The curious thing about these people is that if you ask one of them point-blank which side he would rather see win the war, he will usually, unless he is Colonel Lindbergh, answer with some embarrassment that he would naturally prefer a British victory; but in a second he is off again with some juicy tidbit of British deviousness in the Boer War or some fresh insight into the Boston Tea Party. Rarely does he lift a finger to help the England he would feebly prefer to win, and those who do he bitterly denounces as warmongers.

Sufficient repetition has given this approach a certain effectiveness. Fascists, Communists, and some varieties of Socialist and pacifist, assiduously cultivate what amounts to mass dementia. Under their influence and that of the look-at-the-last-war school, people otherwise perfectly lucid affect an indifference to any distinction between the England of Churchill and the Germany of Hitler, although the faintest possibility of their being forced to live in the nightmare land of the swastika would terrify them out of their minds altogether. Even to those rigid Marxists who take the "long view" that in the end Churchillism and Hitlerism must merge into identity since both are forms of capitalism, it should be apparent that one offers a chance to work for change while the other offers a repressive terror that far outdoes the bungling methods of any czar that ever lived.

The purpose of this special issue, then, is to do the obvious, to demonstrate what everyone knows, consciously or in the recesses of his mind; what the craven dare not face for fear of what it may involve; and what the unscrupulous rationalize away to satisfy their own political ends: namely, that it makes a profound difference who wins this war, all the difference between the certainty of death and the hope of life—even a life of our own making.—R. Europe Under the "Master Race"

BY KONRAD HEIDEN

THE New Order of the Nazis is an attempt to secure to the world the blessings of war for the next thousand years. To comprehend its full significance, we must not be misled by the word "order." The Nazis do not believe in the permanence of law and institutions. Though they speak of the substance and extent of their future realm as the Reich, a term historically old and ambiguous, they do not envisage it as a solidly organized state with stable laws and boundaries. The Great Reich of their dreams is rather a seething volcano of forces out of which one particular force again and again emerges victorious.

The outside world ponders too much over the so-called programs of National Socialism and reads too much into them. The Nazi leaders proclaim and promise a thousand miracles in which they do not for a moment believe. They proclaim and promise a thousand other things in which possibly they believe, but which cannot be accomplished. And because even Nazis can't help telling the truth occasionally in the course of endless ranting, they once in a while say things which are wholly sincere.

Hitler's much-quoted statement "Man lives on war and must perish in peace" is a case in point. This is no hypocritical justification of conquest and pillage, but rather the expression of an almost religious faith in an ideal form of life. War, by the tenets of this philosophy, is no aberration or tragedy, but rather the rule and the good fortune of nations. It is, in the words of Ernst Roehm, "the fount of youth, hope and fulfilment at the same time." War, according to Nazi doctrine, is as vital to nations as bread, not because of the spoils of battle (although they are an incidental objective), but as a constant incentive to ever-greater accomplishments and to the highest development of all the forces needed for survival.

The New Order of the Nazis, then, does not envisage the establishment of a fixed and unshakable tyranny over the entire world, nor does it portend a thousand years' "peace" in which a minority exploits a tortured majority. The Nazis are not such dreamers as to believe in the possibility of an unchallenged rule by force for a thousand years. Plainly and simply, the New Order means a permanent state of war.

People unfamiliar with the Nazi way of thinking will find it hard to visualize this National Socialistic future. The Nazi finds it equally difficult to follow the workings of democracy. For him such concepts as freedom of opinion and equal rights have lost their meaning. All he sees in democracy is disorder, weakness, and degeneration of the state. Values which personal freedom provide are like ultra-violet light to him: he cannot see them, therefore they do not exist. In view of the intellectual abyss that separates the two concepts we may better grasp the implications of the New Order by pointing out first what it is not.

The order which a victorious Hitler will impose on Europe will, in the first place, not be an order based on laws. One look at present-day Germany makes this clear. Its regulations, gagging and muzzling the citizen, have merely the outward aspect of laws. They are not universally valid—for the leaders can break them any time they please and proudly boast of this right; nor are they compulsory—judges can disregard them, limit them, or extend their application at will. And they are not definitive, for tomorrow's "law" may punish what today is permissible. Above all, they never bind the leader, but only those he leads. Nazi law, in short, is not a system of laws at all, but merely a system of orders not yet repealed. Thus it would be a mistake to anticipate from a Hitler victory a new legal code that would be enforced throughout Europe. The New Order will not legislate; it will issue military orders—indefinitely.

"Whoever would really wish from his heart for the victory of the pacifist conception in this world must devote himself by every means to the conquest of the world by the Germans. . ."

Neither can Nazism's New Order be looked upon as an economic system. It would not organize Europe with any idea of solving urgent economic problems, for National Socialism recognizes no urgent economic problems. Such questions are always secondary and can be solved "one way or another," as Hitler puts it.

Within the limitations set by this obliviousness, the Nazis would of course carry out some sort of economic policy in the conquered territories. It is highly probable that they plan to revise drastically the system of production and distribution on the continent. The location of key industries will almost certainly be concentrated in areas where the Germans themselves are concentrated and thinned out elsewhere in accordance with the Nazi scale of racial values. The nations which the Nazis regard as "inferior" would be confined largely to an agricultural economy designed to serve the "master race."

This same scale would be applied even more strikingly in the distribution of consumers' goods, and the Nazi classification of the European nations thus furnishes a likely indication of what the continent will look like in the event of a Hitler triumph. Roughly this "science" divides nations into three categories, which may be termed creative, receptive, and destructive. The most creative, of course, and therefore entitled to the highest standard of living, are the Germans themselves, the "master race." Second to them, by Nazi standards, come the northern nations, from England through northern France, Belgium, Holland, and Scandinavia, to Finland. While these are, in the Nazi view, less productive and efficient than the Germans, they are adaptable, receptive to creative ideas, capable of being entrusted with some of the productive duties of the continent. Under German tutelage they would continue to carry some of the industrial burden of Europe and they would enjoy a corresponding share in the available wealth. Some of the peoples of Southern Europe, notably the Yugoslavs and perhaps the northern Italians, would be granted a similar rating, but, for the most part, the nations of the Mediterranean coasts would fit into the lowest category and be treated accordingly.

State regulation of production would prevail throughout the continent; this would be the instrument for controlling the location of industries and consequently the standard of living in the respective regions. In no case, of course, would living standards compare with those "... forget such terms as humanitarianism, civilization, international rights, and international confidence.

For us, Nazis, these arguments no longer have any appeal, since we long ceased believing in them." (Josef Goebbels; in a speech quoted in the New York Times, March 21, 1939.)

that predominated on the continent from 1920 to 1939, since National Socialist economy is geared to war production—first, last, and always. In four years Nazism produced the most gruesome economic system that any country ever called its own—Goering's Four Year Plan—in order to wage the present war. If the Nazis triumph, every part of the world under their domination is going to enjoy the blessings of such Four Year Plans. Each plan will vary, depending on the momentary distribution of political power, which, according to the Nazis, will undergo constant changes. This permanent kaleidoscope must mean the eclipse of business as a prime power in society, for only in times of stable political conditions, only when power is balanced and unable to cut at will into the orderly process of production, distribution, and consumption, can business assume its fateful role of shaping man's destiny.

It is natural that in a world in which three Panzer divisions can conquer half a continent, business should be reduced to a minor role. When it is realized what importance technology has assumed in Nazi plans, this "revaluation of all values" becomes clearer. The National Socialist considers technology to be the magic key to all economic problems; he himself, in his own view, is an armed technician. To the technician every material problem is theoretically solvable even though the solution has not yet been found and may possibly be found only after many generations.

The proposed New Order does not envisage a definite territorial reorganization of Europe any more than it does a new fixed legal code or a stable economy. Most people have very mistaken ideas of the territorial designs of the Nazis, and the Nazis do their best to encourage such illusions. They constantly allow "official" plans to leak out which they have no real intention of pursuing and they will resort to any political stratagem or improvisation, no matter on how gigantic a scale, to suit immediate ends. No one takes their non-aggression pacts seriously, and it is just as idle to be taken in by even so impressive a move as the forced migration of thousands of Germans from the Baltic countries. At first sight this migration on orders from Berlin impressed the world as the establishment of a permanent boundary between Slavs and Germans. Nothing could be more unlikely. Hitler is always ready to make a political gesture which costs no more than the private happiness of ten thousand people. The move was expedient in the process of humoring his Bolshevik neighbor. It looked more final than the most sacred oath, but Nazi methods can easily send hundreds of thousands of Germans into the Baltic states tomorrow to replace the tens of thousands ordered out today.

The principle to remember in connection with all Nazi commitments, territorial as well as otherwise, is that the Reich of Adolf Hitler considers none of them binding. The Nazis are realists. They reckon with power and draw up their plans accordingly. If the momentary distribution of power permits it, they will remove boundaries that hamper them; they will destroy or transplant whole nations, as they are doing at the moment with Poland, on a scale made possible by the supreme application of modern technology. This is what the Nazis mean by "dynamics."

Based on neither law nor economics, nor on territorial revision, the order which Hitler promises Europe is similarly rootless in a moral sense. This is not belaboring the obvious, for even an order which does not conform to our conception of morality may have moral authority by other standards. But force itself can never be a moral principle, for its very existence bars any moral influence. Power can serve a moral principle, but then it serves; in the Nazi world power does not serve; it rules.

Selection of the strongest is the real, in fact the only, purpose of the New Order. The strongest, once he is found, is going to attend to everything. Politics and war are his business, and to Nazi thinking the two are synonymous. I speak here only of that absolute politics which transcends material values and is pursued for its own sake, politics that does not serve an ideal or benefit a community, but aims at gaining and maintaining power. It is such politics that Hitler has in mind when in a confidential mood he talks of himself to his intimates and whispers raptly: "Yes, I am a man of politics." This is not the game of the run-of-the-mill politician, who may be a man of honor compared to Hitler's type and a useful member of society. This is the absolute politics, which uses everything—men, nations, even God—merely as a means to an end. And what an end!

Nobody gets as drunk with power as the man who controls a party machinery which conveys omnipotence. The party machinery of the totalitarian state is organized evil, for it raises men to god-like positions and lets them forget that there are stronger and more important forces in this world than they and methods that are better than theirs. It is this self-idolizing type of man that Hitler has in mind when he claims: "No one can understand

Germany's Peace Aims

"The German race—that is our faith! It has higher rights than all others. . . . We have the divine right to rule, and we shall assure ourselves of that right." (Dr. Robert Ley; quoted from Munk, "The Economics of Force," p. 70.)

"A new peace shall make Germany mistress of the globe, a peace not hanging on the palm fronds of pacifist womenfolk, but established by the victorious sword of a master race that takes over the world in the service of a higher civilization." (Alfred Rosenberg; quoted from Munk, "The Economics of Force," p. 24.)

me who is not a man of politics himself," i. e., who does not live for power alone. To select this type from the masses of the nations is the real objective of the New Order. The doctrine of race is designed to serve this end and the S. S., the Elite Guard of the Nazis, goes so far as to accept only members whose height is at least 5 feet 10 inches, on the theory that the qualities of the genuine leader are embodied most frequently in tall men.

It may be doubted that this selective system will be preserved. For service under a dictator involves the most unexpected tests, and in the long run neither race nor intelligence nor physical figure will be decisive. What counts most is the perpetual readiness to capitulate morally and unreservedly before any need of the moment. When Hitler, on June 30, 1934, slaughtered half of his closest followers, he preserved men like Himmler, Goebbels, Christian Weber, Adolf Wagner, Emil Maurice, and Wilhelm Berchtold, all types which, according to Nazi racial theories, are definitely "inferior."

In a society which worships success as the Nazis do, success will finally become the decisive selective principle as the result of a natural development. For a long time to come a racial elite may be raised, examined, and awarded breeding prizes, but the real ruling group will be as little identical with that racial elite as it is now. For a Nazi society is founded on war, and war selects leaders of its own. A new type of man emerges in our war-shaken civilization: the armed intellectual, the man equipped with the scientific-technical education of our time who suddenly realizes his power. We have only to look at pictures of the men who appear as envoys of the fascist and semi-fascist countries of Central Europe and review the guards of honor at Herr von Ribbentrop's diplomatic conferences to see the type to perfection, in threatening black with silver braid.

These are the frustrated men from among whom fascism draws its first recruits, men who have studied the primitive propaganda technique of the old revolutionary parties of the left and elaborated it into an infinitely more subtle and effective system. Their greatest force has come from the conviction that they are the flower of modern society and the firm belief that they therefore have a right to absolute rule. These are the men who are created by war and social upheaval. They would indeed, in Hitler's words, "perish in peace." If the Nazi vision of a future world of wars and revolutions is correct, we shall not escape rule by these men anywhere.

If on the other hand, we can trust our feeling that the world is aspiring, through convulsions and disorders, to greater unity and organized peace, then this type will not be long in passing into extinction. It is my own belief that we shall never reach this peace and unity unless all nations take a deeper interest in what produces these same men, a much deeper interest than they took—or take even now—in their governmental institutions. Nationally limited democracy seems no longer able to cope with the problems of this age and it is fast losing its appeal. Only a democratic organization along international lines—a world democracy—is appropriate enough to electrify the people of our times. But this goes beyond the scope of my article.

Notes on the United States, 1950

BY WALTER MILLIS

The question of what would happen to the United States in the event of a German victory lies in good part in the realm of prophecy, not of fact capable of scientific analysis. To treat it in conventional terms is to conceal the character of the question, and to end in an unmanageable welter of alternative hypotheses and conflicting assumptions. I have therefore adopted a familiar device which, if more dramatic, is probably better suited to the subject. We may be quite sure that nothing would actually happen precisely as here indicated, but if the assumptions are probable and the development consistent, this must represent at least the kind of thing which might reasonably be expected to happen, and so offer perhaps a better guide to present decisions than a more abstract and generalized discussion.

Here, then, is an imaginary document, written by a fictitious American who has played a prominent role in edging America into the kind of future which I believe a German victory would produce. The year would be, say, 1950.—W. M.

WHAT I am about to set down cannot be published, for obvious reasons. Indeed, it might be a source of serious embarrassment if even the existence of these notes should become known to the authorities; and I must begin with the warning that what follows is strictly for family eyes. But I have recently been thinking over all that has happened in the last half-dozen years; and I have come to feel that a personal account of my own share in them will not only make my position clearer to the family, but may even be of use as guidance at some future time when, perhaps, the present situation—shall I say, when the situation may have altered?

Let me say at the outset that it was in complete sincerity, and with absolutely no prevision of subsequent events or the effect they would have upon my own career, that I threw myself into the opposition to the so-called Lease-Lend Act in the spring of 1941. I thought then, and I think now, that enforcement of that act would simply have meant the condemnation of innumerable American boys to death on European battlefields; I also thought that it would have ended in enshrining the Roosevelt Administration as a permanent, demagogic, personal dictatorship over the United States. I certainly did not foresee the 1944 election or what followed; I had no idea that it would lead to the confirmation of our Permanent President or that I should be appointed by him to the new Congress. When I took the leadership of the Be Strong America movement, which secured the repeal of the Lease-Lend Act, I didn't know that I should ever profit by it personally, any more than I foresaw these more recent events which have now earned me the ill-concealed attentions of the G-Section.

However, all that was nine years ago. The repeal of the Lease-Lend Act, of course, proved the turning point of the war. I confess that I had hardly anticipated the suddenness with which the heart seemed to go out of the British; I was shocked at the London coup d'état only six months later and at the spectacle of the Mosley government jailing Churchill, trying to surrender the fleet, and going down on its belly to Adolf Hitler when he drove up Whitehall. They said it was the American "stab in the back" that left them no alternative; but we couldn't help that, and I still think it shows how unwise we would have been to tie up with a people so ridden with unsuspected defeatism as they proved to be. But it did present us with a definitely new situation.

It was that fall, you remember, that I was first called to Washington—originally as adviser to the Senate coalition that put over the repealer and afterward as special assistant in the State Department, when Roosevelt saw that he had to broaden the base of his Administration, since his own policy had suffered so shattering a defeat. It's hard for people to realize now how acute the problems were. It wasn't only the Japanese; there was Canada hanging in the air, and the Latin Americans. Of course, the latter question practically solved itself; with South Americans falling over each other in the rush for the German legations and trade missions, it was apparent at once that we might as well stop worrying about anything south of the Orinoco. But a lot of the export people couldn't see it at first, and that added to the confusion. It was already bad enough with the uncertainty about Canada, which served to tie our hands in the Far East.

I can see now that it might have been better if we had forced the issue with Japan while the Australians were still holding out at Singapore. If we had massed the whole of our own fleet against them, together with the British forces that got away from the Mediterranean, the Japanese would have had to back down, and we could probably have saved a big area in the Far East—India, the Dutch Indies, the Philippines, New Caledonia, with all their tin and oil and nickel and other resources—at comparatively small cost. But what could we do? Since the whole point of the new policy had been to stay out of war, we could hardly turn around and make war-like gestures on the other side of the Pacific. And there was always the Canadian problem.

ALONE IN THE WORLD

It was an astute move of Hitler's to refuse to hint anything about a Canadian peace, one way or the other; and don't forget that he had the Canadian divisions as hostages. The British fleet units that finally reached Halifax were clearly not good for much. At that time most of our two-ocean navy was still on the ways. If you added up all that Hitler might have been able to mobilize from his own fleet, from the sizeable remnants of the Italian and French navies, plus the captured British merchant shipping, and remembered that the Luftwaffe was now reinforced with everything that was left of the British air force, air industry, and base facilities, it looked pretty formidable. Some of our younger navy men may have been willing to take on the Japanese anyhow; but there were plenty of older and more cautious heads in the Navy Department who said that it was out of the question under the circumstances. Senator Cartwright made convincing use of their testimony to show that nothing could be done in the Far East until the Canadian business was cleared up; and by that time, of course, Hitler had intervened with his dramatic mediation between the Japanese and the Australians, and the German-Japanese Condominium was established. That effectively settled the question of all the Malay territories, and left the Germans in an unassailable position in the Far East.

Some said afterward that we should have opposed the Canadian peace, which came next. But the astonishing generosity of Hitler's terms pretty well cut the ground from under us: no annexations or indemnities, repatriation of the Canadian divisions, Canada to keep the British fleet units, and immediate absorption of surplus wheat stocks, with nothing in return except the disbanding of the Canadian Air Force and the restoration of St. Pierre-Miquelon to the Pétainists. The Canadians weren't going to turn that down. And could we have started a war over St. Pierre-Miquelon or the appearance of a German trade delegation at Ottawa, at a moment when peace was everywhere else returning to a war-torn world? We were not prophets, remember; we were simply practical men doing the best we could at the time to get out of the mess that Roosevelt had got us into. And though things may have looked reasonably safe on the whole, with the new army coming along, we were certainly not blind to the dangers.

I remember a conversation I had with Cartwright some time in December, 1942—it was at the maneuvers signaling the completion of the 9th and 10th Armored Divisions. The German Permanent Mission had just steamed up New York harbor in the Imperator (she had been the Queen Elizabeth), formally reopening unrestricted trans-Atlantic travel. The ship was jammed to the guards with German tourists, and half the tycoons in the country had booked passage for the return trip to see what the New Europe was like. There was a big parade and reception; everything went off a lot better than had been expected (for the police even then had found quiet ways of keeping the Jews off the streets), and the only unfortunate note was a minor riot raised by Fiorello LaGuardia, who afterward made himself so notorious that the G-Section finally retired him from circulation.

Commenting on the affair, Cartwright said that so far was so good. International trade was restored and was being put on a firm basis; there was peace everywhere in the world; while we already had ten armored divisions, with more to come, a big air force, and a growing navy. But he confessed himself worried. We were alone in the world. The Canadians, not to mention the British, naturally hated us like poison; from the Orinoco southward there wasn't one government not taking its orders straight from Berlin; we were running acutely short of rubber and tin; there was a ridiculous amount of squawking about the price of coffee, and we badly needed to get a real foreign trade going if only to cushion the shocks and dislocations which our economy had been taking. The trouble was that there was virtually nobody to trade with except Hitler, and since he controlled nearly everything we wanted to buy and had alternative sources—in Canada and the Argentine and Australia, and in the British and Western European factories—for nearly everything we had to sell, it looked as if the trading might be difficult. I observed that, to make matters worse, a whole lot of the labor people were already beginning to say that we had sold them down the river—since all the great rearmament effort and defend-democracy business had just wound up with Hitler running the world—while a lot of the industrialists, who had backed us against Roosevelt in '41, were beginning to ask what we were going to do about strikes and taxes. I didn't like the temper of the country; it was as if there had been a sort of moral let-down with the peace. Cartwright agreed. You see, we weren't fooling ourselves, even then.

It was easy enough to modify the Wagner Act in the winter of 1943, but that didn't help much. We only ran into the big strike epidemic in the defense industries that spring and summer. And I can say in the confidence of these notes that the Germans didn't make things any easier. They kept the trade negotiations hanging on a month-to-month basis, and only those who were on the inside of things can know how much trouble and anxiety that caused. They had their tourists and lecturers and industrial commissioners everywhere—along with the Americans coming back from the German culture tours—and besides the propaganda for the Hitler Order which all these people naturally made in public, there was a lot more of a different kind made in secret. There is no doubt that they gave a lot of help to the Communists in the strike epidemic; working through their Rome organization, they stirred up the Italian communities, reviving all the old Fascist organizations which had flourished in Mussolini's time, and we knew they deliberately precipitated the great anti-Semitic riots in New York and Baltimore.

Yet what could we do? We dared not jeopardize the trade negotiations; the rubber problem was really serious from a defense point of view, the more particularly as we were in a weak position in regard to the refugees and the press. These problems, as you may not know, were in fact closely related. Of course, we had practically every malcontent from Europe and Asia who had been able to get away ensconced comfortably in the United States. It was not only that they did everything in their own power to raise rebellion in their home countries; but they found easy access to our press, making it one of their most powerful weapons. It was amazing with what irresponsibility our newspapers—even some of the greatest ones—continued their assaults, not only on the Hitler Order but against Herr Hitler himself, after the reestablishment of peace. The Germans put it quite reasonably: without the refugees they might have overlooked the press attacks, and without the press they might have overlooked the refugee agitators, but with each abetting the other they could not safely do business with us. We either had to hand over the refugees or to suppress the excesses of the newspapers. It was an argument difficult to combat.

This was the real origin of the press law of November, 1943, though I will not deny that there were many other reasons which made it seem preferable, as between the two solutions, to proceed against the press—especially as a way of getting around the Constitutional difficulty appeared at just that time. This was provided by the conviction of Jay Darling, the cartoonist, on a libel charge based on a grossly impertinent drawing of Herr Hitler. (The German Consul in New York was behind the case, though this was not made known.) It seemed quite simple to extend the concept of libel sufficiently to sustain a law which would at least impose that measure of decency and control that was becoming, among all our difficulties, more and more necessary. I helped Cartwright draft the bill, and I still think the reform might have been easily and quietly effected if it had not been for the intervention of Wendell Willkie. When he raised his still great following to make a rabid issue of free speech out of it, a hue and cry went up. We finally got the law upheld by one vote in the Supreme Court. That was in the spring of 1944, and even the justices could see by that time how urgent it was on all accounts—foreign relations, labor, the Jewish problem, and the rest—but popular excitement had been roused by then to an almost unmanageable pitch. However, we at least had less and less trouble with the press thereafter; while Herr Hitler's clearly voiced approval materially eased our way with the German Mission.

THE ELECTIONS OF 1944

By that time the 1944 Presidential elections were looming before us. As you know, I had been a lifetime believer in the American constitutional system; and it had few more powerful defenders, in its whole history, than Cartwright. But it was that spring, I think, that both of us began to see some of its more deep-seated defects. For one thing, as a result of the virtual deadlock which followed the Lease-Lend repeal, it had obliged us to run the country for some three years by what amounted to a Senatorial committee—an agency utterly unsuited to the task. I confess we sometimes wished rather acutely for a strong executive leadership, like that which Roosevelt had exerted in his first terms; I have always said that one of the great tragedies lay in the fact that a man of such powers, about whose policies there was so much that was good, should have had his efforts nullified by the deep-seated distrust we all felt for him. It was chiefly because of that distrust that I opposed the Lease-Lend Act, and I have sometimes wondered. . . .

But that is neither here nor there. We now had to elect a new President, and it couldn't have come at a more unfortunate time. The old Republican Party was in fragments, and what was left of the Democratic was held together only by the threads of patronage. We were virtually forced to set up the Be Strong America Party, and when John Smith, who had a firm grip on the ABC unions by that time, approached us, the last hesitation disappeared. I want to assure you, as solemnly as I can, that I had no thought of personal ambition in the matter; it was simply that there was so clearly no alternative. You see, we already knew what had really happened to the Canadian airfields and what was going on at St. Pierre-Miquelon; the big commercial air base in British Guiana was getting bigger and less commercial every week; while our two-ocean navy, that looked so colossal when we planned it back in 1940, seemed pretty weak, as it now came to completion, beside what the Hitler Order had produced in the meantime. The German Mission was as polite as could be, but not very helpful and wholly uncommunicative.

We simply had to have a strong party, ready to stand for order and responsibility at home, for rational co-operation with Herr Hitler, and for enough armed strength on our side to make a genuine cooperation possible. Both Cartwright and I thought at the outset that it could be managed without seriously affecting the essentials of the old system. Roosevelt, naturally, no longer counted. The press law, and the expansion of the old FBI into the Department of Information, had given us a pretty good control over the situation; while it was soon apparent that Hopkins and Willkie, who were dividing the reactionaries, the back-number "liberals," the irresponsibles, the refugee-lovers, and the Jews between them, would simply kill each other off. Other things being equal, it could have been handled easily. But the combination of the threatening international situation, the new defense program, and the election touched off—inevitably, I suppose—the one insoluble issue that had been hanging over our heads ever since 1941.

That was, of course, the financial issue—or rather, what the financial issue implied. In the early years of rearmament the enormous deficits had made no difference; everybody thought of them as temporary, while the idea that war might lie immediately ahead made everyone willing to sink his doubts or differences and let the future take care of itself. There was a rather marked let-down with the reestablishment of peace—I was troubled about it at the time, as I have already said—but all of our people were of course committed to maximum defense. Colonel Lindbergh was a tower of strength on the subject, and the Roosevelt programs were still running. But now they were running out, and it was necessary to undertake new and larger ones.

It was not only the size of the effort that had at last really begun to sink in, it was its permanency. The Congressional Record for the final years is, of course, no longer publicly available; if it were, you could see, from the violent debates over the 1944 service appropriation bills, the real nature of the dilemma. How were the new programs to be financed? It was obvious that the answer would determine the whole character of the economy for a long time to come. In spite of improvements in revenues, there was no hope that the existent tax structure would ever reach a balance on this new and permanent level of armament expenditure. The continued voting of deficits no longer concealed the fundamental economic readjustments implied in the process; people had come to realize that deficit financing was simply a confused and inefficient way of effecting the readjustments. To keep the armament effort going we had to contemplate a permanently managed currency, a permanently managed production system, with permanent priorities and control of investment, drastic redistributions of the tax burden, and very considerable sacrifices from everybody. There wasn't a vested interest in the United States that didn't see itself affected by the prospect, and there wasn't one that didn't find somebody to shout his fool head off for it in the babel on the floor of Congress.

PERMANENT PRESIDENT SMITH

The Germans deliberately made matters worse by the pressure they kept exerting on the supply of imported strategic materials. They had here a leverage out of all proportion to the quantity of goods imported. The tremendous costs, delays, and inefficiencies involved in developing substitutes were formidable enough; what was even worse was the irritating effect of all the minor shortages and economies on the general public. I don't know how much sleep I lost over the fiasco of the artificial-tire scheme, and the resultant scandal. I don't know how many times I damned the man who first invented coffee and enslaved our populace to that utterly useless beverage. Of course, a people with the brains and energy of the Americans could have solved all these difficulties; with only a little forbearance, a little willingness to make sacrifices, to accept voluntary production and priority controls—as they had accepted them in '40 and '41—and some common honesty about paying taxes, the republican system needn't have committed suicide. But the moral deterioration had gone even deeper than we realized. The trouble was that we had to ask these sacrifices and readjustments as a permanent thing, not just as an emergency measure. And I suppose, at bottom, our position was psychologically weak. The one end of our whole policy since 1941 had been peace; but here we had to ask all the exertions of a war. Well, you just can't ask a people to sink their differences and concentrate every energy on a war effort without some sort of present or prospective war to offer them. No man can make bricks without straw. The summer wasn't over before Cartwright saw that the time for asking them was going by; we would have to start telling them pretty quick.

As the Be Strong America national chairman, I was able to choke off most of the popular debate and keep the campaign pretty well oiled; but Congress, including all our own friends, was split from top to bottom and acting like a madhouse. The budget never was passed; and everywhere else the deadlock was complete. As you know, we only barely elected John Smith in November; as you may not know, the Be Strong America majority in both Houses, though it was big enough, was bitterly divided against itself. The conservatives wanted to demobilize the whole defense effort, make a final settlement with the Hitler Order, balance the budget, and "go back to the capitalist system"—as if that were still possible! Cartwright and the progressives insisted upon the clean-cut solution of boldly taking the powers necessary to the times. But Smith, who knew the terms as to domestic as well as foreign policy on which Hitler would naturally have to insist if the conservatives had their way, realized that both courses really led to the same thing in the end. And he made enough of the leading conservative Senators see it too. With no budget, we were living on month-to-month grants; the second and last wave of strikes was at its height; the anti-Semitic riots were getting completely out of hand; the German lease of the big Tampico air base had just been announced, while a squadron of "Canadian" long-range bombers was to make a good-will visit to Washington for the inauguration. Smith had the will to act—and he acted.

I have often thought since of the famous January 20 speech to the old republican Congress, which had just voted him full powers and abolished itself: "I was elected by no single party but by a movement—the Be Strong America movement—a mass movement of the whole people, and a movement not only as wide and as deep but as irresistible as the spirit of that people. In their name I say: America from this hour shall and will be strong!" So it stands in all the schoolbooks; but a lot the people had to do with it. He is our Permanent President now; he made me his deputy in the Appointive Congress, and I served him as loyally as I could through the next three years. But in spite of everything he has done, I wonder how strong he has really made us. It was the fact that I wondered a little too loudly, when the terms of our accession to the Hitler Order became known, that really lay at the bottom of my dismissal from the government. Though I have never spoken of it, I suppose you know how narrowly I missed being shot in the second "purge"—because I had begun to wonder whether there were not a good many elements of the old democratic system which it might have been wiser to preserve. This is a big country to run, in these hard, unhappy, and restless times, by propaganda and concentration camps. There is weakness in those methods as well as strength. I wonder now how long we can go on being drained dry for the sake of the Berlin profiteers and place-holders, not to mention the soldiers. They have already got 1,500,000 of our young men (at least that; the official figure is ridiculous) involved in Central China in their endless "Asiatic incident," and God—or maybe Heinrich Himmler—alone knows how many have actually died there. A little more of this and it will be worse than if we had let Roosevelt get us into the European War in '41.

At least, none of this is what I had anticipated. I know it is the required thing nowadays to say that it was all planned down to the last detail by the genius of the Permanent President and Cartwright. But it was not, and I have had to leave these notes to show that it was not. Because only in this way can I make my true position clear to my children. I am horrified by what I see around me; I am profoundly disturbed for the future of my country, and I feel that somewhere there must have been a mistake that might have been avoided. But if so, it was not and could not have been deliberate; I cannot believe that I was at fault. I, like Cartwright and the rest, never plotted the end of the old republic. As I have shown, we were simply practical men trying to do our best with a situation as it developed. Reviewing the whole record, there is no point at which I can see how we might have acted differently. Not one. Or only one, perhaps. I have sometimes asked myself what really would have happened if we had not killed the Lease-Lend Act. But that is the purest speculation.

The Fate of Latin America

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

UNTIL about a year ago the illusion prevailed in Latin America, as in the United States, that the Atlantic Ocean would be enough to protect the Western Hemisphere from the effects of a Nazi victory in Europe. And just as in this country, the idea fitted admirably into the schemes of Hitler's propaganda office. In the case of Latin America, however, Nazi agents had a much richer field for exploitation than this false feeling of security; they had at their disposal, and waiting only to be manipulated, the deep distrust which certain Latin-American circles reserve for any action or proposal originating in Washington. As soon as the European war started, the "geopoliticians" and historians of the Third Reich set themselves with Teutonic zeal to the task of scrutinizing the archives for every unhappy fact that could be recalled to the minds of Latin Americans concerning their relations with the United States. From the Plata to the Caribbean the agents of Herr Goebbels went armed with profuse literature calculated to revive and deepen all the misgivings that preceded the era of the Good Neighbor.

But neither of these propaganda devices could be regarded as conclusive. After all, the sending of marines to Nicaragua and Haiti and even Grover Cleveland's insistence on the right of the United States to the last word in all matters affecting the Western Hemisphere seem curiously mild and archaic when compared with the explosions of force that have shaken the world in the past few years. Along with these tidbits of history, and with the soothing reminders about the width of the Atlantic, went a more potent appeal: the argument that only a Hitler victory could save Latin-American economy from complete stagnation.

Nazi agents emphasized that Latin-American countries not only had nothing to fear from Hitler so far as their independence was concerned, but would benefit hugely by the New Order in Europe. Latin-American goods that now found the United States markets hermetically sealed would flood Europe after the war, taking the place of exports that formerly came from the defeated "pluto-democracies." The exploited proletarian nations of the New World would free themselves forever from the humiliating tutelage of the Bad Neighbor of the North, and join the splendid New Order of the Have-Nots.

The undeniable economic difficulties of the Latin-American countries, most of which were, until the beginning of the war, entirely dependent upon European markets, provide the nourishment upon which this brand of Hitler propaganda feeds. Every prospect of genuine collaboration between Latin America and the United States is ridiculed in that considerable section of the press which has come under German influence. What the United States wants from you, Latin Americans are told, is that you should resign yourselves to a subordinate economy exclusively adjusted to the interests of American production. Never will the Colossus of the North allow your meats, your wheat, your cotton, or any other basic product of your economy to enter the United States if a single farmer of the Middle West or South thereby considers his interests impaired. You must renounce your traditional sources of wealth and devote yourselves in the future to doing the petty tasks assigned to you by American industry while your own population suffers starvation and death. And at the same time Wall Street will not cease to remind you of your debts. (Here Nazi propaganda scores an extra point by announcing that the hour of Hitler's victory will mark the liquidation of all debts, the beginning of a new economy and the end of everything that had to do with the old order. The United States can offer you nothing better than the prospect of adapting yourselves to the coarse egoism of its super-capitalistic system, the Nazi sales talk continues, while Hitler, by unchaining all the creative forces in Europe, will open undreamed of markets for your meat, your wheat, and your cotton. Politically, moreover, a victorious Hitler will be your best ally against the threat of hemisphere domination by the United States.

Unfortunately for those who were prepared to give a sympathetic hearing to such arguments, the deterioration of the chances of a quick German victory has obliged the Nazis to adopt a position of interference which is hard to reconcile with their former attitude of kindly patronizing. In the degree to which increased help from the United States to Great Britain threatened Hitler with ultimate defeat, his main interest in Latin America switched to an unremitting effort to sow unrest with the purpose of creating a diversion of the American effort. Totalitarian intrigues soon began to crystallize in a way that stirred a reaction on the part of non-fascist elements in the population and in several countries obliged the governments to take a more belligerent stand against the propaganda of the Axis powers. In the course of a year public opinion has experienced a remarkable evolution, much like that which has taken place in the United States.

Today, from Buenos Aires to Mexico the conviction is overwhelming that a Hitler victory would have deep and pernicious effects on the fate of Latin America. It is possible that exports to Europe would recover their previous volume and even go beyond, but business would be carried on only on the terms that Nazi Germany would condescend to allow.

To some extent this German domination, based on a potential victory, has already asserted itself. As early as 1936, in fact, the Nazis succeeded in drawing Brazil into a commercial agreement calling for the exchange of surplus coffee, hides, and cotton for chemicals and hardware. The deal proved beneficial to Germany and harmful to Brazil, in the one-sided tradition of all Nazi barter arrangements. Hitler had to rely on the Integralists, or Brazilian Nazis, to put the deal across, and he had to contend with the opposition of courageous anti-fascists, like Menotta de Pichia, who were still able to challenge the Vargas regime. With Hitler victorious in Europe, such commercial agreements will not even call for discussion. They will be imposed.

Nor, on the basis of past evidence, is it reasonable to suppose that such commercial relations would leave room for political independence. In the case of the Nazis, trade is followed by the flag rather than the reverse; and the flag in this case means the Gestapo and all those devices of conquest which respectable Nazi tradesmen intro-

Senator Wheeler, Please Note

"Latin America—we shall create a new Germany there. We have a right to this continent. . . . We require two movements abroad, a loyal and a revolutionary one. Do you think that's so difficult? I think we are capable of it. We should not be here otherwise. We shall not land troops like William the Conqueror and gain Brazil by the strength of arms. Our weapons are not visible ones. It will be a simple matter for me to produce unrest and revolts in the United States so that these gentry will have their hands full with their own affairs. We shall soon have storm troopers in America . . . we shall have men whom degenerate Yankeeedom will not be able to challenge." (From Hitler's "Mein Kampf"; as cited by Rauschnig in "The Voice of Destruction.")

duced into Norway and the Low Countries by way of preparation for the ultimate arrival of parachutists and Panzer divisions. Among the very business men who would enjoy the favors of German commercial "protection" Hitler would find the financiers and supporters of this Fifth Column. He might well start by drawing a South American republic into the New Order—for example, Brazil, which is already far along on the Nazi highroad. From there he could extend his influence by the simple device of giving the other countries of the continent a choice between economic subjugation and eventual ruin. A series of totalitarian putsches would then be perpetrated to finish the last vestiges of democracy—and Simon Bolivar's dream of a strong, free, united Hispanic America would fade into oblivion.

But this Nazification of Latin America would place it in open conflict with the United States. Left alone in the struggle against Hitler, this country would find itself justified in adopting toward a German-controlled Latin America a more or less interventionist attitude. "Yankee domination" would become self-defense. It would be difficult even for anti-imperialists in the United States to expect this country to remain indifferent while Hitler transformed one Latin-American country after another into bases for intrigue, and eventual attack, against the democracy of the Western Hemisphere and against the United States itself. In the life-and-death fight between a victorious Germany and a United States determined to bar Nazi insanity from this part of the world, the Latin-American countries would become a gigantic battlefield.

The alternative to this dark outlook lies in the common interest of the two Americas in a victory for democracy. It is only through the defeat of Hitler and of everything that Hitlerism would mean as it grew and became permanent, that a policy of solidarity and of understanding could grow up between the Americas and put an end to the old differences and resentments. To this end it is essential that the Latin-American countries do not feel themselves placed in a position of having to choose between two evils. Particularly dangerous from this standpoint is the kind of talk which recently crystallized in Henry Luce's pronouncement on the "American Century," in which the United States is pictured as ruling the world of tomorrow. Any hint of an attempt at hegemony in that sense would arouse in the rest of the continent the strongest apprehension.

Going further, a healthy policy of inter-continental cooperation must take into account the by-no-means unreasonable sensitivities of Latin Americans. I know how irritated they are that their best men of science and their best writers remain unnoticed in the United States. Latin America has men of great value. It has always had them. A little capital like San Jose, Costa Rica, has a group of intellectuals that would do honor to any country. It was they who on the eve of the last Pan-American conference signed the courageous manifesto protesting the insolence of the German Minister who had openly attempted to induce the Parliament of Costa Rica to sabotage the Havana conference.

As far back as 1916 Georg Brandes, the great Danish literary critic, told me in Copenhagen that the first person in the New World who had become interested in his work was a Colombian—Señor Baldomero Sanin Cano. Still living in Bogota, Señor Cano is one of the best critics of our time, but I doubt whether there are more than six persons in this country who have heard of him. Nor have Latin-American scientists received the recognition they deserve. American magazines and publishing houses accept articles and books by European authors of doubtful merit, while superior writers and scholars of Latin America remain neglected.

This state of affairs has created a national susceptibility to German propaganda which the Nazis have known well how to exploit. In such an atmosphere of rooted mistrust, to speak of an "American Century" limited to the United States is to show a gross lack of perception.

A still greater mistake would be to underestimate the deep democratic feeling that pulses in the masses of Latin America, even in those countries where dictators enjoy the support of American high finance. Every battle for freedom—regardless of where it was fought—has won a generous response from the people of Latin America. We Spanish Republicans could forget only with great difficulty how the America of our language and of our blood was, in its heart, on our side during our titanic fight. The day the Republic was finally defeated was everywhere in Latin America a day of despair and sorrow. Naturally that fact escaped the attention of those who confound Argentina with the Jockey Club and El Circulo de Armas, or Colombia with the antechamber of the Archbishop of Bogota. Only in reactionary circles, where the Nevile Hendersons of the democratic nations used to move, was Franco the great favorite, as Hitler is today.

The Nazis know how to use the lasting influence of Spain for their attempts at totalitarian penetration in Latin America, but their task will be extremely arduous without the unrestricted cooperation of the Spanish Falanx. Today Hitler can hardly rely on the Italian fascist groups to recruit sympathizers for the Axis. In some countries—Argentina and Brazil—the Black Shirts outnumber the Brown, and in other places, like Peru, Italian economic domination is greater than German, but the continuous defeats suffered by the armies of Graziani and Cavallero have considerably cooled the propagandistic ardor of Il Duce's followers. Mussolini's chief appeal now is to the cabaret singers, who have found in him an inexhaustible subject for caustic humor.

The hunger and terror that now prevail in Franco's Spain hardly give the Falangists a platform from which to address themselves with any authority to anybody. But the Spanish Falanx throughout Latin America is composed of people who have easy access to high society, who enjoy the advantage of speaking Spanish, and whose many relatives in the country allow them to move in circles in which national policies are decided. The appointment of Serrano Suñer, the chief and soul of the Spanish Falanx, as Foreign Minister has greatly favored the work of this branch of Hitler's Fifth Column. Spanish legations and Spanish consulates in Latin America today are mainly centers of Falanx activity conducted by agitators who serve Hitler. When a Nazi diplomat is obliged to leave his post, as in the case of Dr. Otto Langmann in Montevideo, agents of the Spanish Falanx take his place and continue his subversive work.

Officials of the Falanx in Latin America, whether engaged in social aid or in promoting new football teams, have to swear an oath of allegiance to Franco. They must blindly follow orders from Madrid, where Señor Jimenez Arnau, national representative of the foreign department of the Falanx, is entrusted with the delicate task of assuring the closest collaboration between Falangists and Nazis in the former Spanish empire. Arnau has full powers to appoint and discharge his subordinates in Latin America. On December 19, 1939, he named Genaro Riestra as leader of the Cuban Falanx, although the Cuban Ministry of the Interior had already issued a decree outlawing that organization. A week later he dismissed Rafael Cuyos, provincial leader of the Argentinian Falanx, for "lack of initiative and of genuine Falangist spirit."

During the past months the Falanx has been working very hard in Latin America in favor of the so-called "Latin Bloc" (the most religious-minded Falangists prefer to speak of it as a "Catholic Bloc"), which would flourish under the benediction of Pius XII. Of Spanish origin is the idea of a union of the totalitarian or half-totalitarian Latin nations, including Belgium, France, Italy, Portugal, and Spain, under a symbol more attractive to Catholics than the swastika, which would assure at the same time the support of Latin America. During his stay as ambassador to Fascist Spain, Marshal Pétain was maneuvered in this direction. The high Spanish clergy, undoubtedly acting on instructions from Rome, converted him to the idea of a vast Catholic bloc to oppose Nazi Germany in the event that a victorious Hitler should treat the Vatican too harshly.

Nevertheless, Phalanx propaganda in Latin America in support of the Catholic Bloc is to be viewed not as opposition to Hitler but as one more factor in the general struggle against democracy. For the Phalanx the two major enemies are Great Britain and the United States. A Catholic Bloc would complete the anti-British as well as the anti-Yankee front. All those in Latin America who resent the Nazi persecution of Catholics in Germany and Poland, and who consequently reject the thought of marching behind Hitler, could thus be incorporated into a far-reaching movement which accepted fascist principles as the basis of future society without, at the same time, accepting the leadership of Berlin. This is an extremely dangerous maneuver which needs to be watched with the same vigilant attention as the talk of a "negotiated peace."

Latin America is by now aware that its fate depends largely on the outcome of the battle being waged in Europe and Africa. In some places the danger is more visible, more imminent, than in others; and the powers of resistance are weaker. National pride is a factor in minimizing the peril. To some Latin Americans it seems a disgraceful confession to admit the existence of a fifth column—as though it were one of those maladies which forbid discussion and must remain a closely guarded family secret. But the common man, in Latin America as elsewhere, realizes what endless paths of horror would open before him should Nazism succeed in infesting his country, and he knows how to counter-attack. A few weeks ago in Rosario (Argentina), a crowd rushed into a theater where Nazi sympathizers were holding a meeting, and in five minutes the show was over. Such indications of the public temper have lately become frequent.

It is this strong feeling for freedom, rooted in the masses of Latin America, that promises the greatest hope of a real inter-American defense against totalitarian penetration of the Western Hemisphere. In Latin America, as everywhere else, the fight against fascism cannot be entrusted to the half-fascists, to the defeatists, or to the appeasers, but only to those with an iron determination to liquidate Hitler and his works forever.

Imperialism, Old and New

BY ALBERT VITON

MUCH of the confusion in contemporary political thinking must be attributed to the tendency to use the same words to describe realities which, in spite of outward resemblance, are fundamentally different. British conquest and rule of "backward" peoples is called imperialism and Hitler's conquest and exploitation of "minderwertige" ("inferior") peoples is likewise called imperialism. What is more natural, then, than to equate the two? And to arrive at the conclusion that since this war is a struggle between rival imperialisms, there is little reason to support one side or the other? It is a struggle between an old, satiated, perhaps degenerate, imperialism and a vigorous, rising new one.

No doubt there is a hard kernel of truth in this analysis. Hitler is too cynical a nationalist to fight a world war for ideological reasons. German policy in Hungary, Rumania, Norway, and other countries shows boldly Hitler's utter contempt for his foreign ideological fellow-travelers. He has used his fascist followers abroad not as propagandists of a faith but as instruments in his policy of German domination. Berlin had no scruples about coming to terms with Carol after he had liquidated Codreanu and scores of other fascist leaders (it was Carol, in fact, who rejected the German advances), and the Nazis unhesitatingly betrayed their Hungarian disciples the moment it became evident that more could be had from the feudal, aristocratic Teleki government. Nor are the British fighting merely for ideological reasons. They are fighting for their own liberties and they are fighting to preserve the empire that makes them a great power.

This view of the struggle, however, has only a limited validity, for it ignores the wider implications. Concentrating on one small fraction of reality, it distorts the whole picture almost beyond recognition. The plain fact is that not all imperialisms are alike. There are fundamental differences which make some less of a social evil than others. There is a distinct type of imperialism, like the Spanish and Portuguese varieties, which might be called agrarian or feudal imperialism; French imperialism stands somewhere between this type and the kind of capitalistic imperialism developed by the Dutch and, to a far greater extent, by the British, who have added to it a democratic element almost completely absent in even the Dutch type; and within recent years there has emerged a totally new type which is best exemplified by German imperialism. The difference between these various types is not only one of degree of exploitation and oppression; the difference, I submit, is one of kind. Fascist imperialism is not only more cruel, more reactionary, and more oppressive than capitalistic imperialism, not to speak of capitalist-democratic imperialism; it is a throwback to primitive, barbarian exploitation, administered with all the efficiency of the Total State.

The evils of capitalist imperialism are obvious. It is inevitable that private profit should be its motive; hence low wages, horrible working conditions, the lack of interest in social services. Narrowly interpreted, capitalist imperialism can be almost as oppressive and as exploiting as the feudal type. The policies which the Belgian King Leopold I used to develop the Congo are a good example. There is no need to describe here the outrageous cruelties perpetrated on the natives, the inhuman exploitation, and the systematic terror of Leopold's Congo officials; anyone interested will find all the facts in the work of Morel, Hinde, Olivier, and others. And from an immediate capitalistic point of view, the Congo administration was a success. The Crown domain, Leopold's personal estate, produced a net profit of $16,000,000 during the ten years from 1896 through 1905. But fortunately for the natives, this type of imperialism is, in the not-too-long run, simply bad capitalism. It is self-defeating. What were the results of Leopold's reign of terror? The Congo was turned into a desert and a cemetery. Its population of 20 to 30 millions declined by 1908 to 8.5 millions. Thickly populated, well-cultivated regions were turned into arid wastes. But deserts do not produce dividends nor do corpses consume cotton goods and trinkets. After a few years of holocaust the country ceased to produce and became a liability. It has never recovered.

The British learned early the lesson the Belgians had to learn so painfully. They learned that far more can be extracted from the colonies by moderate, continuous exploitation of labor and natural resources than by robbing them of their accumulated wealth, which amounts to little enough. Moreover, they discovered that productive human beings yield profits not only by their labor but by purchasing the manufactured goods of Britain. They realized that it was to their interest not merely to have a large supply of reasonably contented labor, but to increase the productiveness of their subjects and to raise their standard of living. Only the British

Nazi Imperialism Points With Pride

"Germany has in her protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia not only established peace and order, but above all, has laid the foundation for a new economic prosperity and increasing understanding between the two nations. England still has much to accomplish before she can point to similar results in her protectorate in Palestine."
Adolf Hitler in a speech delivered October 6, 1939, as quoted in Facts in Review, October 14.

"The Nordic race has a right to rule the world. We must make this right the guiding star of our foreign policy." (Hitler in a letter to Otto Strasser, May 21, 1930.)

have known how to make an empire pay over the years.

It cannot be denied, moreover, that in some ways the natives have benefited from the British system. The standard of living has usually risen, although far too slowly; the processes of justice have been made available to all; education by precept and example has in the more primitive countries raised the native moral and cultural level; population generally has increased—much more rapidly, in fact, than has been good altogether.

Egypt offers an excellent example of the comparative benefits of capitalist imperialism, even when unenlightened by humanitarian social consideration. Sir Evelyn Baring (later Lord Cromer) was no doubt greatly concerned with protecting the interests of European holders of Egyptian securities. That was why he was sent there. But he soon discovered that Egypt could not be put on its feet without fundamental changes in its social and cultural structure. He found the country bankrupt and in chaos. The irrigation system—Egypt's life-bearing channels—was in a sad state of decay. Public works were almost solely for ostentation (the Khedive had built an opera with money borrowed at usurious rates and regularly engaged expensive European artists). Production was at a low ebb. Fellaheen were flogged with the rhinoceros whip, subjected to various kinds of corvée (forced labor), and brutally oppressed by tax-gatherers. Within an incredibly short period after his arrival Cromer had not merely assured regular interest payments to the European bond-holding swindlers (Britain was in no way responsible for the murderous debts) but was able to undertake a series of highly remunerative public works. Corvée and rhinoceros whip were abolished and corruption was reduced; and the life of the peasantry was considerably improved.

There is no need to attribute humanitarian motives to the great consul, although I am convinced that a purely materialistic interpretation fails to do him justice. Even if Cromer was primarily interested in safeguarding the income of European bondholders, in making jobs for deserving Englishmen, in increasing Egypt's production of cotton to feed Lancashire's mills, and in creating markets for British goods, the fact still remains that the great masses of Egyptians benefited from his immense, highly competent, and, from a personal point of view, unselfish labors. Production increased rapidly; import figures more than doubled; social services were improved and made available to the poorest; the tyranny alike of the pashas and officials was curbed. Above all, the idea of equality before the law—a revolutionary concept in the East—and equitable treatment in the distribution of water were established. Egypt is still dreadfully poor and the standard of living for 90 per cent of the population is still lower than an American can imagine; but conditions today simply cannot be compared with those prevailing when Baring first arrived.

The trouble has been that even Britain has not realized the full potentialities of capitalistic imperialism. The private interests of individual capitalists were made synonymous with the interests of the nation, to the detriment of both Britain and the native peoples. Low wages, lack of social development, and the laissez-faire doctrine which has been traditional with the Colonial Office have prevented Britain no less than the colonies from realizing the promises of the British system. Whereas the highly developed Dominions take annually £4 10s. worth of British goods per head of population, in the colonies and India each person has been able to purchase British goods only to the value of 4s. 3d.

But Britain, aside from being a capitalistic country, has also been a democracy. This factor has played a far more impressive role in British imperial history than is generally realized. Freedom of speech and press in Britain has meant that reformers, humanitarians, and socialists have been able to carry on propaganda against the inevitable abuses of colonial rule. In no other imperialist country has it been so easy to arouse public opinion and legislature against the deeds of colonial agents. Once aroused, Parliament was able to make its weight felt. Dozens of investigating commissions have been sent out in response to popular and parliamentary criticism; and as often as not they have made no attempt to camouflage the ugly realities.

Nor have the British limited freedom of speech and press to themselves. Colonials have enjoyed a surprising amount of both, and it has stood them in good stead. True, the amount of freedom available to Nigeria, Ceylon, or India cannot be compared with freedom as understood in this country; neither, however, can it be compared with the tyranny maintained by the French, Dutch, and other imperial powers. A newspaper has to call pretty openly for riot before the British will take action.

The far-reaching effects of these policies are obvious. The fact is that only British colonies have developed healthy political nationalist movements and have come to within measurable distance of self-government. It should not be forgotten that Gandhi, Nehru, and most of the other Indian leaders are the products of British education and training. Seeley and other nineteenth-century British thinkers pointed out that the greatest disadvantage of imperialist rule is that it destroys native self-respect and the capacity for self-government. We know now that this has not happened in the British colonies, primarily because the British permitted a considerable amount of freedom. All major colonial reform movements were born in Britain. Westminster was first (excepting Denmark, which did not count) to outlaw the slave trade. Slavery itself was first prohibited in the British Empire, as was forced labor for private purposes—a monstrous evil which continues to this day in certain colonial possessions.

All this does not mean for a moment that imperialism is justifiable or that it can become the altruistic, humanitarian, and progressive thing which its exponents say it is. Imperialism is inherently anti-democratic, socially static, and culturally sterile. Its oft-proclaimed promises will not be realized until it reforms itself out of existence. Fortunately British imperialism has begun to do just that.

It is precisely this promise of reforming itself out of existence that is the most hopeful feature of British imperialism. British imperialists have always proclaimed self-government to be the ultimate development of their rule. The day India demands free European political institutions "will be the proudest day in English history," Macaulay exclaimed at the end of his speech on the government of India in 1833. Again and again British statesmen have upheld self-government as the natural fruition of their rule. The promise has been all too slow of fulfilment; but it has not been a vain hope. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Eire, Egypt, and Iraq are evidence of that.

From the comparatively enlightened policies of the British Empire to fascist imperialism is indeed a far cry. None of the fundamental ideas which determined the lines of development of the empire operate in the German scheme. Like British imperialism, it inevitably follows the socio-economic pattern established at home. That pattern is fundamentally different from the liberal capitalistic pattern we have known, and its colonial policy will be just as different.

Fascist society is based on war. Both the economic organization and the social structure are carefully adapted to that end. Not only can a completely planned economy be operated best under conditions of permanent total mobilization but a militarization of society is considered by fascist theoreticians a good thing in itself—even if there are no wars to fight. In an economy organized for war, the standard of living must be kept to the barest minimum, and even then it is doubtful whether the economy can yield enough for permanent military needs. A large part of the productive man-power, moreover, will always be removed from production, while women, as befits a military society, will find their fulfillment not in the productive world, but as consumers at home. Total organization, in addition, requires a tremendous number of officials, supervisors, coordinators, administrators of all sorts, thus further reducing the number of men actually engaged in production. Fascist economy therefore faces an inherent difficulty. It cannot satisfy more than the barest needs of its population while maintaining a completely militarized, collectivized society; but failure to maintain such a permanent military state means the certain doom of the system.

That is the fascist dilemma; and imperialism is the basic solution—an imperialism governed completely by the military economy of the governing country. The conquered peoples will deliver the fruits of their labor not simply for the benefit of profit-seekers, but to feed a vast military machine and to maintain a tolerable standard of living for the "master race." The natural resources of the conquered territories will be exploited by hordes of slaves. Since the military machine in the metropolitan country removes millions of men from production, millions of conquered natives must be imported to perform the most menial tasks in agriculture and industry. As Hitler told Rauschning, the fascists will not repeat the errors of private capitalists, "who misused industry in the service of progress." They will use it as an "instrument not of progress but of dominion. It requires to be used as a means of dominion." "Following the enslavement of subjected races," Hitler openly avowed in "Mein Kampf," the Aryan will control "their practical ability according to his command and his will and for his aims."

There is no need to dwell here on the inhuman oppression practiced by the Italians in Libya and by the Nazis in the recently conquered territories of Europe. There is no need to tell here the monstrous tale of Nazi cruelties in Poland, where tens, probably hundreds, of thousands of peasants have been driven from the soil their ancestors have cultivated for centuries; to describe the fate of farmers and workers removed by force to the Reich, where their labor-power is exploited while they are degraded to the position of pariahs; or of leaders exterminated by the hundred to crush forever the morale of a nation. I need not analyze here the systematic campaigns against all intellectuals in Czechoslovakia, Poland, Holland, and other territories, where libraries have been closed and books burned, where most of the universities have been dissolved and even high schools closed, where writers, teachers, doctors, lawyers have been hunted, thrown in concentration camps, and often murdered. But I must point out that far from being aberrations due to peculiar war conditions, these practices are in reality an essential part of the new imperialism. Only by practicing these forms of oppression can fascist imperialism degrade the conquered peoples to the plane of serfs and slaves and thereby fulfill its essential economic function.

Just as capitalistic imperialism was affected and modified by the liberal-democratic culture of the governing countries, so the new imperialism is determined not only by fundamental economic considerations but by the cultural pattern as well. Basic in the new system is the concept of a hierarchy of races—a concept totally absent from the liberal-democratic scheme. British imperialists have certainly not been energetic in preparing their colonial wards for self-rule and independence, but even the most rabid British imperialists did not deny the theoretical equality of human beings, did not set up an immutable racial hierarchy, or claim that non-British peoples were inherently incapable of self-rule.

The decline and disappearance of democratic-capitalistic imperialism was foreseen by most students of the problem before the rise of fascism. Even in the early years of this century Hobson charted with much erudition and insight the inevitable course of its downfall. The fascist powers, if victorious, will give imperialism a new lease of life, and by all indications it will become an imperialism infinitely more brutal, more oppressive, than capitalist imperialism has been during the past century and a half. Nor will it have the saving grace of working toward its own extinction.

We Promise You Slavery. . . .

"We will introduce in our new 'living space' completely new methods. All soil and industrial property of inhabitants of non-German origin will be confiscated without exception and distributed primarily among the worthy members of the party and soldiers who were accorded honors for bravery in this war. Thus, a new aristocracy of German masters [Herrenvolk] will be created. This aristocracy will have slaves assigned to it, these slaves to be their property and to consist of landless non-German nationals. . . . German masters, accustomed to command and, in cases of necessity, to strike inconsiderately where striking is necessary, will be fine pillars to uphold Germany's rule of the world." (Richard-Walther Darré, German Minister of Agriculture; in a private speech delivered last May, reported in the New York Times, December 6.)

Revolution by Consent

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

THE destruction of Mussolini and Hitler is essential to the salvation of Europe. But we shall not understand this war if we attribute its coming solely to the malevolence of these evil men. This war is more truly the second act in a vast world-drama on which the curtain went up on August 4, 1914. It is, in part, a struggle for world-dominion between old empires and new; in that sense those are right who speak of it as an "imperialist" war. But it is not an imperialist war merely. It is also a declaration of bankruptcy on the part of capitalist civilization. It is the proof that the operation of the profit-making motive can no longer produce either a just or a peaceful society. It proves that the forces of privilege stand in the way of that access to the potentialities science has now made possible for us; that, unless their power is arrested now, they will destroy, to preserve themselves, all the democratic institutions and procedures of freedom which have struggled so painfully to recognition in the last four centuries.

Anyone who examines either the aims or the record of Hitler and Mussolini is entitled to conclude that those who oppose them stand, by comparison, for liberty and democracy. There are ugly and evil things in our way of life; unjust things also. But there is nothing so ugly, so evil, or so unjust as the basic principles upon which the dictatorial systems are built. I can therefore understand why their overthrow seems to many in itself a sufficient end. But I am bound to remark that their overthrow will not, in itself, end the causes which led to their emergence; and that, unless we seek to deal with those causes, we shall find ourselves confronted by precisely the same grim issue about which we are fighting today. It is not enough to want victory; it is essential to want victory for ends that make possible an enduring peace. Those ends involve the need to reorganize the foundations of our social order.

The essence of fascism, whether in its German or its Italian form, is the use of the outlaw by the privileged to defend themselves against the demand of the masses for justice. That demand is made when the contraction of the economic system brings out the inherent contradiction between the forces of production and its relations. When a society reaches this point, capitalist principles cannot operate so as to satisfy the established expectations of the masses; and the latter then seek to use their political power to reorganize economic institutions. Their claims then become a threat to privilege; and its possessors, panic-stricken at the prospect of its loss, turn to the outlaws for protection against the threat. The outlaws then take over the state-power. But since they cannot, without a wholesale reorganization of property-relations, any more satisfy the masses than their predecessors, they are compelled to dictatorship in order to stifle protest. What is more, they are compelled to military adventure; for it is the inescapable necessity of all dictatorship to seek in foreign conquest the means of relief from domestic grievance.

The central problem for our rulers is that they should understand in time that we have reached an epoch certain to be as decisive in its results as that which saw the fall of Rome, or that which, with the Reformation, witnessed the rise of the middle class to power. We have now to plan the economic and social foundations of our life in the interest of the whole community, or to relapse into a new dark age in which the outlaws everywhere will rule us. A system which frustrates the possibilities of science, which condemns millions to poverty and ignorance, which maintains its authority by methods which are too often an outrage on human decency, cannot expect to secure for that authority the allegiance of millions who have no interest in its continuance.

Does anyone expect the working class of Poland to fight for the return of the Becks and the Lubomirskis? Are the Rumanians likely to attack their new German masters that they may return to the yoke of King Carol and Madam Lupescu? Will the Italians rise against Mussolini to restore that inept ballet of group-maneuvers in which Giolitti was the chief performer? Frenchmen are not likely to turn on the Pétain regime for a system in which the Two Hundred Families were driven into headlong panic and anger by social reforms as mild as those of the Blum government. And the masses of Britain will not be content with a victory which leaves the gains of life still to the Westminsters and the Bedfords, while the men and women of London and Coventry and Jarrow have no heritage but its toil. Our problem is whether we can use the dramatic opportunity of war to lay the foundations of a new social order.

My argument is not that military victory is impossible save on these terms; it is rather that, otherwise, military victory will solve none of the problems before us. This approach, I think, has two immense advantages. In the first place, it offers the prospect of a more just society; in that prospect there are hope and exhilaration, and these create that power to endure which is so vital in the present struggle. In the second place, it enables Britain to put before the peoples of Europe, above all before the victims of the dictators, the pattern of a social order with the promise of which neither Mussolini nor Hitler can hope to compete. Thereby England builds for itself an army of allies who, as the war deepens, will find no prospect of hope save in its victory; who will, as Britain moves to the offensive, become, as it were, the spearhead of its attack. Our task, this is to say, is the preparation of that European Revolution in which the overthrow of Hitler and Mussolini makes possible an epoch of creative liberation.

The power of the dictators is built upon terror and victory; but terror can only maintain its authority by a continued success which destroys hope in its victims. My argument is that we can break the legend of their success, in part by showing that they can actually be conquered, and, in part, by the idea we place behind our military effort, by diverting to ourselves the allegiance men are compelled to give them. I am pleading, in fact, for an offensive of the mind and spirit parallel with the offensive of arms. I am arguing that we can shatter the psychological hold of the dictators upon their subjects by making the end our victory will serve seem to them the one road to a better way of life.

They do not feel certain that this is the case today. They will only be made to feel certain as our cause establishes its bona fides with them. This it will not do by the easy rhetoric of promises to be fulfilled when the war is over. It will do so only as they see that we really mean what our rhetoric is pledged to perform; and we can only give them that insight by the performance of the promises in which we seek to make them believe. In war the deed is the word. If we claim to be fighting for democracy and freedom, what better way is there of proving our claim than to broaden and deepen in the midst of war the democracy and freedom that we have?

I do not want to underestimate the magnitude of the changes this policy will eventually imply; obviously they are very great. They will mean, in the long run, a new social faith, a transvaluation of all values. I know, too, that to ask for their initiation by consent, as I am now doing, is to ask for the display of a magnanimity which is one of the rarest qualities in history. I ask for it, nevertheless, on two grounds. I ask for it, first, because, in any profound way, we cannot win the war without it; and I ask for it, in the second place, because there is no other way to the creative use of victory.

When we have beaten our enemies, we have to win their cooperation in the common task if our lives are not to be a perpetual nightmare. To end this war without the psychological basis of international stability is to have fought it in vain. Our task, if we can, is to find a common ground between parties which will enable us to effect necessary social change in terms of consent. To do so, we have to adjust vitally the relation of the forces of production to the existing ownership of its instruments. If we fail to do so, all the pre-war problems will descend upon us with redoubled force; and the costs of the war will greatly diminish our ability to solve them.

More than this. We have aroused expectations of social justice. We have exacted immense sacrifices, above all from the poor. We have praised the capacity of the common people heroically to endure immense sufferings, and we have promised them the reward of that endurance. We shall have to pay the bills for these. Either we pay them with the understanding that to meet them generously is no more than justice; or, if that understanding is absent, we shall move rapidly to a position where the differences between men on matters of social constitution cannot be accommodated in terms of reason.

If that tragedy occurs, we shall have thrown our victory away. For, on the domestic side, we shall have fought to maintain a democratic system without organizing the conditions in which it has the opportunity to function effectively. And, on the international side, internecine conflict here will be so grave a preoccupation that we shall lack the power and the energy to preside over that European reconstruction in which our leadership will be so obviously essential.

There is a remark of Peter Kropotkin's which offers us the formula that we need. "A revolution," he wrote,¹ "must from its inception be an act of justice to the ill-treated and the oppressed, and not a promise to perform this act of reparation later on. If not, it is sure to fail." That is the answer to those who want social reform to wait until after the war. We cannot afford to let it wait, simply because its initiation now is an essential part of the strategy of victory.

I recognize that we cannot embark upon a program which endangers the unity of the nation. I recognize too that the claims of totalitarian war mean that we can initiate only the beginning of fundamental change, and that the process will have to be spread over long years of peace. I urge that there are two circumstances which make the present moment a singularly propitious one for this adventure. The first is that war itself has compelled profound changes and so induced a mood in the nation that is prepared for great experiment. Crisis always breaks the cake of custom; and it is folly not to take advantage of the mood while it lasts.

The second circumstance is not less important. The formation of the Churchill government was not merely the replacement of one statesman by another. It was also the deliberate association of the organized workers of this country with the war effort; and it cannot be assumed that, in accepting that association, their leaders abandoned the principles which led them to accept the view that a victory over Hitler and Mussolini is essential. I do not for a moment claim that the Labor leaders are entitled to exact for their support the enactment of the Labor Party's program; granted our constitutional principles, that would obviously be an impossible demand. But I do urge that they cannot be asked to lend the vital support they bring merely to enable the Conservative Party to maintain the status quo as of September 3, 1939. They are entitled to ask for those changes which at once enable the war to be won, in that profounder sense that we are attaching to victory, and prevent its aftermath from degenerating into a sordid domestic struggle in which the fruits of a military victory for democracy are thrown away. They may, that is to say, legitimately demand now the discovery of that plane of political action which fulfills the conditions of an enduring peace. They are entitled to ask for its discovery now because the common people are now paying the grim costs of the war; and because the new mood of the public is so largely the outcome of the faith and energy the common people have put into the national effort.

If this attitude be accepted, it seems to me that we have at least the large outlines of a basis upon which to build. Obviously enough, in a war of which the detailed contours alter every day, no government can be expected, in the international sphere, to attempt to do more than lay down the general principles with which it will approach a settlement. Its end is enduring peace, and this is incompatible with the power of any nation-state to threaten by aggression the security of its neighbors. This must mean an international order the members of which abandon their claim to sovereignty, and agree that all matters of common concern shall be matters also of common decision. It is, I think, clear that the executive organ of that international order must control all armaments, especially aviation. It is clear, further, that tariffs, currency, migration, the standards of labor, the right of access to raw materials, and the use of colonial possessions are matters of common concern in which no state can exercise sovereign powers. In the light, further, of the years between 1919 and 1939, the power in the international authority to protect, under sanctions, the

Labor Minister Bevin Says:

"It is better to leave the masses untaught than to give them a double appetite, both of stomach and head, and then not to satisfy either. Things can never be as they were. The old age has passed. A new age has to be built." (November 21, 1940.)

"Britain and her allies are determined to produce a just order in Europe and to recreate it on the basis of freedom, free association, and equality. We will never tolerate again masses of unemployed or poverty. We will not recognize privilege or place. A juster scheme of things is our main aim." (October 27, 1940.)

rights both of national and of religious minorities, and of individual citizens, so that there is, to take a single illustration, something akin to an international writ of habeas corpus, must be established beyond a peradventure. Great Britain must undertake to see that these principles are written into the peace settlement; that it is a settlement freely negotiated between equals; that its acceptability is not destroyed by either punitive indemnities or punitive annexations. And it is urgent to make it understood that, whatever the form of constitution in any state, its essential institutions must not violate the vested procedures of freedom. I should like to see Great Britain pledge the utmost it can afford from its resources to the reconstruction of stricken Europe; and I should like to see an emphasis from its leaders that, subject to the primary rights of their own inhabitants, it is willing to place those of its colonies not yet ready for self-government under international mandate.

Further than these general principles in the international field, it does not seem to me possible as yet to go; we cannot penetrate the hidden veil of the future to speak with confidence either upon the form of international institutions or upon the details in which the application of these general principles will be clothed. But already, by such principles, we are offering to Europe cooperation with national freedom as against the Nazi ideal of a European unity that is built upon the slavery of the vanquished to the victors. The new imperialism, in short, of which Hitler and Mussolini are the protagonists, must be met by our abandonment of that imperialism which regards colonial peoples as the fit subject of economic exploitation. And, if we accept this as desirable, we must come to the peace conference with clean hands. We do not do so while India is a plaintiff before the bar of history demanding a right to self-government which we persistently refuse to recognize.

I cite India only as a symbol of the larger imperial problem; I add only that our good name before the world seems to me bound up with some such approach as this. But it is our handling of certain domestic issues which seems to me central to the future of the world. If we handle them wisely, we can, I think, as certainly lead the world in social and economic reconstruction today as we led it in and after the eighteenth century. If we fail to handle them wisely, whatever the military outcome of the war, we shall drift rapidly to social revolution in this country. We shall then have lost the war, since, if social revolution supervenes, it will be impossible to maintain the fabric of democratic institutions; and if they are destroyed here, they will, believe me, be destroyed all over the world.

What are we entitled to ask for from this government in the sphere of social and economic change which offers hope and exhilaration to the people and safeguards us, in the post-war period, against the danger that the forces of privilege will prefer their vested interests to those changes which are obviously required.

We need, I suggest, the recognition of five principles. We require the organization of a sector of industry, the content of which is vital to the national life, which is removed from the hazards of the profit-making motive. In that sector belong today the mechanism of national credit, coal and electric power, transport, and the ownership of the land. We need, second, a radical transformation of our educational system. We should abolish the present class division of the schools; and we should, at long last, establish free secondary education for all. It is important, moreover, to increase the opportunities of further training at the university level. We need, thirdly, a great extension of the public health system with special attention to the problems of nutrition. We need, fourthly, full safeguards that, after the war, the immense issues connected with the rehousing of the population shall not be left to the discretion of the ground-landlord and the speculative builder. We need, finally, the assurance that economic planning after the war will safeguard us against the recurrence of mass unemployment and those distressed areas which, like Jarrow, have been so long a grim reproach to the quality of our statesmanship.

It is said that the forces of privilege in this country will never accept a program of this magnitude. Those who take this view may be right. If that is the case, two inferences follow. The first is the simple one that, like the comparable class in France, the forces of privilege care more for their vested interests than they do for democracy. If they are unwilling to yield principles which provide the key to victory, then the inference also follows that, after the war, they will fight for their privileges against the demands of the masses; sooner or later, and sooner, I think, rather than later, that means social conflict in this country and, with its coming, the end of democracy. I do not assume for a moment that in such a conflict the popular forces would be successful. I only point out that, if they were defeated, we should ourselves become a fascist society and that we should then have fought a war for democracy in vain. Even if the popular forces won, a period would be inevitable in which democratic institutions would have to be suspended; and obvious contemporary analogies suggest that the price for their suspension is a grim and heavy one.

Such a program as I have suggested would begin, peacefully, the readjustment of the relations of production to the forces of production. It calls neither for the proscription of persons nor the expropriation of property. It provides the time for that psychological readjustment to great innovation which offers the surest basis for the avoidance of conflict. It would begin, in a real way, the mitigation of what Professor Tawney has called our "religion of inequality."

I do not say that without this program we shall not win; indeed, I accept the view that a world in which Hitler and Mussolini are overthrown is, of itself, a better world. But I do say that to overthrow them for so great an end as this program implies is to begin one of those great ages of expansion in which the spirit of man finds the opportunity of creative liberation. For this program goes to the root of the problem out of which the war came: it offers a real and continuous prospect of raising the standard of life of the masses. By setting our own house in order in a democratic way, I believe we not only serve our own best interests; we also set an example to others which, as our enemies begin to feel the weight of our power, they will not be slow to follow. "War," said Edmund Burke, "never leaves where it found a nation." Those who find unacceptable a program of this kind have at least the obligation to provide an alternative.

One final word may be said. I have argued that there is need for a European revolution and that it is the historic mission of Great Britain to inaugurate its coming. To many the idea of revolution is inherently a terrifying one; there is no path they will not tread in the effort to evade its onset. The answer to their fear is a simple one: the revolution is, in any case, unavoidable. By the fact that we have embarked upon war with the fascist states, its coming is assured; the only questions to be raised are whether its birth-pangs can be abridged and its purpose made beneficent. If the victory of this country were to be set in the perspective I have described, I think that abridgement and that beneficence can be secured; without it, I believe we shall enter upon an era as dark as any in the human record.

Economy for a New World

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

ALEXANDER the Great, world conqueror and self-ordained god, when asked to unravel the Gordian Knot, slashed it through with his sword. Today Hitler offers a similar absolutist solution for the riddles of our tangled civilization. He would cure the curse of national egotisms by subjecting the world to one super-national egotism; he would end economic insecurity by reducing "inferior" classes and races to the status of human livestock. Our struggle now is to arrest his sword but, that achieved, we must set patiently to work to untie the knot into which the strands of society have been twisted, lest some new adventurer should once again offer the world a short cut.

What are the aims which must guide the builders of peace? No one, I think, has summed them up more completely than President Roosevelt, who, in his Annual Message to Congress on January 6, said:

We look forward to a world founded on four essential human freedoms: The first is freedom of speech and expression—everywhere in the world. The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world. The third is freedom from want—which, translated into world terms, means economic understandings which will secure every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants—everywhere in the world. The fourth is freedom from fear—which, translated into world terms, means a worldwide reduction of armaments to such a point in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbor—anywhere in the world.

Mr. Roosevelt's declaration emphasizes that peace and economic security are indivisible. There cannot be social peace within a democratic society in which large sections of the population have votes but not enough to eat; there cannot be international peace in a world sharply divided between Have and Have-Not nations. Thus it is hopeless to discuss the restoration of peace in purely political terms. That was the cardinal error of Versailles, which politically did represent an attempt to provide independence for all major national groups in Europe and did succeed in leaving fewer minorities under alien control than ever before. What it overlooked was the fact that a self-determining unit is not the same thing as a self-supporting unit; it took no steps to prevent the building of new economic barriers at the very moment when advances in technology were insistently demanding wider spheres of action. Had Europe in 1919 been united in one great free-trade area it is just conceivable that its already-decaying capitalism would have received a new lease of life and that, after a comparatively short period of adjustment, a period of economic development might have followed, comparable to that enjoyed by the United States in the nineteenth century.

Be that as it may, during the past twenty years or so economic organization, national and international, has been so violently distorted that laissez-faire could not provide even a temporary cure. The chronic alcoholic suddenly bereft of all stimulants suffers a complete nervous collapse. Checked by tariffs, quotas, embargoes, and exchange manipulations, international trade has ceased to be a means of widening the benefits of the division of labor and degenerated to a weapon. Under cover of these and other protective devices, private enterprise escaped from the discipline of competition, which was its basic economic justification, to snatch the forbidden fruit of monopoly. But, since that involved a futile effort to maintain profits by restricted production, it led to widespread unemployment and to an irresistible popular demand for government intervention. In Germany and Italy the monopolists sought to solve their dilemma by buying protection from gangsters only to find that after they had obtained relief from democratic pressure they themselves had to submit to involuntary servitude. In the Western democracies, the crisis was cushioned by greater accumulated wealth and stronger constitutional traditions, but here we encounter the phenomenon of the investor who has become allergic to risks and prizes liquidity above dividends.

With private enterprise already partially atrophied as a method of procuring the optimum production and distribution of wealth, we can hardly expect it to show greater resilience at the end of the war. The economics of modern warfare cannot be engined by the profit motive except by resorting to inflation and so enabling the government, with its inexhaustible buying power, to outbid private consumers in attracting to its service all the production it requires. This was the method largely relied upon in the last war and the results were hardly propitious even from the capitalist point of view. Today it would involve an even greater degree of inflation, since the necessities of war demand a still greater proportion of national production. Thus even Britain has almost completely abandoned "business as usual" and is now operating a planned economy.

Can such planning be discarded when the world is able to turn to the economic problems of peace and reconstruction? Can we rely on the profit motive to rebuild the cities that have been shattered, to restore communications, to return the millions of refugees or resettle them in new homes, and to provide a secure existence for all so that international peace is not broken by civil strife? Even the staunchest defender of private enterprise, even Mr. Mark Sullivan, would answer that there must be some measure of government intervention, some degree of centralized planning, and, I would add, the relegation of private property rights to a place of secondary importance.

Let me illustrate by considering briefly the problems involved in rebuilding London and other British cities. The task is not merely to restore them as they were but to seize the opportunity to rid them of slums and to make them efficient for modern living, and that means replanning on a grand scale. This cannot be accomplished by leaving private builders the right to erect those structures which offer the best profit nor by permitting landowners to retain sites needed for improvements. Obviously the British authorities will have to resort to wholesale condemnation, and in the interests of speed, efficiency, and fairness they may well decide to nationalize all urban land with pre-war values as the basis of compensation.

Now turn to a far broader question: By what method is the capital needed to replace the ravages of war in Europe to be obtained? Leaving aside the possibility of American loans, it is obvious that such capital must be found in the margin of current production over current consumption and, in order to ensure that this margin is adequate, it will probably be necessary to continue to curtail spending power, just as it is now held down in order to free resources for war purposes. Under the orthodox mechanisms of capitalism this end would be achieved by depressing wages, thus enabling the owners of capital to accumulate larger profits for the purpose of making new investments. Both wage-earners and capitalists would sacrifice present consumption but the sacrifice of the former would be as permanent as the gain of the latter.

In the democratic Europe which we hope to see after the war, I cannot believe that such a distribution of the burdens of reconstruction will be tolerated. It will therefore be necessary for the state to finance reconstruction as it now finances destruction. This would mean the continuance of high rates of taxation; it would probably also mean that maintenance of wage-rates would have to be accompanied by some form of compulsory savings such as J. M. Keynes has proposed as a means of financing the war. The end result of these measures would be that the capital of the country adopting them would tend to pass into the hands (a) of the state as trustee for the community as a whole, (b) of wage- and salary-earners, thus gradually producing a more even distribution of wealth. But it would not necessarily mean the extinction of private enterprise, which, I believe, should find in the future democratic state a broad but not boundless sphere of activities. To be more precise, while utilities, natural monopolies, such as mines, and key industries, such as steel, seem to me to call for public ownership, the supply of goods and services in regard to which the individual taste of the consumer is an important factor might with advantage be left to the private entrepreneur. And, in this connection, I am willing to concede that widely distributed private property can be a bulwark of democracy so long as the privileges attached to it are not allowed to override proven public interests.

This discussion may seem to some readers to have strayed rather far from the field of international economic organization. But we cannot solve the problem of the Have and Have-Not nations while leaving unsettled that of the Have and Have-Not classes. Nearly all of the many schemes now current for promoting peace among nations stress the necessity for the surrender of national claims to absolute sovereignty. We must realize, however, that assertions of absolute sovereignty are to a large extent bound up with conceptions of property as a sacred right. Does not almost every industry in every country look upon the home market as its Lebensraum which must be protected from outsiders? And, as Harold Laski has pointed out in "Where Do We Go From Here?" the effort to maintain "the uneasy equilibrium between capitalism and democracy" lies behind the imperialist struggle for new markets.

The advocates of Union Now do not, in my opinion, sufficiently take into account the obstacles to their objectives provided by the present economic organization of the democratic states. They seem to regard international anarchy as a cause, rather than an effect, of the disorders of capitalism and thus tend to repeat the mistake of the Versailles treaty-makers by relying too exclusively on political cures. Mr. Streit's original proposal was for a federation composed of the United States, Great Britain, the British Dominions, and the democracies of Western Europe. Now the last group is either overrun or hemmed in by the Axis, and this leaves only the English-speaking peoples as immediate prospects for Union Now. Its proponents, however, are prepared to go ahead on this basis, leaving the way open for new adherents if and when they regain their freedom. The draft constitution for the "Union of the Free," which Mr. Streit has published, is practically identical with that of the United States, including the Bill of Rights. As Mr. Streit rightly points out, this is a "time-tested" document. Its authors were truly men of vision who contrived to allow for a growth beyond their own imaginings. Yet it is a document which reflects the political and economic ideas of its time, and its elasticity has been severely strained in attempting to cope with the problems of twentieth-century America.

I cannot avoid the feeling, therefore, that any constitution for a wider-flung democracy, while incorporating many of the basic principles of America's Founding Fathers, must also take cognizance of the need for a new economic order. We must retain our charter of political liberties but to it must be added an economic Bill of Rights which will proclaim the inalienable right of every citizen to a job at a living wage and declare the right to enjoy property not as unlimited but as subordinate to the common weal. The achievement of an Anglo-American union at this time, even if based on the substantial maintenance of the present social and economic order, might appear as a shattering reply to the totalitarian powers. Yet it is arguable that from this point of view too the proposal is dangerous, for it would lend real force to the Nazi claim that Anglo-American plutocracy is seeking to perpetuate its monopoly of world resources. We must oppose Hitler's New Order with something more attractive, more reassuring, to the common man throughout the world, with a new democracy which will vastly extend the blessings of security and equality of opportunity.

Despite these criticisms of Union Now, I believe its basic principles to be thoroughly sound. A wide, open-ended federation of nations in which the participants will merge an agreed part of their several sovereignties is the only solution for the clash of national egotisms. "Federate or Perish" is truly the watchword but federation must supply the framework for a new social order for the world, just as the Constitution of 1789 supplied a framework for progress in terms of the frontier society of its day. In the growing number of supporters of Union Now there are many ardent advocates of an economic revolution by consent. Recently I talked with the head of Federal Union, the autonomous British organization which was inspired by Mr. Streit's work. He told me that it was working on a new program which buttressed the federal idea with concrete proposals for more effective democratic political machinery and for a recasting of the economic system to provide for greater security and a higher degree of social justice. That is a move along the road which, I believe, must be followed.

It is possible here to suggest only an outline of the division of economic functions in a federation of states designed to achieve the aims outlined in President Roosevelt's declaration. The first care of the federal government of such a union will be the regulation of interstate commerce. Some writers on this subject have suggested that existing barriers will have to be removed gradually so as to ease the strain on protected producer groups. But Hitler's methods have already made nonsense of tariff systems in Europe and, although they have not freed trade in Europe, they have made clear the costly futility of selling without buying. Moreover, the end of the war will bring a tremendous demand for goods in famine-stricken Europe and it will be far easier to satisfy this efficiently if internal free trade is introduced immediately.

A second important federal function will be the provision of a reserve bank linking the central banks of the various states which, in Europe, are already either state-owned or closely controlled. It would be the business of this federal institution to ensure an even distribution of credit to various parts of the union, making available the surplus savings of one area to meet excess demands in another. It will also be necessary to organize a federal investment bank for the purpose of financing long-term projects and in particular to promote the development of the more backward districts.

Another formidable task will be the reorganization of interstate communications. Parts of Europe are woefully deficient in transport facilities, and existing systems have all too often been inspired by strategic rather than economic considerations. Repairing the ravages of war in this field will be an enormous job, and one that will provide a unique opportunity to create a coordinated system of highways, railroads, waterways, and airways.

Other federal economic functions would include the interstate connection of public utilities, the control and eventual socialization of interstate monopolies, and the supervision of colonies. A federal constitution insuring peace and a federal economy for maintaining production near capacity would afford the participating countries a standard of living hitherto unknown. Consider how economic development has been throttled in the past twenty years: by armaments, which even in peacetime swallow from 10 to 50 per cent of national incomes; by drives for self-sufficiency, involving the production of ersatz goods at three or four times the cost of imports in terms of labor effort; and by tariffs, which everywhere have undercut purchasing power by forcing it into dear markets.

There are those who gladly agree that federation would be a good thing for Europe but question the advantages of American membership. To such doubters I can only offer here two brief arguments. The inclusion of the United States in a post-war federal union with all or part of Europe would give this country moral leadership by virtue of its advanced political and economic development and it would remove for all time the danger of a clash should a United States of Europe, on which we had turned our back, struggle to maturity in isolation. From the economic angle it would mean the availability of a field of investment, politically safeguarded, which would bring new life to our capital goods industries. And the ensuing era of prosperity would enable the social and economic adjustments, which we must make under any circumstances, to be carried through with a minimum of strain. The opportunity awaits us if we have the imagination and daring to grasp it; we can take the lead in loosening the Gordian knot which is choking the life out of our civilization.

Fighting Chance for a Sick Society

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE Western world was very sick before Hitlerism appeared as both an aggravation of its diseases and a false cure. The defeat of Nazism alone will therefore not guarantee new health and strength to the structure of Western society. It will, however, usher in a period of convalescence in which the new moral power and resolution, gained from victorious combat with a mortal enemy, will at least partially offset the physical fatigue in which the patient will have been left by the fevers and exertions of this tragic period.

There are bound to be new crises and new sinking spells in this period of convalescence in which false cures or meaningless palliatives might lead to fresh disasters. But there will be at least a possibility of nursing the residual health of a sick society back to normal vitality. So tentative a hope can prompt only the very stout-hearted to resist what all expect to be a terrible ordeal and what some regard as the prelude to the death of our civilization. The weaker members of our community seek escape from this choice by abandoning themselves to delirious dreams of a health which is not in the realm of possibilities. These dreams are unfortunately a part of the process of decay. They reveal the broken will-power and the befuddled mind which is out of touch with realities. They make death more painless and more inevitable by mistaking the drugged sleep which precedes it for new health and joy.

Yet if Hitler is defeated matters will not be too hopeless, for the simple reason that such a defeat will not have come about unless what is decent in our society has been strengthened and some of our weaknesses eliminated in the very process. If we survive at all as a society of free men, our survival itself will prove that we have learned how to correct at least some of our weaknesses. It will be possible then to build upon that achievement.

The domestic economy of all the democratic nations has been an anarchy of competing economic interests in which the eighteenth century dream of a "natural" equilibrium of economic forces has given way to a horrible daylight reality. The reality comprises elements of both anarchy and tyranny. The anarchy is the chaos of "private" interests at war with one another and unable to comprehend or to realize the common welfare; the tyrannical elements are derived from the centralization of economic power, by which industrial overlords wield a more irresponsible and a more absolute authority than the agrarian overlords whom they supplanted. The most vivid symbol of the injustice, which is the fruit of this tyranny, is the pathetic army of unemployed in every modern nation. What is left of the health of our society lies in the relative justice which a democratic political state has been able to impose upon a partially chaotic and partially tyrannical economic scheme.

Hitler's false alternative to this combination of anarchy and tyranny is a franker, more brutal, and more efficient tyranny. The irresponsible authority of economic overlords is annulled in favor of an even more irresponsible political overlordship, which does, however, have the advantage of being able to plan for the whole of the national community. The short-range effectiveness of such a political and economic unity is great enough to threaten the democratic nations with disaster. (Thyssen could not defy the national authority with impunity, but Henry Ford can.) In France the chaos of private interest and the resentment of the working classes against the injustices of this chaos were great enough to cause the defeat of the nation. Chamberlain's Britain stood on the brink of defeat for the same reasons. It escaped disaster because the disintegrating forces of modern capitalism were qualified there partly by vestigial remnants of feudalism (of which Churchill is the symbol) and partly by achievements in democratic justice (of which Bevin's authority and prestige are a convenient index). Our own achievements in democratic justice are probably somewhere between France's failure and Britain's partial success.

Certainly the war cannot be won if a greater degree of national unity does not supplant the still high measure of confusion incident upon the power of "private" enterprise to thwart a common effort; and such unity will be without justice if it is achieved by giving economic overlords more power over labor. Hence the importance of resisting all efforts to increase the power of big business in the name of efficiency in a national emergency,

Reinhold Niebuhr's The Nature and Destiny of Man

Reinhold Niebuhr shares with only four other distinguished Americans — William James, John Dewey, William E. Hocking and Josiah Royce—the honor of delivering the famous Gifford lectures. Out of this world-famous lectureship came such books as James's "The Varieties of Religious Experience"—and now Dr. Niebuhr's "The Nature and Destiny of Man."

The first volume, "Human Nature,"* may well shape not only the religious thought of our time, but the political and philosophical. For, as Lewis Mumford states, Niebuhr's teachings "must penetrate among those concerned with political and economic affairs, if we are to achieve the ability to confront the tragic era in which we live." $2.75 and the equal necessity of resisting labor disaffection when it is prompted by Communist loyalty to a nation allied with the Nazis. The fact that the disaffection of workers should be partly expressed and guided by a political party ostensibly opposed to Nazism but actually cooperating with it is one symptom of the moral confusion of our civilization.

If we survive at all, then, we will survive because we will have achieved some measure of unity with justice while facing the threat of a nation tyrannically unified. The efficiency of the democracies may actually remain inferior but the advantage in superior morale may prove decisive. Nevertheless, a victory would not permanently solve our domestic problems, because the unity by which it would be achieved would be partly the consequence of facing a common peril. Class antagonisms will break out afresh after the war and we shall still face the problem of bringing anarchic and tyrannical economic power under control without creating a tyrannical political power. There is no easy solution for this problem. There is, in fact, no one solution for it. If its complexities discourage us, we may be consoled by the thought that we will at least have eliminated two false solutions in the process of achieving a victory over Nazism and its impotent Communist ally.

We face a similar situation in the international issues of the Western world. Our disease is international anarchy. Hitlerism is in one sense an accentuation of that disease because it raises the principle of the moral autonomy of the nation, which lies at the root of international anarchy, into the ultimate principle of politics. It is, in another sense, a false cure for the disease. The nation which began by declaring that it knew no law but its own will, must end by seeking to impose that will as law upon all surrounding nations. We know that life is too robust and multifarious to accept such a tyrannical unification of the nations in the long run. But we do not yet know how successful it may be in the short run; and to what degree a technically efficient monopoly of violence and of industrial skill may be able to overcome the disintegrating tendencies of injustice.

It is a fact, at any rate, that this monstrous New Order has gained victory after victory over a motley assemblage of small and large nations, each of which followed only its immediate interests and faced only its immediate perils and allowed the monster to quiet the fears of one nation by false assurances while it devoured the liberties of another. Nothing now stands between us and disaster but the willingness and ability of Britain and America to subordinate national interest to a common purpose. If Hitler is defeated it will mean that some measure of international anarchy will have been overcome in the very process of defeating him.

Yet it must be observed that, as in the field of domestic politics, our victory will be incomplete and our solution imperfect. The problem of creating an international organization with enough power at the center to prevent disintegration and at the same time instruments of democratic control adequate to prevent imperialistic corruption is one of the most vexing and urgent to which men have ever addressed themselves. It will not be easily solved and our only encouragement must be derived from the knowledge that, in this instance, history has eliminated three false solutions: that of the Nazis, the Communists, and the men of Versailles-Geneva.

For America the problem is complicated by the fact that a way must be found to assume limited responsibilities for the democratic unification of Europe and wider responsibilities for the integration of world politics. We are not a European nation and not subject to its immediate perils; yet history has taught us that we are not finally immune to the disaster which emerges from European anarchy. A way must be found to do justice to both our immediate distance from Europe and our ultimate nearness to all its problems. If the first factor is left out of consideration by a too consistent internationalism America will repeat the experience of the last post-war years and will recoil from its larger responsibilities in a psychosis of isolationism. This very psychosis, a legacy of our past mistake, is still so deep that it may yet prevent the victory over Hitlerism which we are now assuming. If the second factor is left out of account the second world war will have been as vain as the first and American irresponsibility will bear a large share of the guilt.

As in the economic and political spheres, so also in the cultural, Nazism is both an accentuation of a diseased state and a false cure. The bourgeois world, accustomed to the covert forms of power which prevail in the economic, as against the political and military world, and to the "bloodless" manner in which the struggle for survival takes place in the realm of commerce, had long given itself to the illusion that history was the record of the gradual "spiritualization" of man and that a bourgeois civilization was on the very threshold of sublimating the problem of achieving unity and justice between men and nations into an exercise of moral suasion and rational calculation. It was forgotten that life is vitality as well as reason, that an equilibrium of vitality is involved in every achievement of justice and that every tension between life and life and interest and interest may, and even must in the final instance, become an overt contest between power and power.

To these illusions the Nazi glorification of force is a horrible alternative. Life does not justify itself merely by its power any more than rational harmonies of justice establish themselves without the use of power. The illusions of a liberal world on this score have been stubborn enough to contribute to both the rise and the quick triumphs of Nazism. Marxism took an intermediary position between Nazism and liberalism. It was provisionally cynical in the use of power and ultimately utopian in its belief that all power could be transcended. Under the stress of contemporary history this compromise has disintegrated. The Socialists tended to fall back into purely liberal and pacifist illusions; the Communists extended the provisional cynicism of Marxism until it became practically identical with the more basic cynicism of the Nazis.

If these illusions go by the boards—and they will have to if there is to be any victory over Hitler—this also will be only a tentative achievement. Western culture will still have to find a social philosophy which avoids the pitfalls of a rationalistic utopianism on the one hand and a cynical glorification of power on the other. No new world order can be achieved without the social organization of power in economic, political, and military terms. If our fear of imperialism and political power is so great that we blindly insist on utopia as an alternative we will end by getting chaos. Neither can a just world order be achieved without providing every possible check upon central power and every possible method of holding the vitalities of men and nations in equipoise. If that is not understood our "new order" will not differ too much from its Nazi alternative.

Labor's Stake in a Victory

BY GEORGE S. COUNTS

FROM the standpoint of labor the triumph of Hitler would be utterly disastrous. For the most part labor sees this and sees it clearly. Only a few Communist-led unions and an occasional disgruntled or personally ambitious leader affect to view the outcome of the present struggle with indifference.

To labor, this war is profoundly unlike the last. In 1914 it was not easy for many in the labor movement to choose between Germany and Austria-Hungary, on the one side, and Britain, France, and Russia, on the other. At that time Germany was at least as enlightened a country as any of its opponents. Its trade-union movement was powerful, welfare legislation was far advanced, and social democracy was a force to be reckoned with. In contrast, Russia was a land of poverty, ignorance, and tyranny. The first world war was essentially and clearly an imperialistic war in the nineteenth-century sense—a war for markets, colonies, and "spheres of influence." Although the empires in conflict differed in their moral and political ideas, the good and the right were by no means on one side.

The present conflict, by contrast, has an ethical quality that has rarely distinguished the wars of history. It cannot be interpreted as involving merely, or preponderantly, the readjustment of the boundaries of nations. The outstanding fact in this epoch is the rise of the totalitarian state with its complete subordination of the individual, its worship of race or class, its crushing of all voluntary organizations and movements, its glorification of war as man's noblest pursuit. American labor cannot be insensitive to the fact that the leaders of German trade-unionism and German democracy are either dead, in exile, or rotting in concentration camps, whereas representatives of all divisions of British labor are free and active, some of them holding positions of highest rank in the government and others permitted openly to oppose the war—even in Parliament itself. If Hitler wins, the free labor movement will be exterminated throughout the Old World; if Britain wins, that movement will lift its head again in lands where it has been crushed.

A Hitler victory, however, will mean far more than the destruction of the labor movement in Europe. It will mean the destruction of the great heritage out of which the labor movement has come. It will mean the destruction of all that is best in Western culture—the Judaic-Christian doctrine of the brotherhood of man, the humanistic faith in the human mind, the democratic affirmation that ordinary men and women can and should rule themselves.

It would seem obvious that American labor must be deeply concerned in preventing such a catastrophe, yet some who presume to speak for labor contend that Britain is far away, that the United States is strong, that the fall of Britain would not necessarily mean the end of American independence. All of this, of course, may be true and still not justify American labor in reconciling itself to a Nazi victory. For in the event of such an outcome, the course of American history would be radically altered. Even if the people of the United States should continue to cherish ideals of human liberty, they would be compelled to become a great military nation or perish. They would have to arm to the teeth, build and maintain unrivaled naval and air fleets, make conscription permanent, turn schools and all other agencies of education and opinion to the cultivation of the military mind and morals. Moreover, if Nazi arms and Nazi ideas should triumph, they would achieve immeasurably greater authority than they possess today and would form a pattern to be imitated in every land. The free labor movement of America might conceivably survive the disappearance of its counterparts in the rest of the world but the hostility toward trade-unionism on the part of the fascist states on whose terms we would carry on trade, the compulsion to lower standards of living to support a gigantic arms program, and the necessity of competing in a world of slave labor would seem to make that hope a slim one.

The responsibility of American labor in this situation is twofold: first, to throw its energies and idealism into the task of defending American democracy against the threat of totalitarian aggression from abroad; and second, to guard, strengthen, and extend democracy at home. If the majority opinion on the consequences of a Hitler victory is correct, the first of these responsibilities cannot be evaded. On the other hand, if American democracy is not to be inadvertently lost in meeting the threat from totalitarian arms, the second must be just as conscientiously discharged.

The struggle for democracy on the home front must be waged with relentless vigor and determination. This is necessary as a purely defensive measure. People will fight best in the name of democracy only if they know that they possess its substance. But the point must also be stressed that in a highly dynamic period like the present nothing stands still. Everything either advances or retreats. And so it is with democracy. A defeat for Nazism will open the way to a more democratic world only if we will it so. That is why no blueprint of a Nazi-free world is possible, but only a program for action designed to make a defeat of Hitler a guarantee of better things to come.

The first and most fundamental point in such a program is the strengthening of organized labor as a free and independent force in American society. Under the pressure of the demand for total military defense, powerful reactionary interests are endeavoring now, and will continue to endeavor, to bring labor under state control. In the name of national unity, but actually for the sake of profits, legislation calculated to take away rights which working people have achieved through a century of bitter struggle is already being vigorously pushed by employing and fascist-minded groups. This totalitarian tendency must be combatted at all costs and at every point. The incorporation of the labor movement into the state is one of the stigmata of contemporary dictatorship.

This perversion of the defense program does not call, however, for a negative response from labor. It calls for an increased share by labor in the shaping of all public policies and particularly all policies pertaining to defense. With the enormous expansion it has enjoyed under the Roosevelt Administration, organized labor has come of age. The time has arrived for it to insist that its voice be heard on all decisions of importance to the country. If these decisions are to be made in terms of democratic purposes, the viewpoint of the working people must be ably and vigorously presented. In a very profound sense the voice of labor today is the voice of democracy.

The third point in the program is the maintenance of decent living standards for all the people, and here again the pressure to scrap hard-won achievements is intense. All efforts to reduce wages, to impair working conditions, to abandon health and safety regulations, to lower actual purchasing power, to weaken security and pension rights must be resisted. But labor cannot be satisfied with mere resistance to attacks on living and working standards. It must take the offensive. For millions of working people in all parts of the country and in all divisions of the economy, those standards are altogether too low to serve as a defense of democracy. They must not only be maintained; they must be raised.

In spite of the burden of military defense which the nation is assuming, these standards can be raised. This brings the argument to the fourth point of the program. Careful studies of the productive capacity of the economy over a period of twenty years demonstrate conclusively that the American people are living far below what is already possible, that they stand in the vestibule of an economy of abundance. The forces of democracy must insist on the full employment of labor, on the release of the productive energies of industrial technology, on the direction of these energies to the improvement of Attention Mr. Citizen...

The citizens of no nation in the world are so uninformed about military and naval affairs as ours. Pacifically minded, we have not attempted to understand the art and technique of war. As a result, there exists in this country no body of public opinion competent to support or criticize any military or naval policy.

To remedy this weakness, the following three books have been published. Written by outstanding authorities, they explain what the three services are all about—how they are organized, how they function, where they differ from the services of the past, everything the citizen wants and needs to know — and written from the layman's point of view.

They answer thousands of questions not only for those contemplating enlistment, but for everyone who wants to know about our armed forces. You'll want them all.

the lot of the common man. If, in the course of the struggle now developing in the world, it should become necessary for labor to make material sacrifices to insure victory for the ways of freedom, labor would unquestionably be willing to make such sacrifices. It always has. But until full use is made of available energies and resources, standards should be maintained, increased, and made more generally applicable.

The fifth point in the program is the framing of a system of taxation deliberately designed to prevent the further concentration of wealth. War and the conditions of war have always been occasions for the making of profits and fortunes. The crowning irony of the present struggle for democracy would be the continued whittling away of the economic foundations of freedom and security for the masses of the people. The only method of forestalling this, short of widespread socialization of business enterprise, is a plan of taxation which would actually take the profits out of war. Labor must insist that the President be held to his pledge that no millionaire will emerge out of the defense program. Where business refuses to put its service at the disposal of the nation the only course left to a democracy is some form of government operation.

The maintenance and extension of public education and all social services constitute a sixth point in the program. Today a concerted nation-wide drive to reduce school budgets is under way—a drive that is backed by big tax-payers who desire to protect their economic interests and by reactionary elements in society who, fearing an enlightened people, oppose the establishment of a comprehensive and adequate system of education. Particularly important is the necessity of further equalizing educational opportunity so that there will be no underprivileged generation in any section, class, race, or minority of the nation. Only liberal grants from the federal government will make this possible.

Closely related to the extension of educational opportunity is the defense of civil rights and liberties for all. In this sphere Britain has set an example which America should follow. Although the English people are facing dangers unsurpassed in history, they have upheld with remarkable courage and loyalty the highest standards of the liberal tradition. Without the guarantees of free speech, press, assembly, organization, and petition, the democratic process becomes a farce. And without this process of untrammelled discussion, criticism, and group decision, there can be no assurance of the perpetuation of free institutions. The suppression of the Bill of Rights, even for a period, is a dangerous step in the direction of the totalitarian state. Labor cannot afford to be caught napping on this crucial issue.

Defense of civil liberties does not imply, however, that labor should be tolerant of totalitarian encroachments in its own ranks, whether from the right or the left. It is of course natural for organizations of working people to oppose all fascist and Nazi tendencies. They must also oppose every effort on the part of the Communist Party to insinuate itself into their organizations and to impose its line on their decisions. Nothing could be more fraudulent than the "defense of human liberty" by the followers of a dictator, whether that dictator resides in the United States or a foreign land. All who enter the lists for democracy should be asked to show their credentials.

The ninth point in the program is preparation to meet the economic dislocation following the war. That such dislocations, deep and widespread, will come is as certain as death and taxes. Labor should be ready to meet them. Even if the American people succeed in remaining out of the armed conflict, the collapse of the war markets will carry with it a collapse of the entire war industry. If millions of working people are not to be thrown on the streets, if the economy is not to enter a period of general paralysis, provision will have to be made for enlarging peacetime industries sufficiently to provide employment for all. Labor should undertake immediately the studies necessary to the framing of a plan to achieve this end.

Finally, there is the vast and intricate problem of social reconstruction which has faced every industrial nation since the opening of the present century and which was made acute and chronic by the first world war. Labor must give thought and direction to the correction of those domestic and world conditions out of which the totalitarian movements and states emerged. The defeat of Hitler, crucial though it is to the survival of even the ideas of liberty and democracy, would be futile if it did not lead to a stable and just social order. Here lies the supreme challenge of the contemporary struggle to organized labor and all friends of democracy.

WHO READS THE NATION—AND WHY

DR. GEORGE GALLUP:

"The Nation has always reminded me of the youthful David—the lad with the slingshot who didn't pull his punches. It is hard to realize that David is going into his seventy-sixth year. . . . I know of no magazine with more consistent vitality and interest."

ROBERT H. JACKSON:

"To stimulate, to arouse us from a fatal complacency, is enough. In this The Nation has never failed."

H. V. KALTENBORN:

"In this material-minded America, where prejudice, publicity, and propaganda are at the service of the rich and powerful, The Nation should be required reading for every opinion-maker."

SENATOR GEORGE W. NORRIS:

"For a great many years I have been a reader of The Nation and one of its humble admirers. Its courageous and unselfish attitude in defending the rights and liberties of the common man has won for it the admiration of all people who believe in justice and liberty."

RAYMOND GRAM SWING:

"I can think of no single periodical in the United States whose continued existence is of more importance to American democracy than The Nation. Not that it is consistently wiser than other periodicals, but I know of none which is more conscientiously aware of the problem of democracy, or more loyally dedicated to the maintenance of civil liberties."

CLIFTON FADIMAN:

"To every American who treasures, particularly in these trying times, our national ideals of justice, decency, and democracy, The Nation continues to be both a necessity and a stimulus."

THESE men, and thousands like them, leaders in government and education, business and community life, are turning more and more to The Nation as a reliable barometer of progressive thinking about present world developments. For they have learned that in the pages of The Nation they will find fearless, authoritative analysis of news the dailies do not print, informed and accurate reports from Washington and key centers in war-torn Europe, discriminating judgments of books, art, music, and drama by America's best critics. These regular departments, however, are only a part of the weekly service which The Nation renders to its readers. "Survey of Two Worlds," the special supplement in which this announcement appears, is one of many features planned to bring double value to Nation readers at the regular price of a yearly subscription. The Shape of Things

RUSSIA'S RESTATEMENT OF ITS TREATY OF friendship with Turkey and its promise of complete neutrality should Turkey be attacked and obliged to enter the war, represents another cautious but significant move by Moscow to check the German advance towards the Dardanelles. Like the recent Soviet rebuke to Bulgaria it avoids a direct challenge to Hitler but it does convey a warning. For the Turks it constitutes a real encouragement to resist Nazi encroachments by relieving them of anxiety about their backdoor in the Caucasus region should the German armies begin pounding at the front. It may mean further a prospect of Soviet "aid-short-of-war" if and when hostilities break out. The agreement is also important to Britain whose alliance with Turkey has been limited by an "escape clause" excusing the latter from any action embroiling it with Russia. In the negotiations leading up to the new declaration Sir Stafford Cripps, British Ambassador to Moscow, is believed to have played an important part, thus achieving, after a long uphill struggle, a genuine diplomatic triumph. According to persistent but as yet unconfirmed reports, Russia's efforts to impede the Nazi conquest of the Balkans include a ban on oil shipments promulgated the day Bulgaria was taken over. There is also reason to suppose that the wave of sabotage in Bulgaria, attributed by the Nazis to the British secret service, is at least partly inspired by Moscow. *

IN CONSENTING TO THE PASSAGE THROUGH the blockade of two ships laden with flour for France, the British government seems to have been motivated chiefly by a desire to please Washington. Its position is that this shipment is exceptional and that the policy of including unoccupied France within the blockaded area must continue. Only if the Vichy government consented to conditions demonstrating its independence of Germany, such as the removal of the French fleet to the colonies, could Britain afford to treat unoccupied France as outside the German military and economic sphere. But when it comes to negotiations along such lines, Pétain and Darlan are not free agents; they must take orders from Berlin, whose representatives are stationed in Vichy with power to control the activities of the French Foreign Ministry. In its dealings with Ambassador Henry-Haye over the food ships the State Department seems to us to have followed the unrealistic line of treating him as speaking for a fully independent power. This means ignoring mounting evidence that the carefully purged French missions and consulates throughout the world are being assigned tasks on behalf of Germany which it would be inconvenient or impossible for German diplomats to carry out themselves. Vichy's subordinate position has just been underlined again by press attacks on Admiral Leahy. Not only the Paris newspapers, but l'Illustration, a national magazine which circulates in unoccupied as well as occupied France, depict Leahy as a plotter and schemer and describe American aid to France as a "profiteering move" engineered by the Jews. When the hand of Goebbels is so plainly shown in France, our government should be chary of philanthropic efforts which can be used to wedge open the blockade door.

JAY ALLEN MUST HAVE PICKED UP A peculiarly juicy bit of news in occupied France, to judge by the drastic form of censorship to which it has been subjected. To head off Mr. Allen's potential scoop the occupying authorities have hit on the remarkably simple device of holding the American correspondent in jail until his story goes stale. At least that is the interpretation which the Associated Press puts on the incident, and it is hard to find any other explanation. Mr. Allen's technical offense was the crossing of the boundary between the occupied and unoccupied zones of France without benefit of credentials. Informants tell us that this is done hundreds of times daily and one would hardly suppose that it called for more than a fine or a few days' detention at the worst. In Mr. Allen's case the German officials, dispensing with the formalities of a trial, have sent the offender to prison for "investigation" and indicate that they will keep him there for at least two months.

WALTER FUNK, REICH ECONOMICS MINISTER and president of the Reichsbank, has been boasting to the stockholders of that institution about the wonders of German war finance and the international position of German currency. During 1940, he said, the mark so expanded its sphere of influence that today "it practically dominates Europe." That is true. The mark has followed the swastika, and everywhere the peoples of conquered and "protected" countries are forced to accept German currency at such rates of exchange as the Nazis choose to order. This means in every case that the mark is given an inflated value in terms of other currencies, permitting the Germans to buy up cheaply whatever goods are obtainable. After the march into Rumania the former exchange rate of 50 leis to the mark was arbitrarily hoisted to 60 leis. The Rumanians are compelled to sell their product for fewer marks than before and even then they cannot use these marks to buy freely in Germany since the German export capacity is far too limited, under war conditions, to permit satisfaction of all foreign demand. Externally, as well as internally, Germany is financing the war by limiting consumption to the barest subsistence level. The Nazis have repudiated the gold standard as, to quote Herr Funk, "an instrument misused for purposes of oppression in the interests of power politics." They have substituted for it the infinitely more oppressive bayonet standard. Whether they will find this efficient for their purposes, except as a means of rounding up existing surpluses, is another matter. They need the agricultural production of all Europe; but farmers offered money which has no exchange value in terms of goods have a way of restricting output to their own consumption—a habit that would be difficult to cure except by the assignment of a policeman to every field, cowshed, and henroost.

WHILE MATSUOKA IS IN EUROPE TRYING TO obtain some concrete support for Japan for its long-heralded drive to the south, little may be expected to happen in the Far East. The Japanese have effected another landing north of Hongkong and have occupied two minor ports in that area. But the Chinese countered by reoccupying several towns along the West River front in Kwangtung, and retaking all the positions recently lost to the Japanese on the south bank of the Yangtse, opposite Ichang. Reliable reports indicate that Chiang Kai-shek is awaiting only the delivery of American airplanes before launching a major offensive against the Japanese. The recent appointment of John Earl Baker as director of traffic on the Burma road promises immediate relief with regard to China's knotty transport problem, while the allotment of funds to build a railway to the Burmese border and plans for an additional highway to India should provide a more fundamental solution in 1942 or 1943. Reports that Japan is sending a large army through Thailand to the Burmese border seem to be definitely premature. If such plans existed the recent visit of units of the American fleet to Australia and New Zealand may have encouraged their return to cold storage.

A MOVE TOWARD A CONFERENCE BETWEEN British and American labor leaders has been taken by the Steel City Industrial Union Council in Pittsburgh, which has called upon the Congress of Industrial Organizations to communicate "at once" with proper representatives of the British labor movement. The council suggests that spokesmen of British and American labor get together to discuss "American aid to Britain short of war, joint economic and political defense, war aims, and the long-range purposes of the democratic cause." The Pittsburgh group has dispatched copies of its statement to similar groups in other parts of the country, urging that they adopt similar resolutions, and current reports indicate favorable action in a number of localities. It is particularly significant that the move was initiated in Pittsburgh. The industrial council of that city is first of all an important clearing-house for workers in the steel, coal, electrical, and other defense industries, and represents unions with a membership of nearly 100,000. Secondly, it is Philip Murray's own bailiwick and while the resolution does not bear his endorsement, he undoubtedly approves it. Finally, the move is in direct opposition to the Communist clamor about an "imperialist" war and indicates a recognition of labor's prominent role on both sides of the Atlantic. It is an idea that merits the support of all labor and liberal groups.

FIFTY THOUSAND NEW JOBS AND A CUT IN electric rates of 25 per cent are promised New York State in Part VI of the St. Lawrence Survey now being prepared for the Department of Commerce under the direction of N. R. Danielian. It is stated that the project would reverse the decline in manufacturing industry in the state during the past decade. But the more immediate case for the Canadian-American St. Lawrence pact soon to be submitted to Congress was made by Assistant Secretary of State Berle. Berle pointed out that development of the St. Lawrence for both power and navigation had become a defense necessity. Aluminum for planes, chemicals for explosives, and electric furnaces for the new alloys so important in modern armament all require cheap and plentiful power. At the present time we are borrowing power from the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence for American industries, although Canada needs this power badly—now that the Nazi occupation of Norway forces Britain to depend more than ever on Canada for pulp wood, ferro-alloys, and chemicals. Opening of navigation on the St. Lawrence would also make it possible to build ships on the Great Lakes, as we did in the last war. At that time it was necessary, Berle points out, to "cut these ships in two and float them in parts down to Montreal." The railroad and utility lobby, which long blocked development of the St. Lawrence, is in action again, and the vote in Congress will be a clear choice between these private interests and defense.

SENATOR NORRIS'S LETTER TO C. I. O. HEAD Philip Murray and A. F. of L. President William Green calling for action against the exorbitant initiation fees charged by some unions will be heartily endorsed by friends of labor throughout the country. Although the practice is not as widespread as the public has been led to believe, no one will dispute the essential accuracy of the facts as cited by the veteran Nebraska Senator. Some few unions, particularly in the building trades, have long charged excessive initiation fees and monthly dues. This has been done on the theory that the best way to maintain wages and favorable conditions within the industry was to keep down the number of qualified workers. Whatever justification this policy may seem to have had during the depression, it is obviously not applicable to the present period when every skilled worker is needed in defense work. As Senator Norris pointed out, there is no easy remedy for the situation. Practices of this type are controlled by the local unions, many of them of the racketeering variety. Since few, if any, of these are affiliated with the C. I. O., Philip Murray should have no difficulty in throwing the prestige and weight of the C. I. O. against these evils. Mr. Green's position is much more difficult, but it is impossible to believe that the long-delayed drive against racketeering unions within the A. F. of L. would not bear fruit if it were energetically pushed.

THE INDICTMENT OF MORRIS U. SCHAPPES IS in no sense a violation of his rights as an American citizen. Mr. Schappes is not accused of Communism; he is charged with perjury. And he will have his day in court. He may convince a jury that as a leading Communist on the teaching staff of City College he really believed that there were only four members in the Communist Party's unit at that institution; that from 1938 through 1939 he was the sole member of the party on the campus; that for a year he was sole editor of the unit paper; that he knew of no Communist other than himself who was a member of the teachers' union while he was in the party; and that there was no Communist faction within that union. Even if he doesn't convince the jury that he believed all these statements to be true when he so testified before the Rapp-Coudert committee he will go free unless the state proves that they were untrue and that Schappes knew them to be untrue. All the indictment sets forth is the improbability of his testimony, and a more warranted indictment we can hardly imagine. Nor can we guess why Schappes found it necessary to expose himself to an inevitable prosecution. If his revolutionary conscience forbade his revealing any names, he could have refused to testify altogether. Had he been held in contempt as a result, he could then have defended himself on principle and at worst subjected himself to a minor penalty. Instead he has chosen to spin out a yarn that would tax the most flexible imagination. No doubt it is perfectly fitting for Communists to make such use of public agencies as their revolutionary standards may dictate, but it is equally in keeping for the state to deny them the privilege of perjury which is not extended to ordinary citizens. No doubt the Communists, for all their squawking, understand this better than the dupes who now come forward to champion Mr. Schappes in the name of academic freedom.

THE DEATH OF CONSTANCE ROURKE REMOVES one of the most gifted of American critics and historians at a time when her rich research was about to bear fruit in what would surely have been a major and basic work on American culture. She was a scholar of the first order, but she was also one of those rare critics who create as they judge. Sure taste, a strict sense of values, broad knowledge, a remarkable gift of expression, humor, and a capacity for general ideas—these were the tools with which she set out to explore and define the forms of the American imagination. Her underlying purpose was to bring to the American present a greater and more informed awareness of the American past, especially in the arts; for it was her conviction that specific, integrated knowledge and understanding of the past was indispensable to the creative worker in any field. No doubt a way will be found to make available the results of many years of pioneer research and fresh thought along these lines—of which "American Humor" was both prologue and promise. Meanwhile those who knew her will find her death untimely in the most acute personal sense. She was so much more alive than most people that the news of her sudden passing strikes with a double force.

Hitler's Partial Victory

WITH the adherence of Yugoslavia to a modified form of the Tripartite Pact, Hitler has won another diplomatic success. But thanks to a spontaneous outburst of popular opposition, of a kind which is thrilling to see emerge in the browbeaten Balkans, his victory is only partial and may very well prove a Pyrrhic one.

There can be no doubt that what the Nazis wanted from Yugoslavia was an agreement similar to that which they forced upon Bulgaria. They demanded adherence to the Axis, German supervision of military and economic policies, and the right to move troops into and through Yugoslavia. The last item was of immediate importance in the campaign to force Greece to abandon its alliance with Britain, if possible by the methods of cold terror, if necessary by invasion and conquest. It is true that Germany has command of the routes into Greece from Bulgaria. But the best of these, the Struma valley, is a narrow gorge winding through difficult country, offering insufficient space for the easy deployment of a force large enough to overwhelm the Greek defenses rapidly. Conquest by this route might eventually prove possible but it might also prove extremely expensive.

The broad Vardar valley, on the other hand, leading through Yugoslavia direct to Salonika, offers a far more practicable pathway for a mechanized army, and there can be little doubt that it is this road which the German general staff hoped to follow. But the Belgrade government, for all its fears of Germany, dared not face the consequences of such a surrender of its independence and refused to sign any agreement involving actual occupation of the country. Instead, it finally accepted a compromise by which Yugoslavia would become a limited member of the Axis. It was to receive a guarantee of its territorial integrity and of an outlet to the Aegean. In return it agreed to permit German hospital and munition trains to pass through its territory, to halt all anti-Axis propaganda, and to foster "economic cooperation" by accepting the assistance of German technical experts and granting new concessions to Germany.

Even though German troops were barred, this agreement went a long way toward the complete surrender of Yugoslavia's independence, and when it was put before the full Cabinet for final approval that body split badly. Despite all sorts of pressure, three leading members resigned and their action served to fan into flame anti-Axis sentiment which had long been smoldering throughout the country, and particularly in Old Serbia and Bosnia. Opposition to any kind of surrender to the Axis seems to have united all classes and groups in these sections. The peasants and mountaineers who form the bulk of the population come of a tough and democratic strain. They despise the Italians and hate the Germans, and they have not forgotten that they fought the last war in alliance with Britain and won their independence.

The situation in Croatia and Slovenia is rather different. Apart from some minor fascist groups, there is no evidence of pro-Axis sentiment in these provinces. But they lie to the north and their broad plains are fearfully exposed to invasion. Should it come they will be the first to suffer, for it is known that in the event of war the Yugoslav army, with its poor equipment, could not defend this part of the country. It could only hope to put up a prolonged resistance by withdrawing to the southern and western mountains and resorting to guerrilla tactics.

As the news spreads through the country that the pact with Germany and Italy has been signed, there are likely to be further explosions of popular opinion which may lead to open revolt. Threats of assassination have already been uttered against those members of the government who are known to have advocated adherence to the Axis. There is at least a doubt that the government can count on the army and the police, and it will have enormous difficulties in carrying out the undertaking to suppress anti-Axis sentiment. Nor is it probable that German munition trains will be able to pass through the country unmolested: their advent will almost certainly be the signal for an outburst of sabotage.

This is why we expect Hitler's diplomatic victory will prove a Pyrrhic one. Even the limited degree of cooperation which he is now exacting from Yugoslavia can hardly be obtained unless it is backed by his own troops. Yet any attempt to revise the agreement so as to allow him to provide his own protective forces to guard the railroads will almost certainly provoke the bloody resistance which he has tried to avoid, not for any humanitarian reasons, but because his plans would be impeded by the opening of a second front in the Balkans.

New Mediation Board

THE personnel and set-up of the National Defense Mediation Board represent a victory for Sidney Hillman, associate director of the OPM, for the labor movement, and for the New Deal. It was conceived as a means of stemming the growing reactionary drive for legislative curbs on the right to strike, and friends of labor have every assurance that it will not turn into a strike-breaking instrument. The three public representatives on this board of eleven are men who command wide public confidence and at the same time have demonstrated a liberal point of view. Clarence A. Dykstra, the chairman, has wisely asked to be relieved of his duties as director of Selective Service, a move which should spike the whispers that his appointment to head the mediation board indicated that the Administration was prepared to "draft" workers who did not agree to its decisions. Dr. Dykstra made an excellent record as city manager of Cincinnati and as president of the University of Wisconsin. William H. Davis is a famous patent lawyer whose work in the National Recovery Administration made him many friends in the New Deal. The third public representative, Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina, has proved his courage and his liberalism many times in the past. Experience with mediation boards indicates that representatives of both labor and capital tend to vote "a straight ticket" in virtually all disputes, leaving the balance of power and the decision in the hands of the public representatives. We think labor's case will be in good hands on this board.

The labor representatives on the board seem to us excellent. Philip Murray and Thomas Kennedy are both men of practical experience as well as outstanding labor leaders. George M. Harrison, as head of the Railway Clerks, has always shown the progressive outlook we have come to expect from the Brotherhoods. George Meany, now secretary-treasurer of the A. F. of L., may find it easier than some of the older federation leaders to work peacefully with the C. I. O.'s representatives on the board and perhaps together they may informally exert a good influence toward the elimination of jurisdictional strikes.

On the employer side the member about whom we have the greatest misgivings is Roger D. Lapham of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company. The American-Hawaiian steamship and pineapple interests have been the very heart of the reactionary bloc on the West Coast. Walter C. Teagle of Standard Oil is certainly no friend of unionism but during the NRA he at least had some experience of working in harness with representatives of government and labor. Cyrus S. Ching of United States Rubber is an enlightened business man of a kind we wish were more plentiful. He has often shown his understanding of, and friendliness toward, the labor movement in the past. Ching played a commendable role in bringing about the settlement of the strike in Bethlehem's Lackawanna plant. Eugene S. Meyer, the fourth employer representative, is a conservative with unexpected streaks of liberalism. The Washington Post, which he publishes, was one of the few papers in this country to welcome the Reuther plan. It has a good record on civil liberties and it ran an editorial on March 22 calling Ford's labor position "untenable." "A few large companies," the Post said, "are still denying their employees the rights guaranteed to them under the National Labor Relations Act. Wherever that situation exists, the primary responsibility for labor disputes which disrupt or threaten to delay production for defense rests upon the employer." It is a pity that more conservative publications are not willing to do their bit for better industrial relations by making the same admission.

It remains to be pointed out that the new board will not have carte blanche to inject itself into any and every strike. The primary responsibility will remain with the United States Conciliation Service, which has done excellent work in the past. The mediation board will go into action only when Secretary of Labor Perkins has certified that a labor dispute threatens to interfere with defense. In the last war the mediation board headed by William Howard Taft and Frank P. Walsh was an instrument through which labor made many peaceful gains in the shape of increased membership and higher wages. We believe the new board may prove equally useful in reducing strikes and in helping labor to obtain a square deal in industry.

The War at Sea

THE activity of a German battle fleet in the Atlantic—admitted by the British and extolled by the Nazis—ushers in what is perhaps the most crucial phase of the war. Berlin claims that within a few days its surface raiders sank twenty-two armed merchantmen totaling some 116,000 tons, and that an additional 108,000 tons of shipping was destroyed by submarines and airplanes. Undoubtedly these claims are exaggerated. The Nazis have habitually set British losses close to double those admitted in London. But with full allowance for swollen claims, the situation is undeniably serious. The Admiralty has admitted losses in two weeks of some 240,000 tons of British and Allied shipping. If German reports are any criterion, the total for the coming week will be well above this level. Experts are agreed that Britain cannot continue to suffer losses on this scale if it is to win the war.

As the war spreads into the Balkans, Africa, and, possibly, the Far East, the need for shipping will increase. To transport and supply expeditionary forces of any size requires large numbers of ships. Additional shipping will be needed as Britain's reserves of raw materials and foodstuffs are depleted, and for transporting the increased supplies made available under the Lease-Lend bill. It is obvious that Britain, even with help from the United States, cannot build ships as rapidly as Germany can sink them. At most, construction is estimated at 2,100,000 tons in 1941—utilizing both British and American resources to the utmost. The pace can be stepped up considerably in 1942 and 1943; but Britain's problem is how to get through the next twelve months. To do this it must draw on existing American resources. The United States itself is short of ships at this moment. We are having difficulty obtaining the tin, rubber, and manganese required in our defense industries because of a shortage of vessels. We have already transferred or sold some 1,400,000 tons to Britain since the outbreak of the war—about 20 per cent of our total tonnage. Yet greater sacrifices are clearly called for if our aid to Britain is to be more than a futile gesture.

As a first step the United States is likely to begin shipping supplies destined to Britain as far as Halifax in American ships, cutting several days off each trans-Atlantic journey for British freighters. Arrangements are believed to be under way for repairing British naval ships in American yards, as provided in the Lease-Lend bill, and for arming British merchantmen on this side of the Atlantic. Where the additional needed ships are to come from is not yet wholly clear, but there are 362 vessels in the coastwise service which, with a few exceptions, could be utilized for overseas service. This would place a greater burden on the railroads, but they seem capable of assuming the task. Merely providing additional merchant shipping to be sunk by the Nazis is not, however, an answer to the problem. The crucial question is that of protection. The bridge of ships which the President has called for must be safeguarded if it is to be kept intact. It is evident that Britain has not the resources to do this under present conditions. If our supplies are to reach their destination, the United States must either give direct protection through convoys—which would probably be regarded as an act of war—or provide Great Britain with the cruisers, destroyers, and other light naval units needed to keep the shipping lanes open. Choice between these alternatives cannot long be deferred.

A Bad Housing Bill

AN extraordinarily bad defense-housing bill has passed the House and is up for consideration in the Senate. The bill, known as H. R. 3575, would authorize the Federal Housing Administration to issue federal-guaranteed home mortgages up to a total of $100,000,000 to builders and contractors. This is a sharp departure from present practice under which federal-guaranteed mortgages are issued only to owner-tenants. It would eliminate for such loans the 10 to 20 per cent down payment now required for the purchase of a house and would raise the interest rate to as much as 6 per cent. The builder is not restricted as to the disposition of these houses.

Strong opposition to the bill in its present form was voiced in the recent hearings before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency by Miss Harriet Elliott, consumer representative on the Defense Commission, and by representatives of the American Federation of Labor. Miss Elliott objected chiefly to the lack of any protection for the prospective purchasers or tenants of the houses to be constructed under this bill. As the measure stands there is nothing to prevent builders from selling the houses at a speculative profit, or from taking advantage of the emergency to rent the houses at exorbitant rates. The increase in interest charges would add to the burden of workers who might get caught in the post-war depression with houses bought at inflated prices.

The A. F. of L. representatives were even more sweeping in their denunciation. They pointed out that the bill offers nothing but possible headaches for workers in the crowded defense centers. If the government does not provide decent housing, it may be taken for granted that private enterprise will use the speculative opportunities to provide housing of a type. Much, if not most of it, will doubtless be of an inferior, shoddy type, and, unless protective legislation is adopted, rents and selling prices will be exorbitant. This measure does not apply to temporary structures, but it provides a bounty for profiteers by offering government-guaranteed mortgages to potential speculators. All risk is removed as far as the lending institution and the speculative builder are concerned because the government assumes the final responsibility.

Fortunately, it is not necessary to kill the bill altogether in order to eliminate its bad features. In view of the urgent shortage of houses in defense areas, private construction should be encouraged—with elementary safeguards for the families for whom the homes are intended. This might be achieved by amendments prohibiting speculative charges in the sale of such houses as well as excessive rentals, and providing that no deficiency judgments could be made against workers living in these houses in the event of default caused by the termination of their employment in defense industries.

What Mr. Knudsen Thinks

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 22

WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN, production chief of the defense program, made an "off the record" speech at a National Press Club luncheon last Wednesday, and it left your correspondent and a few like him in a low state of mind. Washington correspondents are not the browbeaten helots of a kept press; on the contrary, most of them have fewer misgivings about the economic status quo than Lamont—Thomas W., not Corliss. Few of them need to be told in which receptacle to place a Bureau of Labor Statistics release showing that only a third as many days were lost in strikes last year as in the year before we entered the last war. At Press Club affairs there is always more than a sprinkling of advertising executives, lobbyists, and press agents. The faces are the faces one sees at the Rotary Club in Camden, N. J., or the Kiwanis in Davenport, Iowa. A look at them explains why the President's great speech on March 15 evoked substantial applause only at his reference to strikes. Though Mr. Roosevelt was careful to refer to "unnecessary" strikes, I'm sure his audience, in a mood for sacrifice after its $7.50 dinner, generously assumed that he meant all strikes were unnecessary. Knudsen's speech Wednesday was more to their liking, though a minority of us found it harder to stomach than the Lenten filet of sole. I cannot risk the old school tie by discussing his speech, but most of those present felt that Knudsen had told labor where to get off, always a popular topic with the $5,000-a-year lumpenproletariat.

There are signs that some time between February 19 and February 28, Alfred P. Sloan had a heart-to-heart talk with Knudsen. On February 19 Knudsen told the House Judiciary Committee no new strike legislation was needed; on February 28 he sent the committee a letter suggesting a three-point program to curb strikes. The Press Club speech, like the Knudsen press conference which followed it, reflected the change which has occurred in Knudsen's division. An open contempt in dealing with labor's claims and labor's suggestions is evident, and there are indications that Hillman may not take it lying down. The OPM has a squawk against labor in the jurisdictional strike, but it would have been tactful and gracious to admit that some at least of the other strikes are caused by an unwillingness to obey the Wagner Act or to pay a decent wage. To tell $20-a-week workers that they must not "take advantage of defense" is not too safe as long as they can read the financial pages. Nor is it wise to dismiss the Reuther plan in the cavalier fashion adopted by Knudsen.

I always thought that the secret of running a successful business was to make your workers feel they were a part of it and that any suggestions they had were welcome. I don't see why this doesn't apply to the business of running a defense program. Business spokesmen say they want labor's cooperation. The Reuther plan was the first of the proposals put forward by that section of labor which genuinely wants to cooperate on aid to Britain and the defense program. I should think these proposals would be dealt with in a way to make labor feel that suggestions are appreciated. Knudsen made it clear on Wednesday that he thinks labor ought to mind its own business. Conceivably the people who may have to fight to defend their country might think it their business to make sure it was being adequately prepared.

I should think that where a suggestion from labor was impracticable, there would be a desire to give it so fair a hearing as to win the good will of its sponsors. The Reuther plan has been kicking around Washington since last August, and if it had not been for the burst of publicity which followed The Nation's story on it last December 21 and the interest shown by the President, the plan would have been buried long ago. It was not until February 28 that Knudsen gave Reuther a hearing and then he chose to listen alone to what he already knew. He had heard the details from Hillman months before, and there was some surprise that none of Knudsen's production aides sat in on the conference. Knudsen swore Reuther to secrecy, and then proceeded to tell his side of the story, first, "off the record" at Wednesday's luncheon and then at the press conference which followed. The test was whether it was possible, by special jigs and fixtures, to adapt idle automotive equipment to quantity production of plane parts. "They wanted to go into the shop as a union committee," Knudsen told his press conference, "and try to design fixtures for the present machinery and that was putting the master mechanic out of the job. We had to stall on that one. . . ."

This, the most spectacular aspect of the Reuther plan, is not the only one on which Knudsen has stalled. On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, automotive industry spokesmen tell the press that the Reuther plan is impracticable; on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, that "we're already doing it." They mean that through subcontracting and the much-publicized bomber plan the automobile industry is already making parts of planes. Reuther suggested that the full productive capacity of the industry cannot be utilized for defense until its present production curve is flattened out. So long as production of cars is concentrated in a few winter months, many machines must be kept idle the rest of the year for use during the peak season. But instead of looking into this quite obvious suggestion, the industry isn't even proposing to use what idle capacity it has under present conditions. The government is financing new factories for Ford, Chrysler, and General Motors. Parts and sub-assemblies for bombers will be made in these plants rather than with existing equipment. This may slow up production but it has its advantages for the companies.

The Reuther plan also called public attention to the fact that about half the machine-tool capacity of the automotive industry is in its captive shops, i.e., the shops which belong to the automobile companies and do most of the tooling for new models. Reuther and his aides claim that these are only working at one-fourth capacity.

They could make almost any kind of tool needed for defense. "What is the main drawback now in our national defense effort?" Knudsen was asked at his press conference. "What is the main thing holding us back generally?" Knudsen's answer was, "I think tools."

Any one of the suggestions embodied in the Reuther plan would upset business-as-usual, but part of the dislike for it springs from deeper sources. An unwillingness to permit democratic participation in the defense program is characteristic of OPM activities. A notable example is the run-around given the community committees of small business men, unions, and local agencies, which have been trying unsuccessfully to participate in the farming-out program. The masters of enterprise fear community committees and shop committees as instinctively as monarchs feared parliaments. "Now, Walter," Knudsen said to Reuther at a General Motors wage negotiation some years ago, "no class conflict stuff." I wonder whether they really fear class conflict as much as they fear class cooperation.

The War in the Desert

BY RAOUL AGLION

AT THE beginning of the war I was an attaché in the French legation at Cairo. When Hitler conquered France I resigned my post and from that time until the fall of Sidi Barrani I had a splendid opportunity to observe the war in Africa. I saw General Sir Archibald Wavell's fabulous desert army cut down its Italian foe.

When the fighting in North Africa began, the Italians had by far the better position. For five years they had been accumulating vast stores of ammunition. Their colonial troops had been concentrated in Libya—an army of 275,000 men, including 45,000 natives, ready to fight on both Egyptian and Tunisian frontiers. In Ethiopia they had another army of 125,000 men, including native and Somali troops. To counter these forces the British had not more than 30,000 soldiers. These were faced with the task of defending Egypt, the Sudan, and the Suez Canal, and they had to be ready to throw back a pincer attack on Egypt from the south and west.

The western desert of Egypt is one of the barest places on earth. For the most part a plateau, its topography is a baffling maze of shifting sand dunes which make military movements slow and difficult. Before the Italians, no one had ever attempted to attack Egypt from a Libyan base. Past conquerors—Persians, Arabs, and Turks—struck from the east, or, as in the case of Napoleon and the British, by sea from the north. However, history did not dismay Mussolini's legions, whose grand objective was Alexandria and the Suez Canal.

Soon after the collapse of France the Italians prepared to transfer their troops from the Tunisian frontier to

General Wavell

Dolbin

Libya's eastern border. This meant not only the shifting of troops but the transport of all the supplies required by a mechanized army: tanks, Bren-carriers, ammunition, food, water, ambulances, hospital equipment, and machines for repairing matériel. This great movement of men and supplies was constantly hampered by British aerial and naval attacks along the only important Italian road, the Via Mussolini, and it was not until the first days of August that the Italians were at last ready to move against Egypt, separated from the Italian colonies only by barbed wire fences which the Fascists themselves had erected along the shores and around the wells.

Successively the Italian forces occupied Fort Capuzzo,

Solum, Buqbuq, and Sidi Barrani, 200 miles from Alexandria. Their main handicap was lack of water. In the hundred miles between Solum and Sidi Barrani there are only eight wells and no water at all from Sidi Barrani to the British base of Mersa Matruh.

Late in August the Italians dug in to prepare the advance from Sidi Barrani. On the other side Wavell and his Near East forces had organized an enormous camp at Mersa Matruh and fortified it with ditches, walls, and barbed wire fences. The base had unhampered supply lines with Alexandria, where munitions for the British were unloaded. British troops had begun to arrive in small sections from all over the world. In the streets of Cairo I heard British soldiers talking their mother tongue with the curiously different accents of Scotland, Ireland, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, and Rhodesia. There were British soldiers from the island of Cyprus who spoke Greek. In addition, men from the Sudan spoke Arab; Hindus spoke Hindustani; French was the tongue of the soldiers from the garrison on the island of Mauritius; Jewish soldiers from Palestine spoke Hebrew, and the Maltese spoke a mixture of Latin and Italian. One got the impression that the whole world was on Britain's side. Each group lived in its accustomed fashion and ate its national food. Native officers led their troops, often under their own colors. There were priests of a dozen faiths. The Allied troops were joined by the army of the Nile: Free French from all parts of Syria, Central and West Africa, New Caledonia, and Europe. There were Polish cavalymen, perfectly equipped and trained, Czech soldiers, and Free Libyans joining the Senussi in the war for their national liberation.

The morale of the Italians was, if anything, somewhat worse than British and American press reports described. The Blackshirt troops, who did much of the fighting, especially in less dangerous salients, were known even in the regular Italian army as "street soldiers" and the regular army itself was anything but a paragon of bravery. I recall an occasion when four British soldiers were captured by 230 Blackshirts. The Fascists asked their prisoners if a British capture of Sidi Barrani seemed likely. The English said that their army was already advancing on the Italian fort. Hearing that, the leader of the Italians surrendered his isolated battalion to its prisoners. After the capture of Sidi Barrani, Wavell's men went after this battalion which, the British naturally thought, was still holding its prisoners. Instead of the fight they expected, they were greeted by a British officer waving his cap and gleefully announcing that he was ready to hand over all of his captors as prisoners of war.

On another occasion a group of British began to attack a fort held by a few hundred Italians only to be met outside its gates by a bemedaled Italian general. Signaling a truce, he asked to see the British general. He was told that there was no general in the group. A British colonel came forward to negotiate. The Italian said that he was unhappily forced to surrender because his men had no ammunition. When the formalities were finished and the British entered the fort, they found enough ammunition to support a whole division through a long siege.

In all the eulogies of General Wavell no one has mentioned his extreme sensitivity to the national and social feelings of the men he commands. It was a revelation to watch him mold a compact army from the various and disparate types under his command. Above all, he emphasized the nature of the fight in which they were all engaged and impressed them with the fact that they were free men fighting in the cause of freedom.

Although his army had grown appreciably, Italy's declaration of war against Greece disturbed Wavell's plans. Mussolini's attack on that country some months earlier had been planned to split the British forces and to divert the energies of the army of the Nile. In this design it was not successful but it did serve to prevent sizable British reinforcements from being sent to Africa and dictated a campaign that would have to be carried out by what was still a small army. In this contingency it was the British navy that saved the day. On November 11, while the Italians were still consolidating their forces at Sidi Barrani, bombers carried by the aircraft carriers Eagle and Illustrious sank a large part of the Italian fleet in a daring action in the port of Taranto. Ships of the Littoria and Conte di Cavour classes, as well as many minor vessels, were sent to the bottom.

This naval action was extremely valuable to Wavell, for it made it possible for the British and their allies to make their attack on the Italians near the sea under the protection of the guns of the British fleet. Wavell and Admiral Sir Andrew Cunningham organized a joint fleet and army strategy. The Libyan campaign would have been next to impossible had not the Italian navy been put out of action at Taranto.

The fleet and the army of the Nile were in continual cooperation. Cruisers first dashed along the coast to soften Italian resistance; later, when the army advanced, the ships accompanied it, protecting its northern wing. This arrangement enabled Wavell's army to make turning and flanking movements repeatedly, secure in the knowledge that the guns of the fleet would block any counteraction by the Fascists. Following a battle, the fleet unloaded foodstuffs, water, and ammunition, and took prisoners on board.

When the campaign started the British were outnumbered by the enemy, but the army of the Nile was perfectly trained and armed. In his order of the day before the battle of Sidi Barrani, December 9, Wavell told his men: "In everything but numbers we are superior to the enemy. We are more highly trained, we shoot straighter, we have better equipment. Above all, we have stouter hearts, greater traditions, and we are fighting in a worthier cause. . . ."

The whole attack was prepared in the greatest secrecy. Not only were the movements of the British unknown to the Fascists, but the Fascists were confused by a huge dummy camp, where wooden tanks and worthless trucks gave the impression of freshly arriving troops. Under the orders of Major General Michael O'Moore Creagh, the real armored division traveled at high speed by night, and halted five miles from the two-mile barbed-wire defense which surrounded the tank ditches and walls protecting the four great forts.

The crews of the motorized army slept near their tanks in the cold desert night, a whirlwind of sand blowing around them. Suddenly, at dawn, the R. A. F. started bombing as the first line of light tanks moved to the rear entrances of the forts. The guns of the navy roared, raising clouds of sand as they fired; a second line of battle tanks followed, thundering along at a terrific pace, firing heavy guns. A third reserve line followed quickly. The Italians replied with cannon, Bren-guns and anti-tank fire. The high quality of the armored plate of the most modern British caterpillars, the bravery of Wavell's army, and above all the surprise and speed of the violent attack soon crushed the Fascist defense; after two days' fight a white flag was run up on the main fortress.

A rapid flank movement, carried out with tanks and Bren-carriers in cooperation with the navy's guns, cut off the retreat of the Fascist garrison. On December 11 the victory was complete; the British and their allies had conquered the main Italian fort of the desert, and taken 40,000 prisoners, including high officials. The equipment seized was enormous: Sidi Barrani had been prepared as a base for a future attack and as a storehouse of all ammunition, armament, and foodstuffs required by the Fascist army for the invasion of Egypt. Two thousand six-wheel lorries, 1,200 tanks, Bren-carriers, desert light cars, and twenty airplanes were taken over by the British. A large part of that equipment, especially the Bren guns, was shipped to Greece; the vehicles and the rest of the supplies are now being used by the British in Africa and some of the munitions marked by the Italians "For Abyssinia" have actually reached that country—in the hands of Haile Selassie and his followers. The British did not have enough experts to teach their soldiers how to use all the anti-aircraft guns captured from the Italians.

Sidi Barrani was the key position of the Italians. After the downfall of these forts, the British pushed on and conquered Solum, and, always with the valuable help of the navy, moved on to Bardia, Tobruk, and Bengazi, taking an enormous stock of equipment and more than 150,000 prisoners.

If the British fleet is undisturbed in its cooperation with the desert forces, the war in Libya will end with the capture of the remainder of the Fascist army, those Blackshirt legions driven by Mussolini to "live one day like a lion, rather than a thousand years like a lamb."

Labor: 1918 and 1941

BY ROSE M. STEIN

NOW we have another board—the National Defense Mediation Board. The headlines which greeted announcement of the new agency were most reassuring. Distressed souls led by earlier headlines to believe that our own and Britain's security were being jeopardized by strikes, had good reason to heave sighs of relief. No one else had any bona fide cause for disappointment. It is a good board. The three public representatives are men of the highest caliber, and the fact that industry and labor recommended top leaders from their respective ranks shows that both sides are taking the matter seriously and will make a genuine effort to cooperate. But despite competence and good intentions the board will fail unless there is much more willingness than has so far been shown to approach the problem of labor relations on the basis of conditions in 1941, rather than on conditions as they were in 1918.

Labor's status has undergone significant change in the intervening two decades or more. To ignore this change is as absurd as it would be to ignore the advance in production methods during the same period. No one in his right mind would suggest going back technologically. An amazing number of people appear eager to go back sociologically. But it cannot be done. In 1918, when a similar board was appointed, most of the mass-production industries had no union organization whatever. Consequently when the American Federation of Labor agreed to refrain from organizing non-union shops it made no great sacrifice. Inadequate though they were, the shop councils set up by the 1918 War Labor Board for the adjustment of grievances was a considerable advance over no bargaining machinery at all. In some instances they paved the way for post-war unionization, but to a much greater extent they gave impetus to a drive to promote the Employee Representation Plan, more widely known as the company union, a move which caused no end of trouble during the heyday of its revival under the National Industrial Recovery Act. The whole War Labor Board machinery was a makeshift affair, concocted under stress and strain, and considering the difficulties it faced, it did a magnificent job. But no such stress or strain characterizes the current scene, the alarming tone of the nation's press notwithstanding. Nearly all of the defense industries have union organization and established collective-bargaining procedures. These procedures have not broken down.

The extent of strikes and their effect on production have been as exaggerated as the reports of Mark Twain's death. This is done by the simple device of featuring every minute squabble in alarming headlines, and by reporting it as tying up so many million dollars' worth of defense orders. When authoritative data were offered to counteract the alarm spread by the fourth estate, the press simply refused to accept them on the ground that such facts do not coincide with the public's impression. Latest figures on current strikes, compiled by the United States News, which is not exactly partial to labor, show that approximately 40,000 workers are involved. There are over 40,000,000 workers engaged in American industry. This means a stoppage of one-tenth of one per cent. In terms of defense industries alone, the Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates the ratio to be one-fourth of one per cent. Even where the effect of tied-up plants on related production is taken into account, the situation as a whole is not serious. Machines themselves cannot operate without some break. And it is even more difficult for so many humans to work without interruption. An occasional strike is probably an excellent safety valve for an industrial machine in high gear.

Nevertheless, the need to avoid or reduce work stoppages is not questioned. Labor is among the first to agree to this. The notion that workers want to strike, or that union leaders want to promote strikes, is as silly as it is unfounded. Strikes are a form of war. They are costly and full of risks. With very few exceptions labor engages in them only for good reason and as a last resort. It is therefore pertinent to inquire into the underlying cause of recent strikes. Those which arose out of jurisdictional disputes, or other minor grievances, may well be classed as unwarranted, and no doubt the new board will go a long way toward curbing them. But even now these are neither widespread nor out of hand. By far the largest number of recent strikes have been waged in an effort to establish collective bargaining. That was the main issue in the most important disputes: Vultee, Bethlehem, and Allis-Chalmers. Establishment of this principle is a prerequisite to harmonious employer-employee relations, without which no amount of pressure from whatever source can achieve the degree of industrial productivity which the times demand. Collective bargaining has been established by law, ratified by the Supreme Court, and accepted by a majority of America's mass-production industries and by public opinion. Nevertheless, a few die-hard employers are resisting it. This is the group against whom labor is waging its fight. Is it justified in doing so?

From the earliest rumblings of the industrial revolution down to the present, labor has always pressed for advantages in times of industrial upswing and industry has always endeavored to reduce labor's gains in times of unemployment and depression. At the moment, production is at its peak and labor is unquestionably trying to advance its position by seeking union recognition from recalcitrant employers. There can be no question about the validity of this endeavor, since it merely aims to effectuate what is already public policy. Neither can there be any doubt that the employers who are refusing to deal with unions are defying public policy. The only question is whether the strike is a proper instrument, under present conditions, for settling this issue.

Granting that strikes should be reduced to a minimum, by what means should this end be sought? Without a doubt a large element of conservative opinion both in and out of Congress would have preferred complete prohibition of strikes by law. But any such attempt unquestionably would have led to increased strife. Besides, such action was opposed not only by all branches of labor and the Administration but by industry. Employers would favor an anti-strike measure if they could get a simon-pure brand. But they would rather suffer the ills they have than fly into the arms of another governmental agency set up by law and enforced as conscientiously as are the Railway Mediation and Labor Relations laws. The possibility of Congressional action, however, has been and is being utilized as a club over the heads of labor and the Administration in an effort to hold them in line.

Now that a board has been created, how far can it go toward solving the problem? If it attempts to freeze the status quo either in wages or in organization it will get exactly nowhere. As one top-ranking union official said: "We may be chilled a bit, but we'll never freeze." Much has been made of the argument that labor should not take advantage of the emergency to advance its cause. On the surface this appears logical. But labor's answer is also logical. In any other period of production upswing, it says in effect, there would be no question about the right to establish long-overdue union recognition while labor's bargaining power is strong. To surrender this opportunity now is to allow industry, already the beneficiary of the defense program by way of increased profits, to benefit further through curbs on labor. British labor has made no such surrender; why should American labor surrender? To do so would mean freezing the status quo in organization as a reward to a small group of "wilful men" for their refusal to abide by the law of the land; it would mean capitulation to a few rebels in industry at the expense of their employees and at the expense of that larger section of industry which has shown its readiness to deal with unions.

This, no doubt, is precisely what industry expects of the board. But with the Murray-Kennedy, Meany-Harrison labor team on it, to say nothing of the liberal character of the rest of the board and of the temper of labor's rank and file, unionization is not likely to be placed on ice. However, should the board attempt to force dissident employers to deal with unions, it will probably be defied, as were the labor boards created by executive order during the early days of the New Deal, prior to passage of the Wagner Act.

The whole problem is far too complex for any single agency to solve. It is steeped in tradition and fear, and unless these are uprooted, not only the immediate fate of labor but the fate of the democratic way of life is at stake. Privilege is stubbornly resisting adjustments in the economy which advancing technology and the changing world scene render imperative. Outwardly, and for the moment, this resistance takes the form of a concerted effort to check further labor organization. But it may take other forms. Its roots are deep and imbedded in mortal fear that labor is gaining political and economic power, that in consequence the federal Administration is now virtually a labor government, that the British government is likewise dominated by labor, and that a post-war Anglo-American socialist anschluss is on the horizon.

It is of little avail to point out that neither the rank and file nor the vast majority of responsible leaders of American labor have any hidden scheme or overpowering desire for changing the economic system; that, traditionally, America's labor movement has hewed closely to plain and simple trade-unionism, and this rests upon full acceptance of the capitalist system; and that advocates of a more radical program succeed in stirring up some ferment but are eventually eased out. Facts are of little help because fear is a psychosis. If the National Defense Mediation Board makes any headway toward ending this malady it will deserve lasting gratitude.

A New World Literature

II. MODERN POETRY OF AMERICA HISPANA

BY ALFONSO REYES

Alfonso Reyes is the Hispano-American man of letters perhaps most universally respected and loved by all countries, all generations, all political camps (except the fascists) in his world. This recognition by a continent and a half torn by literary factions, has been won, without compromise, by his never hurrying the ripe maturity of his expression and by a lifetime of sensitive encouragement of every fresh poetic voice in his language. Reyes was born in Monterrey, Mexico, in 1889, the son of a general in the army of Porfirio Díaz, in spite of which he sided in 1910 with the revolution headed by Madero. His talent as a poet was recognized early. Successive governments kept him abroad in the diplomatic service of his country; in Madrid, Paris, and later as Ambassador in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires, he did more than any other single man (except perhaps José Vasconcelos, also a Mexican) during the period between the world wars to foster close cultural relations between the Spanish-speaking republics and Brazil. He distinguished himself, as he grew older, as the champion of the younger generation of revolutionary poets. Reyes is one of the finest of living literary critics and belongs to the top flight of poets in his language (by far the finest company of poets in the world today). His prose "Visión de Anáhuac," a portrait of the Aztec city of Tenochtitlán, now Mexico City, on the eve of its capture by Cortés, has been called by Gabriela Mistral the finest single piece of Hispano-American prose. His studies of Góngora and other classic writers of Spain are themselves classic. But his preeminence is as a poet. Reyes belongs to the Hispano-American writers who stress their Latin rather than their Indian origin. On this account he has been called a classicist. But the temperament of Reyes is profoundly American, and Mexican: which means that the Indian element is not lacking. Nowhere is this more manifest than in his poetic drama, "Ifigenia Cruel" (1924), in which he succeeds in transfiguring without deforming a classic theme in order to express a deeply American vision. This continuity from classic roots to the modern soul of Mexican America makes Reyes one of the masters of American letters.—W. F.

THE Hispano-American character begins to make itself felt from the first period of the colony. Literature had already given an unconscious voice to it with the Mexican Ruiz de Alarcón who brought to the Spanish comedy of the seventeenth century a nuance known then as "the strangeness." But Hispano-American letters become intrinsically important only in the nineteenth century with the political independence of the republics. (Since Brazil speaks Portuguese, we shall omit it from this survey, although its separate literary course is strictly parallel to ours.)

With the movement called Modernism, which extended to the beginnings of this century, Hispano-American literature achieves true personality and its own place in the sun. The importance of this poetic movement has obscured previous phases and, above all, has made us forget its contribution to Spanish prose as well as verse. The truth is (and has not been sufficiently examined) that an American character came earlier to our prose. From the dawn of the nineteenth century, American prose, already differentiated from Spanish by the social spectacle it portrayed, reveals fresh technical preoccupations. At times, as in the Argentine Domingo Faustino Sarmiento,* there is the effort for a new expression. At times, as with the Ecuadoran Montalvo, there is a harking back to the Hispanic models of the "Siglo de Oro." While the peninsular Spanish prose became romantic, "costume," or academic, the continental Spanish prose (our own) revealed in Sarmiento a constant innovation spurred by "the urgent rhythm of thought," and in Montalvo a revival of the virile accents of Quevedo, then extinct in Spain.

The new spirit in Spain dates from the so-called "generation of '98"; the new spirit in America from the 1880's. The two revolutions have different impulses, and presently move upon each other. In Spain, the disaster of the war with the United States inspired a confrontation with the Spanish reality cleansed of the false perspectives of a lost empire (although aesthetic reform was not neglected). In America, the revolution is at first aesthetic, inclined toward a universalism that for the moment removes it from American things or, when it casually touches them, gives them a light twist of style. In this sense, Rodó, speaking of the "Prosas Profanas" of Rubén Darío, was right when he said: "Darío is no poet of America." The refinements of Modernism had detached him from the crude national realities; from which indeed he wanted to escape. His universalism fused frontiers. His ambition to scale the greatest heights made him conceal all reference to the little hill he lived on. The Modernist poet longed to be a citizen of the world—or of Paris, the literary capital of the world which he might never even have seen; or he proclaimed himself the dweller of some abstract legendary country. Modernism, indeed, appears as a negation of the theories of Taine and Buckle on the molding influence of the milieu. Modernism is retaliation on a milieu.

Before Modernism, our poetry is sub-romantic and follows a nineteenth-century tradition. It had finally isolated itself from the world and was dying of scurvy. France overwhelmed, shook, and transformed it. It is usual to say that Modernism was the unexpected, paradoxical child of French Symbolism. But the seed comes from farther off and is nourished with all the waters of the slope of Hugo: romantic, parnassian, and decadent.

It is fairly sure that in 1888, not Silva, not Casal, not Darío, knew the Symbolists of France. In the precursors there is no reflection of Mallarmé. On the other hand, there are accents of Hugo, Musset, Nerval, Gautier, Leconte de Lisle, Banville, Baudelaire, Hérédia, Coppée, Verlaine, Moréas; and even of minor men like Arvers, Bouilhet, Mendés, whom we no longer read and who perhaps best explain the formation of our poets. There are traces of other lands: of Poe, Walt Whitman, Heine, Leopardi, D'Annunzio, Rossetti, Wilde—even of the Scandinavian myths. But these foreign treasures came in French forms or France pointed them out to Modernism.

It is hard to assay the transfusion of French spirit in our Modernism. In these distant contaminations there is always a coefficient of error, although of fecund error; we wish to imitate, and without wanting to we transform. France brought a universal touch and our poetry was freed by it and came into a relation with the world. French seemed the inevitable language of thought and image. Modernism opened a window on this France; and air came in from the immense horizons, making us forget or see within a prism of refraction what we had in our own house. There was suffused into our poetry the France of Versailles, modern France, Greek France, not to name certain effluvia of Ophir and Golconda. Our poetry was peopled with fabulous princesitas, with madrigalesque abbots, with exotic viscounts, with an antiquity first parnassian, then sensual. Rubén Darío, master of the classic myths, also exclaimed: "Oh, Heliogabalus, whose court—gold, silk, marble—my dreams remember." And he adds: "Only the pre-Conquest America is stuff for poetry. The rest is yours, democrat Walt Whitman." Nevertheless, he evolves, faces the world, finds a way to sing even the president of a republic—an unpredictable issue from his beginnings.

To articulate the new sensibility and the archaic imagery, the molds of verse had to be transfigured, the language shaken up to free its frozen resources. Certain gallicisms crept in, to the scandal of the purists. But today we see that the Modernists were faithful enough to the genius of the language. They went no farther than the Italianates of the Spanish Renaissance, and with equally inspiring results. Besides a few neologisms, forgotten words were sought in the traditional treasury; buried metric forms were revived; new rhythms were tried out, and above all verse was conceded a great elasticity of accent. Syntactic audacities were practiced; grammatical forms that had lost their savor were dropped. And it all was naturalized to the American climates. With subject and metaphor renewed, the language acquired fluidity and richness. There had been ankylosis; now it was corrected. There had been old stuff "darings" that were nothing but "poetic license," a crude permission to drag out or curtail words. This license was scrapped; liberty was conquered.

Literary "periods" are tools for interpretation. Modernism, geared with other tendencies, was crossed by unassimilable paths. Of one of its indisputable creators, Gutiérrez Nájera, the Mexican scholar Justo Sierra could say: "He was the autumn flower of the Mexican romantics." Zorrilla de San Martín, contemporary of the first Modernists, could never be associated with them. His "Tabaré," a story of a sentimental savage, son of an Indian and a white woman (the one poem of indigenous subject that survives from Mexico to La Plata) did not appear until 1886. Compared frivolously with Longfellow's "Hiawatha," it is different in intent and character. Every Hispano-American has read it. Its formal excellence is high; and it links up with those notions of the "noble savage" which Europe ruminated long before Rousseau made a system of them.

Salvador Díaz Mirón (1853-1928) also escapes strict classification, except that some judge him the most perfect poet of Mexico and others merely concede that he wrote the most perfect verse. Transition from his first to his second phase meant to leave an oratorical and emphatic romanticism for a poetry at once esoteric and Horatian (paradoxical as that may seem); and on the way he passed by a realism that was often grotesque in its aberrations. In his first manner he made fashionable the pugnacious cries, the sleazy antitheses, that corrupted all the American literatures; and in his final period he became past master in technical problems airily solved; perpetually dissatisfied the while, feeling himself inferior to his ideal, however superior he felt to others. Díaz Mirón recalls the aesthetic tragedy of Mallarmé: no one could emulate him and he could emulate no one. His enigmas and solutions were fruits of solitary investigations, although at times they passed into the purest classic forms. Great tamer of words, he assaulted the images of the senses with a power of vernacular divination seldom equaled. He is exemplary as both a success and a failure. Some have tried to see in him that false figure of their own youth: the scourge of tyrants, the paladin of liberators. It is all nonsense: his "tyrant" was a figure of speech; the one tyrant he truly fought was the limitation of aesthetic language. And the one liberty he loved was that glimpsed beyond a tunnel of voluntary metric obstacles. His was the intimate drama of poetry: Jacob wrestling with the Angel, the duel between thought and expression.

Another Mexican poet, Manuel José Othón (1859-1906), born under the aegis of Núñez de Arce, likewise overflows the schools and cannot be housed under Modernism. His fathers are Luis de León and Virgil; from the great Spanish mystic he inherited the Catholic chains and the bright serenity, from the Roman the dovecooings and the love of nature. His rural pantheism must not be confounded with the bucolic; it has no lyric shepherds. The land itself speaks, as in Saint John of the Cross: "la soledad sonora." In this quality, he has never been surpassed. The brilliant landscapism for instance of our young Mexican poet, Carlos Pellicer, is one of symbols; whereas Othón's is one of beings. The river raises its breast and intones its psalmody, the water bubbles dialogues with the wind and the leaves; the eagles are incrustated in the burning sky "like rivets burying themselves slowly"; the galloping growing corn rends the immobility of the desert. And suddenly, within desolation, a savage love grows, adventure of female, sand, rock, and lianas, moving the poet to a voice of love and hate close to the grave register of Baudelaire.

There is no space to analyze the musical sequence of Luis G. Urbina (1867-1934), also Mexican, in whose work at times a verse or even a short poem has the nature of a single fluid word. Strictly a contemporary of Darío, his plaint comes from deep and far ("the old tear" of his poem) and crosses the Modernist sea solitarily, sweetly, in its own light romantic skiff.

Therefore, it is clear that chronologies do not coincide with artists. Let us return to Modernism. Its creators are considered to be the Cuban José Martí (1853-95), the Mexican Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1859-95), the Colombian José Asunción Silva (1860-96), and the Cuban Julián del Casal (1863-93). All of them dead between the ages of thirty and forty-two, they represent a poetry of youthful temperature.

Martí in "Ismaelillo" and "Versos Sencillos" is both intense and tender. Direct attack and a marvelous simplicity give grace to his emotions of a father, which have nothing in common with the vulgarity, "homey" and humanitarian, of Juan de Dios Peza, our famous "domestic poet." Reading Martí one cannot free oneself of the image of a blade razor-fine and rigid that cuts the heart. Nevertheless, despite the importance of his poetry, his prose as orator, essayist, and polemist is incomparably better. With it the Spanish language makes new conquests. Martí was one of the richest literary natures of America. And yet in great part his work, like his life, was sacrificed to the apostolate of national freedom.* His art remained one of lightning flashes, each flash revealing and hiding unexplored landscapes. Son of sorrow, he never lost his smile; brave as a lion, he was not ashamed of his tears.

In Gutiérrez Nájera, we find clearly articulated the romantic and the French strains. He was also a great proseman. The tenderness of his verse is more malicious and more conscious than that of his Cuban brother. The eroticism which was held against him seems slight to us today. Later, he can be called "guest at the banquet of madness" because of the black and tragic rifts in his well-tooled strophes. Effusive, musical, melancholy, elegant, he gradually evolved toward a classical fullness which scarcely fitted his last poems and which the beginning of his work had already projected, in its passion for composing in a sequence of coherent metaphors. Without knowing it, he discovered for himself the Symbolist formula: "To regain in music the birthright of poetry"; as in the external musicality of his ode to La Corregidora and in his ineffable thirst before the "Serenade" of Schubert. "Thus, if it could, would my soul speak."

In Silva, there is rhythmic inventiveness, delicacy and wisdom, pessimism, deliquescence, hyperaesthesia like that of Des Esseintes, caprice, and even folklore. "Nocturno" is a contagious unending plaint prolonging in verse the tearful "María" of Silva's compatriot, Jorge Isaacs. This unfortunate and beautiful dandy had the gift of tears. His daring verbal repetitions in the imitated harmonics of a sob relate him to Poe. He can be humorous too, as in "Gotas Amargas," and he recalls songs and games of his childhood. But his fate is inexorable and he moves to suicide, fascinated by the fraternal shade which calls him from beyond the tomb.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Profits, Prices, Wages

THE theme-song of the 1940 corporation reports, which for some weeks past have been piling up on my desk, is the burden of taxation. Indeed, so much stress is placed on this subject that casual reading almost leaves the impression of whole segments of business sinking into the red. Only after more careful inspection does one discover that greatly increased tax bills are being met out of greatly increased profits and that most corporations, after providing for the demands of the Treasury, have larger sums available for their shareholders than in 1939, which wasn't exactly a lean year either.

A useful compilation of the National City Bank summarizing the financial results of 925 leading manufacturing corporations shows us that 1940 cannot be accurately described as a period of "profitless prosperity." Net profits of these corporations, after deducting depreciation, interest, taxes, and all other charges, but before dividends, amounted to $1,554,280,000 compared with $1,225,069,000 in 1939. This represents an increase of 26.9 per cent. In terms of return on net worth it means a rise from 8.4 per cent in 1939 to 10.5 per cent in 1940. This seems a pretty generous yield on "risk" capital, especially at a time when "safe" long-term bonds give an income of less than 3 per cent.

The following table shows how some leading industrial groups have fared in the past year.

No. of corporations in group	Per cent change in profits compared with 1939	Per cent return on net worth
		1939	1940
111 Food products	+ 2.7	7.7	7.8
39 Beverages	- 2.0	12.9	12.0
19 Tobacco products	+ 3.6	13.6	13.9
101 Textile	+ 32.9	5.9	7.7
17 Rubber	- 0.6	9.4	8.9
59 Chemical	+ 3.0	13.7	13.7
43 Iron and Steel	+ 98.5	4.4	8.5
77 Machinery	+ 68.5	8.5	13.9
29 Electrical equipment ..	+ 36.1	8.9	11.8
14 Automobiles	+ 9.9	17.2	18.4
38 Auto equipment	+ 46.4	13.0	18.1
20 Railroad equipment ..	+ 241.0	2.2	6.0
18 Aircraft and parts ...	+ 290.0	10.2	25.7

It will be noticed that, except for textiles, the groups enjoying large percentage increases in profits all fall into the capital goods class. They are the industries which have received the first and most direct impetus from the defense program. Textiles have received a fillip from the same source, owing to orders for uniforms, blankets, and other military necessities. Industries catering to consumers, on the other hand, show smaller improvement in net profits and even, in some cases, modest recessions. Many of the corporations in this category actually earned rather higher gross profits than the year before but, after paying taxes, found their net somewhat reduced. This hardship, however, is mitigated by the fact that their earnings in 1939 were fairly substantial.

During the current year, even allowing for the yet higher corporate taxation expected shortly, a further improvement in profits is forecast for both industrial categories. Thanks to defense orders, the heavy industries will be working near capacity throughout the year, instead of for a few months only as in 1940, and with overheads spread over a much larger output, they should be able to effect additional savings in production costs. Republic Steel, for instance, is now working at 100 per cent of capacity while it is geared to operate at a profit when producing only 65 per cent of its maximum tonnage. As a result, one of its directors has forecast earnings 25 per cent better than last year, even allowing for additional 1941 taxes.

Increased payrolls in the defense industries are now beginning to be reflected in heavier demands on the consumer goods manufacturers and on the retailers. Sales of automobiles in the current quarter may establish an all-time record; food companies are reporting sales volume at around 10 per cent better than a year ago; and department stores, which normally make all their profits between July and December, are expecting to show net earnings for the first half of this year, after the best spring business in a decade.

This forecast of profit trends would be incomplete, however, if it left out of account the possibility of both higher prices and higher wages. Normally, a sellers' market, such as prevails today in many lines, would mean that extra profits attributable to capacity operations would be supplemented by the bonanza effects of rising prices. But, from the inception of the defense program, the Administration has been endeavoring to hold down prices by persuasion and publicity coupled with an implied threat that failure of these methods would lead to more formal controls. In respect of a number of leading commodities, including steel and copper, it has achieved considerable success. But the whole industrial field is an enormous beat to cover and, while the attention of the small band of price policemen in Washington has been concentrated on key situations, quotations for quite a list of articles have been moving out of bounds. They include such varied items as carpets, china, household electrical equipment, plumbing wares, lawnmowers, bicycles, and kitchenware. Food prices, also, have been trending upward, with meats sharply higher and, perhaps most important of all from the point of view of the cost of living, rents are being steadily boosted in those areas where defense work is concentrated. In Detroit, for instance, rents are estimated at 10 per cent above a year ago and in some shipbuilding centers still larger increases have been reported.

The impact of this upswing of prices on the pay envelopes of the nation forms part of the background of the present widespread demand for improved wages. Yet the granting of such demands is likely to prove an excuse for further price boosting and we may start the old vicious circle in which wages chase prices but, except in a few strategically placed trades, never succeed in catching up. It seems high time, therefore, that Washington's price police were reinforced and given power to make arrests.

We must recognize, however, that a definite ceiling could not be imposed on prices without some limitation of wage increases. This idea may be unpopular in labor circles but it is worth noting that since 1929 falling prices have made a bigger contribution to the workers' standard of living than have higher wages. For while average weekly "money" wages in the manufacturing industries have risen 5.8 per cent during this period, the decline in the cost of living has meant an improvement of 23.2 per cent in "real" weekly earnings. It would be an ill service to the workers as a whole if favorably placed groups pushed wage demands to a point where the cost of living began once again to overtake earnings. This does not mean freezing present standards altogether, for in many industries, and steel is an example, the present scale of profits would permit some increase in wages without necessitating any rise in prices. Nevertheless wise labor strategy at the present time would confine itself to moderate demands and not press for all that the traffic may seem able to bear.

SIGNS OF RAPPROCHEMENT between followers of Stalin and Trotsky have been numerous since the death of the exiled revolutionist. In New York City the two groups sponsored a joint slate in the Cafeteria Workers' Union, and both supported the candidate of the left wing of the American Labor Party in the recent special Congressional election. In Europe, according to Inside Germany Reports, persons formerly reviled as Trotskyites are now sought out as allies by Comintern agents. The same source asserts that an official order has gone out from Moscow informing Stalinist leaders that the death of Trotsky can be made the occasion for a new program of unity.

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Spring Fervor

IT IS full spring by now at Camp Shelby near Hattiesburg, Mississippi, which a sentimental Southerner named for his wife when he came to cut down the long-leaf pine trees. The girls in the Baptist college and the state teachers' college and the silk mill there have put on wash dresses and all look very fresh and sweet in them. In Columbus, Georgia, close to Fort Benning, the white dogwood and the purple wisteria are blooming together. Wash dresses and wisteria come regularly every year, but this is the spring of defense and as thick as the crocuses are the Yankee boys in khaki in Southern camps. Their great-grandfathers were down that way, but Sherman kept them busy—so the girls complained—stealing chickens and burning barns. Their fathers were down that way too. But never before has there been such a national planning to put the Northern boys by the Southern girls. That may mean the unity about which the President talks so confidently. It may mean anything in the spring.

Already, indeed, the conjunction of South and camp has meant the widest variety of meetings. Not only are the boys bivouacked in a strange land; in many places the land has become strange for the Southerners. Stark, Florida, was too small even to rate the listing of its population in the World Almanac before Camp Blanding was built. Alexandria, Louisiana, was a sleepy town living on the presence of the institutionalized unfortunates and on the plantations along the Red River before two new camps and an expanding old one grew around it. Fayetteville, North Carolina, was quiet around Scotch memories and a slot-machine promoter before Fort Bragg grew under hammers and commands with a livelier noisiness than woodpeckers and jays had made in the empty land before. Now they and other small towns are almost as changed as the camps. New civilians have come as well as new soldiers. Even town loafers have gone to work or found their loafing places vastly disturbed. And one thing is certain. If Carl Carmer of New York State, after residence in Alabama, was exact in his observation that though "the Eastern miss counts herself fortunate to have one beau, the Southern is not content with a dozen," the Southern miss's problem may soon be solved. And upon the terms of its solution may depend a more romantically united—or a more bitterly divided—United States of America.

The problem of boys and girls is not being entirely neglected. Some such cities as staid old Richmond have devised plans, inaccurately called drafting, to provide dancing partners for the soldiers at Camp Lee. In another large city close to big defense concentrations the local merchants have been building good will by sponsoring dances for the boys in brown—with the help of girls wearing every color in the world. Other towns have not been so hospitable. Householders can be patriotic and still not like it when officers' families push up the old-fashioned level of rents. Some men of business have not given dances but instead have doubled the price of beer and soft drinks in the places where the nickelodeons play. Soldiers in some places have had to take their girls and their fun where they found them, which was occasionally in strange places.

It is entirely possible for a chamber of commerce to be eager for a camp without the local boys liking it when the regiments pour into town and also into the clubs and the dances and the parlors and the gardens. Pensacola has had a longer time to build its relationships with the nation's defenders than most towns have. It is the mother-in-law of the navy, but the local males definitely do not like their flying-cadet competition. They might feel, I think, a greater unity with the girls left behind in Rhode Island and Vermont. The Southern boy sees and suffers. But the girls up where there is snow still lying on the ground know by both intuition and report that Southern girls at their worst have a longer spring in which to work. That is not a knowledge which makes a girl happy in Maine.

The President and the Congress have not presented a solution for this problem. But Washington is not unaware of it. An able, energetic New Yorker called me from Washington the other day about it. He had been pulled from private life to deal with it, among other human problems in defense.

"This thing," he told me, "can create fine feelings or bad ones. North and South—"

I know he is right. Also, I know it is already spring in Hattiesburg. And when it is spring there or in Columbus or Columbia, it never seems quite so far home to the Northern boys. It may be sentimental in these grim times to talk about wisteria and wash dresses instead of about men and machines and maneuvers. It is still a sentimental South as well as a warm one. And when you mobilize an army, it marches to more things than war.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Song

BY W. H. AUDEN

Jumbled in the common box
Of their dark stupidity,
Orchid, swan and Caesar lie;
Time that tires of everyone
Has corroded all the locks,
Thrown away the key for fun.

In its cleft the torrent mocks
Prophets who in days gone by
Made a profit on each cry,
Persona grata now with none;
And a jackass language shocks
Poets who can only pun.

Silence settles on the clocks;
Nursing mothers point a sly
Index-finger at the sky,
Crimson in the setting sun;
In the valley of the fox
Gleams the barrel of a gun.

Once we could have made the docks;
Now it is too late to fly;
Once too often you and I
Did what we should not have done;
Round the rampant rugged rocks
Rude and ragged rascals run.

"Family Feeling"

IN THIS OUR LIFE. By Ellen Glasgow. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

SOMEONE like myself, who knows little of Miss Glasgow's work, must be deceived by this book until he is very far along in it. It seems, until then, like the kind of fiction we long ago lost interest in. It seems like one of those studies of middle-class family life which we used to read at our ease in a pleasantly stable world—one of those traditional, tolerably accomplished novels with lifelike enough characters and situations, but with no real power to stir or stimulate us, and no ability to linger in our memory.

But as the book proceeds, it takes on edge, it takes on weight. Its form, to be sure, is so traditional as to be uninteresting. Its style, though sometimes witty, seems serviceable and fluent rather than anything more. Its characters enact too many similar scenes and go in for too many explanatory "reflections." All the same, these things date Miss Glasgow rather than delimit her. Before we have finished her book, things have happened which do not happen by accident. We have come to know its people; we have begun to see what middle-class families are like and what, aside from consanguinity, they are the products of. Most of all we have learned how Miss Glasgow, within a familiar form, works with a special insight; and not only cuts psychological corners, but blasts social rock and storms moral fortresses. Her book tells us something about human nature and human institutions alike—a very respectable day's work, to say the least.

Miss Glasgow's approach to the Timberlake family is largely through the eyes of Asa, the father—a man of sixty tied to an invalid wife he has never loved and to a job (with his wife's rich uncle) he has never succeeded at. Dutiful and kindly in his habits, he is yet skeptical and undeceived in his thinking. The one person in the family he really loves is his married daughter Roy, and never more than when Stanley, his other daughter, blasts Roy's happiness. In terms of plot the book tells of the trouble that Stanley, who is shallow and selfish, stirs up—first in jilting her fiancé to run off with Roy's husband Peter; then in driving Peter to suicide; again, in winning back her fiancé after he has become engaged to Roy; and finally, in getting a young Negro blamed for a reckless act of her own. But the incidents of the plot are important only for their effect on the characters, for what they reveal about "family feeling," and for what they expose of family life as a middle-class institution.

There are no villains in the story; only people; which is why Miss Glasgow's study of family feeling is the more damning. Family feeling is not enough to keep Stanley from running away with her sister's husband. But on the other hand it is quite enough to make Stanley's relatives conspire to save her skin at the expense of sending an innocent young Negro to prison. It would be hard for two incidents to say more—morally speaking—about the family as a middle-class institution than these two do.

The whole book, in its modulated but merciless way, probes the social morality of the thousands of families that the Timberlakes, in their Tidewater city, represent. But Miss Glasgow comes to concepts by way of people, and her people react upon one another, in the end, as human beings. Stanley, petulant and irresistible and weak, reaching out hungrily for happiness, is not less real for being also a type; nor is Roy, proud of her strength and defiant in her courage, unreal for being a familiar species of "heroine." Asa, I think, is not so much a character as a set of values; through him Miss Glasgow is able to pass judgment on the others, and even on life. Nor is it only in his sympathy and skepticism and moral sensibility that Asa seems to speak for the author; he speaks just a little also—though not defensively—for the generation they both are part of. No study of a family can avoid being concerned with the conflict between generations.

Miss Glasgow is not only an adult novelist but, like very few others of her sex in America, an unsentimental one. She understands what is Southern about her people as she understands what is human about them; but though she shows sympathy, it never corrupts her judgment. Her art, I should think from my scant knowledge of it, has been overestimated, but not her astuteness. The people who could give her cards and spades on technique, or with the help of Hemingway sharpen her dialogue, or toss out whole pages from her book as wasteful or slow-moving, still could learn from her a good deal more than they could teach.

VERSAILLES TWENTY YEARS AFTER. By Paul Birdsall.

Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

GERMANY PREPARES FOR WAR. By Ewald Banse.

Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

UNION NOW WITH BRITAIN. By Clarence K. Streit.

Harper. $1.75.

ONE of the most potent weapons of German propaganda has been the ascribing of all the ills of the world and the second world war to the treaty of Versailles. It is conveniently forgotten that the first world war broke out with no treaty of Versailles to precede it and with a Germany not defeated but victorious and rapidly acquiring wealth. To learn the causes of the second world war one must go deep, not attribute them to the treaty-makers of Versailles. As long as public thought is not cleared up on this point there will be no understanding of the present situation. It is therefore most fortunate that at this moment an American historian, Paul Birdsall, should publish a well-documented and readable history of the Versailles negotiations. This excellent volume attempts a reappraisal of the forces which shaped the peace treaty. It may be called a scholarly revindication of Woodrow Wilson and his policies. It shows the immense difficulties with which Wilson's program was beset, not only (and not even primarily) because of European statesmen, but because of the isolationist and nationalistic sentiment of all peoples, especially the Americans. The argument is presented with exemplary balance of judgment and restraint of language. The book should be read by everyone who wishes to talk about the peace treaty and do more than indulge in the glib phraseology current in the past twenty years. For the legend of the treaty of Versailles has not only served as a basis for present German aggression; it has also obscured from the American public the real issues to be settled before there is any lasting peace and has allowed them an escape into a wishful, and at the same time an unexact, sentimental pacifism. "By curious logic the inevitable European chaos which resulted from American isolation has been used as a further foundation for isolationist argument. The complete distortion of the role of the United States in the first world war and at Versailles crystallized a powerful isolationist sentiment which threatens to paralyze American foreign policy in the present increasingly critical world situation."

The leading circles in Germany did not resent the treaty of Versailles; they resented the loss of the war, the frustration of their plans to achieve in the first world war that master position which they are now trying to attain. They regarded the defeat as a temporary setback, and prepared for the resumption of the war for world domination as soon as their own preparations and the blindness of the democratic nations created a favorable situation. The plans were laid for a long time. In 1932 Ewald Banse, a German geographer and strategist who was nominated professor of military science immediately after the National Socialists came into power, published a book called "Raum und Volk im Weltkriege," in which he pointed out the mistakes made in the first world war and from them drew lessons for the second. It predicted in many details the events of the present war. As soon as public attention in England was drawn to the book, the National Socialist government banned it and tried to make the appearance of an English translation impossible because, as the Germans obligingly said, it would "unfortunately give anti-German propaganda abroad occasion to throw doubt on the peace policy of the German government." The strategic theories developed by Professor Banse (and since put into effect by the German government) were then called by the National Socialists "absurd" and "senseless babblings" of an "irresponsible theorist." That the National Socialists said this is understandable; that the people in the democracies seemed to believe them is less understandable. The American publishers have now republished the book, which in its first edition (1934) attracted very little public comment.

From the past peace and the preparations for the present war our attention is inevitably drawn to the most urgent problem at the moment: the present war and the peace to follow. That the free peoples, including the United States, are threatened by a combination of ruthless aggressors is generally conceded today, even by those who refused to see the facts a year ago: the introduction of conscription and the voting of many billions for armaments and for a two-ocean navy by overwhelming majorities in Congress are the best proof of this. But to make America secure and to establish this time a lasting peace demands more than the routine resolutions appropriate to another age. It demands a courageous determination to meet an unprecedented situation by fresh thought and unprecedented action. Clarence Streit has deserved well of America and of democracy by pointing out the path which, if trod in time, would have saved the democracies of Europe and the New World from the physical and mental agonies which they are now experiencing. His suggested world federal union is, in my opinion, the logical solution of problems arising from the interdependence of all nations in the twentieth century. His new book is an answer to the problems that have developed during the past eighteen months as a result of the refusal of the democratic nations to establish a closer cooperation.

The fate of mankind for centuries to come may depend in the present crisis on right timing; steps taken too late or too half-heartedly may seal the catastrophe which they were intended to prevent. Mr. Streit submits a closely reasoned and cogent argument for action now. Without necessarily agreeing with every detail of his outline, this reviewer believes that it offers the only rational solution of the world crisis. Thus it is an indispensable book for every American to read and ponder. It points the way to the establishment of a society in which democracy will be safe and peace will be lasting.

everywhere. If American public opinion will accept Mr. Streit's plan for the future the mistakes which have frustrated the peace efforts of the past twenty-five years will be avoided.

CRUSADER IN CRINOLINE: THE LIFE OF HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. By Forrest Wilson. Lippincott. $3.75.

FORREST WILSON'S manifest adoration of his heroine, which might have ensnared him in a maze of tiresome eulogy, seems to have been the spur driving him to produce a fascinating and balanced history of her life. For instead of setting out to prove that she was the foremost genius of her day, he takes that assumption as his first premise, then allows his thoughtful narrative to captivate the reader's attention.

In order to enliven a scholarly discourse with a dash of atmosphere, a biographer will occasionally open fire with a brisk description of the members of his subject's family, dismissing these unfortunate stooges as soon as they have served their turn. Mr. Wilson, shunning the treatise for the chronicle, has given just weight to the remarkable Beecher family, never obtruding upon, but never out of touch with "Hattie."

Like a number of other women of literary renown of the last century, Harriet Beecher Stowe was born into a family whose salient characteristics were fire-and-brimstone theology—and fecundity. Lyman, with his missionary spirit, hypochondria, penchant for getting married, and his son, Henry Ward, sensational pulpit orator, headed the Beecher clan, while the dominating Catherine, and even Harriet herself, ostensibly remained the weaker vessels.

Seeking fresh worlds to conquer, Lyman Beecher transplanted his family from New England to Cincinnati, and it was there that Harriet, by the skin of her teeth, and at the ripe age of twenty-four, graduated from schoolmarm spinsterhood to matrimony. Mr. Wilson contrives to imbue the story of the wedding of Harriet Beecher and Calvin Stowe with an air of authentic stuffiness; the natural outcome of spiritual affinity's transcendence of a tendency to pouchiness and premature baldness in the widower-bridegroom.

Before she had been married a year, and during her husband's absence on a European tour, Mrs. Stowe, stirred by the sordid horror of the anti-Abolition riots, entered her first plea in the press under a masculine pseudonym. However, no interest in social endeavor could withstand the pressure of keeping house and raising a number of children on an inadequate income. Fifteen years of pulling the devil by the tail, goading a lethargic husband, fighting the cholera epidemics that broke out in the stagnant summer heat, left Mrs. Stowe a rag of a woman straggling back to New England just in time to give birth to her seventh child, and prophesying an early death.

Beset with such vicissitudes, many women would have grown apathetic. But Harriet Beecher Stowe, braced by the return to her native New England and by the easing of financial tension, produced her last baby with an air of finality and fell to writing what turned out to be the last chapter of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The years in Cincinnati had left latent images, and these welled up and overflowed at the first slackening of domestic activity.

Mr. Wilson's account of the conception, execution, and undreamed of acclaim of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is irresistible. He carries the reader, as if on the crest of a wave, through the transformation of the jaded housewife into a female Messiah. In spite of his genuflections in front of what he describes as the miracle of the book, the book's most remarkable quality remains its success. As the product of a fiery conscience, of a sharp tongue partly sheathed by the mellifluous language current in Calvinistic circles, and of a deep capacity for day-dreaming, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" touched off every emotion of partisanship on the highly controversial subject of slavery.

The remainder of Harriet Beecher Stowe's long life was based on her initial and astounding success. The impulse to reform which pervaded her work she ascribed to divine inspiration, combining a tribute to her own humility with the satisfaction of leaving the final responsibility with the Almighty. Dotage overcame her before the intellectual reaction of the younger skeptics could touch her. From the dangerous anarchist of her heyday, she became an Aunt Sally for the new generation of her critics, but, ignorant of the deadly change, remained to the end queen of her dwindling realm.

Whether or not American democracy was shaped by Harriet Beecher Stowe, and Mr. Wilson almost implies that it was, "Crusader in Crinoline" stands well on its merits as the story of an amazing career.

Fifty Years of Russian Labor

WORKERS BEFORE AND AFTER LENIN. By Many Gordon. E. P. Dutton and Company. $4.

THIS book is modestly named, for it is more than a history of the Russian working class before and after the Bolshevik revolution: it is the first comprehensive social and economic history of the Soviet Union from an author possessed of the knowledge, the energy, the ability, and the desire to do the necessary preliminary work. Many Gordon's book is that rare product—a volume of painstaking and honest research vividly presented and of equal value to expert and layman. She not only knows the Russian language but having herself at one time been a member of the Russian Social Revolutionary Party, is able to compare conditions in Tsarist Russia with conditions under the Soviet government. Her indictment of the Bolshevik regime is rendered unanswerable by her references to official Soviet data, or press reports, or pronouncements by members of the Soviet government, in substantiation of every statement. Since such evidence is only to be obtained by reading an enormous number of publications, it is perhaps not extraordinary that no other Russian-born citizen of the United States or exile in Europe has ever had the patience and energy to undertake the task.

It will surprise most readers to learn the extent of Russian labor gains and the tempo of industrial progress from 1903 to 1914. Bad as conditions were under the tsars, there was a steady improvement; under Stalin there has been an almost continuous decline. Calmly the author examines the material situation of the workers and peasants, the results of the Five-Year plans, the consequences of forced collectivization, the educational system, social legislation, the labor of children and women. She deals also with the liquidation under Stalin of the great handicraft and village industries which once supplied so many of the people's needs, and with the failure of the new factories to satisfy these needs. Illuminating comparisons are made between labor's slow but certain progress after 1903 and the gradual degradation, from 1928 onwards, which has brought the Russian workers and peasants back to about where they were before the abolition of serfdom in 1861. The decline in real wages over the past decade to far below the 1913 level is conclusively demonstrated.

Perhaps the most important section of the book is that relating to the changed status and functions of the trade unions. We are shown how Lenin quickly abandoned his original thesis that "the trade unions could be relied upon to produce a given number of managers." In 1921 he decided, in his own words, "to throw the whole syndicalist absurdity into the wastepaper basket," and announced that henceforth the government would itself appoint the managers of enterprises. The Bolsheviks of that period were, however, genuinely and sincerely interested in the welfare of the proletariat, and Lenin, although he found it necessary to create order out of the chaos produced by workers' control of industry, said:

"Our present government is such that the proletariat, organized to the last man, must protect itself against it. And we must use the workers' organizations for the protection of the workers against their government."

In 1928 Stalin completely reversed Lenin's policy. He gave out the slogan "extirpate trade unionism" and told the trade unions that henceforth they must "play a decisive role in the task of building socialist industry by stimulating labor productivity, labor discipline, and socialist competition." When Tomsky refused to cooperate in converting the trade unions from protectors of the working class into agencies for its exploitation, he was removed by Stalin from his post as head of the Soviet trade unions.

Today the wheel has described a full circle. The trade unions, which in 1917 were told to manage industry, and in 1921 to protect the workers from oppression by the state, are now themselves organs for the suppression and speeding up of the workers. It is treason for them to try to protect labor standards, and the state-appointed managers are the sole authority on wages, work norms, hiring, and firing. A worker who is a few minutes late on consecutive days is dismissed and may not be reemployed for six months. One must have had the experience of trying to fight one's way on to a Russian street-car to appreciate the cruelty of this decree. One must also be aware that dismissal usually means the loss of the room in which the worker and his family lives, and that there is no unemployment pay or poor relief in the Soviet Union. Unemployment is liquidated by the simple device of liquidating the unemployed. The inhuman speeding up of labor has not achieved its purpose of increasing productivity. The neglect of the human factor has its repercussion on the material factors as shown in the rapid deterioration of neglected and overdriven machinery.

from the Soviet press and official sources, the author shows the continual downward revision of the legislation dealing with social insurance, education, and the employment of women and children. Women now work in the mines and perform the heaviest physical labor as in England in the early days of the industrial revolution. With telling effect she quotes such frank admissions as that of the Soviet journalist who wrote in Za Industrializatsiu in 1931: "We are not in the habit of worrying about people. Rather we feel that of that bounty—people—we have more than enough."

However, Hitler's rise to power and the real menace of attack from the outside world at last led the Soviet government to recognize that perhaps, after all, there might not be enough "people—that bounty" to use as cannon fodder. The census of 1937 (the results of which were suppressed) revealed that there were between twenty and twenty-five million fewer people in the U.S.S.R. than had been expected. Famine, semi-starvation, overwork, bad housing, and a decline in the birth rate were obviously responsible, but Stalin's first remedy was the liquidation of the statisticians who had carried out the census. Then in a desperate effort to force a population increase, abortions were made illegal and Pravda announced that Soviet women must become record-breakers in the production of babies. Women were told to consider themselves henceforth as the Stakhanovites of the human productive machinery. But the state still fails to provide them with decent housing accommodation, or clothing and nourishment for their babies, or even rubber nipples for the babies' bottles.

No book yet written so well illustrates the truth of the bitter saying current among the Russian workers concerning their rulers: "They have constructed socialism for themselves." It should be required reading in the universities, and one wishes that every "friend of the Soviet Union" could be made to study it. Unfortunately, the very fact that it is so scholarly, so fully documented, objective, and free from sensationalism, makes it unlikely that it will receive the wide attention it deserves.

The World of the Budds

BETWEEN TWO WORLDS. By Upton Sinclair. The Viking Press. $3.

THE sixty titles of Upton Sinclair's books and plays are honorable battle-flags commemorating a lifelong crusade against rackets and oppression and injustice of all kinds, and his skill at combining humanitarian propaganda with fiction has placed the liberals of this country under a much deeper obligation to him than most of them realize. But that the old warrior, after three or four decades of single-handed, often quixotic combats in the politico-literary arena, should turn out two novels of the breadth and objectivity of "World's End" (last year) and "Between Two Worlds"—that is a minor miracle.

With the sequel or sequels which he has obviously projected and very likely already embarked upon, these books will come closer than any other American novels to the scope and spirit of "Men of Good Will" or "The World of the Thibaults." But while Romain Rolland and Du Gard probe microscopically into the souls of their characters, leaving the history of twentieth-century Europe to weave through their lives like an undercurrent, Sinclair uses his people frankly as lenses and mirrors for observing and reflecting the events, trends, scenes, personalities of the time; while you may never thoroughly believe in his characters as men and women, you see through their eyes a stereoscopic panorama of the yesterdays that lighted so many fools the way to dusty death.

"Between Two Worlds," beginning at the close of the Versailles peace conference, where "World's End" left off, offers you a box-seat at the morbidly fascinating drama-spectacle of Europe and America in the 'twenties. Through it, you walk the streets of a dozen of the world's cities; you sit in, both before and behind the scenes, at all the principal "disarmament" conferences. You talk tête-à-tête with Lincoln Steffens, Isadora Duncan, Lloyd George, Zaharoff, Matteotti, and Mussolini (known to his early associates as The Little Pouter Pigeon), and overhear some inflammatory speeches delivered by Adolf Hitler Schicklgruber in a Munich beer-hall.

Your entree to these international didoes is provided by young and winsome Lanny Budd, son of a wealthy Connecticut munitions manufacturer and a beautiful artists' model. Like Julian Bern in "Europa," he knows everyone, goes everywhere, listens to all sides. Living among the wastrels and blue-bloods on the Riviera, he burns with a hard, gem-like flame for the beauties of music and painting, yet his generous heart and shrewd intelligence bring him intermittent qualms over the poverty and ferment beneath, and sometimes breaking through, the glittering surface of his world.

By ascribing to him a concern for the masses and occasionally showing him among the "red" friends of his uncle Jesse Blackless, the author is clearly educating Lanny for an active role in a subsequent novel which will usher in the grimmer, more turbulent 'thirties.

Even though the book is primarily a novelized "Only Yesterday," Mr. Sinclair succeeds in making the story of Lanny Budd's worldly pilgrimage an engrossing tale in its own right. Though it dives temporarily into a slough of Dickensian caricature with the marriage of Lanny's flighty mother to the ascetic Mr. Parsifal Dingle, it recovers quickly and closes with the most dramatic picture of the October, 1929, stock-market crash that I have ever read in fiction.

It is a far, far cry from the appearance of these two voluminous novels under the imprint of the Viking Press to those days when Upton Sinclair had to publish and peddle his books himself because publishers were afraid to handle his "radical" exposés of the mistreatment of the little man. One might remark that the change is a highly encouraging sign; and, Pollyanna-wise, that perhaps the very obstacles and prejudices against which he has so long leveled a fearless pen have helped to equip him, better than any other contemporary American novelist, to serve as impresario for this tragi-comedy of two worlds, one dead, the other powerless to be born.

Coroner's Inquest: A Dialogue

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: Twenty Years of Independence. Edited by Robert J. Kerner. The University of California Press. $5.

HISTORY: Theories are no pastime of mine. Like most American journalists I care only for facts. Nevertheless, here is a perplexing problem: how states are born and why they die. Wouldn't your case supply a useful explanation?

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: In some ways it would—as you can see in the informing, yet delightful volume bearing my name and edited and partly written by Professor R. J. Kerner of Berkeley. Incidentally, I wish you would observe how much more he and Professor Malbone W. Graham, both in California, know of my past than the Cliveden set in England ever knew. Knowledge seems to increase with distance.

HISTORY: And what theory does your case support—Professor Laski's that the state is the government, or Professor Kelsen's that it is a system of legal norms?

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: It supports neither. There is no Czech government—except in exile; there is a system of legal rules, but the oppressors respect only their own arbitrariness.

HISTORY: Am I to understand, then, that this book is an obituary rather than a biography?

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: Certainly not. Czech independence may be dead at the moment, but the Czechoslovak nation is more alive than ever. Though Philadelphia and Munich were milestones of sovereignty, the nation had developed, since the Premyslide rulers, a standard of spiritual culture and economic prosperity. Not even three centuries of Hapsburg blackout could obliterate it. As our great humanist, Jan Amos Comenius predicted in his "Testament": "... The rule HISTORY: That I grant you. But for the time being you are under the wheels of the Nazi juggernaut. I remember that Palacky—as Hans Kohn puts it—identified "the Czech cause with that of democracy" and that the President-Liberator coordinated Czech democracy with the ideal of humanism. As Professor Graham says in his masterful chapters: after a distinct break of nearly two hundred and fifty years the "resurgent Czechoslovak nationality passed out of existence on October 5, 1938." I must admit that this was the result of betrayal and not of defeat. However, don't you think the chief cause was the inclusion of nationalities of which a third were neither Czech nor Slovak?

Will Big Business bring Fascism?

Recent sensational TNEC revelations explode a bombshell! Here the author of the report on which the TNEC based many findings gives complete data, popularly presented, to prove that 1.) Industry's stifling of competition is destroying free private enterprise; 2.) unless big business is restrained it will destroy competition; 3.) on the ground of efficiency alone big business has not justified itself; 4.) autocracy in business increases as size increases.

ECONOMISTS, teachers, students, businessmen, investors (and investment counsellors particularly) alarmed at the growth of monopoly and government control will want this book. It covers such basic industries as steel, cement, petroleum, farm machinery, flour and wheat, beet and cane sugar, milk products, automobiles, chemicals and rayon. Authoritative, conclusive, fully documented, it holds that unless giant trusts are broken up in the United States the next step will be economic FASCISM.

THE Nation

a polyglot republic. Yet this could not have been avoided entirely. Professor Joseph S. Roucek asks: "Did Czechoslovakia make a mistake in trying to solve her problem of minorities by democratic, rather than by brutal and violent, methods, as her neighbors have done?" The question seems to need no answer. Places in state-supported minority schools were in proportion to, or even in greater proportion than, the numbers of children among the minorities represented. From Professor Stuermer's account it appears that, acting under American stimulus, Minister Dérer did what the Weimar Republic omitted to do: he organized a democratic educational system. Some people might object that neither the theory of revisionism nor that of Lebensraum was taught in these schools, but on the whole Professor O. Jaszi's conclusion, in his chapter on Ruthenia, that the old "Utopia" of an Oriental Switzerland would be the only realistic solution, is vindicated.

HISTORY: No use crying over spilt political milk. The question is one of the future. In Professor Shotwell's authoritative opinion, "The great experiment . . . will be lost to the world only if Europe itself is lost." But was it really only an experiment?

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: I would not call a necessity an experiment. Czechoslovak democracy, thriving on a homogeneous culture, was the core of Hussitism. Masaryk and Benes, both of peasant descent, supported by the ability of our people, unearthed this democracy from the debris of the Austro-Hungarian landslide and made it work.

HISTORY: And the result?

CZECHOSLOVAKIA: Eight contributors to this book, most of them Americans, bear witness to the economic, social, and intellectual development. There is no bragging, no over-estimation of the achievements. From what Brackett Lewis tells us, we may conclude that the social legislation of the republic topped that of post-war continental Europe. Whoever reads Professor Vojan's succinct chapter on art and literature will regret that many other Czechoslovak names are not as familiar in this country as are those of Smetana, Dvorak, Novak, or of Karel Capek, Langer, and Hasek.

HISTORY: This, of course, would certainly not justify such a phrase as the "passing of Czechoslovakia." From a brilliant chapter by Wickham Steed we learn that Masaryk himself diagnosed the mental and moral disease now called "Hitlerism." Only an ignoramus takes a disease for an alternative form of government or for a "wave of the future." Those who cherished the insane hope of turning the losses of the first world war into profits had to ride on the crest of this "wave" to Munich. There is no stronger proof of the Czechoslovak democracy than the coalition of feudalism and mobocracy against its existence. However, there is a future not only in heaven, but beyond Munich as well. Believers in the self-created savior of Europe whom they mistook for a savior of their continental investments may disbelieve the truth inscribed on the Czechoslovak coat of arms. Yet democracy on earth is the only form of government corresponding to divine absolutism in the universe.

My verdict is: Czechoslovakia may have fallen a victim to the treachery of fools and the violence of cavemen, but no one can evade or kill the word of the Scriptures: "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

RUSTEM VAMBERY

RECORDS

"MUSIC for the Theatre," when I heard it in 1925, gave me the impression of Aaron Copland as the outstandingly talented American composer—an impression which I have had even from subsequent works that I have found emotionally arid and twisted and ugly, and which I have had, certainly, from the recent "Billy the Kid." The excellent Victor recording of "Music for the Theatre" made by Howard Hanson with the Eastman-Rochester Symphony (Set 744, $3.50) has given me a chance to hear the work again and discover that I think as much of it as I did in 1925. Copland has remarked on the fact that it is the most frequently played of his works; but that isn't at all remarkable: I would say that the performances it has received are evidence of its quality as music, whereas the performances of most of the other works are evidence of his efficiency as a promoter.

Soon after their performance of Brahms's B flat Piano Concerto in Carnegie Hall last year Horowitz and Toscanini and the N. B. C. Symphony recorded it for Victor (Set 740, $6.50). On this occasion Horowitz seems to have played with more emotional and physical relaxation: on the records he still answers the quiet opening measure of the orchestra too emphatically and does a few other things of the sort; but for the most part his playing doesn't exhibit the stylistic elephantiasis with which, in the concert performance, he found it necessary to measure up to the "bigness" of the music; and as a result there is none of the harsh, jangling sound that he produced from the piano at the concert. On the records, that is, he plays in his normal style—sinuous, svelte, and as such hardly suited to the character of the music—and with his normal dazzling beauty of physical sound. Sheer beauty of sound, in fact, is the outstanding quality of this new set—the beauty of the sound of the piano part, and the extraordinary beauty of the sound of the effective orchestral framework created by Toscanini and recorded not in Studio 8H but in Carnegie Hall. As against this the older Victor set offers a performance of the piano part by Schnabel that is authoritative in style, though occasionally pretentious and often technically messy, with an adequate orchestral framework by the B. B. C. Symphony under Boult. People still talk about Artur Rubinstein's wonderful performance in the early Victor set; why doesn't Victor reissue this as a Black Label Classic; and why doesn't it do the same thing with Bachaus's superb set of Chopin's Etudes?

Stokowski's record of Debussy's Prelude to "L'après-midi d'un faune" with the Philadelphia Orchestra (17700, $1) offers gorgeous orchestral sound but annoyingly fussy phrasing. Beecham's version—beautiful in sound and admirable in style—is still the one to own. Hans Kindler has recorded with his National Symphony an excellent performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 3 (Set 747, $5.50), in which Tchaikovsky's qualities and powers are evident, sometimes with fine effect. In my review copy the sixth side wavers in pitch. There is superb playing by Edwin Fischer's Chamber Orchestra in Mozart's Serenade K. 361 for thirteen wind instruments, which I find dull (Set 743, $3.50). And Fiedler's Sinfonietta has recorded a good performance of Corelli's Concerto Grosso No. 11, which I find only moderately enjoyable (13587, $1).

When Victor issued the volume of Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 for solo 'cello played by Casals I wrote that listening to this music one is aware of Bach's success with the difficult problem he set himself, but also of the fact that solving the problem was not equivalent to writing great or interesting music. I would say the same thing about No. 1 in the second volume that Victor has issued (Set 742, $7.50), and of much of No. 6, which is more impressive. And I would say again that the life which the works have on these records is mostly the life created by the coloring, the movement, the tensions of Casals's phrasing—not only the bold, powerful distention of the phrases of the vigorous movements, but the subtle inflection of quiet movements like the Sarabande and second Minuet of No. 1, the ornate Allemande of No. 6.

Beethoven's high-spirited String Quartet Op. 18 No. 6 needs a performance with the brilliance and sparkle that the otherwise good Coolidge Quartet performance does not have (Set 745, $3).

The works on the first three records of the volume of Medieval and Renaissance Choral Music (Set 739, $6.50) I found less enjoyable than those on the other three: the parts of a Mass by Obrecht (13558/9), the Gregorian chant and pieces by Taverner, Lassus, and Palestrina (13560). The singing of the Choir of the Pius X School of Liturgical Music conducted by Mother Stevens is superb. Melchior is in his best voice of today in the passages from Wagner's music-dramas that Victor has issued in one volume (Set 749, $5.50); and Flagstad, who joins him in the first-act duet from "Götterdämmerung," sings marvelously. The two Sibelius songs recorded a while back by Marian Anderson, "Aus banger Brust" and "Langsam som Kvalsskyn" (2146, $.75), are inconsequential; Miss Anderson's voice is lovelier on the record than it is today.

Rodzinski and the Cleveland Orchestra recorded for Columbia a fine performance of Strauss's "Heldenleben" which emerges from the records (Set 441, $5.50) sounding dull and muffled.

Defense and the Movies

Hollywood, March 18

THE industry at the moment presents the most delightful prospect of patriotic fervor and cooperation with the government in the matter of the defense program—truly a most laudable spectacle. Naturally the considerations which motivate this are, first, the almost universal support and approval of the government's foreign policy amongst the big producers and, secondly, the box-office demand for an expression of that support. However, certain factors may be said to help noticeably in making the bed more comfortable for such strange companions as the Hollywood executives and the Roosevelt Administration. Joseph Schenck is now in the dock in Washington on a charge of income-tax evasion amounting to nearly half a million, thus demonstrating with distressing clarity the vulnerability of the most powerful movie potentates; while the threat of an investigation of the activities of the major studios under the anti-trust laws is a powerful whip which Washington might crack.

Hollywood's major service to defense is, of course, its South American goodwill program, which has not so far been remarkably successful, but which is shortly to be expanded and it is hoped improved under the guidance of Jock Whitney. Mr. Whitney, who is associated with Nelson Rockefeller in the attempt to promote friendship and understanding with the Latin Americas, has recently arrived in town to give advice on productions for South American consumption. On the home front, the industry is chiefly concerned with fostering Americanism and popularizing various of the least acceptable parts of the defense program, such as the draft. A certain crudity of approach to these subjects must be excused on the grounds of enthusiasm: for instance, in any current production the most hard-boiled characters are apt to dissolve into maudlin tears at the sound of "The Star-Spangled Banner," and practically any player with a foreign accent will, some time during the course of a picture, stare glassily at the audience and in broken accents itemize the virtues of the United States, regardless of the plot. Also, Warner Brothers are turning out in increasing numbers the patriotic "shorts" they have been making for several years under the auspices of Harry Warner, with whom Americanism has always been a major concern.

The most direct contribution of the industry to the defense program is a series of shorts for army consumption only. These shorts will not be shown, under any circumstances, to the general public and as they are non-profit-making and as no credits or publicity are supposed to attach to them the burden of production is being shouldered by the Research Council of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences headed by Darryl Zanuck. The research council is sponsored by the producers, who thus have joint responsibility. The army has recently been sending to Hollywood one officer each year from the Signal Corps to study methods of motion picture production: these officers have worked with the research council, placing it in a good position to embark on productions for the army.

The shorts are supposed to be made by all of the studios, or at any rate by most, but so far Darryl Zanuck's studio, Twentieth-Century Fox, seems to have the monopoly. Actually only two have been made so far—on hygiene and on venereal disease. One was directed by John Ford, the other by Irving Pichel, and both are reported to be frightening to a degree and extremely well made.

Training and technical films of every variety are scheduled for production and the army hopes for excellent results and increased speed in getting recruits into shape through the medium of the screen. Certain Hollywood writers have volunteered for service in the Signal Corps with the intention of writing commentary and dialogue for these films; there is a rumor (unsubstantiated) that in some studios writers under contract who are considered not to be earning their salaries have had pressure put on them to join the Signal Corps. However,

Hollywood's defense program is progressing with only minor frictions.

HIGH HAT

The function of the week was the Screen Actors Guild Gambol, a charity affair held at the Cocoanut Grove. The usual brilliant constellation attended the party, which was remarkable only for the fact that President Roosevelt's campaign hat, which he had recently presented to Edward Arnold, was put up for auction and sold to Edward G. Robinson and Melvyn Douglas for $3,200.

RECENT FILMS

For muddled thinking and mawkish sentiment "Meet John Doe" undoubtedly deserves a special academy award . . . a gilt crocodile in tears. Frank Capra, who directed this picture, has long been associated with hearts of gold and virtue triumphant, but his more successful creations, such as Mr. Smith and Mr. Deeds, had a certain allegorical robustness about them which John Doe sadly lacks. John Doe, the brain child of a sob-sister (and he could hardly have been anything else), is materialized in the form of a hobo who starts a nation-wide movement based on good neighborliness; the movement is exploited by a big business shark who wants to run for President on the John Doe ticket and who dresses his henchmen in black uniforms (get it?) The final sequence discloses big business in repentant tears and John Doe, who is a sticker if nothing else, determined to keep the John Doe movement alive. The picture is designed to deliver a message, a task in which Gary Cooper, Barbara Stanwyck, and Edward Arnold give able cooperation, but what the message is remains a mystery.

"That Night in Rio" strikes another sledgehammer blow for—or should one say at?—Pan-American friendship. This musical in vivid technicolor which features Alice Faye, Don Ameche, and Carmen Miranda (who radiates more energy than a dynamo) is luxurious and high-spirited to a degree.

Untrammelled by historical fact Alexander Korda's production of "That Hamilton Woman," based on the lives of Nelson and Lady Hamilton, makes a lovely spectacle and an interesting if slightly lengthy and incredible tale. Vivien Leigh and Laurence Olivier do wonders with their somewhat stilted dialogue and Miss Leigh looks unbelievably beautiful. The battle of Trafalgar provides a terrific climax and there is plenty of opportunity for anti-dictator propaganda.

Letters to the Editors

Inside Germany

Dear Sirs: The following is a letter recently received from a German friend:

"Somewhere in a German Occupied Country

"Dear Charles: If I was not on an inspection trip through occupied areas there would hardly be a chance to send you an uncensored report on our domestic 'theater of war.' But from here I can make use of an underground channel for postal service. . . .

"The maintenance of the public safety in our different occupied areas is the duty of the police administration rather than of the military forces. The number of the military forces in the occupied territories is relatively small; they are mainly stationed at points of military importance; for instance, along the Channel. 'The police protects the rear of the army,' is an official pronouncement. In other words, Heinrich Himmler's police organization, which is several hundred thousand men strong, is the true master of continental Europe. His chief executive officers are the 'Supreme SS and Police Leader East' in Cracow and the 'Supreme SS and Police Leaders' in Oslo, in The Hague, and in Prague. These police generals are in command of the large police armies which are divided into machine-gun, tank, pioneer, mounted, and other units. These uniformed police forces, in cooperation with the forces of the secret police (Gestapo), have the task of ruthlessly suppressing any form of revolutionary movement in its very beginnings.

"A great difficulty in the establishment of the administrative set-up of the New Order is caused by lack of appropriate personnel, particularly noticed in the police force. Where can we find the ten thousand new police officials required? We have been instructed by a confidential administrative order of Heinrich Himmler 'to select men between twenty-six and forty years of age.' With regard to the great need of personnel: 'We shall lower the standard of the candidates' physical fitness.' But in order to show other nations that we are really a master race, Himmler's circular further instructs us that 'only racially good-looking applicants are to be selected for active service.' I cannot imagine what is going to happen should we have to suppress a revolutionary movement with racially good-looking but physically unfit policemen. Hermann Goering made objections to this kind of selection, but unsuccessfully.

"By the way, Goering's new letter-heads carry the title 'The Reich's Marshal of Greater Germany' (Der Reichsmarschall des Grossdeutschen Reiches).

"If you in the other hemisphere believe that our administration runs without inner resistance and sabotage, you are very much mistaken. The Fuehrer, of course, still believes he can overcome all resistance by the utmost severity and ruthlessness. So the old Russian system of the knout has been resurrected during the past weeks. You can find evidence of this in the numerous newly introduced legal provisions for the punishment of soldiers, air-raid wardens, and parents of juvenile delinquents.

"The following law is now valid in the navy: 'The commander of any vessel will receive capital punishment if he surrenders his ship or his crew to the enemy without previously having taken all steps which might have prevented such an act of surrender.' Thus, Hitler has introduced the principle of destroying a ship rather than letting her fall into the hands of the enemy.

"It is typical of our attitude toward the Italian Axis partner that the German martial laws apply also to the Italian officers attached to our army. But no corresponding regulation applies to the German officers attached to the Italian army.

"You will be surprised to hear that our air-raid protection does not work efficiently, in spite of the continuous press and radio propaganda and of severe punishments by the police administration and the courts. This is not my private opinion but that of the Fuehrer himself. He recently expressed his 'deepest dissatisfaction' with the lack of discipline during the blackouts, especially in Berlin. At his instigation the Deputy Leader, Rudolf Hess, sent a circular to all district governors, ordering immediate improvement. In this circular it is emphasized that the working-classes do not properly black out the rear windows of their houses. The circular says: 'Heavy infractions against the blackout regulations occur continuously during night alarms. Therefore, in order to guarantee the necessary discipline, infractions must be punished more severely than before.'

"The higher officials worry a good deal about the political developments of 1941. I wonder whether the Fuehrer himself believes what he writes, for instance, about the 'final victory which will come soon.' "

The Ex-Descendants

Dear Sirs: The letter from the recording secretary of the Descendants of the American Revolution (in the March 15 issue) attempts to defend the mailing to the House and Senate Foreign Affairs Committees of a strongly worded condemnation of H. 1776 without first polling the membership of the organization. No resolution adopted by the national committee is binding on the membership, for it is no more than a recommendation for action. The executive committee, invoking democracy, performed as dictators. The committee well knew the acute differences within the organization regarding the constitutionality of H. 1776, and the resigning members have published their denial of its authority to impose upon them a partisan personal opinion.

The committee were not unanimous in adopting the resolution. The two members specifically referred to in the recording secretary's letter abstained from voting and assumed no responsibility for the action.

Add Vichy and Bergson

Dear Sirs: In a letter about Henri Bergson and the respectful treatment accorded him by some members of the Vichy government, published in your issue of February 22, Miss Betty Barzin states that "the gulf which divides, and always will divide, Latin civilization and German Kultur" is illustrated by the fact that "post-1933 Germany did not treat him [Edmund Husserl] as the Vichy authorities are now treating Bergson." In drawing this contrast, Miss Barzin misstates several facts.

Husserl never "fled to Czechoslovakia" or to any other place. In 1936 he lectured in Vienna and Prague, obviously with the consent of the German authorities who gave him his passport. He then returned to his home in Freiburg, Baden, where he continued to live, write, and publish, though his only subsequent work appeared in Yugoslavia. It was in Freiburg, not in Czechoslovakia, that he died in 1938. Shortly after his death, the University of Louvain provided a place for his manuscripts and, again with the consent of the German government, two young scholars, non-Jewish German nationals, went to Belgium to prepare his unpublished work for the press. These men were still at work in Louvain when the German armies invaded Belgium. Meanwhile, Husserl's widow had also removed to Louvain, in the spring of 1939, a few months after the manuscripts had been installed there and work on them had begun.

It is a question whether the quasi-official funeral honors accorded M. Bergson argue "a love of the spirit still shown by the very French government that is at the same time ousting Jews from places of learning." The facts suggest an interpretation less paradoxical and less flattering. But surely the claim "that German pressure is in no way affecting French culture" is exaggerated, even if one grants that the land of Dreyfus has probably continued to produce enough native anti-Semitism to explain Vichy's anti-Jewish regulations.

"France," Miss Barzin assures us, "may be crushed materially, politically, and even morally. But the love of the spirit for the spirit's sake will live there forever." Is it foolish to cherish a like hope for Germany, even while we go about the task of defeating German arms?

DORION CAIRNS

Rockford, Ill., March 14

Dear Sirs: I am sorry my letter about Bergson and Vichy contained the misstatements to which Mr. Cairns has drawn your attention, but I feel that his corrections provide in themselves further evidence that there is a gulf dividing Latin civilization and German Kultur.

Mr. Cairns points out that Husserl died in Freiburg (Germany) and not in Czechoslovakia, as I wrongly assumed. If the German civilian and academic authorities had honored Husserl in the way the French have honored Bergson, I could not have made this mistake, for which, once again, I apologize.

Mr. Cairns further writes that Husserl's manuscripts have found a home at Louvain University. No doubt he has good reasons for that statement. Nevertheless, in Brussels, shortly before the German invasion, I was asked for advice on what Husserl's widow should do with "several cases of her husband's papers." Hence my second misstatement. I sincerely hope that the Husserl manuscripts that reached Louvain were not lost in the second destruction of the Louvain Library. To my knowledge, Bergson's papers and manuscripts are not "exiled."

I must draw attention to a misstatement made by Mr. Cairns. He writes ". . . he (Husserl) continued to live, write, and publish (in Freiburg), though his only subsequent work appeared in Yugoslavia." This sentence is mysterious to me. What, in that instance, is meant by the word publish? As far as can be ascertained from Husserl's bibliography, Germany's greatest philosopher did not publish one single line in Germany after 1933. Three works by Husserl have been published since Hitler's advent, and all three outside Germany: (1) A letter addressed to the 1934 Prague Congress of Philosophy (which obviously had to be published in Prague); (2) Die Krisis der Europäischen Wissenschaften und die transzendente Phänomenologie, published in Belgrade in 1936, which is, I suppose, "the only subsequent work," appearing "in Yugoslavia" to which Mr. Cairns refers (printed in Philosophia, a review edited by a group of exiled German philosophers); and (3) a volume of 478 pages, Erfahrung und Urteil, published in Prague in 1939 by Husserl's disciple Landgrebe on the eve of the German invasion of Czechoslovakia. I feel very strongly that Bergson would never have been compelled to publish his writings outside France.

Pirates' Accomplice?

Dear Sirs: I find one point disturbing in Mr. Brooks Atkinson's article (issue of March 8).

In seeking to interpret today's crisis in the clear-cut terms of an issue which is basically moral, it seems to me that Mr. Atkinson falls into the common error of painting things too wholly in terms of blacks and whites. No one can disagree with his vigorous condemnation of international piracy as being morally wrong. But why condemn only the pirate, and, by implication at least, condone his accomplices? Of course it was morally wrong for Italy to ravage Ethiopia and for Italy and Germany together to rape Spain. But was it morally right for England to permit the former, and for England and France together to conspire actively to do the latter? We fail to serve the moral cause by suppressing facts or by interpreting only part of the picture.

If out of the "blood and tears and toil and sweat" of this war the necessary social rebirth is to come it is important that we continue to condemn the moral mistakes of England too, if the mistakes of 1919 are not to be repeated.

The Shape of Things

THE ITALIAN FLEET HAS SHOWN SUCH A penchant for snug harbors and so strong an antipathy for close contact with the enemy that it is hard to believe that it ventured into the Ionian Sea seeking a real battle. Perhaps the Italian High Command was misled by an official British announcement a few days earlier to the effect that the fleet had returned to Alexandria after a sweep through the middle Mediterranean. This might have suggested that Britain's heavy ships would be refueling at a safe distance and that an attempt to intercept convoys off the Greek coast would not be too risky an enterprise. Whether or not this was the means used to entice the Italian navy to sea, it certainly fell into a trap and paid the heavy price of three first-class cruisers and two destroyers certainly sunk. In addition, one battleship of the Littorio class was badly damaged. Among the prisoners picked up by the British were a number of Germans. Has Hitler put his bailiffs on board the Italian fleet? If so, this battle, which leaves the Italian navy in a parlous condition, suggests that it will take more than German leaven to raise Italian morale. At the other end of the Mediterranean there has been a clash between the British and French following an attempt by the former to halt convoyed merchant ships off the Algerian coast. This may prove a minor incident but now that its relative strength in the Mediterranean has been further increased by the battle of the Ionian Sea, Britain may be less tolerant of French breaches of the blockade. At the same time Nazi pressure on Vichy to obtain use of the French fleet may well be intensified.

THE FALL OF CHEREN AND HARAR MARK THE beginning of the end for the Italians in East Africa. With the whole of Italian and British Somaliland in British hands, the Addis Ababa-Jibuti railroad cut, and the capture of Massawa in Eritrea now apparently only a matter of days, the main Italian forces in Ethiopia are completely barred from escape. Rather than allow the tens of thousands of Italian colonists to fall into the hands of natives bent on revenge, the Italian command may have to surrender outright to the British. Although the territory itself is not of first-rate importance, such a surrender would be a bitter blow for the Axis—particularly after the recent setback in Yugoslavia. It would liberate a substantial British army for action in either Greece or Western Libya. It would eliminate the last remaining bases for Axis naval activity in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean. And in eliminating that region as a belligerent zone, it might open the way for the direct shipment of war supplies on American ships as far as the Suez Canal. This might become a decisive factor if a German attack made the Balkans a major theater of war.

SEIZURE OF ITALIAN, GERMAN, AND DANISH merchant ships by the Coast Guard following the revelation of sabotage aboard many of the Italian vessels constitutes an undeniably grave step. The action has already been protested vigorously by the Axis powers. A rupture of diplomatic relations is even possible if the United States takes the further step of taking title to the ships under the Espionage Act. Yet the seizure has a firm basis in both international and domestic law. The action was taken under what is known as the "right of angary." This right has its roots in long-established custom going back into the Middle Ages. It was carefully defined in a number of treaties in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Italy itself invoked this right in seizing 34 German ships in November, 1915, before it entered the war against Germany. In domestic law, the Espionage Act of 1917 gives the Secretary of the Treasury the right to seize vessels to protect them against damage. It is difficult to see how action could have been avoided in the present instance. The damage inflicted on many of the ships by their Italian crews was considerable and doubtless would have been intensified if the vessels had not been taken over by the Coast Guard. The damage was done apparently on the direct orders of the Italian consular officials. Ironically enough, the orders were transmitted through the Italian consulate in Newark, the closing of which had been requested by the United States government. Whether the seized ships will be put into use by the United States government remains to be seen. But in view of the government's need for ships to transport raw materials for our armament program, there is every reason for believing that the ships will be drafted into immediate service, as permitted by law.

ALL THE COUNTRIES OCCUPIED BY GERMANY, even those like Denmark which submitted to protection without resistance, are compelled to pay for the privilege. They are assessed amounts supposed to represent the actual costs of the armies of occupation but it would seem that questions of what the traffic will bear also enter into the Nazi calculations. According to estimates given in the House of Commons recently, the total bill for the conquered western countries alone is about $4,600,000,000 annually. The levy on France, in respect of which definite official figures have been published by the German authorities, represents almost three-quarters of this total and is equivalent to $80 for every Frenchman. The assessment on the Norwegians, however, is believed to be still higher, amounting to around $100 per capita annually. These amounts appear to be considerably in excess of the sums actually spent by the German army within the countries in question. A recent report from Vichy quoted financial experts as agreeing that Germany is spending only about 125 million francs daily on its forces in France while it receives from the French government 400 millions. As a result, the German government is rapidly accumulating a huge credit balance at the Bank of France which on February 1 is said to have reached 53 billion francs. This gives the Nazis abundant funds for financing propaganda inside France, for purchasing food and material in the unoccupied area, and for buying control of French industries. The French government, struggling with a hopelessly unbalanced budget, can only supply these funds by means of interest-free loans from the Bank of France. The upshot is that money becomes more and more plentiful while goods grow increasingly scarce. France seems doomed to suffer the worst sort of inflation and a complete financial breakdown.

THE LA FOLLETTE COMMITTEE'S LATEST report is so timely that it will probably get little attention in the press. We hope to discuss it at greater length in a later issue and note only that this report—on the Little Steel strike—is of the greatest relevance to the defense program. The committee points out that in the last war "the most serious obstacles to defense had their roots in the refusal of certain employers to bargain collectively." Most prominent among those "certain employers" now, as then, are the Little Steel companies, especially Bethlehem. "With an enlightened labor policy written into federal statute," the La Follette committee says, "we should not permit this to happen again." Uninterrupted production of steel is more vital than ever and we agree with the committee's conclusion: "Certain it is that the nation cannot permit these companies today to take the same attitude they took in 1937. . . . Any company which today stands up and flatly refuses to enter into a signed bargaining contract under all circumstances . . . [is] endangering the national security. Such conduct not only threatens the vital continuity of production but challenges the nation's domestic authority, weakens respect of labor for the national aims, and destroys the sense of unity and national effort." If Bethlehem's workers were as contemptuous of the law as its management is, their attitude would be termed sabotage of defense.

YET BETHLEHEM STEEL WENT UNREBUKED in the press for ordering an employee representation plan election in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, and carrying out its design in a manner calculated to provoke trouble. Bethlehem's shrewd managers know that the labor board regards the holding of an election on company property as one of the indications of company unionism, and it has become customary for that reason to hold these employee representation plan elections off company property. In this case Bethlehem set up the ballot boxes within the plant in a way that was almost certain to cause a walkout. There is a maxim of the law which says that justice delayed is justice denied. The S. W. O. C. filed its complaint against Bethlehem's employee representation plan in August of 1937 and an NLRB complaint was issued that same month, but the NLRB did not declare the plan invalid until August, 1939, two years later. Not until February 17, this year, did the Circuit Court of Appeals finally hear the case and a decision has yet to be rendered. The settlement of the strike in Bethlehem was a victory for the union, but the company provoked another strike in the same way in its Cambria plant at Johnstown, where arrangements were made for a plan election. Trouble now threatens again at Lackawanna, where the company is accused of failing to live up to its agreement. Eugene Grace, who headed Bethlehem during the last war, seems intent on making the same disgraceful labor policy record in this one.

A GOOD START SEEMS TO HAVE BEEN MADE by the new National Defense Mediation Board. Of the first four strikes certified to it, settlements have been reached in two, those at the Condenser Corporation in Plainfield, New Jersey, and the Universal Cyclops Company in Bridgeville, Pennsylvania. While the agreements do little more than safeguard the rights of the returned strikers and lay the basis for mediation, the truth is that labor has been ready to mediate most of these walkouts anyway. Even the New York Times on March 29 felt compelled to condemn the International Harvester Company for its refusal to mediate after the C. I. O. union on strike had accepted the mediation board's proposal. International Harvester, despite tripled earnings last year, is unwilling to grant any wage increases. The union, as shown in its newest reply to the board, would like to arbitrate the wage issue, but as we go to press all the company will accept is mediation. The fourth strike certified to the board is that of the Vanadium Corporation at Bridgeville, where the union claims that the hiring of five non-union men as guards is a violation of their agreement with the company. E. D. Bransome, head of the company, is one of Sidney Hillman's assistants at the OPM but this does not seem to make him any readier for the minor concessions needed to settle the strike.

"HYSTERIA" IS THE WORD MOST COMMONLY used to describe the temper of certain Congressmen now engaged in cooking up dire threats against organized labor. We dissent. The word implies a genuine conviction on the part of these gentlemen that collective bargaining is blocking the defense of the republic. The callous truth is that they have found in the defense program a heaven-sent opportunity to sizzle labor into submission by a fierce war of nerves. "When the time comes that it is necessary to deal with the enemies of the nation in the factory or elsewhere, I believe I can speak for each member of the committee . . . they would not hesitate one split second to enact legislation to send them to the electric chair." The author of this sentiment, unlike the idiot who yells "Fire!" in a crowded theater just to see what happens, is in no danger of being hauled up before a magistrate for creating a panic. He is Representative Sumners of Texas, he was talking of defense strikes when he made the remark, and he will go right on serving his country as chairman of the House Judiciary (of all things) Committee. Mr. Sumners unhappily is not alone in his blood-curdling ambitions. His Georgia colleague, Mr. Cox, would draft all manpower in the country between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five. Representative Smith of Virginia, who "investigated" the National Labor Relations Board half to death, wants his smear area extended to take in all phases of defense. And Mr. Ford of California would make defense strikes "treason," punishable by twenty-five years' imprisonment or by death if the strike causes fatalities. We hardly think these gentry expect their electric-chair-and-forced-labor prescription to be taken seriously—there's nothing like demanding a mile when you hope to get a yard—but their ravings are not calculated to stimulate the country's morale. Sumners, Cox, et al could do with that "cooling-off period" we've been hearing so much about.

The Spell Is Broken

THE hypnotic spell cast upon the world by Hitler's methods of terror has been broken by the Yugoslav people. Reports from Belgrade picture them as light-hearted in their successful overthrow of the capitulating Cvetkovitch government. But they are not light-headed, and in uniting to defy the dragon they know well the heavy price which may be exacted for their daring. Memories of the suffering and devastation that afflicted Serbia in the last war are far from dim. Yet Yugoslavs know also that to keep the independence for which they then fought, they must be prepared to fight again. For they are not deceived by the high-falutin promises of the "new order" and they realize that by accepting Hitler's protection they would be submitting their necks to a perpetual yoke.

Thus the new Yugoslavian government has taken the stand that it cannot put its neutrality into Nazi keeping. It does not threaten war but it states plainly that it will resist to the utmost any invasion of its rights. Nevertheless this action puts Hitler in a position where, for the first time in his dealings with small nations, he must choose between equally risky and disagreeable alternatives. Had he grasped in time the temper of the Yugoslavs, he might have decided to leave them alone, even though that would have complicated the problem of dealing with Greece. But he thought he had another Bulgaria on his hands and the only thing needed was the signature of the pliant Cvetkovitch. That he obtained and, ignoring the ominous rumblings from Belgrade, the Axis press broke into paeans of triumph.

Now Hitler's pact has been flung back in his face and he must either accept the rebuff and consequential loss of prestige or he must recast his whole Balkan plan in order to invade and punish Yugoslavia. There are signs that immediately he will make one last effort to get the Simovitch government to reconsider. All Germans are being withdrawn from the country while every weapon known to the war of nerves is being brought into play. Particularly the Nazis hope to split Yugoslavia by playing on both the fears and the racial sentiments of the Croats. This is truly a tender spot, for while the Croats as a whole are thoroughly anti-Nazi they occupy the region which will bear the first brunt of any Axis attack. Moreover, they have not in the past been fairly treated by the Serbians and they see in the new government elements which hitherto stood for Serbian hegemony in the triune kingdom. This is the kind of situation which the Nazis are skilled in exploiting but their efforts are likely to be wasted, as Stoyan Pribichevich points out in his article on page 399, if the Simovitch cabinet gives clear guarantees of Croatian autonomy.

Assuming, as we have every right to, that Yugoslavia stands firm, Hitler must call off his scheduled attack on Greece, and attempt to subdue the obstinate southern Slavs. His forces in Bulgaria will have to be turned west and new divisions concentrated north of the Danube. There are reports of Hungarian and Bulgarian mobilization which may indicate that he will attempt to make these enforced allies, both of which have claims on Yugoslavia, do some of his fighting for him. Northern Yugoslavia is open country and military experts do not believe that much would be done to defend it. But the Yugoslav army has the training and equipment to make a prolonged stand in the mountainous regions of the west and south.

The first victim of a German attack might well be the battered Italian army in Albania, for there is every reason to suppose that the Yugoslavs would drive in on its rear with the double objective of joining up with the Greeks and of capturing a new outlet to the sea. The story that Italy is trying to persuade Hitler to be patient with Belgrade is probably well-founded.

Another reason why the invasion of Yugoslavia will be such an unpleasant necessity for Germany is its importance to German economy. Something like one-third of German imports of bauxite (from which aluminum is extracted) are derived from Yugoslav mines as well as important quantities of copper, lead, and zinc. Yugoslavia has also provided Germany with considerable amounts of food.

Economically as well as strategically then, Yugoslavia's refusal to knuckle under quietly means, at least, a serious setback to Berlin. It ruins Nazi plans for a bloodless conquest of the Balkans and threatens the stream of supplies which Germany has been drawing from that region. It has already given a tremendous fillip to Greek and Turkish morale, and as the news spreads it will fan the ever-smoldering resistance of the captive nations. Finally, it may well open a prolonged struggle on that second front which Hitler has striven so hard to avoid and force a fatal postponement of the invasion of Britain.

Knudsen's Coup d'Etat

AT 10 a. m. on Wednesday, March 26, Sidney Hillman left Washington by plane for a badly needed vacation in Florida. Before he left, Knudsen had discussed with him the possibility that the Allis-Chalmers plant in Wisconsin might have to be taken over under Section 9 of the Selective Service Act. This provides for the drafting, not of workers, but of plants. Hillman agreed this might have to be done, but nothing was said of a "back-to-work" order, an order the OPM has no authority to issue. After Hillman left, Knudsen went into conference with Max Babb, head of Allis-Chalmers, one of Babb's directors named Armour, and Under-Secretary of the Navy Forrestal. The result of that conference, held without Hillman's knowledge, was the issuance of an order to "both" the union and the company ordering a resumption of work. "This isn't an order," as one New Dealer put it; "it's a coup d'état."

If the Allis-Chalmers strikers permit themselves to be bullied back to work in this fashion, and if unions in the rest of the country fail to support them, the consequences for the labor movement and for its representatives in the OPM will be very serious. Knudsen, with the support of the press, will have become not merely the "czar" of defense but also the "czar" of labor, and employers will be encouraged to refuse concessions in controversies with their employees. For not the least shocking aspect of Knudsen's arrogant behavior is that the Allis-Chalmers Company, with a notoriously bad labor record as far back as the last war, has refused to accept the OPM compromise of March 1 to which the union had agreed. The OPM, after obtaining the union's agreement, failed to bring pressure on the company. Knudsen a month later issued an ultimatum to the workers instead. It is no secret in Washington that the Allis-Chalmers Company is in no hurry to settle the strike. It has $40,000,000 in defense orders. Its president, Max Babb, is a leading figure of the America First Committee. He would like to use the situation to break the union, and certain of his cynical reflections on the strike in an unguarded "off the record" moment with a government representative have leaked back to Washington and are well known in the OPM. They make Knudsen's attitude and action all the more reprehensible.

The terms set out by the OPM on March 1 were mild enough. The union was to order its members back to work. The management was to agree to the appointment of an impartial referee to pass upon union complaints of "disrupters" in the plant—this was the only concession asked. The referee's decision was to be binding on both parties. These "disrupters" were not merely non-union men who voiced opposition to the union, but a small group of a dozen toughs who picked fights with union stewards. At least one of them has a criminal record. This man, while in the navy, beat up an officer, was placed "in the brig," escaped through a porthole, swam ashore to Brooklyn and fled to Milwaukee, where he obtained a job with Allis-Chalmers. A girl friend betrayed him to the police. He served ten months in Leavenworth, and returned to Allis-Chalmers. He left to become a policeman, was dishonorably discharged after eight years of service, and then went back to work for Allis-Chalmers. Two of the men against whom the union complained, Nicholas Imp and Mike Bohachef, were the subjects of serious charges in a letter to Governor Heil of Wisconsin last December 26. The head of the union asked the governor to remove District Attorney Steffes of Milwaukee County from office for failure to order the arrest of these two men after they "deliberately and maliciously" drove their car into a union man outside the plant early on the morning of December 18.

These two men, Imp and Bohachef, brought the charges of "irregularities" in the strike balloting held under Wisconsin law on January 21. These charges have now been made the excuse for a newspaper campaign smearing the union and for hostile action by Governor Heil's reactionary Wisconsin labor commission. We should like to see these charges thoroughly aired and suspend judgment until all the facts are known. If irregularities were committed, they served the company's purposes beautifully by dragging a red herring across the real issues. One is whether a company with $40,000,000 in defense orders is not under obligation to meet its workers half-way in peaceful settlements of disputes. The other is whether Knudsen is to be allowed to use the prestige of his office for strikebreaking purposes.

Vichy's True Colors

IN A moving and illuminating article in the April Atlantic Monthly, Raoul de Roussy de Sales, well-known French newspaperman, points out that while the Vichy regime claims to be saving France "as a living entity," it has repudiated "some of the essential ideas which made France live." It is this which shakes the confidence of so many Frenchmen in Marshal Pétain and his colleagues—this "willingness to collaborate with the Nazis not only in practical matters but also morally and politically." We see it in their outlawry of the slogans of the French revolution, in their efforts to stifle free opinion, in their shamefaced adoption of anti-Semitic laws.

We see it, too, in their willingness to assist the dictators in hounding the tens of thousands of hapless refugees who have become trapped in unoccupied France. The latest and most disgraceful example is the ban on the departure of 348 Spaniards bound for Mexico. These refugees were emigrating in accordance with an agreement made between Mexico and France last August. They all had passports with valid exit visas, but when the ship was ready to sail it was boarded by French police and all Spaniards of military age were ordered ashore. This action directly violates pledges given to the Mexican government and it accentuates the despair of 30,000 Spaniards who believed that they would be allowed to sail to the New World as soon as transport was available. The Vichy government cannot excuse this action, as it has excused the detention of German and Italian refugees, by reference to the terms of the armistice. It is under no obligations to Franco to prevent Spaniards leaving France and its behavior can only be explained by anxiety to curry favor with a hanger-on of the Axis.

In the ears of Hitler, too, such deeds speak louder than all verbal promises of collaboration, for they precipitate Vichy toward the same abyss of moral degradation which has long been the undisputed Nazi Lebensraum. They should also help to convince the outside world that when Pétain offers his hand to Hitler it is not so much an involuntary gesture as the act of a man who has invested his moral capital in Nazi victory and is hoping for quick dividends. As Fernand de Brinon, Vichy's agent in Paris, reported after a recent interview with the Marshal: "He is convinced that France must participate in the creation of a new European order and that is why he hopes to be able to work toward that end with victorious Germany." If that is Pétain's conviction, it is one the French people do not share. Their beliefs were voiced better by that spontaneous demonstration in Marseilles after the Yugoslav defiance of Hitler.

There are still many people in this country, including officials of the State Department, who close their eyes to the true character of Vichy. They disregard the inconsistencies in which the Pétain government has become involved by its attempt to combine claims to an independent status with the adoption of Nazi ideology. Mr. de Roussy de Sales, in the article previously quoted, catalogues a number of these inconsistencies. We have space only for one example: "Finally, it is not consistent to try to conciliate the traditional policy of Franco-American friendship and the ambiguous acceptance of the Nazi order in Europe when America has formally notified the world that it would not accept the establishment of that order."

Vichy's efforts to achieve this difficult straddle have been encouraged by altogether too much sympathy in this country. We have received Ambassador Henry-Haye as the free agent of a free state, overlooking his appeasing past and his still more dubious present. It is true he suppresses his pro-Nazi sentiments in public. But his propaganda against the British blockade and his omission of any reference to Nazi responsibility for French sufferings indicate clearly the primary source of his orders.

In pleading for American assistance in feeding France the Vichy government has again and again promised every kind of control to insure that food will not reach Germany. It is difficult, however, to place any reliance on official statements regarding the situation. When Admiral Darlan threatened to break the British blockade, he implied that all food shipments were being stopped and he contrasted the British attitude with German generosity in releasing requisitioned wheat in the occupied area. Now he has himself given particulars of imports into France between October and February including 260,000 tons of grain, 5,000 tons of meat, 180,000 tons of peanut oil, and 135,000 tons of fruit. Further, it has been officially made known in Vichy that the "generous" German gesture was really part and parcel of a barter arrangement made many months ago by which the occupied zone sends wheat, sugar, and potatoes to the unoccupied area in return for cattle, table oil, vegetables, cheese, and other products. As the Germans have the right of requisition in the occupied area this arrangement no doubt contributes usefully to their rations.

The arrangement goes far to justify the British contention that it is impossible to send supplies to France without favorably affecting the German position. We may well ask, therefore, why these facts remained hidden during the recent negotiations over the dispatch of food to France. The State Department has now asked Ambassador Leahy to make a full report concerning the exchanges between the occupied and unoccupied territories. We hope he insists on obtaining all the facts on the food stocks, imports, and exports of unoccupied France and on the activities of the German purchasing commission at Marseilles. That is information to which we are entitled, whether or not the Nazis object to its disclosure, before we are asked to urge Britain to modify its blockade.

Matsuoka's Visit

IF Yosuke Matsuoka, the Japanese Foreign Minister, went to Berlin and Rome to obtain assurances regarding an Axis victory before committing Japan to parallel action in the Pacific, his visit could not have been more unfortunately timed. He arrived in Berlin about six hours before the Yugoslav people had dealt Germany its most serious diplomatic setback of recent years. Between that time and the date scheduled for his elaborate reception in Rome, Italy suffered its most severe defeat of the war in Africa as well as a catastrophic blow to its fleet. These setbacks have undoubtedly increased the desire of the Axis partners to have Japan enter the war. In fact Japanese participation has become essential if the Axis is to deal a knockout blow against the British Empire before American assistance irrevocably turns the tide.

But it is increasingly difficult to see what the European Axis partners can offer Matsuoka that will overcome the doubts which led him to make his European trip. Military and naval assistance is out of the question. The strained relations which have arisen between Berlin and Moscow over the Balkans reduce the possibility that Germany can be of any help in bringing about the desired Soviet-Japanese non-aggression pact. Recent Axis defeats are also bound to curtail German influence in China. On the other side of the picture, Japan must take into account the fact that Britain's recent Mediterranean and African victories will permit it to strengthen its Far Eastern defenses. Additional British and Indian troops have recently arrived at Singapore to supplement the Australian and New Zealand forces dispatched there a few weeks ago. The Mediterranean naval victory may even permit a few light naval units to be sent into the Indian Ocean. Certainly the likelihood of American action to check further Japanese aggression has not been reduced. It has been intimated that in the event of an attack on Singapore, the United States might transfer to Britain some of the cruisers and destroyers now in Far Eastern waters.

In face of these difficulties Japanese entry into the war seems unlikely. Without doubt Japan will set about consolidating its position in Thailand and Indo-China so as to be prepared for any future opportunity. But its primary efforts will probably be directed toward liquidation of the disastrous "China incident." If China is to be destroyed, obviously this must be done before the United States either stops the flow of war materials to Japan or renders effective aid to Chungking. The danger of such an attack must not be minimized. Japan has been gravely weakened by four years of war; but so has China. Faced by a concerted Japanese attack, China may go down before the United States gets around to giving the assistance that has long been promised but never delivered.

Yugoslav Explosion

BY STOYAN PRIBICHEVICH

IN THIS war the greatest casualties have occurred so far among civilians and prophets. Just last week experts and authorities were interpreting the Yugoslav surrender at Vienna, which they had long foretold, when overnight they had to rearrange their arguments to explain an event inexplicable to them: the furious, whole-hearted defiance of Hitler's Diktat by a peasant nation of 16,000,000 almost entirely surrounded by Axis armies. Only a few of us had insisted publicly that under no conditions would the Yugoslavs accept a pact with the Axis and permit the passage of German munitions for use against the Greeks and the British. This apparently naive opinion was based, not on any inside information, but merely on a knowledge of the character and temperament of the people.

The Belgrade military coup of March 27 marks the first failure of Hitler's technique in the war of nerves: by putting on steam he provoked an explosion, and for the first time had a treaty torn up by somebody else. The primitive mind of the Serbian peasant usually makes instant courageous decisions in a crisis, because it sees each problem in its simplest terms. On the other hand the Nazis, shrewd and ruthless but singularly unimaginative, disregarded two essential qualities of the Serbs: their almost morbid feeling for the sacredness of their soil, and their capacity for accumulating hatred until it quivers, incandescent, in the air.

It is unfair to say that the former Regent, Prince Paul, or former Premier Cvetkovich, was pro-Nazi. The only influential Serbian pro-Nazi, Stoyadinovich, was delivered by them into Greek hands even during the negotiations with Hitler. Actually, the situation was simplicity itself: practically all Serbs are anti-Nazi; some have guts, some haven't; those who happened to be in the government hadn't—and they were overthrown.

Preparations for the revolt which put young King Peter and General Simovich in power must have been under way ("just in case") ever since the Nazi occupation of Bulgaria on March 1. For the coup was executed with such swiftness and precision that it caught both the Yugoslav and the German governments unawares, and not even the Gestapo had wind of it. Had Hitler understood Serbian psychology, he would have marched in the moment he heard of the initial street riots. He waited complacently for two days—and was irreparably late.

Of course, the boy king, Peter II—grandson of the heroic World War king, Peter I—is a symbol. The actual rulers now are the generals who as young officers drove the Germans out of Serbia in 1918. With them in the Cabinet sit representatives of the Serbian democratic and agrarian parties, most of whom were national revolutionaries against Austria-Hungary. Vladimir Matchek, veteran chief of the powerful Croatian Peasant Party, quietly moved from Prince Paul's into King Peter's government, but at the time this is written he has not yet announced whether he will remain in the Cabinet.

It is glib to write, as some correspondents have, that the Croats are less anti-Nazi than the Serbs. The point is that, while they are more appreciative of democracy, they are less aggressive physically; and that their provinces, full of farms and industries and located in the flat northwest, are the most exposed and the least defensible. To make matters more difficult, the Croatian fascist, Ante Pavelich, who organized the assassination of King Alexander in 1934, is now an Italian guest, and is available for duty as a Croatian satrap under any Axis occupation. This, then, is Matchek's dilemma in case of war: to have Croatia hopelessly devastated or be regarded as a backstabber by the Serbs. Out of natural common sense, he is likely to remain Vice-Premier or to leave some of his lieutenants in the present Cabinet, especially if the new regime confirms the autonomous status of Croatia. But as long as Yugoslav troops command the borders German propaganda for Croatian secession on the Czechoslovak model has little chance of success. And in the event of war, most of the Croatian territory would have to be abandoned in any case.

To all German warnings the government headed by Dusan Simovitch is almost certain to reply repeatedly that it is resolved on strict neutrality and that the agreement signed by former Premier Cvetkovich cannot be fulfilled because it is contrary to the will of the Yugoslav people. For Hitler, on the other hand, retreat is now impossible. But the customary Nazi technique of threats and vilification, far from mollifying the Serbs, would at this point exasperate them to white heat. A Balkan war therefore seems inevitable in the near future.

The greatest part of Yugoslavia's 1,200,000 men have been moving south for some time. For the probable Yugoslav strategy will be to throw the Italians out of Albania, give up the northern and northwestern provinces to the Germans, and retreat into the wild mountains of Bosnia, Montenegro, Central Serbia, and Macedonia, where German tanks and motorized columns would not be of much use. If such a maneuver were carried out, the seasoned Greek troops in Albania could be thrown eastward into Thrace, and the Germans in Bulgaria would find themselves outflanked by the Yugoslavs. Whatever the outcome, the Germans would have to employ huge masses of men and matériel—and in no case could they prevent one disastrous result: destruction of Balkan foodstuffs and raw materials which the Reich has long depended upon. Even if the Nazis conquer the Balkan mainland, yet without the Greek islands and a Mediterranean fleet they will scarcely have advanced in the war against the British Empire.

Chungking and Washington

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 27

SOMEONE seems to have sold the isolationist news letter, Uncensored, a bill of goods. The March 22 issue reports that "In Washington close observers have noted a weakening of the Administration's eagerness to stand up to Japan—regarding China. The reason is not of course that anyone loves Japan the more. And there are factors other than the possibility of a Soviet-Japanese agreement. The report brought back from China by special emissary Lauchlin Currie was discouraging. For one thing Currie is said to have been impressed by the split inside China. He is also said to have discovered that too large a portion of the money the United States has loaned to China has found its way into the private pockets of members of the Chungking government. Quite possibly it was the Currie report which led the President to soft-pedal aid to China in his speech on March 15. He did not speak of China in quite the same way he spoke of Britain and Greece." This is not an accurate description of Mr. Roosevelt's attitude or of the Currie report.

It is possible from Administration and Chinese sources to obtain some idea of Currie's impressions. This story is an attempt to collate these scraps for what they may be worth. Currie came back rather more optimistic than otherwise, and his is one of the Administration's most discerning minds. One gathers that Chiang Kai-shek immensely impressed Currie by his astuteness, his austerity and his awareness of his own historic role and mission. In him China for the first time has a truly national leader. The seriousness of recent clashes between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists is not underestimated, but it is felt that they are not in as critical a stage as they were. Whether the improvement will continue remains to be seen, and depends in part on the extent to which Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union can arrive at some measure of parallel action in the East. It seems agreed that the Soviet government has been "scrupulously correct" in its dealing with Chungking. In a paradoxical way, renewed strife between Kuomintang and Communists reflects some improvement in Chinese conditions; cooperation is easy enough when the situation seems desperate; jockeying for position begins when prospects improve. China's upper crust is as resistant as our own to social and economic reforms, though the Chinese Communist program is a rural New Deal rather than Sovietism. That this is well understood in the West was reflected in the dismay voiced even by our conservative press over the split, and the comment of such papers as the New York Times had a good effect in Chungking. Popular morale and guerrilla warfare within the Japanese occupied territory were hurt by the clashes with the Kuomintang, but the Generalissimo's speech before the People's Political Council is regarded as conciliatory and giving promise of peace.

Mr. Roosevelt did not "soft-pedal" aid to China in his March 15 speech. On the contrary, he promised more strongly than he has in the past to extend help to that country. The Chinese need more than we have been giving them, but the raw materials, artillery and planes required bulk very small amid the huge totals of the Lease-Lend Act. The chief artery for these supplies remains the Burma Road. Though Japanese planes operating from bases in French Indo-China may soon provide a new danger to the road, the Chinese are confident that they can keep it open. Bombed sections of the road are repaired in three hours and broken bridges replaced with pontoons or ferries in a day's time. The road has carried less freight than it should have because of the poor organization of traffic on it, not because of Japanese bombings. J. E. Baker, formerly head of the American Red Cross in China, has been appointed Director General of the Burma Road and expects to organize travel upon it more efficiently.

The Chinese have obtained more supplies from the Soviets than from America, but the prestige of the United States is much higher than that of any other country. The Japanese have gone as far as they can in China without getting into mountainous country and river gorges where their superior mechanical equipment would be of little use. Chinese guerrillas and irregular armies operate within so-called Japanese-occupied territory. Clashes between the central government and the Communists have had a bad effect on this guerrilla activity, for these roving bands live upon the countryside, and the tax and land reforms instituted by the Communists had tended to raise morale. Small enterprises were not interfered with in Communist territory but a progressive tax was laid on landholdings according to their size, and local democratic institutions were established.

It is hard to get a picture of just what is the difference in theory between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communist programs, both groups basing themselves on Sun Yat-sen's "Three Principles." The central government, as the only agency in Free China which can command adequate credit, has embarked on many large-scale government-owned enterprises. But Chiang's greatness is as the unifier and leader of China; he has just begun to learn first lessons in democracy and social reform. China's gentry must pay a price for the struggles of China's common people if China's defense is to be effective, and in this its problem is not so unlike that of the older democracies.

In this respect we are only beginning to get rid of the mote in our own eye. The habit of exporting encouraging speeches to China and war materials to Japan is dying out slowly. Exports to Japan in January were 40 per cent below December and the lowest for any month since August, 1936. It is nevertheless interesting to note in the latest Department of Commerce report on trade with the Far East that exports to Japan in January were three times as great as to China, and that exports to China have been declining and are about half of what they were a year ago. The Department's figures exaggerate our shipments to Free China, for Chinese representatives estimate that easily four-fifths of the $4,670,000 in goods shipped to China went to areas under Japanese control. It is also useful to recall that the $100,000,000 in loans promised China on November 30 have not yet been made available, though this is expected soon. So far the total of our loans to China is $65,000,000, a figure which makes our rhetoric seem a little shabby.

While exports were down in January, Japan took huge quantities of copper and lead, both now placed under licensing because of their scarcity and the need for them in the defense program. Licensing, of course, is not the same as an embargo, though one is often confused with the other. The State Department refuses to make information on licenses public and there is no way to find out what licenses are being granted. The oil companies are still doing a big business with Japan. Exports of petroleum to Japan totaled more than $3,500,000 in January and continue at a high level, though the companies are becoming more and more worried about the publicity attending the business. I have before me a photostat of a Standard-Vacuum bill of lading for 265,200 gallons of Pennsylvania-emblem motor oil to be shipped aboard the Tusima Maru from New York harbor "about March 23/24." It is marked, "No Socony shield or mention of company name to appear on package."

Battle of the Atlantic

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

BOTH Allied and Axis powers admit that 1941 is the critical year of World War II. If the British can hold out against Hitler this year, an ever-increasing volume of American ships and planes will be at their disposal to help turn the tide in 1942 and succeeding years. Conversely, the Axis, its forces not only weakened by blockade but spread over Europe because of the necessity of dominating a large and hostile subject population, will find its chances of victory materially diminishing.

But will aid in 1942 be too late? Hitler's military and diplomatic triumphs, British bravery against aerial attack, and the brilliant successes of the Greeks and British against the Italians in the Mediterranean have been the featured news of the past year of war. Much less spectacular but of probably greater importance has been the struggle at sea. Here a steady toll of sinkings, not as large as in any one month of the World War but with the same cumulative effect, has whittled away the margin of British security. Great Britain may be defeated on the land or even in the air and still survive, but should Germany succeed in completely disrupting the transport of British food and supplies the result will be either starvation or surrender.

Nothing is more dangerous than the assumption that the present war at sea is roughly parallel to that of the last war. During April, 1917, nearly a million tons of shipping were sent to the bottom of the Atlantic. An Allied defeat by November of that year was prophesied by the Germans and fully expected by the British leaders. Then the adoption of convoys, at the suggestion of Admiral Sims, cut submarine losses among convoyed ships by 90 per cent. The arrival of American destroyers and patrol vessels, the invention of reliable hydrophones for anti-submarine ships, and the laying of mine barrages in the North Sea and the Straits of Dover, only outlets to the Atlantic trade lanes for German submarines, first checked losses of merchant tonnage, then increased the toll on untersee boats, and finally caused such loss of morale among the German crews that cocked revolvers in the hands of their officers would not induce sailors to go aboard the doomed vessels.

At the beginning of the present war naval authorities were inclined to feel that any effort Germany made to gain command of the sea or to cut trade lanes would have no more than a nuisance value. They regarded the situation as comparable to that of the World War, and contended that the defenses against the submarine had been discovered then and that now it was merely necessary to apply them. The surprisingly long list of submarines destroyed and the relatively light loss of merchant tonnage during the early months of the present war confirmed this view. Even without the Russian, Italian, Japanese, and American aid which it had in the World War, and with a considerably smaller force, the Royal navy appeared to have the situation well in hand.

However, the German campaigns in Norway and France altered the situation inasmuch as they not only eliminated hostile land power from the continent of Europe but radically changed, in Germany's favor, the factors governing success in the war at sea. So many and far-reaching were the alterations in the conditions of sea warfare that few writers, even among naval men, appeared to grasp the full implications of all of them. And by the general public they were practically unnoticed.

The most obvious change, of course, related to German bases. Whereas these had once been concentrated along a narrow strip of North Sea coast, where their very crowding invited attack, they are now strung along the coastline from Norway to Spain—an achievement which greatly complicates the problem of successful enemy attack. But this is not the main advantage Germany derives from these new bases. Two of the three main anti-submarine devices of the World War—mine barrages and patrol vessels armed with listening devices—were effective only because they operated in comparatively narrow waters through which the U-boats were forced to pass. These narrow waters are no longer a condition of the sea war. Now that Germany has easy and direct access to the trade lanes of the Atlantic, its submarines do not have to run the gantlet of minefields and patrols before reaching their hunting grounds. Minefields in the North Sea and the Dover Straits have therefore become nearly valueless, and it would be dangerous to lay them near the French coast, in proximity to German air bases. With minefields close inshore out of the question and distant ones no longer effective, the greatest single threat to enemy morale has been dissipated.

The elimination of French sea power and Italy's entrance into the war have been too lightly regarded. Italian ships may have made far greater use of their extreme speed to escape action than they have of their offensive capacity. Nevertheless, the loss of French help has forced Great Britain to concentrate much of its navy in the Mediterranean. And because of the larger numbers of Italian submarines and the comparative absence of British air bases there, the ships in demand have been destroyers and submarines, the two classes that the British could least easily spare from the Atlantic.

It would thus be extremely unwise to view the Italian navy's recent losses as a heavy blow to Hitler. The mere existence of a reasonably strong Italian "fleet in being" drew warships into the Mediterranean at a time when Britain vitally needed them in the Atlantic for anti-submarine and convoy duties. Furthermore, the inability to make use of the bases in western Ireland, which proved so useful in 1917 and 1918, has compelled escorting ships to make about twice as long a trip on each voyage. Forced to these unusual exertions in an attempt to do the work of several times their number, both ships and men are being rapidly worn out by overwork. Germans have naturally attacked the destroyers whenever possible, and even according to British figures, have sunk at least forty. Meanwhile, experienced seamen have become so few that the manning of the fifty destroyers sent by the United States had to wait for several weeks until crews could be gathered. Lacking destroyers, of which they now have only about one-half the number with which they finished the war of 1914-18, the British have armed old tramp steamers, pressed into service trawlers and drifters, and invented a new and cheaper class of anti-submarine vessel known as the corvette. But sinkings continue to mount.

Not only the submarine danger, but danger from surface raiders has greatly increased. During the World War raiders were at least forced to run a blockade in the North Sea. They must still do so but the task is infinitely easier since their proximity to air bases in Norway has compelled Britain virtually to abandon its strongholds in the Orkneys and northern Scotland, and since the Royal navy, with a much weaker force than once used to watch the 230 miles of sea lane between Scotland and Norway, can scarcely hope to make a continental blockade airtight. The belligerency of Italy has at the same time immobilized the very battle-cruisers and plane-carriers that would be most useful against commerce raiders.

So far, the British have apparently resisted the natural temptation to disperse their forces widely over a large area. As a result, their losses from the forays of German pocket-battleships, cruisers, and armed merchantmen in the Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian Oceans have gone up to startling figures; several entire convoys have been intercepted and badly mangled. Yet battleship protection is hardly possible. It is highly significant that the loss of the Graf Spee has been the only major German casualty in this phase of war and that that loss occurred when the strategic position at sea was very different from what it is today.

Aerial warfare against commerce has proved disappointing to many aviation enthusiasts who have long insisted that the bomber had spelled the doom of the battleship. According to both British and German figures the ship losses due to planes have been less than a third of the whole. This, however, is probably due in part to the fact that the giant German air force is notably deficient in large long-range bombers. At any rate, German planes have found their greatest value in scouting for merchantmen and reporting their location and course by radio to nearby submarines. The advent of aerial scouting has thus nearly destroyed the utility of the World War device of using irregular routes and times of sailing.

The seriousness of the present emergency would be hard for an outsider to estimate. Figures of total losses are no longer released by the British Admiralty; those of the Germans are subject to heavy discount. Nevertheless, the indications are that they are enormous. The best American students of sea warfare estimate them at at least 5,000,000 tons or about one-fourth of the pre-war merchant marine; German figures run close to 9,000,000 tons. Added to the outright losses has been the burden on overcrowded dockyards of repairing damaged ships at a time when German air raids are aimed especially at shipping centers. Some of these losses have been replaced by the million tons of merchant shipping the United States sold Britain and by French, Dutch, Norwegian, Belgian, and Danish tonnage taken over. But countering these gains are the significant facts that the war has vastly increased the needs of ocean transport, that the Mediterranean lifeline has been largely abandoned for commercial use, and that the necessities of the convoy system itself, with its waits for escorts, reductions of speed to that of the slowest unit, and zigzag steering, have decreased the effectiveness of a given tonnage by at least 20 to 30 per cent. So serious is the emergency that British spokesmen in the United States have almost ceased emphasizing airplanes in the growing urgency of their demand for ships, and they have scraped the boneyards clean, purchasing every bottom conceivably useful.

Critical as the present situation is, there is no proof whatever that it will not steadily become worse. With a stronger industrial machine, more abundant resources and shipyards, and less need to produce for land war, there is no reason why German production of submarines should not far surpass the twelve to fifteen per month achieved during the best period of the last war. In fact, if reports of the mass building of tiny, standardized boats with just enough cruising radius to reach the hunting grounds west of Ireland are at all correct, forty to fifty ships a month might well be turned out. Since the runs are shorter, the proportion of ships at sea at any one time could conceivably reach one-third, far more than the 10 to 15 per cent usually active during 1917 and 1918. The provision of enough trained crews offers a more serious problem, but not one incapable of solution. If rumors of increased production of the new Focke-Wulf long-range bomber are accurate, air power also may well offer a much more formidable threat than has heretofore been the case.

The main feature of the German Blitzkrieg has not been the invention of any new weapons but rather the greatly improved and more imaginative use of old ones. Today virtually every condition in the war against commerce is drastically different from the circumstances of the World War. Even German technique has greatly improved. A single submarine of the World War has given place to fleets of submarines, a single torpedo to entire salvos. It is probable that sound detectors have been improved to the point where U-boats are firing by sound alone without the risk of raising their periscopes above the surface. In 1917 Great Britain found answers to the submarine, then a new weapon, barely in time to escape defeat. To 1941 problems these 1918 answers have become as inadequate as was French employment of 1918 ideas in land warfare last spring.

By one of the curious parallels in which history abounds, American aid in World War II, as in World War I, is coming at a time when Great Britain faces defeat. The lending of mosquito and patrol craft and the building within three to four months of perhaps hundreds of additional submarine-chasers and torpedo boats are the most obvious measures of American aid now being undertaken. Coordination of British and American shipping to bring about the most favorable possible use of existing tonnage is also inevitable. Great Britain itself is taking steps to insure more rapid and efficient handling of merchant tonnage. Since ships take months or years to build, shipbuilding to replace lost tonnage cannot at once become effective. However, there is a noticeable speeding up here, together with R. A. F. attempts to cripple progress at German shipyards and bases.

Another suggestion of aid involves the use of American merchantmen in convoys, with United States warships serving as escorts. From a positive angle, such a course of action would augment considerably the protection now given convoys and increase the number of vessels which could be safeguarded. On the other hand, it would certainly involve loss of American ships and lives and the definite abandonment of the comforting legal fiction that the United States is not, after all, at war. The Administration is therefore weighing the idea with great caution. A more conservative plan, the loaning of additional warships to Britain, would avoid these psychological perils but would be much less effective, since one of England's greatest shortages is in skilled crews. By either method the extent of American aid would be more limited than many imagine, since large forces of destroyers are required with the Pacific and Asiatic fleets, the only really effective deterrent to a southward push by Japan. Nevertheless, the emergency is so critical that one of these schemes may have to be adopted.

Yet there is no assurance that any of these steps by themselves will be adequate. Will the British navy, traditionally conservative, find a successful defense against the submarine menace of 1941? In 1917 it was American ideas and invention rather than American material aid that brought ultimate victory. And again today the fate of Britain hangs on the rapid invention of new means to overcome heavy shipping losses.

Bombs Over the Hedgerows

BY CHARLES DUFF

London, March 10 (By Clipper)

IT IS comparatively easy for a trained observer, or one with good natural instincts, to estimate the psychological atmosphere of London or that of any of the big English provincial towns or cities in time of war. To do as much for the countryside is far more difficult, and the countryside, though almost ignored, is hardly less important. After all, it produces much food; it would bear the brunt of invasion; and it is the home now of hundreds of thousands of evacuees from the metropolis and the danger areas. Why it should be so neglected by journalists and correspondents I do not know, but this is a good enough excuse for my own observations.

In June, 1938, an Austrian friend and myself were discussing England's power of resistance in the event of war with Germany, which we both regarded as inevitable. He said: "If Hitler bombs London, he will do the job thoroughly; and this great soft monster will soon collapse. As a people, the English have had no first-hand experience of war. They have never had it on their doorsteps. From long prosperity and security at home they have developed qualities which do not offer wonderful prospects of resistance. In this they are unlike the Irish and the Spaniards—or even the French—and I shudder to think what will happen to your great city if there are serious air raids."

I had heard the same thesis before, especially from Nazis, all of whom seemed to think that England had grown too fat to fight successfully in the sort of Blitzkrieg they had in mind. Of course I disagreed—for reasons which have so far proved correct. The English are not a soft race, individually or collectively; and they may be counted upon to fight not only tenaciously but even ferociously to defend their homes, their mode of life, and their existence. It is not easy to find a tougher customer than the average London Cockney, whose morale, staying power, and dry, sardonic humor in the most adverse circumstances often evoked my admiration in the last war. I noticed then that even in a helter-skelter retreat they never lost their heads. There was certainly a lot of cussing and swearing; but signs of panic—never.

I lived through all that heavy bombing of London which began on last September 7 (without once going to an air-raid shelter) and saw precisely the same qualities that I saw in 1914-18. Londoners were grim, quiet—and very angry—all indications of good morale. The general feeling was: "If only we could hit back." There was a certain amount of awe at the barbarity of those first big raids when the Germans, engaged in "area bombing" by night, razed churches, hospitals, schools, great office buildings, and the humble dwellings of the poor, in a way that the quick-witted Cockneys instinctively recognized as having terrorism as the chief military purpose. They seemed to know that Hitler's advisers had told him a story similar to that expounded by my Austrian friend, and they drew upon their rich spiritual resources to prove how wrong it was. In about a fortnight or three weeks the spirit of London resembled the spirit of Madrid, as I had known it during the Spanish war. There is no need to disguise the fact that life was difficult and sometimes chaotic, but the ordinary people rose above officialdom and bureaucracy and solved problem after problem for themselves. They worked like a rather good football team. There has never been a better example of what Kropotkin calls "mutual aid." Everybody helped everybody; the amount of looting was negligible, considering the population; and the stoicism of the people and the nightly heroism of workers and the services had epic qualities. Terrorism has failed in this war so far as England is concerned. It failed in London; it fails in the ports and industrial areas. It will also fail in the countryside.

In recent weeks Hitler has devoted some attention to country towns, villages, hamlets, and even to farms and isolated spots. I was myself in due course bombed out of my London apartment and decided I would sleep in the country until I could get another home organized. And so I have taken advantage of the respite to study the countryside. Every evening I talk to small-town dwellers, villagers, farm laborers, and others, some of whom have not visited a city many times in their lives. I find them quite a different breed from the Londoners—but not less interesting.

The town on the outskirts of which I live is in the center of an agricultural district and normally has about 11,000 inhabitants. With evacuees and bombed-out folk like myself, it now has about 20,000. One Sunday not long ago I was out for a stroll with a friend when two planes appeared amid the low-lying clouds. I suspected they belonged to the enemy, but was not sure. Suddenly there was the roar of exploding bombs. The planes swept directly overhead at a height of a few hundred feet—I saw the hooded head of the pilot of one clearly—and made off. In the distance was the wasp-like noise of our own fighters, and soon we heard the rattle of machine-gun fire. Later we were informed that a raider had been brought down.

That evening I went out for my usual ramble and visited a little roadside beerhouse frequented almost exclusively by poor small-farmers and farm laborers—about the simplest people one can find in England. I expected the conversation to turn upon that daylight raid, the first which our town had experienced. But no. Nobody even mentioned it, until I did. And then it was dismissed with testy remarks such as: "Those bloody Germans have a cheek to come here in broad daylight. Much good it does them bombing a place like this!" In another town a few miles away a German plane came on market day—Hitler's Luftwaffe has not forgotten the lesson of Guernica—and reduced a few houses to rubble, killed seven people, and wounded a score. It machine-gunned the marketers and stall-holders. A man who had a fish stall in the street showed me two bullet holes in the tray of his scales. "Can you beat it," he said. "Another foot to the left and he'd have got me. He hit a codfish on my stall, and if the price hadn't been fixed I coulda sold it for double in souvenir steaks." The point about all this is not that the country people seem more phlegmatic than the Londoners (which one might expect) but that their morale is as strong, even if they are perhaps not so quick in the uptake as Londoners, not so instinctively ready in team work. I began to speculate on what their behavior would be in the event of invasion.

Apart from the presence (especially in the evenings and at week-ends) of a few thousand extra inhabitants, one would not notice any difference in our town between times of peace and of war. A little more shopping activity, more aimless walking in the streets, bigger queues for the two cinemas and, of course, the food shortage—that is all. The food shortage sounds far worse than it is, and is chiefly in butchers' meat. Only twice in recent weeks have our butchers' shops been short of the ration allowance and then the allowance turned up a few days later. One can always buy other meats: hares, rabbits, fowls, fish, which are not rationed. In short, we have not really felt the food shortage. The carnivorous who can afford the money may go to a restaurant and have a good meat meal and then go home and eat their own rations. If they wanted they could go from one restaurant to another and gorge to repletion. Nobody expects that condition to last. It is unfair on the poor, and it is not only the poor who criticize it. Sometimes you can't get your favorite brand of cigarettes or tobacco; but you always have something to choose from. Prices of clothes have gone up and there's a purchase tax, but I find no profiteering to compare with that which was common in 1914-18. The ordinary English people, on the whole, seem to have developed a better civic sense, especially in regard to petty profiteering and speculating. This is not to say that these evils do not exist. Onions have been sold at two shillings a pound. Leeks went to some appalling price. But, in the main, the grounds for complaint are few. This is true not only in London but in every town and village I have visited. Perhaps the storekeepers realize that the public is not in a mood to stand much nonsense (and it certainly is not); so they may not have a very much better civic sense after all.

Underneath the surface of life there is the quiet, persistent activity of war preparations. The town where I sleep and live at week-ends is proceeding to perfect its organization and defenses, but one sees very little evidence of either. There are I do not know how many town and country folk in the Home Guard, and with this is incorporated a fair leaven of old soldiers who saw active service in the last war—seasoned men, who have been under fire, bombardment, and in gas attacks, men who know military routine from A to Z. They have all had refresher courses and training in modern methods of guerrilla warfare.

The Home Guard is as near as England has ever got to a democratic army, and there is an excellent spirit prevailing between officers and men. This is a fortunate state of affairs in a corps which consists of all classes, creeds, and conditions. Indeed the men would not work with officers whom they disliked. In the Home Guard the lawyer, the company director, the farm laborer, and the newspaper-seller train alongside one another; and the man who is boss in the daytime may be taking orders from his employee in the evening. The general social significance of this leveling out is incalculable, and if there is no invasion, England should have good reason to thank Hitler for the threat of it. I meet many Home Guardsmen and have been struck by the way they have toughened up in recent months. One can hardly expect storm-trooper qualities from them, but I imagine that, should invasion come, they will provide many surprises. Some of them are expert at their jobs: as machine-gunners, grenade-throwers, and riflemen. All are volunteers and proud of their uniform. The majority of the men guarding key points are of the regular army, and they have been instructed to die rather than yield an inch. They will have the whole of the population behind them in this part of the countryside; there will be no panic, even if gas and flame-throwers are used, but a stolid, intelligent, and tenacious resistance, at times of a ferocity that may come as a shock to those who have not looked deeply into the English soul. "Let us get face to face with the Germans and we'll slaughter them," is a common sentiment.

As regards the general behavior of the civil population, many of the evacuees are women and children and they may be expected to "stay put" in the event of invasion. They will remain indoors. The townsfolk may be divided into two categories: those who will stay home and adopt passive resistance, following the official instructions which are to be distributed any day now; and an incalculable number who may be counted upon not to resist the temptation to do something. I have met dozens of men who say: "It's all very fine to be told just to stay home by the fireside if the Germans come. I don't know what I'll do, but I'll do something. There's bound to be some mopping up wanted." While the spirit behind all this is good, the military nuisance value may be in proportion. There is another certainty: the people in these country towns and villages have had the lessons of Belgium and France so dinned into them that they will never clutter up the roads.

In one respect there is a striking difference between London and the countryside: that of political outlook. In London it is impossible to avoid hearing among the ordinary population views to the effect that after the war there must be a fundamental change in political structure, tending toward an undefined socialism. But even in London I find little evidence of a semi-revolutionary feeling. There is a vague yearning for a leveling out of the gross inequalities of life—those inequalities which that first month's heavy bombing brought into sharp relief. In London and, I understand, in the big provincial cities and industrial districts and bombed ports, the prism of war is splitting social thought into a spectrum in which the colors stand out in violent contrast. In both London and the countryside it is realized that bureaucracy is stifling democracy, but whereas something may be done about it in the big cities, the countryside is unlikely to be greatly moved.

The people in my town and countryside are ultra-Conservatives down to the humblest farm laborer, and Labor or even Liberal town councilors are looked at askance and almost as reds. Here the church and land-owning influences are considerable—and reactionary. To me, who have lived for years in London, it is odd to feel that unpopularity or worse is the reward of some opinion that would pass unnoticed in the metropolis. Here there is hardly an adverse word or thought about the politicians responsible for Munich, and to talk of that episode as a betrayal produces a hostile silence. Having sensed the hostility, I get out of it by remarking: "Well, thank God we have Churchill"—with which there is unanimous agreement. Churchill's latest broadcast was listened to with religious awe. Of course Russia is outside the pale. Here, the Communist is a monster and the Conservative a gentleman. That, in general, expresses the spirit of this countryside. London is not England—any more than New York is the United States. Perhaps less so.

THE RICH PASS THROUGH THE EYE OF A NEEDLE

The Opportunists

BY CHRISTOPHER LA FARGE

THE Opportunists are individuals, without any official connections, who will get you a government order for goods to be used in the defense program—at a price. They have appeared in force in southern New England, one of the largest centers of armament production in the country, since last July. I know that fifteen pairs of them (they work in pairs as a rule) have turned up here in Rhode Island; and that, from their own accounts, they have not limited themselves to this territory. They cover a wide field in an anxious time.

The price for which the Opportunists will work varies from 2 to 10 per cent of the gross amount of the orders procured. If they can secure for a factory an order for $100,000 worth of gun-carriages (that sum to include a profit for the manufacturer) the eventual cost to the army or the navy may be as much as $110,000. This increase in cost the Opportunists would justify on the ground that, acting as a clearing-house and information center in a time of disorganization and confusion, they have expedited both the placing and the completion of defense contracts.

As far back as May, 1940, some of the Opportunists saw their chance and organized, though most of them began in July or August. They work in teams—composed, usually, of two men, one of whom is an engineer of sorts—management or industrial—and the other a sales promoter, or contact man. The better organized pairs carry elaborately prepared catalogues which list the equipment of those plants they claim as "clients." The plants are identified only by an unrevealing key number, for the common practice is to show or give this catalogue freely to manufacturers to consult in case they need supplementary equipment in order to put through a complex defense order. Thus, one manufacturer may not have Bullard lathes and may need them badly. In the Opportunists' catalogue he finds a plant having Bullards. If he can sub-contract part of his order to the other plant he gets his work finished and the Opportunists collect their commission from the plant that had the Bullards. It is obvious that the plants so catalogued must be anonymous, for otherwise what would prevent a direct contact between the two manufacturers, that would leave the Opportunists out in the cold?

In talking recently with state officials and manufacturers in New England, I found them eager to supply me with facts on this kind of defense profiteering, but reluctant to be quoted specifically, lest they be reproached for having furthered the schemes of the Opportunists.

The average manufacturer or politician can be only a victim of these practices, never a beneficiary, for none of the excess profits come his way. In order, therefore, not to embarrass honest men, I shall cite composite examples, in which names of places and persons are invented but none the less typical; much of the material that I shall quote, in letters and contracts, is exact though somewhat condensed.

Let us follow the course of that enterprising group The Arms and Ordnance Procurement Associates, which has set out to collect a percentage on national defense orders. On expensive stationery the president of the firm writes to the state government commission which acts as a clearing-house for manufacturers. The commission has production facilities listed in such a fashion that any manufacturer may learn where he can have this or that made or processed or finished. State listings are sent to production offices in Washington, to the army and navy, and to other states. The Procurement Associates request an interview with the commission. Soon granted an appointment, Mr. Lugg and Mr. Tinker of the Procurement Associates arrive at the commission offices; possibly they have brought along that prominent club man and broker, Mr. Dolan, who has an acquaintance with some member of the state commission. Mr. Lugg is a management engineer and Mr. Tinker is a sales-promotion expert. After some polite talk, they get down to business. Can the commission tell them who in this state can handle a particular defense requisite?

Suppose the Procurement Associates inquire about anti-aircraft guns. When the commission asks why they want this information they talk of their intimate connections with defense chiefs in Washington, then go on to explain that they are eager, like all good Americans, to help rearm the United States. They are out to cut red tape, get wheels moving. The commission is unable to refuse information that may bring business into the state; and the matter of any fee paid by the manufacturer to the Procurement Associates is utterly beyond its control. The commission finally informs the Procurement Associates that the A & B Machine Works have the equipment to make anti-aircraft guns. Then, in all probability, the Procurement Associates will go directly to the A & B Machine Works and introduce themselves as sent by the commission—a falsification which is not usually exposed by the indignant commission until the Procurement Associates' business is sufficiently advanced to be safe, or has been flatly refused. If, the Opportunists explain, they should go to their connection in Washington, Mr. X (A Man Who Is Close to Knudsen), with a full description of a reputable New England plant capable of making, say, anti-aircraft guns, Mr. X (possibly the most honest of public servants) will be only too delighted to send government specifications directly to that plant and ask it for a bid on such guns. The only thing that is holding up Mr. X, they point out, is the regrettable lack of coordination of such information in Washington. The fact is, of course, that in all likelihood Mr. X would in time send, on his own initiative, those very plans to that very plant.

The Opportunists dangle a large bait before hungry men. If the men are hungry enough they bite and, virtually without proof that the allocation of such work to their respective plants is the doing of these salesmen and not the natural course of events in Washington, swallow a contract calling for a commission to be paid to the Opportunists upon receipt of a government order.

If by any chance this is a little more than the manager can easily take and he asks the Procurement Associates to get out, they may look sadly at him and tell him that they will feel it necessary, under the circumstances, to inform their connections in Washington not to send any inquiries for the time being to the A & B Machine Works, at least not until the manager has had time to think over their proposition and decide to come to some definite arrangement with them. They then leave.

Now let us look at another method. The Procurement Associates, who are interested by now in sub-contracts, first call on the state commission. Their experience at the offices of the commission is identical with the one already described, unless this is their second visit, in which case a certain coolness may mark the interview. After they have left the commission offices, they return to their own home office and start the good work by writing letters. A typical form letter will read like this:

The A & B Machine Works, Mechanicsville.

Through the cooperation of the State Industrial Commission, we are advised that you have some plant facilities adaptable to the urgent requirements of the Ordnance Department. At the present time a considerable volume of overflow orders for parts is being distributed to machine shops in the East through this organization by nationally known manufacturers.

We are constantly receiving quotation inquiries and blueprints for many types of machine-shop work. The capacities of the shops which we represent are becoming greatly overtaxed and we seek additional outlets for such orders. If you have the facilities for such work and are interested, please write us.

In writing, please list fully your equipment, floor space, number of your employees, and also whether or not all of your employees are American citizens, and the type of machine-shop work you prefer.

Please let us hear from you by return mail if you are interested, as we are flooded with quotation inquiries. (Signed) The Arms & Ordnance Procurement Associates

By: H. C. Lugg, President.

If the shop is at all interested (there is nothing in this letter about a commission) it is likely to reply, and thus to give the Procurement Associates another anonymous though detailed listing of equipment for their catalogue. This listing is impressive for the next prospect and it means that the job eventually offered to the A & B Machine Works will be temptingly well suited to its facilities.

The manager of the A & B Machine Works writes as requested, listing his equipment in full. Presently he gets another letter. Somewhat condensed, it runs:

We acknowledge receipt of your communication of September—with accompanying enclosure.

We are and will be in a position to forward blueprints and quotation inquiries in considerable quantities for work adaptable to your machinery. We have already placed much of this type of business and will be glad to add your plant to our clientele provided one copy of the Standard Form Agreement, herewith enclosed, is executed and returned to this office. . . . As all quotation inquiries forwarded to you will be strictly on a bid basis, our procurement commission will nowise affect your normal margin of profit but will merely be reflected in your bids and will only apply in those instances where work forwarded by us is considered acceptable enough to you to warrant your bid, and any re-orders from the same source.

Please let us hear by return mail, etc.

The "Standard Form Agreement" is so remarkable a document that I give it in full below:

We, the undersigned, do hereby employ and retain Arms & Ordnance Procurement Associates of New York to procure us quotation inquiries, specifications, blueprints, orders, or any of them, for production and fabrication of ordnance parts or equipment, and do hereby agree for value received and in consideration of services so rendered to pay the said Arms & Ordnance Procurement Associates a commission of ten percentum of the gross business so procured for us.

In addition to the above specified commission on the initial orders, we further agree to pay to the aforesaid Arms & Ordnance Procurement Associates a commission of ten percentum on all ensuing orders from the same source or sources either directly or indirectly received by us hereafter. We further agree that the ten percentum commission herein provided for will also include and be computed upon all jigs, tools, dies, etc., as well as parts which might be billed separately or collectively by us.

We further agree to pay the ten percentum commission promptly upon receipt of payment of our invoice for said orders and we agree to send a duplicate of all invoices applicable thereto at the time we bill the same to the office of the Arms and Ordnance Procurement Associates.

We further agree that this contract remain in force and effect during the continuation of the present European war, or any wars in continuation thereof by the present nations, or any wars immediately growing out of the present war, and in any event remain in full force and effect during the period and continuation of the rearmament program of the United States government.

We further agree that this agreement shall be binding upon our heirs, executors, assigns, and/or legal representatives.

It is a charming document—and remarkable not only for its language but for the fact that, standard or not, the grim little paragraph referring to wars and the children of wars, had to be modified later, as follows:

We further agree to pay the above specified commissions on all ensuing orders or re-orders hereafter received from the same source or sources and directly resulting from our satisfactorily handling the initial orders so procured or any orders received resulting from contacts established by Arms & Ordnance Procurement Associates.

We further agree that this contract remain in force and effect for two years from the date hereof.

It may be wondered how the Opportunists get hold of these blueprints they peddle about. It can be done by a simple and ingenious method.

A salesman for the Procurement Associates calls on the manager of the E & F Company, a big, nationally known plant. The salesman asks the manager what work is giving him the most trouble. The manager says that it is very difficult to get three-inch internal boring. The salesman then says that his firm has as a client the G & H Company, which has precisely the equipment necessary, and he asks the manager for blueprints and specifications to take to the G & H Company for a bid on this work. The manager is usually unwilling to give government prints to the salesman, but he is willing to send them to G & H, a reputable firm. The salesman agrees to this and telephones G & H that the E & F Company are sending prints on his recommendation. The prints are then posted out to the G & H Company. If G & H get the job, the Procurement Associates get a commission. But if the job is lost because the price is too high, the salesman for Procurement Associates calls on G & H to offer his regrets, at the same time saying that the E & F Company want him to bring back the blueprints and specifications. The G & H Company see no real reason for refusing to give him the prints, since they came through him, and so the salesman walks out with them. The Procurement Associates are now in a position to go to any plant in the country and exhibit these prints and specifications as an admirable warranty that they represent the E & F Company.

On March 30 Donald M. Nelson of the OPM issued a warning that the Opportunists were at work and asked business men to deal only with government-appointed purchasing agents. The warning was timely, but, considering the inroads the Opportunists have already made, it will probably take more than a warning to get rid of them.

In the Wind

THE Borough of Queens in New York City is fast becoming the headquarters and hunting ground of fascist groups. After the last election, in which he suffered a severe defeat, Joe McWilliams moved his American Destiny Party from Yorkville to Queens. Father Brophy, Coughlin's Eastern representative, now operates in Queens. And most of New York's professional fascists are said to be colonizing the borough in the hope that this vast area of lower middle-class dwelling places may become the stronghold of American fascism.

LOWELL MELLETT'S Office of Government Reports publishes each week, for the convenience of federal workers, a list of magazine articles on public affairs. In the index to the March 12 issue this entry appears: "Civil Liberties (see Subversive Activities)."

A PROMINENT FRENCHMAN who recently left France tells this story of the Parisians' attitude toward their conquerors. One of the large Paris restaurants is generally filled in the evenings by German and Italian officers as well as by French civilians. When the Germans enter there is complete silence. When the Italians appear, however, one of the Frenchmen stands up, asks for silence, then cries out: "Voilà —voilà nos vainqueurs!" Even the Germans, according to the story, join in the laughter.

A UNITED PRESS STORY that appeared in only a few Southern papers told of a Negro who volunteered for army service but who was known and disliked by the examining board. Eager to get rid of him, the board asked the army doctor to do his utmost to find some physical defect. The doctor found nothing wrong and wrote this report: "Perfect physical specimen but ugly as hell. Army will accept at its own discretion."

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

The Georgia of the North

THE Farm Security Administration is not setting up any transient camps along the line between Connecticut and Westchester County, New York, to take care of the migrant suburbanites. They provide their own shelter but they are on the move and their migration is a demonstration of the fact that there may be as much pull in the hope that in Connecticut they will escape a state income tax as there is in the hope of getting a job anywhere picking beans or building a powder factory. Also some clerks as well as some capitalists are troubled because the real-estate tax on a suburban home in the Nutmeg State is only half what it is a little nearer the Grand Central Terminal in New York. Taxgatherers are disturbed in New York and pleased in Connecticut because taxpayers are moving.

The New York Times seemed to be philosophic—even poetic—about the ferment on the roads north of it. Contemplating the situation with a benignity which it extends to its entire suburban circulation on both sides of the line, the journal declared that "everybody in the present lively debate agrees that in both states the grass is green, the hills are soft and round, and the air is bracing." The description is of those green pastures we have all been seeking.

The new parkways may indeed be the perfect American plush-lined passageways for migrants to them. It seems almost impolite to suggest that the big roads may lead just as straight to sadness as does the road out of Oklahoma by Hooverville and the honky-tonk. They do. I have the testimony of a black shepherd in the green pastures to prove it.

I hope the escaping suburbanites will have better luck than some other people who also moved, in hope of escape, up the same roads. The Reverend Richard A. G. Foster told me about them, and as pastor of the Varick Memorial African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in New Haven he is one of them himself. Their story is perhaps not very important in the big picture of migration in America. It is not as dramatic as the mass movements of defense. It does not make as much news as the scurrying of the suburbanites from state income taxes and higher real-estate levies. But I think what the Reverend Mr. Foster, who preaches under the towers of a Yale gymnasium which looks like a cathedral, says about his people is interesting. He has, I think, a right to report on his own part of life in the pleasant state where financiers and factories, taxpayers and Gothic Towers are at home. His testimony, however, has not often enough been taken.

"I have traveled over Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, and in the backwoods of North Carolina and Virginia," he said, "and have seen the deplorable Negro homes there. But when I came to New Haven I was amazed to see terrible homes for Negroes here too. I inquired what Negroes pay for such 'homes' and felt that one of the cleverest pieces of robbery that has ever been perpetrated upon a people was the rent asked for these old fire-traps."

The shepherd in the land where "the grass is green and the hills are soft and round" went on: "Who cares how Negroes live! That seems to be the attitude of most people. As to a living wage for Negroes, apparently no one wants them to have enough money to better their conditions. Everyone knows that Negroes are paid less than any other racial group. But when the cost of living rises, they must pay just as much as anyone else. It is sad, but many regard Connecticut as the Georgia of the North as far as Negroes are concerned."

It is a long way from Georgia to Connecticut and not all the roads are planted with grass and trees. But the Negroes have been coming for a long time. The Reverend Mr. Foster's church was established in 1820. Eli Whitney was living in New Haven then. He had already been to Georgia and tightened the ties of slavery with his machine. Mr. Foster's church must have been one of the first havens for the escaped. They could shout hallelujah for freedom at the top of their lungs till the hallelujahs came back resounding from all Connecticut's little hills. That was when the road on which Negroes came to the North and to freedom ran underground. Now it has four lanes, and shrubs and spruce trees and grass are prettily planted beside it. A Negro can run on it as fast as a taxpayer. And if he has any wind left at the end of his journey he can sing hallelujah still in the A. M. E. Zion Church.

Within the sound of any such singing it seems to me that Connecticut itself might begin to contrast a tax policy designed to catch millionaires with its inability or unwillingness to provide decent living conditions for Negroes. Such a conflict in state attitudes of promise to some and performance to others may not be the American dream but too often has seemed the American plan.

THE MODERN POETRY OF AMERICA HISPANA*

BY ALFONSO REYES

II

IN THE second hour of Modernism appear the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío (1867-1916) and the Mexican Amado Nervo (1870-1919). The great name of Darío means a whole era of Spanish poetry, equal at least to that of Garcilaso. Centuries must pass before human clay raises another such tower of poetic strength. In Darío's work, three principal phases are usually marked: the origins, sprung from Spain's soil, from the epigram of Campoamor and the romantic Becquer—through the volume "Azul"; Rubenismo, which some place apart from Modernism, it being his most imitated manner, an erudite music of violins and sonatinas and mythic bas-reliefs—through the volume "Prosas Profanas"; and finally the huge discordant music of "Cantos de Vida y Esperanza," thus far imitated by none, and one of the clearest summits of poetry. The first manner is "family jewelry"; the second is the gay luxury of the salon; the third is prophetic storm. Language, technique, imagination, are permanently made over. The inevitable reaction against Darío's reign will be a reaction against the sheer physical beauty of his verse, against the imperialism of his vast resources, against the plethora of motives for creation which he finds in the external world. The reaction will be fatigue, mutedness, almost silence: imprisonment in one's own soul. Darío, more than a lyre, was the whole orchestra. The reaction will take the form of intricate specialization within his immense panorama. Darío's prose would not have an indifferent page had not his secretaries in his last years put their hands on it. His book of critical silhouettes, "Los Raros," has this distinction: it reveals not the literary influences that formed the master, but the influences that his successors were able to take hold of.

Nervo is an erudite poet in evolution toward a too consciously sought innocence. His growth reveals spiritual purification, often at aesthetic sacrifice. His tortured eroticism, redeeming and simplifying itself, lets its graces go. If in his youth "Sappho, Crisis, Aspasia, Magdalena, Afrodita" were the heroines of his "perverse desire," maturity made him rave mildly over no more than "the blonde and the dark one," "la rubia y la morena." Ten years with his "unmovable beloved" (then she died) did not placate him. Thereafter, sick and sad, he will dote on the kiss of a child and make believe that the sympathy shown for him is love. The ecclesiastic mysticism of his childhood, burdened with Catholic art, darkened by the black wings of á Kempis, becomes an abstract transparency in which are fused Franciscan sweetness, the sacrifice of Christ, and the aloofness of Buddha. He sports with both spiritualism and science, above all with the sciences of still unsolved mysteries. And at last his Saturnian complexities turn saintly, and his art grows vulgar; for "it is with good sentiments that one makes bad books." But his refined sensibilities win a fair use of the Mexican diminutive, so characteristic of our speech; his early techniques—those deliciously dissolving alexandrines, those coquettish and gluttonous ritournelles—disappear one by one; so that at the last this literary poet (if ever there was one!) exclaims: "Of literature, I know nothing."

Nervo came to his end "through the strait gate," utterly empty and perfect. His popularity with the American publics coincides with the aversion of the critics.

The Argentine, Leopoldo Lugones (1874-1938), places one foot on Modernism to begin a march that lasts his entire life. With "Los crepúsculos del jardín" he grasps the scepter and thenceforth never yields it. As he broadens, he leaves the schools behind him, unclassed by the athleticism of his robust personality. Every substance is palpable in his work, from languid silk to bronze; each new volume is a new zone of the spirit. He invents always, he never repeats; moving from the aristocratic to the popular and from the love of liberty to the bitter belief in the need for a dictator. Impatient as a man of the Renaissance, he embraces everything: humanism, politics, history, and exact sciences, botany, philology, anthropology, myths. His facility rides him. A provincial toward Buenos Aires, a creole toward Spain, torn between a ballad terseness and a rustic asperity, with something of Góngora and of a natural-born symbolist, now recondite, now diaphanous, with an indefatigable gift for words, he is the typical American embracing civilizations and anxieties. His "Lunario Sentimental" is a seed-store of the new Argentine poetry beyond him; in his gallant prose there are pages which I venture to call immortal. He devolved from anarchism to militarism; the youth of Argentina sorrowfully had to break with him. But as time passes, there will remain of him only the height of his destiny: his artistic perfection. It is not certain, nor need be here considered, in what sense there were associations between him and the Uruguayan Julio Herrera y Reissig (1873-1909). They refer at best to one phase of Lugones, and a parallel is not a map. The Bolivian Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (1872-1934) is also, up to a certain point, associated with Lugones; he was a poet of strong originality, investigator of new rhythms in whose work visions of the pampa grow palpable.

The Peruvian José Santos Chocano (1875-1934) is virtuosity incarnate. The chivalric pride of Díaz Mirón inspired him, but his eyes opened on the opulent history and nature of his land and led him to his own way. Its mountains and plains, its rivers and lakes, the legends of the Conquistadores, horses, eagles, are not so much descriptive features of his poems as blazons of a heraldry, weapons in an armory. The architecture is parnassian. And the landscape plays a divining part in a game of hieroglyphs. Seduced by visual enchantments, Chocano can graciously descend to describe the pirouette of a circus or the black-and-white of a tearoom. Only in the "Limeña" of his contemporary, Luis Fernán Cisneros, has his funambular grace been excelled. But when Chocano came to Mexico, his wisdom in reading signs helped him to penetrate with a magistral stroke the sadness of the Indian.

The Colombian Guillermo Valencia (1873-), humanist and philosopher, directs his spiritual gaze over India, the Near East, the Bible, and classic lands; ascends through Spain to the European literatures; reaches Germany and Russia. He is an intense and grave poet with thought and form both purified. He has revived the long poem and evaded none of its problems. Narrator and contemplator more than lyricist, his culture is unobtrusive and inward. Contrast with his meditative features the shrewd grimace of another Colombian, the humorist Luis Carlos López, younger but already dead; his satires denote a reaction of Creolism against Modernism. Sentimental, urban, simple, the Argentine Evaristo Carriego (1883-1912) initiates in the extreme south another trek back to creolism.

Mexico's indisputable master today is Enrique González Martínez (1871-). From the beginning, his command of his own tradition, his discipline tempered in the translation of the French poets, above all his probity of spirit enabled him to preserve in new forms and navigate to his own port the permanent assets of Romanticism together with the aesthetic freedom of the Modernists. Form for him is never the direct objective. Virile thought, introspection without tortuousness, healthy and ready imagination, severe lyricism, a minimum of ostentation, and a pattern limned by the necessity of his subject, are his pledges against time. In him, as in the Platonic figure, beauty and good fuse in a higher harmony.

In a word, the pleiade of poets I have briefly evoked made a conquest: liberty. It brought to America all the tendencies, all the techniques, and naturalized here the spirit of the world. After these poets, no accent and no capacity will be missing. Federico de Onís in his splendid anthology of Hispano-American poets names in the reaction to lyric simplicity the Argentine Rafael Alberto Arrieta (1889-); in the classical reaction the Argentine Enrique Banchs (1888-) and the Mexican Alfonso Reyes (1889-); in the romantic reaction the Argentine Arturo Capdevila (1889-) and the Uruguayan Carlos Sabat Erasty (1887-). The Argentine Fernández Moreno (1886-) is the poet of the everyday event; he approaches the new Creole school of the Uruguayan Fernán Silva Valdés (1887-) and the Mexican Ramón López Velarde (1889-). The art of this poet, influenced by Lugones and Francis Jammes, both complex and subtly "small-town," is the object of deep study by the younger critics; one poem brought him fame: "La Suave Patria." The latest ships come laden with social unrest, a political poetry of redemption strangely mixed with new aesthetic forms and pure experiments in prosody. American poetry breaks once for all with the Graeco-Roman metaphor in the outstanding poet of youth, the Chilean Pablo Neruda.

We will close this review with a glance at the modern women poets of our America: the bitter and spirited Uruguayan Delmira Agustini (1890-1914); the Uruguayan Juana de Ibarbourou (1895-) whose work is strong of sap and fruitful; latest of the three Juanas of America Hispana, she evolves to an ever more dense religious expression which her great predecessor, Sor Juana de Inés of Mexico, would have understood. The Argentine Alfonsina Storni (1892-1939) is a cerebral, hyper-aesthetic metropolitan devoured by her armored city. The Chilean Gabriela Mistral (1889-) is a genius in both verse and prose; mountainous and potent, her "inward mansions" are whipped by Andean tempests akin to the spiritual storms that shook the coarse strong flesh of Santa Teresa. Mistral is the author of the best poem inspired by the Mexican revolution: "El Recado á Lolita Arriaga."

... I yield to another the enviable privilege of discussing the younger poets, among whom are some of my strongest friendships and firmest admirations.

U. S. S. Jezebel

WITH an almost palpable, yet instantaneous, clang, the sun left the sea and dominated the disinterested heaven. There seemed to be no interval between that event and the assertion of itself upon the poopdeck of what at first appeared to be a solid marmoreal column and was then revealed as a line of clean, laundered, shining, liberty-bound gobs. Out of fifty individual souls emboned and bemusled in disciplined flesh, the relentless routine of the fleet had created one of those ordered masses which men call crews, to itself seeming a microcosmal society more intense and architectonic than the jaundiced union of the family, and to others as formidable in its moments of unanimity as the organized mass of atoms and the electric wave which combine to form an exploding cannon. The sun, now nearing the zenith, toward which it had deliberately insinuated its way through one of these interminable but zodiacal sentences, struck the crew of the Jezebel; and the crew, with a contemptuous immobility no less deadly than one of Seaman Snitkin's left jabs, struck right back. The sun was seen to falter: Even to sink a little. Viewing this phenomenon, Captain McCullers regarded his men with tacit congratulation. Shoreside, aquiver in the halted sunbeams, Goa awaited the visit of the eager liberty-party with a more than bridal alarm.

Focusing the crew's swelling urgency on himself, Captain McCullers shouted:

"Ahoy!"

At once the crew reached into its collective pants. Flashing, there was deployed before that chryselephantine slab a feral arsenal. The Captain's golden eyes inspected, in arrogant stillness, the improvised but nonetheless menacing matériel. A home-made submachine-gun . . . a rapier whittled down from a turbine-shaft . . . a Focke-Wulf Kurier bomber swinging from the hands of three huge Potato-peeler's Minders . . . poisoned belaying-pins . . . a beer-can of vitriol, poised delicately on the pinkie of the Midshipman, Little Billee . . . and two enormous and gleaming cojones belonging to the Mate, Franco. McCullers admitted into his gaze no hint of approval, but turned slowly away toward the Shuffleboard Turret, throwing over his shoulder the single command.

"Avast!"

With the inflexible devotion of years of self-sacrifice he leveled his shuffleboard upon the now almost permanently paralyzed sun. It was noon. The liberty-party was already swimming towards Goa. Here and there appeared an ominous but graceful swirl in the water; once there was a muffled curse. Minutes later, when the gobs climbed leisurely out upon the adipose and bananoid shore, one straggler could be discerned loitering in the harbor and slowly tearing an unwarly shark to pieces. As they entered the main street of the doomed town, he joined them swinging in one hand a sharp metallic fin. Then the first shriek rose from the inhabitants.

Aware of the mounting torrent of shouts, curses, shots, orgasms, and death-rattles which marked the progress of his crew, the Captain's spirit faltered. He turned to face that comrade which somehow embodied all the suffering and nobility of the Jezebel.

The ship's cat, Lupescu, unwinkingly regarded him from the top of a brass bunion on the forecastle. With a Medea-like intensity, she was endeavoring to hypnotize McCullers into remembering that it was time for luncheon. He felt a warm surge of something deeper than friendship possess his soul. It was, he realized, hunger. He ejaculated:

"Chow!"

Liverwards, Lupescu delicately followed him to the galley.

His inanition satiated, the Captain glanced ashore. The town was burning nicely, and the screams of the populace were dying away. The crew, he noted, was swimming back to the Jezebel. Here and there a terrified octopus rose high in the air, grotesquely like a turnip-ghost in ballet-skirts as it strove to escape the grip of a passing Steward. The Captain turned to Lupescu, once more inviolate upon her bunion, and for a timeless moment looked unspoken intimacy into her eyes.

They were bent, he observed, upon the liberty-party: And had in them a: Hint of sur: Prise! Turning, he contemplated those precious segments of his personality. A half-defined figure seemed to play about their ranks, melting and reforming as if in the effort to achieve its avatar. It was like the ghost of a dead seaman, or the wraith of one unborn. Yellowly, it met McCullers's gaze, and shrank into a near invisibility again. The Captain indignantly howled:

"Who the hell are you?"

The figure drew itself together into a profound and determined effort. Slowly, like a photographic plate which defines its image as much by its own force as by the corrosion of its collaborious acid, the man took shape—the hat slouched scornfully over one eye, the tight-lipped grin, the bloodshot pupils beneath no eyebrows, and the degenerate nobility implicit in every muscle. In one hand he bore a corncob thing, doubtless a pipe. He said:

"Mr. Faulkner sent me. He said you'd make a sailor out of me. My name's Popeye!"

And, as in proof, he displayed the heraldic symbol borne in his other hand, the mystic emblem which paralleled and complemented his corncob. It was a bunch of rich, flourishing, baroque spinach.

GILBERT HIGHET

Science and Society

THE SOCIAL RELATIONS OF SCIENCE. By J. G. Crowther. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

PERHAPS no major activity in the United States gets less public attention than science. Reams may be written in the press on some political speech of doubtful value. Yet a few lines suffice to announce a new infra-red detector for airplanes. The inventor's name is lost in anonymity, in contrast to the double-case type used for a flyer's personal opinion. Editorial ignorance of what is news therefore makes it impossible to judge the influence of science on the national well-being.

In the book under review the author, who has followed science for many years in many countries, places this form of endeavor in relation to the social and economic setting in which it exists. He does not fall into the fallacy of thinking that science is a phenomenon of the past two hundred years, but covers its various manifestations from the origin of man. In the first parts of the book he has been obliged to lean heavily on the anthropologist's conjectures and evidence of primitive man's behavior. But the conciseness of the writing presupposes a whittling away of the irrelevant. The bold picture left is more than satisfying.

Nowhere else have I had the pleasure of reading so complete a description of the Moslem contributions to modern science. The other periods of science are also dealt with competently. All this, however, would not necessarily make a remarkable book, which this one is. The decisive factor lies in the author's ability to show the interrelation of the science of a period with its economic background.

"Ambitious and able slaves were preoccupied with the acquisition of freedom and the conveyance of manual tasks to inferior slaves. The preoccupation with status was inimical to the objective study of manual processes and the phenomena of nature. This influence was one of the causes of the decline of science in Roman society." These words might well be written of certain branches of science today. The mind of the worker in the biological sciences is much more preoccupied with status than is that of the worker in the physical sciences, and this is one of the reasons why these branches are not moving at comparable rates. Concern over status also has another intrinsic drawback. Once status is attained, it has to be defended and in many cases leads away from science to the personal. Another feature of acquired status which is today creating difficulties similar to those in Roman society is that the contact with the experimental material itself is frequently left to inferior slaves (read technicians). Some of our best minds are now trying to solve this problem.

The tournaments of mathematics held under the King of Sicily in 1225 led to many advances in mathematical theory. Today such occasions are called meetings of the Mathematical Society, but it is not difficult to detect the tournament spirit.

One of the most startling descriptions in the book, and a real contribution, is the explanation of the loss of definite positive achievements through the centuries. It seems inconceivable to us that such things as the radio or immunization to disease could be lost; yet other things of just as much significance have been lost. Owing to the fact that the Greeks were separated from their slaves, they did not get a complete conception of the use of the lever. The slaves, on their side, without any theoretical knowledge, applied the forces to the lever where they did the most good; but the lack of contact between slave and master, practice and theory, effectively prevented these applications from being recorded in the writings of the Greeks. The destruction of the Greek labor system, coupled with the respect of the conquerors for the Greek writings, led to inefficient use of the lever; and the escapement principle, on which so much modern engineering depends, had to be rediscovered hundreds of years later. As each civilization has gone down, many of its achievements have disappeared with it, perhaps for centuries, perhaps forever.

Perhaps no more timely topic can be found than the section dealing with the rise of the Moslem empire. It was predicated on the invention of the saddle and the stirrup. With these two mechanical advances, the Moslem soldier was able to move faster than his enemy and fight from above him. Mobility then played as important a part as it does today. Mahomet and his followers seized upon the new invention before its use became widespread.

It is impossible to mention even a small fraction of the scientific achievements that Mr. Crowther has put in a new light. It is enough to say that he has written a remarkable description of the interaction of science and society through the ages.

The South

THE MIND OF THE SOUTH. By W. J. Cash. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.75.

"THE Congo is not more different from Massachusetts or Kansas or California," than Alabama, said Mr. Carl Carmer, himself a native of New York State and a Southerner by adoption. That is a hyperbole, according to Mr. Cash who is a native of South Carolina and long a citizen of the most "progressive" of Southern states, North Carolina. It should not be forgotten, moreover, that Alabama is almost as different from North Carolina or Virginia.

"Nevertheless," writes Mr. Cash in what he calls a Preview to Understanding, "if it can be said that there are many Souths, the fact remains that there is also one South." Furthermore, although fundamentally it derives from the common American heritage—"To imagine it existing outside this continent would be quite impossible"—"the peculiar history of the South has so greatly modified it from the general American norm that, when viewed as a whole, it decisively justifies the notion that the country is—not quite a nation within a nation, but the next thing to it."

To understand the mind of the South as such Mr. Cash feels it is necessary to understand this peculiar history, and a large proportion of his book is taken up with a sort of meditative sociological retrospect. From this it is fairly apparent that the "one South" (as Mr. Cash implies but does not clearly state, although he calls one of his chapters Of the Frontier the Yankee Made) is the creation of the North. Neither before nor during the War of Secession was the South truly united, and this was a not negligible factor in the defeat of the Confederacy. It took the sufferings of Reconstruction and after to unite the South to such an extent that it is still "solid," still refers to that war as "the" war, has only lately begun to criticize itself, and still cannot stand criticism by an outsider. The report of President Roosevelt's special committee a year or two ago, though in some ways it might be interpreted as a far greater criticism of the economically dominant sections of the country, was widely resented even by Southern intellectuals.

That is because, as Mr. Cash shows, there is one South also in the sense that both the Old South and the New South are legends, springing from the same necessity, that of affirming the difference and self-sufficiency of the South; so that the paradox of believing at the same time that the South is entirely different from the rest of the country and yet just as up-to-date, progressive, and "American" gives very few Southerners pause. The first Southern intellectuals to see through the legend of the New South, the Agrarians, fell back upon the legend of the Old in a modified form. In doing this, however, they were not taking a unique line, but following the same pattern as some of our Neo-Thomists or some of the English intellectuals who have recoiled from the ruins left by the collapse of capitalist expansion to take refuge among the early Tudors or the late Whigs. Some of the intellectuals, Mr. Cash points out, showed, on the other hand, "a marked tendency to react to a new extreme, and as they sloughed off the old imperative to use their writings as a vehicle for glorifying and defending Dixie, to take more or less actively to hating and denouncing the South." As examples he cites Thomas Wolfe, Erskine Caldwell, and, a little more dubiously, William Faulkner. But here again the Southern writers are exemplifying a national, perhaps an international tendency of the period between two wars, as Van Wyck Brooks has explained in a recent article in the Saturday Review of Literature, drawn from his new book "On American Literature." "I think our generation," says Mr. Brooks, "will be remembered as the one in which everyone hated, often without visible reason, the town in which he was born." Indeed, some of the most conspicuous characteristics of the Southern mind, such as its individualism and its rhetorical cast, might be viewed as intensifications of tendencies predominant in the American mind as a whole, and common in some degree to all peoples nurtured in a parliamentary and democratic tradition. (For the South is democratic as well as Democratic.)

In short, though to Northerners this is a truism and to many Southerners treason, what makes the mind of the South different is that it thinks it is. Even the influence of the Negro problem is one of degree and not of kind. From this Mr. Cash excepts Virginia, which, on account of its unique history, its priority on the scene, and other factors, he believes really achieved what the rest of the South only aspired to. To everyone except dialectical materialists, however, this constitutes as valid a difference as any, in fact a difference of utmost reality and importance. To explain why the South thinks it is different is the object of Mr. Cash's study. Of the actual mind of the South he says comparatively little. This is a sociological rather than a psychological or intellectual examination, and it is largely historical. There is very little in it which has not been recounted many times before; but the emphasis and purpose are new. It will doubtless be an aid to an understanding on the part of Americans of other regions who have been alternately charmed and maddened, and always puzzled, by the apparent paradoxes and inconsistencies of the Southern viewpoint. It might have been more interesting for those who know the South if it had been written from a greater distance. Mr. Cash sometimes seems to be confused by the trees. As a Southerner himself he deprecates plain-speaking and takes his time to convey a conclusion. In the matter of style he often carries individualism to the point of quaintness, and rhetoric to the point of Carlylese. But these are minor blemishes of a thoughtful and knowledgeable book.

The Lins in China

DAWN OVER CHUNGKING. By Adet, Anor, and Meimei Lin. The John Day Company. $2.

THE daughters Lin belong to the young China of dreams and desires, and of faith that these can be realized through struggle: a China ready to fight for old values and for new ones it hopes to create. Sensitive and conscientious in their patriotism, they naturally wanted to return and assume part of the burden in the epic battle for independence. While China "suffered and fought," writes Adet Lin, "we were leisurely enjoying ourselves and traveling around foreign lands." But last year Pater Lin Yutang visited Chungking to see how the war was and he took his family with him. His daughters got the longed-for opportunity to see and hear and smell the phenomenon and at times to feel its touch.

Out of their experience the younger Lins have now produced this exciting account of life and death in and around the Chinese capital. Passages written by Anor and Meimei, ages fourteen and ten, deal with the hectic adventures of their daily lives and give you an idea of the young mind's reaction to being bombed. They report with charm and an inherited talent for observing the significant. Their elfish wit will bring many a chuckle to adult readers. Consider Anor's air-raid stories:

There was one baker who did not get to the dugout and suddenly a bomb dropped beside him. Before it had time to explode, he pressed the dough he was mixing on it, and suffocated it so that it did not explode.

There was a family consisting of a father, a wife, a concubine and a precious son of four months. Suddenly bombs began to fall. The concubine, being bright and quick, laid the child, the most precious one, on the floor; the husband, being second important, was told to lie on top of it, the concubine, thinking herself more important than the wife, piled on the husband, and the wife was told to cover the concubine with her own body. The result was that the wife got a little hurt; a piece of her flesh was blown off, she was on top, but the concubine, the husband, and the baby were all safe, and the baby was not suffocated or crushed!

But it is Adet, the eldest daughter and now seventeen, who writes the largest and most informative part of the book. In some of her pages you forget, almost, that you are reading a children's report. Here and there are remarks that penetrate into the universal problems of our day. Frequently descriptions are vivid and somehow very accurate. For example, this reaction to a ruined street in Peipei, just after a bombing:

In that upper space where birds could fly through now there had been a second floor and people slept on it. But now how could people sleep in that space? It seemed our sight suddenly had quickened; usually one would see after a period of a hundred years little pieces of wall crumble down and the beams rot gradually, so that the change was hardly noticeable. And now it was like a man who had been imprisoned for thirty years and come out to step into a different world and to see his sons already growing beards.

For that is bombing: it is an outrage against gradualness; like a catastrophe, it is a violation of evolution. It shortens adolescence, turns youth to middle age in a single night, and disorganizes or obliterates time.

Adet ends up on a note of political faith which reflects the heroic creed she believes now firmly unites all China:

Ever since the revolution, nearly thirty years ago now, there was a dream of China as an independent country. . . . And yet in these thirty years the dream was never accomplished. . . . Many had died for it while the people kept on being trampled under the heels of the landlords and the nation kept on being humiliated. And now the moment had come at last. A China united and fighting against the enemy, and meanwhile a new nation of order was building itself up . . . a nation like a scientist caught by an idea. When a nation of people is caught by a dream, you can imagine how formidable it is!

And the dream, she concludes, must come true. Bombs may kill and destroy men and the things they build, but they cannot kill the idea and the purpose to which both the men and the things are dedicated.

EDGAR SNOW

Land of the Free

LANDSCAPE OF FREEDOM. By Mauritz A. Hallgren. Howell, Soskin and Company. $3.50.

IT TAKES Mr. Hallgren more than four hundred large pages to tell the story of personal liberty in the United States, from the beginnings of Colonial history to our own day and hour. In the course of it he also manages to cover the public attitude at various periods in our history toward politics, religion, and sex; manners and morals, with many interesting facts on eating and drinking; the state of culture, including music, letters, and the arts; and our slow but sure progress toward the daily bath. And he does it with gusto.

For it is clear that, even allowing Mr. Hallgren a little pardonable exaggeration now and then when he gets really warmed up to his subject, we Americans are the most violent, volatile, wild-cattinest, obstreperous folks that ever swung all the way out on one side of a pendulum just for the fun of swinging all the way back on the other. We may laugh at the spectacle of Americans in search of freedom or we may weep. Mr. Hallgren, like a good historian, does very little of either. He merely tells his story.

Let us remember, for example, that those who fled the Old World in search of freedom of worship established on these shores as rigid a system of doctrine as the world had yet seen and as firm a control of manners and behavior. Let us remember that no sooner was liberty fought for and won than the Alien and Sedition laws were passed to check it. Salem witchcraft flourished and was done penance for at the end of the seventeenth century; but in the eighteen-forties, two little girls of Hydesville, New York, learned that they could produce spirit tappings by pressing their toes to the end of their bed, and as a result a wave of spiritualism swept the country.

In our comparatively short but stormy history labor has won the right to strike, picket, and negotiate; the grip of the church on the minds and morals of the people has been loosened; humane letters has recovered a little from the foaming fanaticism of comstockery; women have the suffrage, may own property, and in most places can walk out on the street in pants without being arrested. But let us not congratulate ourselves on our libertarian triumphs. Mr. Hallgren tells the shocking story of anti-German persecution in 1917, when, before books were burned in the Third Reich, German books, magazines, and pamphlets were burned in various communities in the United States. He reviews the red raids that followed the war, when the Postmaster General and the Attorney General of the United States forgot that they were holding office in a democracy. And latest and most shameful of all, he reminds us of the excesses of national prohibition, when a law was defied by millions of otherwise law-abiding citizens, and completely unlawful attempts were made by the authorities to enforce it.

An American may very well finish Mr. Hallgren's book in a chastened mood. Perhaps after more than three hundred years of living in the land of the free, all we have done in the direction of achieving the good life is to abolish the spittoon.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Recollections of Freud

FROM THIRTY YEARS WITH FREUD. By Theodor Reik. Translated by R. Winston. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THIS is a collection of papers which have previously been published elsewhere, in full or in part. The layman might find them not too enlightening, while the professional psychoanalyst is supposed to be acquainted with the data offered. One might regret that Reik did not follow through his intention of giving us an intimate portrait of Freud's scientific personality. Evidently the time is not ripe for a true appraisal of Freud as a person and a leader; his death is of too recent date and the times are so turbulent that his pupils, who knew him best, are scattered all over the world as expatriates, refugees whose historical perspective is naturally marred by the vicissitudes of their new situation and environment. Under such circumstances it is quite natural that too much of the personal element has entered into what should have been an objective appraisal of a scientific discipline and of its founder.

The translator of the book did Reik a disservice. Reik is not as obscure as some awkward turns of phrase would suggest. One cannot call Dostoevski a "poet" nor very well denote obscure phenomena as "dark"; nor do such expressions as "psychic perception" mean what Reik intends to say.

As a document the book has interest, since it does reflect the psychological difficulties which the uprooted European scientists of today have to meet.

GREGORY ZILBOORG, M. D.

IN BRIEF

JOB'S HOUSE. By Caroline Slade. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

As in her previous novel, "The Triumph of Willie Pond," Mrs. Slade presents some graphic, almost gruesome annals of the poor, and of their treatment at the hands of the public relief agencies, "The Welfares." Old Jobie Mann, unemployed but sturdy and independent at sixty-eight, puts up with as much of their prying as he and his wife can stand; then he decides to renounce an old-age pension and retain his self-respect. "Job's House," however, unlike the tragic story of the Pond family, never shakes off the artificial stiffness of a demonstration case, constructed to illustrate the functioning of some state agencies and the reasons why "clients" are not always in a receptive mood.

MATCHING YOUTH AND JOBS.

By Howard M. Bell. American Council on Education. $2.

Mr. Bell either does not realize, or he glosses over, the deeper implications of his problem, with the result that the reader is lost in a mere chaos of "facts" and "cases." As an auxiliary manual for people who are actively dealing with unemployment this book might have its uses. But the average person, wishing to gain a clearer understanding of the situation, will find it bewildering.

AMERICA'S LOST PLAYS. "The Last Duel in Spain and Other Plays." By John Howard Payne. Edited by Codman Hislop and W. R. Richardson. "The Great Diamond Robbery and Other Recent Melodramas." Edited by Garrett H. Leverton. "Five Plays" by Charles Hoyt. Edited by Douglas L. Hunt. Princeton University Press. $5 each.

Three more in the projected twenty-volume series of hitherto unpublished American plays. Admittedly, most of the works included have little literary merit but many have at least curious interest of one sort or another. The volume of melodramas includes two—"From Rags to Riches" (1903) and "No Mother to Guide Her" (1905)—whose titles have become bywords. From the Hoyt volume it is astonishing to learn that plays as famous as these have never previously been printed. "A Trip to China Town" (1891) was performed 657 consecutive times and held a record until the production of "Lightnin'." From it came two songs which many still remember—"Reuben, Reuben, I've Been Thinking" and "The Bowery." "After the Ball," though written by Charles K. Harris, also appeared in this farce.

WHAT'S PAST IS PROLOGUE. Reflections on My Industrial Experience.

By Mary Barnett Gilson. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Miss Gilson is a pioneer in scientific industrial employment management. She early realized where her work lay, and the story of her life falls into two parts, which make one—the preparation for her career in industry and the career itself up to the present stock-taking. The real purpose of this book is to make a contribution to social history and, as such, its primary appeal is to sociologists. Nevertheless, it has also general interest as the autobiography of a wise and sympathetic woman.

DRAMA

Minority Report

"NATIVE SON," the successful novel by Richard Wright, has been made into a play by Paul Green and produced—very fancily—by Orson Welles at the St. James Theater. The reception by the press was not only favorable but in most instances wildly enthusiastic and it is therefore only fitting for me to warn my readers that mine is a minority report. My colleagues made free use of such words as "smashing," "brutal," and "violent." I recognize the suitability of the adjectives but their persistent occurrence is really the only thing which enables me to believe that the performance I saw is the one which most of the other reporters were talking about. And I will accept them only if "noisy" and "frantic" be added to the list, with "dull" figuring somewhere as an indication of the final effect.

When I read "Native Son," the novel, some months ago I found it undeniably impressive despite the bald, graceless, and plodding style. Its resemblance in theme, structure, and general manner to Dreiser's "An American Tragedy" is almost too striking, but like Dreiser the author manages to make his lumbering matter-of-factness carry conviction. Unfortunately, however, such books do not lend themselves easily to dramatization and if the text of the present play were to be examined I am sure that it would be found to be very little more than a skeleton outline from which much had been omitted and to which nothing capable of increasing the effectiveness of the presentation had been added. Certainly one result is to separate rather than further to integrate the two elements of the novel—crude melodrama and social preachment—so that most of the second element is held in reserve for the last two scenes which come after the action is concluded and provide a positively stupefying anticlimax in two parts. As for the courtroom scene, it is not long enough to become impressive through the weight of detail and not pointed enough to gain in dramatic effectiveness what it loses in bulk. All in all I do not see how it can possibly be denied that the text of the play, considered merely as a text, is a pretty poor substitute for that of the novel.

Obviously this is where the producer is supposed to step in and provide, by means of "the new stagecraft," purely theatrical effects calculated to make up for the sketchiness of the play itself. And Mr. Welles evidently decided to shoot the works, for everything is determinedly "different" whether the strangeness has anything except strangeness to recommend it or not. For one thing, a sort of inverted proscenium consisting of a brick wall reduces the width of the stage and elevates the acting platform several feet above the usual stage level so that much of the action takes place in a confined space, and can only be watched if one tilts the head at a very uncomfortable angle. For another, a large proportion of the scenes take place in a semi-obscurity which calls to mind the masterly device inadvertently achieved by the movie director in "Once in a Lifetime." And for still another, the members of the audience are given, upon entering, a slip of paper which informs them that they cannot have a program until after the performance is over—the idea apparently being that to study the cast of characters might break the subtle spell of a production which is certainly the noisiest since "Hellzapoppin'." And when the novel devices do have a recognizable purpose, that purpose seems always some sort of mere harassment of the nerves as, for example, in the big scene where the hero shooting it out with the officers of the law blazes away point-blank at the audience while police whistles shrill away at the back of the auditorium.

In so far as such scenes may be described as effective I do not think the effects are worth achieving. An audience may be reached legitimately through its intellect or through its emotions. It may also be stirred through a simple assault upon the nerves and I am beginning to wonder whether the so-called new stagecraft ever succeeds in promoting anything except the simple jitters. Of course any normal person will emerge with frayed nerves from an evening during which he has been yelled at by assorted performers, shot at from the stage, and kept on edge during what might have been the merciful peace of the brief pauses between scenes, by hideous noises which rumble and roar from under the stage. But—and I use the phrase in all seriousness—is it art? Might not one achieve the same effect by spending an evening in what used to be called, with grim irony, "The Fun House" at Coney Island?

A few weeks ago the New Yorker published a picture of an elaborate torture chamber in which a victim tied to a chair was being subjected to an inferno of radios, electric signs, insurance agents, and automobile salesmen all working on him at once. "We are," said the calm scientist in charge, "merely trying to determine the limit of human endurance." I do not forget that I have admired some of Mr. Welles's productions in the past, but I am beginning to wonder if his ultimate goal isn't the same as that of the New Yorker's grim experimenter.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

THE title "From Austin High Comes Jazz" for Columbia's album (C-40, $2.50) of performances by Bud Freeman and His Famous Chicagoans represents a claim for the performances in the unauthoritative accompanying story by John Hammond. The story is that the group of young musicians identified with Austin High School in Chicago—whom Hammond gives as Freeman, Dave Tough, Eddie Condon, Frank Teschemaker, and Benny Goodman—developed a "Chicago style" of ensemble performance which they used "in a way which has never since been duplicated"; and that these new records allow us to hear again "that unparalleled spirit which was lost when these musicians succumbed to economic temptation and necessity and joined big bands"—and this although Freeman, Condon, and Tough play on these records with musicians who were not members of the Austin group: presumably the Austiners have imparted their style and spirit to the others, as Hammond tells us they did to Jack Teagarden in the late 'twenties. But the fact is that even in Chicago the style and spirit were not the exclusive possessions of the Austiners—that other musicians played that way and as well; and one might add that Condon and Goodman were in fact not members of the Austin group but were among the other musicians, along with Muggsy Spanier, Gene Krupa, Jess Stacy, Joe Sullivan, who occasionally played with the Austiners; but since Hammond puts Goodman among the original Austin group one might ask why Goodman is not on these new records: Beiderbecke and Teschemaker, explains Hammond, are dead; but Goodman is alive. Moreover, the style was carried to other cities and absorbed by other musicians (Teagarden was only one). And aside from whether it could be said to have been lost as long as any of these musicians continued to play that way, as they did privately and in recording studios even when they played in big bands publicly (and not all of them took such jobs), the fact is that the new Freeman records were preceded a year ago by the even more brilliant Muggsy Spanier performances on Bluebird—to say nothing of other records in the past ten years. They are, then, to be taken merely as additional examples of the style, some of them—"At the Jazz Band Ball" (35853), "Jack Hits the Road" and "That Da-Da Strain" (35854), "Forty-Seventh and State" (35855), "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble" (35856)—with exciting ensembles and fine solos.

As it happens, Columbia itself has reissued a 1935 Chicago style performance of "The Land of Dreams" by Paul Mares and his Friars Society Orchestra (35880)—not one of the best ever, but with the characteristic driving ensembles and good solos by Stacy at the piano, Pecora on trombone, and Mares on cornet. It is clouded somewhat by poor recording, as is "Nagasaki" on the reverse side. Other Columbia reissues of hot jazz classics include one that is a classic—the superb Louis Armstrong "Mahogany Hall Stomp" (35879), with the less good "Beau Koo Jack" on the reverse side, and an album (C-41, $2.50) of Earl Hines's piano-playing. "Basic Negro simplicity" is one of the Hammond stock of ideas—regardless-of-fact—in this instance the fact of occasional Negro complexity and ornateness, and in particular Hines's exhausting intricacy in the six 1928 solo improvisations in this album. I find that I can take it only in the slow ones, "I Ain't Got Nobody" (35875) and "Caution Blues" (35876). On the fourth record (35878) are two band performances—"Rosetta," with a good Hines chorus, and "Deep Forest," which I find uninteresting.

As it happens also, Commodore has issued two records made by Eddie Condon and a group that includes several other Chicagoans, with excellent performances of "Pretty Doll" and "Oh, Sister Ain't That Hot" (535), and "Georgia Grind" and "Dancing Fool" (536). And Commodore 534 offers piano solos by Joe Bushkin—"In a Little Spanish Town" and Bushkin's own "Blue Chips," both beautifully sensitive but harmonically too lush for my taste. I prefer to hear Bushkin, as I do Hines, play in bands, where the tendency to luxuriance is restrained somewhat.

As for other new records, I am not one of those who can hear the fairies that were in the studio when Benny Goodman recorded; all I can hear is what is on the records, whether this is stiff, cold playing of Mozart, or jazz as poor as Goodman has recorded for many years, or on the other hand the almost unique "My Honey's Lovin' Arms" that Victor has reissued on Bluebird 11056, and now, after the most recent rubbish, "As Long As I Live" (Columbia 35901), which pretends to nothing more than the usual series of variations on a tune, and which Goodman, Cootie Williams, Basie, and others of the Sextet play simply, subtly, and exquisitely. (My copy has a bad rattle due to faulty recording or processing.) Another example of this style, but not quite as good, is the Sextet's "On the Alamo" (Columbia 35938). And Ellington, also using a small group, provides a fine example in the Rext Stewart "Linger Awhile" (Bluebird 11057). Other things I have enjoyed are Ellington's early "Jubilee Stomp" and the parts of his recent "Country Gal" without Cootie Williams's growling (Columbia 35776); "Dicky Wells Blues" and "Bill Coleman Blues" (Victor 27318); Mildred Bailey's "There'll Be Some Changes Made," with Mary Lou Williams at the piano, and "Rockin' Chair," both issued originally on Vocalion (Columbia 35943); the new Teddy Wilson Orchestra's "I Never Knew" (Columbia 35905); the Hot Lips Page Trio's "Do It If You Wanna" (Bluebird 8634); the Crosby Bobcats' playing in parts of "Take Me Back Again" and "I'll Come Back to You" (Decca 3576); and Ethel Waters's singing of "Georgia on My Mind" (Bluebird 11028).

Survey of Two Worlds

Dear Sirs: If I had the choice between the world of Adolf Hitler and the world of Freda Kirchwey, I should certainly not choose hers.

GEORGE SYLVESTER VIERECK

New York, March 27

Father Gillis Protests

Dear Sirs: In your issue of March 22, Mr. Herbert Agar calls me an "appeaser." Since that word has come to have a nasty connotation of cowardice, I feel that Mr. Agar should have favored his readers with at least a definition, if not a justification, of the term as applied to me.

Further, he accuses me, amongst others, of being "partly motivated by the ancient undying grievances of the Irish." But "who knoweth the mind of a man save the spirit of man that is in him?" I have examined my conscience in regard to my motive for opposing the entrance of America, my own country, into the war. I have found in myself no race prejudice or animosity. Has Mr. Agar been able to dig deeper into my soul than I myself?

Why should he not stick to facts and leave the matter of hidden motives to the Omniscient? And in his school of journalism is it considered honorable to fling an epithet in place of a fact or a proof?

JAMES M. GILLIS

Against Luce Thinking

Dear Sirs: Miss Kirchwey has already dealt with Mr. Luce's roomy essay on Americanism (which reminded me irresistibly of W. J. Cameron's Ford talks on the same subject) but there is more she might have said. To me the most irritating thing about the Life spread was the assumption in every line that this was America speaking through the mouth of its prophet—"I am Sir Oracle, and, when I ope my lips, let no dog bark."

Unlike Mr. Luce, I cannot speak for America, but by way of cordial example to the rest of the hundred-and-thirty million, here are my own war aims:

We all know what we are against. We do not all know, or rather are not all agreed, what we are for. I want Hitler beaten, yes. But I would not turn my hand over to beat him simply to preserve Chamberlainism in England or Luce-Cameronism in this country. "The American Ideal," "The American Century," "The American Way of Living"—I do not forget that for these and similar slogans we were asked to vote for Coolidge, Hoover, Landon, and Willkie by the same people who are now pushing them at us in order to whip up a war spirit. Well, I don't need my spirit whipped up; I'll fight, all right. But I am going to war against Hitler because he threatens to interrupt my war against Luce and Cameron—just when I was doing so well, too.

The glory of our kind of government is that it permits us to wage a continual fight against its abuses. I am not sure whether the thing we are fighting for is an "American" way of living or not, or whether the thing we are fighting for is an "American" century. But there is a tradition, an idiom which is native to this country and to me, and which I will fight to save. It was not created by these sloganmongers; they could never have made it, they do not share or express it, and they cannot replace it should it be lost. But neither have they been able to destroy it, and the Nazis might, so I am gunning for Hitler now, and I'll see Messrs. Luce and Cameron later.

U. S. Plan for Negroes?

Dear Sirs: As a Negro I was very much interested in your article, "The Nazi Plan for Negroes," by Hans Habe in the March 1 issue.

What struck me, however, was that the Nazi plan for Negroes approximates so closely what seems to be the American plan for Negroes. The principles listed by Mr. Habe are exactly those with which most Negroes are painfully familiar in this country. True, there are a few cases of comparative freedom for Negroes here, but there are so very few that they scarcely affect the truth of my statement.

The Nazi Negro policy seems to be the same as that of France, the British Empire, Belgium, Holland, Portugal, and the United States, except that Hitler wants, or plans, to use Negroes only in labor battalions (as most United States blacks were used in 1917-18), whereas the other white powers permit them to risk their lives in defense of those who despise them.

GEORGE S. SCHUYLER

New York, February 27

[What strikes us, on the other hand, is how a responsible Negro leader like Mr. Schuyler can permit himself to draw such dangerously misleading parallels. If the "American plan for Negroes" were anything like the Nazi plan, as described by Mr. Habe, Mr. Schuyler would be in no position to complain about it in American magazines, nor would any editor dare to publish his complaint. It seems too bad that the unquestioned ill treatment of Negroes in this country should drive men like Mr. Schuyler to equate it with a far greater evil instead of emphasizing the need to fight the race mania at home and abroad. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dear Sirs: As a Negro I am intensely interested in Hans Habe's "The Nazi Plan for Negroes." Mr. Habe's hint about a Nazi massacre of French Negro troops is boldly affirmed in a series of articles which are now appearing in the Negro Pittsburgh Courier. The Courier's European correspondent, R. Walter Merguson, a Negro long resident in France, asserts that more than a half million of France's black troops were murdered by the Nazis. "At no time in the history of the world have so many men, made in the Master's own image, been murdered in so short a time," says Mr. Merguson.

Where Mr. Habe hints that much of the blame is to be placed at the door of the Germans, Mr. Merguson frankly implicates the French for their insistence that Africans must fight au sauvage; that is, in hand-to-hand encounters with knives and pistols. French insistence on Negro savagery rebounded in an equally ferocious Nazi savagery.

Palestine's Army

Dear Sirs: It has been England's policy in Palestine to take into its armies the same number of Arabs and of Jews. The recruiting, so far as my information goes, has lagged. Yet, conservatively, there are at least 40,000 well-trained Jewish troops ready and eager to serve with England were they to be given the opportunity. Another 50,000 would answer the call in a moment. These figures do not include medical officers, women who want to serve in various capacities, etc. But England hesitates to call on them.

Certainly, the situation in Greece would seem to indicate a need for them. These several divisions could easily be dispatched to Northern Africa, which would, in turn, release experienced fighters for the more strenuous job which will confront the forces of democracy in Greece and Turkey.

Why are they not being used? Only England knows the answer.

Author's Lament

Dear Sirs: It appears that there is something much worse than a rejection slip and the cutting of vital passages from a manuscript. It is the plight of the author whose name has been put under passages he never wrote. Some time ago I was asked to write an article on Communism for the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia now in the process of publication. Upon receiving the proofs I found that changes and additions had been made in the text without my knowledge—changes affecting the tone of the article. Thus, to my passage about the "Jews among the extreme Left Socialists in Western Europe [who] invariably identified themselves with the nation in whose midst they lived and whose language they spoke" the editors added "They were also atheistic and irreligious, hence their hostility or indifference to Jewish religions or national survival." I immediately protested against interpolations or changes of this kind, involving a phraseology and an attitude which were alien to me. The promise of the editors to print my corrections was not kept, and as a result I decline any responsibility for this passage.

MAX NOMAD

Is It Revolution?

Dear Sirs: It was Emperor Nero's desire that all his enemies should have but a single neck. Perhaps similar wishful thinking led democratic journalism to accept the term totalitarianism, which dictators use to euphemize ruthless despotism. These dictatorships, although akin in their methods, differ as much as do the definitions of the term in the so-called totalitarian countries. In Germany totalitarianism is explained as "a form of government claiming to coordinate all spheres of national (voelkisch) life"; Mussolini defined it as "the co-ordination of individuals in their relation to the state." But no one doubted the revolutionary character of either the bolshevist or the fascist movement. I was therefore surprised to read in a book review by Hans Kohn (issue of March 15) that "fascism is not a revolutionary movement, but the first sustained and consistent effort to make all revolutions impossible." Now this is exactly what Hitler et consortes want us to believe. Both they and their appeasers insist that the rapacious despotism turned the revolution into new legal order, a form of government which is an equivalent alternative of democracy. According to Carlyle: "Revolution, like jelly sufficiently boiled, needs only to be poured into shapes of constitution and consolidated therein—could it, indeed, contrive to cool." Fascism is evidently still seething and boiling. Not even its effort "to make all revolutions impossible" is a discriminative mark of consolidation. So far all revolutions have done their utmost to foil any potential revolution or counter-revolution. As a rule, some Napoleon eventually creates a synthesis of the old order and the new disorder. However, it seems doubtful whether the present attempt to be a Robespierre and a Napoleon in one will have a lasting success.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Decision Is Impossible

Dear Sirs: After two careful readings of the article by Brooks Atkinson (issue of March 8) I get the impression that he has just begun the study of history. One who tries to pass judgment on the moral values of men, or of nations, certainly ought to take into consideration more than the events of the past ten years. Yet this decade is all with which Mr. Atkinson concerns himself; then he hands down a decision—a simple one indeed. Evidently he does not consider expediency or prudence or self-interest a sufficiently exalted standard by which to judge conduct. Nothing less than the absolutely good, the good in itself, will do for him. He is free to accept that standard if he wishes, but he might be embarrassed by the conclusions to which he would be led if he applied it impartially. To cap it all, he enlists Jesus Christ on his side. Wasn't he the man from Galilee who said something about loving your enemies?

If Mr. Atkinson read the review of "Ambassador Dodd's Diary" in the same issue of The Nation, he might have an inkling of how inadequate is his judgment of the respective merits of the warring powers. H. C. DEKKER

The Shape of Things

IN THE SPRING OF 1936 THE PROUD LEGIONS of the resurgent Roman Empire marched into Addis Ababa. Benito Mussolini's son wrote poetically of the beauties of bombing Ethiopians to bits; British statesmen mumbled something about sanctions, and piously washed their hands; the League of Nations wagged a finger and averted its gaze; the Lion of Judah, dignified and moving in exile, warned the statesmen of England and France that their turn would come; and a Fascist official in Rome explained languidly to a correspondent of The Nation: "Empires come and empires go, and Britain's day is done." Now, just five years later, the empire of the New Rome lies in shreds, the League of Nations is one with the dodo, the bumbling statesmen of London and Paris are gone with their wind, their cities attacked with more fury than Benito's son could ever visit on the towns of Ethiopia, and Addis Ababa makes ready for the homecoming of the prophetic Lion of Judah. To complete the irony, the representatives of the empire whose "day is done" are thanked by the Italian Viceroy of Ethiopia for their "protection of the women and children of Addis Ababa." By their conduct, adds the Duke of Aosta, the British demonstrate "that strong bonds of humanity and race still exist between our nations." These are not the words of a belligerent; they sound like the words of the Italian people, who never had the heart to kill and be killed to make an empire for a megalomaniac.

AT THE BACK OF ITALY'S DEFEATS THERE is an extraordinary "dry-rot" infecting every domestic institution, according to the reports of Savile R. Davis and John T. Whitaker, two American correspondents who have recently left Rome. This does not mean, however, that Italy is on the point of overthrowing Mussolini and suing for peace. That Hitler cannot allow, and he is rapidly replacing the deadwood of Italian fascism with graftings from his sturdier Nazi tree. This process was facilitated by the nervous paralysis which afflicted not only the country but Il Duce as the Italian armed forces sustained one blow after another. German infiltrations into the police and propaganda departments are particularly noticeable, Mr. Whitaker tells us in the New York Post, and one result is a drive to work up popular resentment against the United States with the argument that Italy would be enjoying the fruits of victory but for American interference. Mr. Davis, writing in the Christian Science Monitor, emphasizes the breakdown in military morale and organization. He confirms reports that the invasion of Greece was ordered against the advice of Marshal Badoglio and the general staff, who knew how ill-prepared the army was. But the fact that they were proved right did not save them: on the contrary, defeat was used by Farinacci and the pro-Nazi Fascists as a lever to force out the veteran commander-in-chief. Mr. Davis has an amazing story to tell about the utter failure of the supply organization in Albania. Regiments were sent into the bitterly cold mountains in summer clothing. Many were without arms or had weapons lacking essential parts and, while food piled up at the ports, the front lines had nothing to eat for days. Even more striking is his report on the boasted Italian air force which, he says, is fighting with out-of-date machines manned by half-trained pilots.

AN ADDITIONAL BURDEN ON SHIPPING WILL be imposed by the outbreak of war in the Balkans. If effective resistance is to be offered against the latest German drive, tremendous quantities of war materials will have to flow continuously to the Greek ports. The presence of German dive bombers in Sicily makes transportation through the Mediterranean precarious, while the long route around the Cape of Good Hope is time-consuming and thereby wasteful of shipping resources. British shipping losses for the last month have been at the rate of approximately 5,000,000 tons a year, or more than double the present capacity of British and American ship-building facilities. The $500,000,000 allocation from the lease-lend fund announced by President Roosevelt last week will make up part, but only part, of the deficiency. More immediate assistance is required. Use of the Danish vessels recently seized by the Coast Guard should be of minor aid. But the chief, and as yet unsolved, problem is that of cutting down the number of sinkings. This apparently can be achieved only by the use of a substantial number of the light naval vessels now attached to the United States Navy. We have a choice either of undertaking the hazardous task of convoying our own merchant ships or of releasing a number of destroyers and light cruisers to Britain. It is obvious that this decision cannot be long delayed.

ORGANIZED LABOR, PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, and the assorted government mediators and conciliators are all, in our opinion, being unfair, not to say unkind, to the press. The headline-makers, who often appear not to have read the stories beneath, no sooner get worked up over a strike or the threat of a strike that will undoubtedly "cripple" the defense program than a conciliator settles the dispute, or a union agrees not to interrupt production during negotiations, or the President says that the trouble will be settled within a day or two—and, what is even more inconsiderate, proves to be a good prophet. The horrendous coal strike materialized only faintly, in a week-end stoppage, followed by a union victory—which indicates that the union demands were not exactly subversive; the threat of a steel strike faded almost before the headlines were dry. The spectacle of the press on the end of a hysterical limb would be amusing if headlines were not so influential and if they were not so obviously motivated by a determination to brand labor as a fifth column, bent only on disrupting defense and persecuting innocent employers like Henry Ford. Labor is not perfect, and it is unquestionably taking advantage of its collective bargaining position; but it would be refreshing if for once the press admitted that employers have also been known to make hay while the defense sun shines. It is not labor's fault if it has to fight publicly for its gains, while employers haggle over contracts in quiet conferences that don't make "news."

ONCE AGAIN THE "GOOD NEIGHBOR" POLICY has been jeopardized by irresponsible Congressional action. Under pressure from sectional livestock interests great efforts are being made on Capitol Hill to forbid purchases for the armed forces of imported canned meat and wool. Two weeks ago there was a tied vote in the Senate on a motion to strike from the Navy Supply bill a House provision prohibiting the purchase of a small quantity of Argentine canned beef. The situation was saved only when Senator Russell of Georgia explained that his vote in favor of the deletion had been wrongly recorded. The House then voted into the Supplemental Defense Appropriation bill a provision proscribing the purchase of foreign food or clothing for the army unless such supplies were not produced in the United States or not produced in sufficient quantities. The Senate first approved this proposal but later agreed on a compromise offered by Senator Adams permitting the head of the department concerned to buy such articles from foreign sources if home supplies are insufficient, of unsatisfactory quality, or offered at unreasonable prices. It is a matter of record that canned beef is produced in this country in quantities quite insufficient to meet normal demands and that the Argentine product can be purchased far more cheaply, even allowing for the stiff tariff. Nor are we anywhere near self-supporting in the matter of raw wool. Indeed, the dangers of a serious shortage of this raw material have induced the Administration to build up a stock-pile from imported supplies. Thus, if Congress succeeds in barring the government from the use of foreign meat and wool, the result must be that the taxpayers will be charged higher prices. Even more serious is the rebuff to Argentina, most influential and least trustful of our Latin-American neighbors.

IMMEDIATE ATTENTION FOR MIGRATORY workers who are swarming to defense centers in search of jobs was urged last week by the special House committee appointed to study that problem. The report, unfortunately, received little attention in the press and so far has been completely disregarded by a Congress which seems to be concerned chiefly with throttling organized labor. Observers in Washington report that the welfare aspects of the defense program are in a state of utter confusion. The well-intentioned efforts of Charles P. Taft, Assistant Coordinator of Health and Welfare, have been thwarted by red tape and overlapping in the division of authority. As a result the situation in the defense centers is rapidly moving from bad to worse. Mr. Taft estimates that the total of the defense migrants may reach 5,000,000. Only a minority of these will obtain jobs, and all constitute a potential problem when the emergency ends. As a fundamental solution, the committee recommends the setting up of a fourth category of public assistance under the Social Security Act to care for non-settled persons. The establishment of such a scheme, unfortunately, would take at least a year. Meanwhile, Congress must deal with the growing problems of 1941.

THE CONVICTION OF THE AMERICAN Medical Association and the Medical Society of the District of Columbia for violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act may stand as a milestone in the struggle for a more satisfactory system of financing medical care. For years the organized power of the A. M. A. has blocked experimentation with methods for bringing adequate medical service within the reach of the low- and middle-income groups. The rank and file of physicians have been effectively kept from participation in new schemes by threats of blacklisting. Until recently it had been assumed that a progressive physician had no means of redress against these tactics. But the present conviction, coupled with the Supreme Court's recent decision holding that the medical profession conducts a "trade" within the meaning of the anti-trust law, provides a legal weapon for combatting A. M. A. pressure. It should also go far in wrecking its pretense of infallibility in matters regarding medical economics. The upholding of the conviction by the Supreme Court will probably be followed by a wave of new schemes for a more democratic and economical organization of medical service through the country.

THE CURRENT TIDE AGAINST EDUCATION, which has been running strong in all sections of the country, has wrought havoc in New York in recent weeks. Not content with a 2 per cent blanket cut in educational funds at the last session of the legislature, the Republican minority reduced the state appropriation for the schools by another $250,000 in the session just ended. Having taken this action on the plea of urgent economy, the legislature voted $247,000 for the notorious Rapp-Coudert investigating committee, with a view to effecting further "economies" in the schools. The legislature also adopted a Coudert bill directed against mentally unfit teachers, although rejecting Governor Lehman's plea for a $50,000,000 bond issue for erection of new state mental hygiene institutions. In New York City, Mayor La Guardia, probable candidate for reelection on the Republican ticket, eliminated 1,200 teaching and administrative positions from next year's education budget at an estimated savings of $2,500,000. The economies involve discontinuing the Townsend Harris High School, which has the highest standards of any high school in the city, and the abolition of the post of director of the Bureau of Children with Retarded Mental Development. Night schools, particularly of the secondary grade, also came in for drastic cuts. The restoration of day classes in English and citizenship, sought by the Board of Education, was refused. Some reduction in school budgets may be justified on the basis of the declining numbers of children in the elementary schools, but the attack on the progressive and specialized branches of education, particularly adult and citizenship training, is a disquieting sign of the times.

THE LAUNCHING OF A UNITED CHINA RELIEF drive coordinating the fund-raising activities of a half-dozen or more independent committees offers hope that China will at last get a measure of the aid it deserves from this country. Despite the existence of a number of hard-working committees, American assistance to date has been negligible as compared either with the need or with the aid given Britain or Greece. The new combined drive, headed by James G. Blaine, has as its goal the raising of $5,000,000 by July 31. Wendell Willkie, speaking at the dinner which inaugurated the campaign, declared that the Chinese have "withstood bombings the like of which not even the brave men of Britain have had to endure." He could have added that they have done so, as Mr. Stone pointed out last week, not only without aid from the Western world but in face of continued large-scale American assistance to Japan. The present campaign offers an opportunity for those of us who are ashamed of our equivocal policy in the Far East to do our bit to offset the effects of that policy. It will help to repair the human lives shattered by bombs carried to their destination by American gasoline. Five million dollars is very inadequate penance for the aid we have extended to Japan, but it is better than none.

Battle of the Balkans

BERLIN has already found it necessary to issue ■ warning that the situation in the Balkans is not favorable for a Blitzkrieg victory. The terrain hinders mechanized warfare. Both Greece and Yugoslavia are fully united and determined to resist to the bitter end; and the fact that circumstances have made surprise impossible means that Britain and its allies have had time to take counter-measures. But, even if Germany overcomes these handicaps and succeeds in its objective of driving the British into the sea, it will still have suffered a setback by being forced to fight to obtain complete ascendancy in southeastern Europe. For while Hitler is fighting the Battle of the Balkans he cannot exert his full strength in the Battle of Britain. Yet that remains the crucial front where he must conquer if he is to achieve final victory.

When the Nazis claim that their intentions in regard to the Balkan states have always been to encourage the maintenance of peace, they have spoken the truth, accepting their rather peculiar definition of such words as peace and neutrality. They wanted to maintain this region with its exportable surpluses of mineral and agricultural products as a supply depot safely removed from the hazards of war. They knew, too, that they could not move very far toward the southeast without stepping on Russian toes and thus endangering another important economic connection. How considerable this second risk is remains to be seen. But Moscow has felt obliged to exhibit its displeasure at German encroachments by rebuking Bulgaria, and by signing pacts of friendship with Turkey and Yugoslavia, the one threatened by Nazi aggression and the other actually experiencing it at the moment the Soviet gesture was made. These steps may be purely platonic, and Moscow, while condemning German actions on a moral plane, may condone them materially by continuing to supply the Luftwaffe with oil. After all, it has a pretty good precedent in this country's ambiguous attitude toward Japan.

There can be little doubt that all the Balkan states, whatever their sympathies or antipathies, were ready enough to accommodate themselves to Hitler's plans and remain neutral. They all agreed to expand deliveries to Germany and they all gave facilities to German agents and propaganda. Thus the Nazis might have gained their ends without military occupation of the Balkans apart from Rumania, had not Mussolini made his colossal blunder in attacking Greece. This move, dictated, no doubt, by jealousy of German successes and a desire to obtain a cheap victory, ranks among the worst miscalculations in history. For not only did Italy find that in invading Greece it had plunged its hand into a hornet's nest, but it provided Britain with an opportunity to establish naval ascendancy in the Mediterranean and to assume the offensive in North Africa.

As a result of the blows his partner had sustained, Hitler was obliged to revamp his plans and go to the rescue. Bulgaria capitulated easily enough and Germany then appeared perfectly placed to obtain from Yugoslavia what von Ribbentrop calls "close cooperation"—the unity of purpose that exists between a boa-constrictor and the rabbit it has hypnotized. But Yugoslavia, like Greece, turned out to be one of those unregenerate animals which, when attacked, defend themselves, and it refused to accept the role assigned to it.

So now Hitler finds himself compelled to fight on a battleground which is not of his own choosing. He has, to be sure, certain advantages. In order to supply and reinforce its army in Greece, Britain must rely on long and dangerous sea routes while the Germans enjoy interior lines of communication. On the other hand, the Nazi forces must depend on the inadequate and already overburdened railroad systems of Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia or else on the even more primitive highways of these countries. So far as numbers are concerned, the two sides are fairly evenly matched but Germany has certainly an edge as regards equipment. In the matter of mechanized weapons this handicap may not prove so serious for the allied armies: German superiority in the air is far more dangerous. In Albania the Italians never have been able to establish command of the skies, and many of their troubles stem from that fact. But the Nazis seem to have moved a very considerable part of their air power to the Balkans (the comparatively light raids on Britain in the last two weeks are significant), and they are evidently attempting to knock out their opponents' air forces at the start. If they are as successful in this effort as they were in Poland, they will have gone a long way toward winning the campaign.

One of the chief strategical disadvantages of the German army in this campaign is the precarious position of its Italian ally in Albania. Already one Yugoslav army has launched an attack on the Italian rear, and if the German onslaught at the head of the Struma valley and in eastern Yugoslavia can be checked for a short time, Mussolini's legions may be pushed into the Adriatic.

It is not possible, however, to discuss the strategy of the Balkan campaign without some reference to the situation in North Africa, where German reinforcement of the Italian army, now under the command of General Gariboldi, has recaptured Bengazi. This move may be intended chiefly to divert British attention from the Balkans, but it is clear that General Wavell cannot afford to strip this front of troops. However, hot weather and the water supply problem are likely to check Axis operations and meanwhile British victories in East Africa will probably free for service in Libya the Indian divisions who have borne the brunt of the fighting in Eritrea.

It will certainly be days, and it may be weeks, before it will be possible to discern how the fortunes of war are swaying on the vast new fronts which opened with the Nazi attack on Greece and Yugoslavia on Palm Sunday. If Hitler wins rapidly in this theater, he will be able to turn back to the Battle of Britain with a real chance of success. But if he is forced to fight along this line the whole summer, he will enter the third winter of war with his chances of victory shrunk to vanishing point.

Business International

THE settlement of the Allis-Chalmers strike is good news. It clears away what the President himself has termed the only serious stoppage in the defense program. It is too much to hope that a press intent on whipping up anti-labor hysteria will now desist from its efforts, but the truth will nevertheless begin to trickle through to the public. The Allis-Chalmers strike would never have occurred if the company involved had dealt fairly with a union which admittedly represents a majority of its employees. The strike would have been over a month ago if the company had joined the union in accepting the OPM formula for settlement, or if the OPM had at that time brought as much pressure on the company as it did on the union. The agreement on which work is now resumed is virtually the same as that offered a month ago by the OPM and accepted then by the union. Arbitration of grievances is provided, and some measure of contractual security against disruption is given the union. But the ending of the strike is a victory not for the OPM but for the new National Defense Mediation Board, which has again demonstrated the superiority of conciliation to coercion in labor disputes. The attempt of Knudsen and Knox to "order" the strikers back to work was a failure, as it should have been. They had no power to issue any such order and they certainly had no right to ask the union to give up its strike without at the same time asking the employer to make some comparable concessions. The Mediation Board on the contrary has obtained concessions for and from both sides. The Allis-Chalmers settlement adds another to its growing list of victories, and it demonstrates again that it is no mere strikebreaking agency but a medium through which both sides may draw some benefit from a peaceful settlement of disputes.

Knudsen's attempt to break the Allis-Chalmers strike and the speech he made on the eve of its settlement add to the evidence of his partiality in dealing with labor. "The Conciliation Service of the Labor Department, the OPM, and the union," he told the Veterans of Foreign Wars, "tried for two months to find a way of settling the argument, only to find at last that the original strike vote was fraudulent and that the strike was called without the consent of the members." The truth is that the strike would have been settled on March 1 if the company had accepted the OPM agreement. Knudsen's failure to say anything of the company's notorious recalcitrance gives cause for questioning his good faith. But there is also no ground for saying that "the strike was called without the consent of the members," whatever the truth is in the stories of ballot-box irregularity. Knudsen made no effort to learn the union's side of the story on these charges. The union's story is presented for the first time in our Washington letter this week. Knudsen acted on the basis of what Max Babb, head of Allis-Chalmers, told him. This is not our conception of fair play.

But far more serious than the question of fair play for the workers at Allis-Chalmers is the question of fair play for labor as a whole. The real dangers to defense production lie not in strikes but in shortages of raw materials. The need for more aluminum and magnesium, for example, has become a serious impediment to plane production. On the other hand, we have had but one aviation strike, in which eight working days were lost. These were later made up when the workers at Vultee finished its first contract forty days ahead of time. Charges of communism were freely—and loosely—made in the Vultee strike. But little attention is paid to the far more tangible foreign influences and connections which have hobbled this country in the production of basic defense materials. Every crackpot utterance on labor in Congress achieves headlines, but how many newspaper readers knew of Congressman Rabaut's summary in the House on April 2 of the aluminum and magnesium tie-ups abroad? Rabaut pointed out that the international aluminum cartel in which our Mellon company plays a dominant part loosened its restrictions on Hitler, but kept output limited in this and other countries until in 1940 the Reich was able to produce 50 per cent more aluminum than the United States, despite our superior natural resources. Magnesium was left to a company jointly owned by the Aluminum Company of America and the German chemical trust. "Our own Dow Chemical Company," Congressman Rabaut said, "was the sole licensee in this country and agreed to sell only a small amount to England, while its other exports were to go to the German chemical trust at a lower price than any domestic user could purchase it for in the United States." The result was so to restrict production here that while our American output of magnesium in 1940 was 6,000 tons, Germany's was 25,000 tons. Both aluminum and magnesium are essential to aircraft. Why don't the newspapers, which are searching so hard for subversive international influences in labor, pay a little attention to the more obvious and the more serious obstacles created by the greed and the unpatriotic internationalism of big business?

River Rouge Revolt

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Detroit, April 7

AT fifteen minutes after midnight, Norman Smith, a hulking, unkempt, gentle-faced organizer who looks like Heywood Broun, stood on top of a C. I. O. sound-truck outside the main gate of the River Rouge plant. The hundreds of workers who had been milling around in the street, shouting and murmuring in the night, became pretty quiet. Then Smith roared: "The strike is on. Picket lines will be formed immediately."

The announcement sounded neat and unrheterical, but the date—April 2—will be recorded in labor history. There was a lot of the incidental music of history in the setting. Over Smith's head, as he recited the strike call, was the overpass where C. I. O. organizers were so pitilessly slugged by Ford service men in the futile campaign of 1937. Smith himself took a terrific beating from Ford goons in Memphis, where another Ford plant was defying the C. I. O. But now, in the capital of the Ford empire, men had struck for the first time in the thirty-eight-year life of the Rouge plant.

It all happened with such incredible suddenness, and events moved so fast afterward, that the epic touch was almost overlooked. The words and sounds and signs were familiar strike routine. Yet this walkout, C. I. O. chiefs admitted, was close to a trade-union miracle. The basic and indisputable fact was that it was provoked by the company; that the C. I. O. strategists had not planned to strike for several weeks and had hoped that a walkout might be entirely avoided. Several months ago Michael F. Widman, Jr., leader of the C. I. O. drive at Ford, told me: "We won't let Harry Bennett pick the date for a strike if we have to have one." But Harry Bennett did.

The jaunty, shrewd chief of Ford's terror squad could easily have prevented the dismissal of eleven key C. I. O. workers from exploding into a strike. All that the C. I. O. asked was to discuss the firings. Bennett plainly believed that this was the time to fight it out, perhaps because the national temper was so inauspicious for labor, perhaps because he thought the C. I. O. had gained so much ground at River Rouge that it had to be smashed now or not at all. He did not know that he was already too late. Neither did the C. I. O. leaders.

Throughout Tuesday evening the C. I. O. cabinet sat behind closed doors weighing a decision they had hoped to make under less feverish circumstances. As they met, stoppages—genuinely spontaneous—spread through the plant. When Ford officials refused to meet with the cabinet, retreat became impossible; it might have fatally demoralized the whole union. So at 12:15 the word sped into the cold Michigan night that Henry Ford's workers were going on strike.

After that the chips were down in this costly, desperate, long-frustrated campaign to organize the last home of anti-unionism in the auto industry, to make Henry Ford do what he had vowed he never would: recognize an outside union. What happened subsequently exceeded even the wishful thinking usually found in labor upsurges. It was a kind of mass rebellion against a tyranny that people had thought was immortal. Apparently the great bulk of the 85,000 workers employed at Rouge had decided, too, that this might be the last time they could fight it out with hope of success.

Once upon a time Henry Ford had insisted he would never close his plant in the face of a strike crisis; "We would stand to the last man." But twenty-four hours after the walkout Ford officialdom closed the plant, announcing it would not reopen while the war was being waged over mediation tables. The announcement was a confession that the C. I. O. had organized Ford. Thousands of workers signed union cards in the ensuing hours. The A. F. of L., in a frail and foolish effort to steal the C. I. O. show, called a mass meeting and preached back-to-work slogans; but less than 1,000 workers attended the meeting in the hall in which the C. I. O. had rallied 15,000 the night before.

This is written five days after the strike began, and its future is unpredictable. It is obvious here that the paunchy Ford hierarchy is choosing between capitulation in one form or another and a ruthless attempt to break the strike with thugs, brickbats, and guns. If the second course is chosen, there will be murder; because these lines won't yield to fear. Watching Ford workers parade through Dearborn, singing "Solidarity Forever," you are convinced this walkout cannot be broken so long as some measure of law survives. And C. I. O. leaders are confident that the government won't wield clubs for Ford.

There are those who believe that strikes are sinister in time of defense, that they aid the Axis, that they ought to be postponed until Hitler is licked. You get the feeling here that almost the reverse is true: that the strike at Ford is an affirmation of democratic vitality, that so long as 85,000 men were imprisoned behind Ford's feudal gates our democratic talk could be caricatured in the defeatist press. Now Ford's workers, harassed by industry's worst spy system, lacking seniority rights, paid less than men in other great auto plants, no longer walk and talk alone; they have joyous mass-picket lines where distribution of leaflets was once forbidden.

By the time this report appears, the strike may have been settled by a sudden compromise, or pending the Labor Board election, Henry Ford may have unleashed last-ditch violence against his employees. Whatever he does, there is a widespread conviction here that he has lost, and only the procedure of defeat is unsettled. Because while Ford publicists are lamely saying that "imported agitators" are behind the strike, they admitted the lie when they closed the plant.

Roosevelt's Answer to Hysteria

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 6

THIS has been quite a week-end. On Thursday night horrendous rumors were in circulation. The President was going to "speak out at last" on labor. He was preparing to blast John L. Lewis, presumably for telling off Hatton W. Sumners, the well-known electrocutionist. He was about to let loose a terrific attack on the Communists. The anti-labor bloc in Congress felt that Der Tag was just around the corner. As one conservative paper said, the strategy was to "build a fire under the President . . . Make him accept legislation curbing strikes which can't pass without his okay." There was an unusually large turnout for the President's press conference Friday morning, and an air of joyful anticipation. The time was fixed for 10:30 but we were kept waiting almost fifteen minutes. When the doors opened, the press burst in like Menelaus on Helen in Rupert Brooke's sonnet—to find the President all serene. His thoughts seemed far from labor troubles. He spoke of new lease-lend allocations, going with some detail into the figures. He discussed merchant shipping and the repair problem. A reporter finally perked up with a question about those strikes. Strikes? There was only one serious stoppage on defense, Mr. Roosevelt said, and that was at Allis-Chalmers. He was giving the Mediation Board a few more days to settle it. That didn't mean eight or ten weeks. The coal strike? He thought it would be settled by Monday. Communists? Yes, there were some in unions as elsewhere, but that didn't apply to labor as a whole. Ford? It is a little difficult to describe Mr. Roosevelt's answer and attitude. It might have been mistaken for a mild interest. It wasn't ungentlemanly enough to be described as a snub. The President was magnificent.

Mr. Roosevelt's calm refusal to be swept away by the strike hysteria was enough to make the week memorable, but there was another pleasant surprise Saturday morning at the Labor Board hearing on the petition for an election at the Ford plant in Dearborn. Ford's counsel, A. I. Capizzi, who sounds more like a Coughlin understudy than a lawyer, was winding up for a speech on the Red menace in the U. A. W.-C. I. O. and the Detroit office of the Labor Board when Dr. William M. Leiserson applied a pin to the bladder. He suggested that the issue being raised was as irrelevant as if the board were to try the charge that Ford was a Nazi agent because he had received a decoration from Hitler. Capizzi recovered sufficiently to suggest that before the war all the crowned heads of Europe had exchanged decorations with one another. Later, when Capizzi returned to the forbidden topic, Dr. Leiserson asked if he thought it would be fair to inquire whether Capizzi was a Communist or a Fascist. "I am an American citizen," Capizzi said, in his most orotund tones. "So are they," was Dr. Leiserson's dry rejoinder. But Capizzi, irrepressible, was soon back at the same subject by another route. Deferentially, he explained that in criticizing the personnel of the Detroit office he, of course, could intend no reflection on the "present majority" of the board, since it was but newly appointed and therefore had nothing to do with picking the communistic personnel in control at Detroit. "I myself appointed Frank Bowen director in Detroit in 1934," interjected Chairman Millis. After Capizzi was finished, there wasn't much that quiet Maurice Sugar had left to do for the U. A. W.-C. I. O.

This afternoon I went up to the OPM, where the mediation panel was in session on the Allis-Chalmers strike, which may be settled by morning. I had heard that the leaders of the Allis-Chalmers union were in town and I hoped to get their version of the ballot-box irregularities which occurred in the strike vote taken under Wisconsin law. I had been told that the local union leaders there were pretty green, but this turned out to be an understatement. The two I first encountered literally fled down the hall when the lone OPM press agent on Sunday duty said I was a newspaperman. Finally one of them went into the conference room and brought out Harold Christoffel, head of the union. Christoffel, a thin, gangling young man, who doesn't seem too experienced, told his story. He said there were two strike votes. The first, on February 19, was held under the union constitution, which requires a two-thirds vote of those present at a strike meeting to authorize a strike. This vote, he explained, was by ballot, not by acclamation. There were about 3,000 workers present and he said the vote was more than 90 per cent for a strike. Under the new Wisconsin law fathered by the reactionary Heil administration, a majority of those in the plant or department is required to make a strike legal. Since there are more than 7,000 men in the plant, the vote at the union strike meeting was not enough. An election under the state law was held on February 21, with some 6,700 votes cast, of which only 758 were against a strike. Imp and Bohachef, the two non-union "disrupters" mentioned last week in The Nation's editorial, Knudsen's Coup d'Etat, charged that the union had resorted to an unfair labor practice under the state law by changing the form of the question on the ballot between the two elections. A similar charge was filed by the company. In refutation, the union submitted as evidence all the votes cast in both elections.

Christoffel said that the state law requires neither state inspectors at the election nor the preservation of the ballots cast, but that the union had saved the ballots "just in case any question was raised." The union, he said, consulted counsel before the election and arranged to have its returns notarized. It was so anxious to make the election unassailable that it invited non-union as well as union men to vote in the election. The union thought it a joke when the company brought two handwriting experts into the case to examine the ballot-box markings, Christoffel explained, but became worried when the company asked for a week's recess in the Wisconsin Labor Board hearings to allow for further study of the returns. "We thought we'd better get an expert of our own," he said, "so we went to Northwestern University, which has a Crime School and hired a woman who is an expert on ballot frauds. She didn't look twenty minutes before she told us something was wrong, and after a few hours she reported that between 1,800 and 2,200 ballots seemed to contain irregularities." Christoffel denied that any officers of the union had anything to do with these irregularities. He said that people were streaming through the union office all day during the election and that the ballots were small enough for one man to take thirty or forty into the voting booth with him. He blamed the failure to arrive at a settlement on the company's lawyer and deplored the fact that the general works manager, with whom the union was able to get along, had been removed from control. He said the union was not insisting on a closed shop or a union shop but wanted security against the kind of anti-union activities carried on by the company in the past. Christoffel added that he was not a Communist. "I'm not taking orders from anybody," he said, "but the C. I. O."

Strategy in the Caribbean

BY W. ADOLPHE ROBERTS

THE Caribbean policy of the United States has assumed a form which we may reasonably expect to be permanent. It has been developing for 120 years, or since the acquisition of Florida rounded out control of the Gulf Coast. President Monroe had the ingenious theory that the Straits of Florida, between Key West and Cuba, constituted the true mouth of the Mississippi River, and that, as the inevitable corollary of this, all the approaches must be dominated. Other theories had their day, perhaps the most extraordinary being Secretary Seward's that Cuba was formed of sand washed to sea by the Mississippi and therefore belonged to this country.

The safeguarding of trade with the lands bordering the Sea was the next phase of the policy. Then came "Manifest Destiny"—expansion for the sake of expansion—which petered out with William Walker, the filibuster, in Nicaragua. Meanwhile, the real and lasting issue had emerged. Inter-oceanic canals at the Panama and Nicaragua depressions had become practicable, and already there were overland transit routes at both points. The Caribbean as the maritime lobby of the Pacific grew vastly important to the United States.

After the Spanish-American War and the digging of the Panama Canal, the naval station at Guantánamo, Cuba, and the ownership of Puerto Rico seemed sufficient in a world that did not expect a major war or foresee the rise of air power. The Virgin Islands were bought in 1917 lest Germany should want them. But the victory of the Allies and the supposedly invulnerable military position of friendly Britain and France lulled Washington's anxiety over the Caribbean. The 1920's and most of the 1930's were a dazed period in which confused cries came from the somnambulists in Geneva, and statesmen believed that unarmed neutrality, admonitions, and appeasement would maintain the status quo.

The approach of the present conflict stimulated the Roosevelt Administration into improving existing defenses and formulating new plans for the protection of the Canal. Bases in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands were, with the approval of Congress, ordered developed to a high degree of efficiency. In the spring of 1939 the combined Atlantic and Pacific fleets held maneuvers which clearly indicated that should war occur the United States would not count on the effectiveness of parallel defensive action by the European nations holding colonies in the region. It would pursue its own Caribbean strategy. The Sea was clearly Mare Nostrum.

Recent events are too familiar to call for rehearsal in detail. But certain points need emphasis. The first conference of the American foreign ministers at Panama made a great deal of noise but was important only because it proved that the twenty-one republics were disposed to work together. Meeting a few weeks after the outbreak of hostilities in Europe, the diplomats sought to fix a safety zone extending roughly 300 miles from the shores of the Western Hemisphere, excluding Canada. Belligerents who committed an act of war within this zone were threatened with—exactly what? The guns of Hitler's Graf von Spee and the British squadron off the Rio de la Plata went unanswered. Secret agencies had been at work, nevertheless, and in the first week of March, 1940, President Roosevelt remarked that the existing fortifications in the Canal Zone should be, and could be, supplemented by nearby bases. He hinted that while no acquisitions of territory were contemplated, an understanding had been reached with Colombia and Costa Rica for the military use of their airports in an emergency.

Here, then, was the vital turning point. The United States had concluded that it needed to operate from sites under foreign flags, but it proposed to obtain the facilities by negotiation, working on the assumption that it was the only nation with power vast enough to guard the interests of all the peoples of the Caribbean. It did not take an augur to realize that airports in the immediate vicinity of the Canal would be only a small part of Caribbean defense. Bases had to be sought—in British and French colonies. It was equally certain that all the centrally located republics would yield whatever was asked of them, primarily because the Good Neighbor program of the previous few years had cleared the way. Under any other recent Administration in Washington the little states could have been brought into line only by coercion. But Franklin Roosevelt had done away with the kind of tutelage exemplified by the Platt Amendment in Cuba and the marines in Haiti, closing his eyes at the same time to pocket dictatorships that spelled stability. Business relations, too, were good.

The rapidity with which events moved in 1940 played into the hands of the architects of the new hegemony. The United States, consulted in advance, raised no objections to the British and French marines landing on the Dutch islands of Curaçao and Aruba when Holland was invaded. Sabotage of oil refineries and stores supposedly had to be forestalled. Scarcely six weeks later, France had signed an armistice with Germany, and British warships unofficially blockaded Martinique, where two French cruisers and two destroyers were stationed, and where the aircraft carrier Béarn had just arrived with a hundred planes bought in the United States. Again, though for the moment, aggressive moves by one European power against another were allowed to go unchecked by the true rulers of the Caribbean.

The second conference of the American foreign ministers, at Havana, was a far more weighty and realistic gathering than the one at Panama. From its deliberations emerged the Act of Havana, which provided for a joint guardianship of all European colonies in America that had lost their sovereignty as a result of the war. One or more of the republics might initiate an occupation, a course which it was plainly the intent of the United States to follow freely if Britain collapsed—an event which seemed imminent as the conference ended.

But Britain did not collapse, and there took place instead the bases-for-destroyers deal. The six points of vantage acquired gave the United States a far-flung grip on the region. Close to the Venezuelan coast, Trinidad commands the southerly gateway to the Caribbean and would be the outer bastion in the event of an attempted invasion from Africa by way of Brazil. St. Lucia, more than 200 miles north of the arc of the Lesser Antilles, lies close to the passage from the Atlantic most favored by the ancient navigators, athwart which is Martinique. Antigua is on the edge of the Anegada Passage and looks across to the Virgins. The Bahaman base yet to be selected is an outpost for the Florida stations. Jamaica is of dual importance, being the sentinel of the lower end of the Windward Passage and the island closest to the Isthmus of Panama, 550 miles distant. Here the major defenses of the inner ring are being built. They comprise an airfield, as well as forts to protect the anchorage at Galleon Harbor, which is to be wholly American; and a reconstruction of the base at Port Royal, ancient capital of the buccaneers.

The day Britain consented to the leases it ceased to have a Caribbean program in the military sense. Any future effort on its part would be a duplication of the American effort and thus a futile expense. France and the Netherlands had not been active in the Sea for more than a century, and were now beaten nations with a doubtful, perhaps hopeless, future. None of the Latin republics possessed martial establishments that could figure in rivalry.

Two questions remain to be answered: (1) Has the United States obtained all the footholds it needs to perfect its control of the Caribbean? (2) Is its status as tenant in the British colonies workable, or will it want to annex territory?

I feel strongly that the reply to the first question is no. To complete the strategic pattern it will be necessary to have bases on Martinique, on Dutch Curaçao off the Venezuelan coast, and on the British islands of Barbados. The Yucatan channel leading into the Gulf of Mexico should be watched from a post near Cape San Antonio, the western tip of Cuba. The fairly long gap between Guantánamo and San Juan, Puerto Rico, should be plugged by an air squadron base in either Haiti or the Dominican Republic. It should be understood that I am not advocating all this, but am cold-bloodedly analyzing the drift of a policy. A government cannot plunge into militarism and be satisfied with half measures.

Martinique and Curaçao are indispensable. The French island is the very key to the Lesser Antilles. It has a much better harbor than Gros Islet Bay, St. Lucia, accepted from England because of its proximity to the Martinique channel. Curaçao lies midway off the Spanish Main, between Trinidad and Panama; it also forms the third point of an interior triangle, the other points being Jamaica and the Canal. That would be reason enough for fortifying Curaçao. It is, in addition, the ideal watchtower for the immense oil fields around Maracaibo Lagoon, and its dependency, Aruba, is covered with refineries. The Shell combine and other Dutch interests never cared to take a chance with Venezuelan revolutions, but exported crude oil to Aruba for processing and storing.

The interest of the United States in Martinique was shown as early as November, 1940, when a neutrality patrol from the Atlantic fleet took over from the blockading British squadron. The surveillance is still being maintained, though the French warships have been partially dismantled and the airplanes are said to be rusting in an open field beneath tarpaulins. One may assume that if for any reason troops are landed they will be American marines.

Neither the French nor the Dutch government could lease bases to the United States without incurring reprisals from the Germans in occupied territory. But we are likely to see the Stars and Stripes go up in Martinique and Curaçao before the war ends. It will be justified, somehow, as an emergency act. If this country goes to war with Germany, the matter would be simple indeed.

The argument for a base on Barbados lies in the isolation of that island, a hundred miles or so east of the rest of the Lesser Antilles. It is an advance post which might be seized by an enemy if a tightly drawn battle were raging. It is not essential to a defensive plan, but it would seem the part of wisdom to modernize the feeble armaments which the British now have there. The airfields suggested for western Cuba and Hispaniola are also secondary. If required, the governments concerned would probably yield them willingly.

Whether the United States should, or will, seek outright possession of the colonies where it has bases is a tangled question which cannot be answered with a flat yes or no. Imperialists favor a clean sweep while the getting is good, in partial liquidation of war debts old and new, and to enhance the national prestige. There are many arguments against this extreme position. President Roosevelt has personally disclaimed it. The Havana Conference came out for self-determination for the colonies. The dominant political groups in the United States, particularly the Southern reactionaries, are determined that no large addition to the Negro population shall be made. Although the colonies would not be granted statehood, they would have spokesmen in Congress and their new status would enable Negroes to come to work in this country without having to hurdle the barriers that now stand in their way. Nor is American business eager to lower tariff bars on a new stream of tropical products in competition with those of Puerto Rico and Hawaii. Finally, it is realized that it would harm rather than help the national prestige to gain territory at the cost of offending fellow members of the Pan-American Union and arousing the enmity of the autonomist factions in the more developed British colonies.

But military exigencies will carry weight, and I believe that a compromise is indicated. Islands so small that the naval and air bases occupy a considerable proportion of their area are likely to be acquired in toto. St. Lucia and Antigua, for instance, are only a little over one hundred square miles each. The problems of local government will become complicated in such places as the American personnel increases and new sites have to be taken over. It has been officially announced that the Gros Islet foothold in St. Lucia is but a beginning, and other sections of the island are being surveyed for airfields. The Bahaman coral key to be utilized is pretty certain to be one of those inhabited only by fishermen and sponge-divers; a double administration would be cumbersome.

The bases in Jamaica, Trinidad, and British Guiana, on the other hand, can be operated as pocket domains with no more difficulty than has marked the operation of the one at Guantánamo, Cuba, for forty years. Spheres of special interest can be definitely established in a large community, which has other problems to think about. In view of this, and for the reasons cited above, I do not think that the annexation of any important British or French colony is contemplated.

What is the attitude of the other American republics toward the mastery of the Caribbean by the United States? Present conditions are unique. The fear of a totalitarian victory in Europe and Asia hangs over the Western Hemisphere, and the spirit of Pan-American cooperation is correspondingly strong. But how will it be when the war is over? Though the position now being solidified will not be abandoned, its usefulness might be hampered by disgruntled neighbors.

The extent of economic aid given by the United States during the war will decide the matter in part. European markets have been lost by all the Caribbean countries, and some of the results have been disastrous. Poverty-stricken Haiti is largely dependent on its coffee crop, the bulk of which went to France, but which no longer has purchasers there. Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, and the Dominican Republic also depend heavily on coffee, much of which was taken by France, Germany and Italy. Sales of cocoa, copra, sugar, and rum have been seriously affected. So has Venezuelan oil. Only bananas and chicle have held up, since the United States has been the chief market for these products.

Loans from the Treasury and from the Export-Import Bank have helped. For instance, $11,300,000 has been advanced to the Cuban Sugar Stabilization Institute, $2,000,000 to the government of Nicaragua, and proportionate sums to other republics. There has been an increased absorption of tropical products, notably of Haitian coffee, though not as yet in amounts sufficiently large to restore shattered economies. A more determined effort will have to be made in this direction. It is equally important to provide Central America with manufactured goods which only the United States can furnish in time of war.

The soundness of democracy below Key West and the Rio Grande is something else again. The defeat of Germany would, of course, render the idea of totalitarianism extremely unpopular throughout the Western Hemisphere. Contrariwise, Vice-President Wallace made the following statement in a recent speech in Chicago: "If England loses, the Nazi scheme of things will, unless proper safeguards are taken, come into control within less than a year in certain Latin-American republics." I do not know precisely what countries Mr. Wallace had in mind, but I feel sure that his assertion is too sweeping to apply to the Caribbean region. If our policy there continues along its present lines and economic aid is forthcoming, approval of the role of the United States should withstand the worst jolts the war can bring.

Will Turkey Fight?

BY PETER STEVENS

Istanbul, March 14

MUSTAFA KEMAL PASHA, the Ghazi (Conqueror) has been dead for two and a half years. His portraits, like shrines, still hang in every house, every schoolroom, every office, every restaurant, night club, and hotel. It is not unusual for adult men to weep when they mention his name or glance reverently at the steel-blue eyes looking down from hundreds of thousands of gilded frames throughout Turkey. The Ghazi dreamed of a democratic republic for his people, but lack of education and appreciation of such a Western idea made the hope illusory. He even went to the length of asking a friend to form a "loyal" opposition, but the plan had to be abandoned because the lives of the synthetic opposition were constantly in danger from Turks who could not understand the idea and thought of the new party as dangerous revolutionists. Thus the People's Party, the party of Ataturk, as he called himself, is the only political organization in Turkey and its nomination is equal to election to the national legislature, which does meet from time to time in Ankara to ratify what the executive department has already decided to do.

Today Turkey is ruled by Ataturk's political and military satellites. At their head is Ismet Inonu, who took his last name from a military victory he won against the Greeks. He is a competent and quiet little military careerman, a professional soldier who gave up his sword to follow Ataturk into the field of politics. Saydam, the Prime Minister, and Saracoglu, the Foreign Minister, were likewise close followers of the Ghazi. This is at best a government of disciples, and the spirit of the dead Ataturk as well as his portrait hovers over their nervous meetings, for no one dare do anything of importance in Turkey without debating what the Ghazi would have done under such-and-such circumstances. His every word is poured over. "HE would do it if HE were alive," is the highest recommendation for an action.

Fundamentally this is the most "un-Ghazilike" approach to a problem. Ataturk was extremely impetuous; he made bold and unexpected decisions of greatest importance on a moment's whim; surprise and violence were his best tools; and he detested caution and deliberation. It is hard to believe that he would have had the patience to carry on the long and deliberate diplomatic game of gradual retreat in which Turkey has engaged in this war; he would have attacked the first minute that

■ German stepped on Bulgarian soil. It was he who threatened a war against victorious England and France when he had but an unarmed rabble with which to fight. The flare, the élan, the dash of his policy, which carried Turkey that far, are now missing and in their place is the prudence of a group of aging men who debate each point.

Each week or two new statements of policy come from Ankara. They are cleverly and very orientally phrased and purport to say what Turkey will or will not do to meet the German flood spreading over Europe. Always the door is left open for a later interpretation which will allow Turkey to do nothing. They always boil down to "We will fight if our territory is invaded, possibly if we think we are threatened, certainly not now."

Six months ago it was impossible to find a Turk who did not believe that a German penetration of the Southern Balkans would be the signal for Turkey to attack. But that was last fall, which, in this uncertain atmosphere, now seems years ago. Almost all Turks believed that "one single German uniform in Bulgaria means we will advance to the line of the mountains south of Sofia." It was considered extremely unpatriotic to question this and one American who did was asked to leave the country. Now the Germans have come, not only to Bulgaria, but in great numbers to positions where the Turkish frontier sentries can easily see them with the naked eye. And when they came, no one in Turkey was surprised that war did not result.

Little by little, the government-dictated press (the only press in Turkey) prepared the people. There was no one day on which you could say, "Have you seen the newspapers today? The government has changed its policy; we shall not fight over Bulgaria." It was a beautifully executed retreat—but retreat it most certainly was. The Germans came and stayed, and the people of Istanbul, with the potential enemy less than 200 kilometers away, went most unexcitedly about their tasks, so gently and so completely had their minds been changed for them.

The new idea of the English alliance is that England is bound to come to Turkey's aid when it is attacked but that Turkey is not bound to come to the aid of England or its Greek ally under any circumstances. Possibly, as rumored here, this is the advice of the British who are not yet ready to give the Turks that aid, especially in equipment, which can prevent the loss and dispersal of the Turkish army. It is argued that Eden and Churchill do not want to waste 1,000,000 stout-hearted fighting men on a hopeless task when later, well equipped, they may be the backbone of the army that will invade Germany.

The Turks, however, lived for many generations as the professional fighting class of the vast Ottoman Empire and they are proud and touchy about their ability to fight anyone, anywhere, anytime. Besides, the Ghazi often told his people that they must always attack first. They do not readily take to these Western ways of weighing all the possibilities. Their Ghazi flattered them often with the name "Invincibles." Thus the military class, in a one-party country, where criticism is unpatriotic, is beginning to question the decisions of the ruling politicians in Ankara. These officers remember Ataturk too well to allow the men in Ankara to interpret his words for them. Did he not say Turkey was doomed if it sat by and saw a great power move into the Balkans? These questionings are still discreet, but there are distinct rumblings of disappointment and even bitterness.

How will the Turks stand up under this war, which, deep down, they all feel is inevitable? They will have a great advantage over any enemy, however strong it is on paper, for they are deeply, religiously convinced that they are invincible on their own soil. The average man in this country believes that no Turk can be stampeded or demoralized by modern war machinery: he holds the dive-bomber in contempt except as a weapon against women and children; he feels that an infantry willing to sacrifice its lives as individuals is more than a match for tanks; he is convinced that he can make less ammunition go further, use a bayonet better, march farther with no food and little water, sustain the will to win longer than any other fighting man in the world. This is an important dogma of the religion of the Great Ghazi. There is the story current here that a general, Nuri Pasha, recently marched his men eighty-two hours with no food and only one canteen of water each; no stops were allowed night or day.

It is notable that no one well informed has any fears of fifth-column activity in Turkey. The well-worn Nazi formula used so successfully with slight variations in Norway, Holland, France, Belgium, Rumania, and Bulgaria simply cannot be used at all in Turkey. There are literally no Turks who would fall for it; the religion of the Ghazi is too strong and united for there to be a schism. As for Germans here, the Turkish police know them all and literally shadow each and every non-English or non-American foreigner. In number the German agents are extremely few, and if the Greek boast that they had every Italian six hours after war began is justified, then Turkey would better that record by at least six hours. Fortunately, no foreigner can speak Turkish without a noticeable accent.

The Turks do not fear the destruction of Istanbul; they know it will occur, and aside from a certain nationalistic pride in the great mosques built by their early leaders, they are oddly indifferent. The historical and artistic values of old Constantinople are those of the West, of Greece, and its European successor civilization. As for Pera and Galata, the Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Europeans live there, and the Turk thinks that it will, in the long run, be a blessing if its wooden hovels and crooked streets are destroyed so that a modern city may rise in its stead. The Turk is a great lover of the Modern, the New.

To us it would be tragic to lose Sancta Sofia, the great Church of Justinian with its tradition and beauty, in many ways the cradle of our civilization. But apart from this single great building, there is little to lose save sentiment. Even if England cannot afford to supply enough mechanized equipment and air strength in time to save the situation, and, if as a result, Turkey is defeated in Europe, that will not be the end. European Turkey is a small part of Turkey, and woe to him who pours his men and machines into the waterless stretches and trackless mountains of Anatolia. Here the Turk is supreme and the invader will have to fight every man, woman, and child of the civilian population, as well as a trained army of over 1,000,000 men. When the Greeks, with the backing of England, tried it in the early 1920's, they were cut to ribbons by a mob of peasants hurriedly assembled by Mustafa Kemal in a Turkey disunited and torn by civil war, a Turkey that had been crushingly defeated by the Allies only a year or two before. Frantically aroused by the presence of an invader on the sacred soil of Anatolia, the women of the peasantry cut the throats of Greek soldiers with long knives while they slept; children stoned them to death. The Greek army was soon a crazily retreating remnant. Many died of thirst on the trek back to the sea. Few returned to Greece.

It is dangerous to tackle any nation when it is in the throes of a great national renaissance, when any war of defense becomes a Holy War. At no time has the Turk been a pushover for any army. Now he is doubly dangerous, defending the Most Sacred Trust of the Ghazi, the Turkey he willed to each Turk to protect. It may well be that with its strength spread rather thinly from Arctic Norway to subtropical Sicily, from France in the west to Poland and Rumania in the east, Germany will find in Turkey the straw that will break the camel's back. Every Turk knows that when the first shot is fired the dead Ghazi will arise from his tomb in the Ethnological Museum in Ankara and lead his people in a new Holy War. They have seen what a small nation like Greece can do when inspired, and a Turkish counterpart of that campaign would surprise no foreign resident of the Balkans. The New Turkey of Ataturk is ready for the acid test, confidently, quietly, and a little impatiently.

Minorities On the Move

BY ANTHONY FIELD

IN THE past eight years Hitler has shifted millions of people—civilians—back and forth across the face of Europe. Quite apart from the movement of troops, war prisoners, and refugees blasted from their homes by bombs, he has set in motion human migrations on a scale vast enough to recall the time when hordes from the south and east first settled the European continent. Germans who had been living and working in other countries have been repatriated by the thousands, while Germans distasteful to the Hitler regime have been expatriated, when they have not been executed. Great numbers of Jews have fled Germany and countries overrun by the Nazis. And, finally, the Germans are constantly shifting workers from their homes in the occupied countries to the places in which they can best serve the Axis war machine.

Although the Nazis make little effort to hide the fact that they are uprooting millions of people and disrupting whole social systems, it is impossible to get a precise estimate of all the numbers concerned. By checking the data of the best American news agencies against that of the International Labor Office, the various governments in exile, and the German government, it is possible to get a reasonably clear picture of what is going on. For instance, it is known that after the Soviet-Nazi rapprochement in the autumn of 1939, some 50,000 people were shifted from the Baltic states—Latvia, Lithuania, and Esthonia—to Germany. The same winter, after the partition of Poland, some 130,000 Germans from Russia or Russian-occupied Poland moved to Germany. At about the same time some 50,000 Germans from Southern Tyrol were shifted back to Germany according to the terms of a treaty between Italy and Germany. In the latter half of 1940, when the Russians moved into Bessarabia, about 100,000 Germans went back to their fatherland. And in January of this year another 51,000 Germans from the Baltic countries were repatriated and some 100,000 Poles were shifted from German into Russian territory.

It was reported that the Russians, on their part, re-transferred to Siberia a half-million Poles who had entered Soviet territory after the German occupation, and that from 30,000 to 40,000 White Russians and Ukrainians were moved into Poland. About 70,000 Frenchmen whom Hitler felt were dangerous to his control of Lorraine, were moved to unoccupied France, according to reports from that province. It is known, however, that most of them actually went to Algeria.

The number of Jews moved around inside Greater Germany is unknown, but those forced to leave Germany and the occupied countries total about 600,000. After the fall of Poland the Nazis announced that all the Jews of Greater Germany were to be sent to the "Lublin Jewish Reservation." But no more than 40,000 Jews from the Reich have gone there until quite recently, when a new deportation wave set in. Most of the Polish Jews who lived outside the big cities are simply being sent into the overcrowded ghettos of Warsaw and Cracow.

The German "master race" itself is by no means safe from Hitler's migromania. In January, 1940, the Germans announced that 400,000 families—mostly farmers and tradesmen from Baden and Württemberg—would be transferred to Poland. That would mean, if the proportion of peasants, with their large families, ran high, as it undoubtedly did, that nearly 2,000,000 people were to be uprooted from their homes. In addition to these, 350,000 of the Germans who had been recalled from other countries were settled in Western Poland, an area which the Nazis hope will become predominantly German within a few years.

Some of the reasons for these tremendous population shifts are obvious, others obscure. The treatment of the Jew is part of the Nazi religion. The expulsion of patriotic Frenchmen from Lorraine was an essential part of the Germanization of the area. Other groups have been moved in an effort to break up economic or political resistance to the conquerors. In Poland, for example, people have been shifted around within relatively small areas for no purpose other than that of disrupting community life and solidarity and aggravating sectional prejudices. But perhaps the two most interesting aspects of the population changes instigated by the Reich are those involving forced labor and the mystical repatriation of Germans who had been living, some of them for generations, in other countries.

To some extent the transfer of Polish labor to Germany was only the continuation and acceleration of an old trend. Ever since Germany became an industrial nation there has been a steady flow of Polish workers into German factories and into the coal mines of the Rhineland. Even when Germany was primarily agrarian Polish farm laborers worked in the Reich. A treaty between the two countries fixed the exact number of workers that could be moved in a year, their wages, and the period for which they would stay in Germany. That process has been incredibly speeded up until, today, whole labor contingents in factories and farm areas are made up of Poles bossed by German overseers while the former German workers do battle against the British, the Greeks, and the Yugoslavs.

The Czech, Dutch, Belgian, and French workers now feeding the German war machine ease Germany's burden politically as well as industrially. To a large extent they have been taken from the most radical sections of their homelands. "La ceinture rouge de Paris"—that is, the "Red girdle of Paris"—is today said to be largely depleted of its most radical workers, as are the Czech socialist communities of Prague, Pilsen, and Kladno. When the Nazis entered Czechoslovakia, France, Belgium, they rounded up the radicals and bluntly informed them that if they did not work for Germany they would receive no compensation when they were unemployed, and that they would be unemployed very soon, since their bosses were to be forced to fire them. They were promised wages equal to those received by the Germans themselves if they complied. Under the circumstances there was little that most of the workers could do but accept. Today they provide Germany with a better labor supply than it would ordinarily have.

The most intricate and in many ways inexplicable problem raised by Hitler's migromania is presented by the "repatriation" of the Germans abroad or, as it is frequently put, their "liberation from foreign yokes." Take the example of the Baltic Germans, those descendants of old Crusaders and Hanseatic traders, for centuries the masters of the country and owners of nearly all the land in large estates; and the Germans of Southern Tyrol, famous wine and fruit growers of Bozen and Meran, settled and deeply rooted in one of the most attractive regions of the earth for something like one thousand years. Both groups were representative of the best in the German tradition.

Technically the Tyrolean and the Baltic moves were made through bilateral treaties concluded between Germany and Italy, Russia, Estonia, and Latvia. The minorities themselves had no say in the matter. Politically, the Italian case differs from the Baltic. Mussolini was anxious to get rid of the Germans in Alto Adige (the Italian expression for Southern Tyrol). The angle south of the Brenner Pass allotted to Italy by the peace of St. Germain is the key to Italy's strategic northern defense line, and for this and historical reasons the Fascists did their utmost to denationalize the Germans there. Thus the repatriation was in truth a kind of liberation from the importunities of a foreign oppressor.

Even if this particular shift was actually a bargain between the two autocrats, Hitler would have never paid such a price to win a partner had not the entire idea fitted his secret plans. The history of the agreement is not completely known. Apparently by its original terms all Germans would have had to move north unconditionally. The final arrangement, which was influenced by the stubborn resistance of the mountain peasants, provided an option: as far as we know only a part of the 200,000 preferred to be "liberated." Reportedly they settled in the Northern Tyrol and in Vorarlberg, the westernmost province of Austria, and in Western Poland.

Unlike the Italians, the Baltic peoples made no effort to suppress the Germans culturally. The Baltic peoples were farmers, and the Germans were their lawyers, physicians, merchants, teachers, even in part their civil service staff. Esthonia had passed a most generous law in 1926 on cultural autonomy, permitting the Germans to run (and to raise taxes for) their own schools. If any minority ever enjoyed full-fledged liberty, it was the Baltic Germans. They were not longing for liberation. But it happened that the Baltic Germans had remarkable assets. Berlin badly needed foreign currency. From the text of the two treaties it is clear that "liberated" colonials were allowed, besides some furniture and tools, only a little pocket money for exportation (50 lats and 50 Esthonian crowns respectively), whereas the bulk of their fortune (cash, real estate, plant, bonds, notes) had to be handed over to a German Trustee Association (Treuhandstelle) which liquidated it and transferred the receipts to Germany. Considering the Reich's enormous needs, however, this haul can hardly account exclusively for such a mass movement. Doubtless the primary motive was Hitler's desire to create a solid block of Germans in the center of Europe in order to forestall possible attempts by foreign nations to assimilate the scattered German minorities, perhaps to deprive these states of the chance eventually to use these Germans as hostages, and finally to increase the military power of the Reich.

If Hitler wins, this migratory process will go on and may even be aggravated. Slav, French, and Jewish minorities will disappear within the Reich. If the Allies win, the foreign workers in Germany will try to return to their old lands. The Lorraine Frenchmen will flock back. Many of the Poles will stay in Germany. A certain number of the Jews will try to go back there; although those of the younger generation who have become part of the countries of their wartime residence will not be eager to return. The Zionist movement will grow.

The Baltic Germans will make every effort to regain their privileged positions if Russia should free the Baltic countries again. Yet even if Russia does free them, would Esthonia, Latvia, or a Baltic or an Oslo Bloc within a future European federation really care to have the Germans back? The ousted mountaineers of Southern Tyrol can by no force on earth be compelled to stay where they are now. And, finally, a new type of refugee, the Nazi refugee, disguised or not, will enter the scene.

REAL ESTATE: On March 23, when income-tax grumbling was at its height, the New York Times published, page one, column one, a story telling how residents of the Westchester suburbs were moving to Connecticut, where there are no income taxes. (See Jonathan Daniels in The Nation for April 1.) "Throughout Westchester," said the Times, "suburbanites are expressing acute awareness of greener pastures over the line." The story so incensed Westchester real estate men and merchants that they demanded reparations. On March 30, page one, column one, the Times ran a story headed: "Westchester Finds Spurt in Building of Private Homes." The story began, "The wooded hills of Westchester are echoing to the thud of the carpenter's hammer and the clink of trowel against stone. . . ."

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS who boarded the Italian ships seized last week reported that in the mess rooms and recreation halls the walls were adorned with pictures of Mussolini and Victor Emmanuel. In the crew's bunkrooms they found photographs only of Margie Hart, the strip-tease girl.

GEORGE SOKOLSKY was recently asked his opinion on freedom of the press. To illustrate his belief that most publishers are not influenced by advertisers, Sokolsky told of his own experiences with Bernarr MacFadden's Liberty. In the course of some articles Sokolsky found it necessary to mention certain commercial products, and despite the fact that the products never advertised in Liberty, he said, the editors allowed him to mention them.

THE NEW YORK Legislature has been requested by several of the state's important figures to investigate Judge Herbert O'Brien of Queens, whose testimony on the Lease-Lend Act before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee was openly inflammatory. A counter-petition has been drawn up by many of the Christian Front-Coughlinite supporters toward whom O'Brien has long been friendly. Among the signers, according to the New York Gaelic-American, is Representative Vito Marcantonio.

EDUCATIONAL AUTHORITIES in Spain recently announced through the press that sixteen important chairs were vacant in the state universities. Not one person applied for any of the jobs.

FRANK CROWNINSHIELD, veteran editor of Vogue, had this to say of Nazi spies in Mexico in a recent issue of the magazine: "The best-equipped German spies in Mexico are usually men of a highly intellectual order. The archaeologists probably rank first, both in their number and ability; after them the ornithologists, botanists, mineralogists, conchologists, and ichthyologists, in approximately that order."

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

"The Greatest of These . . ."

THE multiplicity of British and other war charities has the home folks confused in the home towns, where there is a real and increasing desire to give. Britain's people in their tragedy seem neighbors now. Main Street ladies are ready to strip kitchens of mail-order aluminum pots and pans to provide the parts for British bombers. But in the enthusiastic confusion there is a real possibility that both the home folks and the essential foreign war charities may suffer together.

Sometimes it is hard to tell whether the multiplicity of the good-intentioned or the ubiquitousness of the racketeers does the more harm. I suspect that the racketeers are less dangerous than the men of good will. Also, I know from the small towns that the highly organized good will coming from the great cities under big names often fails to reach hearts. The reason for this is the almost rank growth of local individualism in good deeds which has flourished among people who see no reason why they should not go right ahead where they are, collecting for Britain on their own initiative and according to their own plans.

By now a certain able young business man I know in a small American city must have become a somewhat puzzled national figure. He had plenty of work of his own to do—and little time of his own to spare. But he decided it was his duty to assume the local leadership of one of the largest and best of the organizations seeking gifts for the relief of the people of Britain. He had hardly taken on the job, however, before he discovered that he was not alone. The town seemed full of collectors, each certain of his—or generally her—cause. With great good sense he called a meeting of every type and kind of the friends of the British.

Not all the collectors came. A good many did. There was a preacher who decided he would rather collect funds from school children for British children than work with a national organization of the same kind working in the same way. There was a lady restricting herself to work among the D.A.R. There was a Baptist lady ready to lead her Baptist sisters into any good relief work, and in a hurry to be off. A man who had been collecting pledges of a dollar a head from firemen and policemen, with which to purchase a bomber, was not present. Others were, and enthusiastically, but all with a growing consciousness of confusion. The young business man wanted a central local committee for charity drives for the suffering in England and elsewhere, similar to the community chest for local drives. He may get it. The confusion is incentive to sense.

But beyond the scope of any such local body is the mail, which comes pleading persuasively from far away. Much of its pleading is for excellent causes. In my own mail one morning were the cry that "there must be no black-out of the Bible" and some deeply appealing Save-the-Children facts. Both appeals were from highly reputable organizations which are trying to do excellent work and need money to do it with. There are many more such. My only feeling is that the diverse drives of the diverse good causes may do all of them harm.

Of course, there are the racketeers. The world will never bleed so badly that they will not be with us. In the last great war a board named by Secretary of War Baker reported that out of 3,000 money-raising appeals, involving upwards of a billion dollars, only 300 were worthy. The State Department by its license requirements has already made some effort to reduce the percentage of racketeering in this war. It has been reduced, undoubtedly. A national agency has been set up to help divide the good from the wicked; it has found organizations about which it urges serious inquiry before any contributions are made—and some of them have heart-touching names.

I am not sure there is any certain way to protect the people in the home towns from either foolish organizations or essentially wicked ones. But of one thing I am sure: a great deal of energy—much of it straight from the heart—is reaching from great centers to little towns, to distant states, for gifts. And in those little towns it begins to look as if not only money, but horse-sense, is needed. The small towns, I think, would like to send back to the organizations in the big cities an appeal of their own—that they get the people of good will together, reduce the number of their organizations, budget their businesses, and cut down the costs of duplicating postage and telephone bills.

If the good organizations will get together, we people in the country will have less trouble in spotting the racketeers. Today the confusion of good works is a rank-growing jungle in which racketeers with only a cash interest in our hearts get beyond them to our pocketbooks. Honest directors of war charity must thin this forest, if they hope to get rid of the weeds.

BOOKS and the ARTS

CULTURE AND LIBERTY

BY HERBERT READ

THE connection between culture and liberty is not just rhetorical, as the phrase might suggest, but vital and organic. That is the general conclusion I shall try to establish, but before reaching it I want to show, first, what meaning I attach to the word culture; secondly, how culture is related to the kind of society we live in, or intend to live in—and that will involve a definition of liberty; and, thirdly, why culture is incompatible with the kind of society which has been set up by the totalitarian states.

Culture is a slow product of the organic process we call history, and it is very difficult to catch it on the move. For example, contemporary efforts to estimate the greatness of poets and painters are almost invariably wrong. And if occasionally an age does honor the right man, it generally does so for the wrong reason. Now, in our dumb instinctive way I think we as a nation have always realized this, and for that reason we have not tried to define the quality of our culture. There is very little in the body of English writing which shows any consciousness of our native genius as it is expressed in our literature and drama, painting and music. By comparison, the literatures of Germany and of France abound in such self-examinations, self-criticisms, and self-satisfaction.

I am not going to make the mistake of confusing culture with what, in a narrower sense, we call the arts. When you have examined all the architecture and drama, the oratory and philosophy, the poetry, painting, and music of a nation, even then you have not exhausted the meaning of the word. To be worthy of the word, a nation has to possess something more—something in its manners, something in its speech and behavior—something which we might call gentleness, grace, or reverence. And this intangible quality may be precisely the essential quality—the one thing to which, if it is given to a nation, all other things are added. It is precisely this quality which is lacking, and always has been lacking, in the culture of our present enemy.

For German poetry, for German philosophy, for some periods of German architecture, I have the greatest admiration; I feel for German culture a sympathy which is deep and genuine. But at the same time this feeling of sympathy has always been accompanied by a feeling of despair. It is as though every road taken by German poets and philosophers led to the edge of an abyss—an abyss from which they could not withdraw, but must fall into headlong—the abyss which is the second part of "Faust," or the transcendentalism of Kant, or the dialectic of Hegel—abysses of intellect no longer controlled by any awareness of the sensuous realities of life. Now these faults are not unknown to the Germans themselves, and some of their greatest writers, Goethe and Nietzsche, for example, have indulged in orgies of national self-castigation. But let me quote a less well-known self-criticism—the words of a very great poet, perhaps the greatest of all German poets, and one whom the Nazis have sometimes perverted to their nationalistic purposes: Friedrich Hölderlin. This is what he said about his fellow countrymen in a letter to his friend Bellarmin:

It is a hard word, and yet I say it because it is the truth: I can think of no people more divided and torn than the Germans. You see artisans, but not human beings; thinkers, but not human beings; priests, but not human beings; masters and servants, old and young people, but not human beings. . . . But your Germans like to stick to the most material and necessary tasks, and that is why there is amongst them so much bungling, and so little really free and joyful activity. But even that could be overlooked, if only such men were not so insensitive to all beautiful life, if only the curse of god-forsaken, unnatural life did not rest everywhere on such a people. . . . Everything on earth is so imperfect, the Germans are ever complaining. If only someone would tell this god-forsaken people that things are so imperfect amongst them only because they do not leave purity uncorrupted and sacred things untouched by their coarse hands; that nothing flourishes amongst them because they do not heed the roots of growth, divine nature; that amongst them life is empty and burdensome and too full of cold, mute conflict, because they scorn the spirit, which infuses vigor and nobility into human activity and serenity into suffering, and brings into cities and dwellings love and brotherhood.

That is a long quotation, but it makes an important point: the point that culture is not an affair of crude calculation, or power and purpose, but of the spirit, of Genius, as Hölderlin writes in German. And this is the essence which, somehow or other, we have to preserve within the structure of our society.

Now, what has been proved many times in the past, and what is being proved today in Germany, is that this spirit can only exist in an atmosphere of liberty. And by liberty we mean, not economic security which is the only conception of liberty entertained by Hitler, but something much more in the nature of intellectual adventure. This becomes clear if we examine what might be called the incidence of culture, for then the vital difference between the true and the false conception of culture is seen to be a difference of position. I mean that you can regard culture either as something originating in separate individuals, or as something deriving from the collective entity of the nation. This is a very important distinction, and Hitler himself is quite aware of it. When three years ago he opened the magnificent new Haus der Deutschen Kunst in Munich, he made a speech of an hour and a half entirely devoted to these questions of art and culture. During the course of this speech Hitler made quite clear the very close connection which exists between the political and the artistic concept of National Socialism. According to the Nazi theory, as a nation grows to self-awareness and to power, there comes into being an art which is of that nation, peculiar to that nation, a direct expression of its being and ethos.

Hitler has enforced a national standard of art and has created a whole organization to see that this standard is adopted and observed by all artists, architects, writers, and composers within the Reich. And with the help of the Gestapo, that standard has been the only standard in evidence for the last seven years.

The result is disastrous. We have seen photographs of the new architecture, and of some of the new works of painting and sculpture. We have read some of the new poetry and drama. In so far as it is not crude propaganda, all this work, in every department of art, is of a dullness and deadness not exceeded by our own Royal Academy. It is not merely the expression of empty life, of cold mute conflict: when not barbarous, it is vulgar and sentimental, and never once lifts itself into those regions of radiance and joy and fantasy to which all true works of art belong.

Such is the kind of culture which we may expect in a country that subordinates the artist and writer to political censorship and police control. For the Nazi theory that art is a sort of reward for national self-sufficiency, and that it will blossom when the state of self-sufficiency is securely established, ignores the truth of the matter, which is far more subtle. All forms of art, and indeed all expressions of human genius, are the products of exceptionally endowed individuals, and though those products may to a considerable extent depend on the kind of society to which these individuals belong, their actual creation is the result of a very delicate psychological balance of forces within the individual mind. Nothing can explain the erratic phenomena of art except laws of chance and probability which are beyond calculation. But if we are so ignorant of the positive laws of artistic expression, we do know, on the negative side, that no force is so easily inhibited. It is not merely that the act of expression—the particular inspiration which gives birth to a work of art—is subject to frustration by the least interruption and dispersal of the mood of concentration; but the whole artistic life of the artist can be brought to a sudden end by casual and apparently irrelevant causes—by marriage, by age, by change of climate, or even by change of diet. But devastating as these interruptions are, they are as nothing compared with any form of external control affecting the mode and quality of expression. You may put a poet in prison and he will still write; but if you tell him what to write and how to write, either he will not be able to write another word, or he will produce those monuments of dullness typified by the coronation odes of our poets laureate.

That, surely, is obvious to all but the kind of thug or philistine who rules in Germany, but let us give the thug his due. Hitler does at any rate acknowledge the importance of art, which is more than any British government has ever done. Fatal as his interference with art has been, do not let us entertain the complacent idea that our policy of laissez-faire is the alternative. As in economics, so in art: laissez-faire within a capitalist economy merely abandons art to the chances of unrestricted competition, and the devil take the hindmost. It means that art becomes one more commodity on the free market, and that to succeed it must practice all the wiles of salesmanship—mass appeal, sex appeal, adulteration, and the sacrifice of quality to cheapness. That, in short, is what is wrong with our culture.

The commercialization of art has been accomplished in the past 150 years. Before that time art existed for the most part on patronage, and though I don't like the sound of the word, it is to some form of patronage that art must return if it is ever to recover its vitality. But this brings us up against a very real dilemma. It is impossible—and will become still more impossible in the socialist state of the future—to depend on personal patronage. The alternative is obvious, you will say—state patronage. But how are we to visualize state patronage; how is such state patronage going to differ essentially from the state control of art exercised by Hitler's regime? I do not see how the cold master of the state can replace the sympathetic patron, how a heterogeneous committee can ever be a substitute for the man of taste and sensibility. Not that all patrons in the past were enlightened: some of them were as prejudiced and tyrannical as a Hitler. The only substitute for patronage I can suggest is some form of guild organization in which the artists, in each branch of the arts, give mutual support to each other and divide whatever income they can procure by exchanging their products for the products of other organized producers. But this implies a form of guild socialism of which I am apparently the sole surviving advocate in this country.

And here let me explain that when I speak of guild socialism, or on other occasions of anarchism or syndicalism, I always have in mind this very problem of culture and liberty, which is for me the snag in the way of any system of state socialism. It is not merely that I cannot see how the sensuous and spiritual truths of culture can be safely delivered into the hands of ministries and committees; it is not merely that I distrust the calculating minds of economists and politicians; but everywhere I look, whether into past history or at present practice, I see the hand of the state as a dead hand, a hand which paralyzes every manifestation of the human spirit, not only all forms of art, but even philosophy and religion. What is National Socialism but a state philosophy or a state religion? If we are going to oppose National Socialism in the fundamentals of its faith, then we must first and foremost deny this worship of the nation and the state. When Hitler says that the only reality is the nation we must say No: the only reality is the human being. When Hitler says that art is a direct expression of the being and ethos of the nation, we must say No: art is a direct expression of the emotion and vision of the individual—of one man speaking to the people and for the people, of one man speaking to and for the whole of humanity. But we cannot logically say such things if in the same breath we deny the individual by advocating a form of socialism which, in the pursuit of economic or political ideals, establishes a bureaucracy to which all the ways of life are subordinated.

This past quarter of a century through which we have lived has one bitter lesson for all of us. In one country after another we have seen the revolutionary fervor which is the basis of our socialism perverted with apparent ease into an instrument of oppression. Let us take care that we, too, do not pervert the true doctrines of liberty and equality, and find too late that we have created a machine whose power we can no longer control—a machine which will carry us, helpless passengers, into the realm of totalitarian despotism. For I suggest that whatever we call it, any form of totalitarian collectivism is fatal to culture, simply because it cannot leave culture alone.

What, then, is the alternative? There is one other possibility. It is to abolish the artist—I mean, abolish the artist as an economic unit, as a separate profession. Art would then be produced, as it generally is today, by people who earn their living in some other way. The only duty of the community would be to see that everyone who wanted it had sufficient liberty to practice an art—and I mean liberty in the concrete sense of free time. It does not seem to me that this is an impossible ideal to aim at, but it is a general social ideal and not one which can be realized on behalf of art alone. It should be obvious that by the time we had reached such a degree of social development, certain types of artist would have been absorbed in the general organization of the life of the community. The architect, the sculptor, and even the painter would be no longer artists, but artisans, and as such organic units in the building guild; the composer and the dramatist would be artisans in the theater guild. In fact, about the only social misfit would be the poet, and except for poets laureate and political propagandists like Virgil and Pope, they have always been left out in the cold.

When I say that we should abolish the artist, what I really mean is that we should all become artists. It is this horrible distinction between art and ordinary things, between artists and ordinary men, which is the mark or symptom of the disease of our civilization. When we have put that civilization to rights, we shall be less conscious of our culture but we shall have more of it.

As I present it, this idea may have the appearance of a paradox, but it is not original. It was the conclusion reached by that great artist and great socialist, William Morris: a man who thought deeply on this very problem of culture and liberty. Morris perhaps tended to simplify the problem, in both his reading of the past and his vision of the future. But one thing he saw clearly: that in the society of the future the division between the artist and the artisan which is so characteristic of our present civilization had to disappear. All through Morris's work runs the essential thought, that if you establish the right form of society, culture will be added to it as naturally as is the color to the rose. And as for the right form of society, let me describe it in Morris's own words:

It is a society which does not know the meaning of the words rich and poor, or the rights of property, or law or legality, or nationality: a society which has no consciousness of being governed; in which equality of condition is a matter of course, and in which no man is rewarded for having served the community by having the power given him to injure it.

It is possible that I should say more about bringing culture to the people, but it seems to me that it is useless to bring culture to people who have not been prepared for it. In other words, we have to bring the people to culture. And to do this we have to begin at the bottom and build up. Any extensive change in the cultural level of the nation can only be brought about by a long process of education which will in itself be an essential part of our social revolution. And by a long process of education I do not mean university extension lectures on the painters of the Renaissance. I don't mean cultural education of any kind: again I say, make your social revolution and let culture take care of itself. What I do mean is nothing less than a drastic reform of the whole technique of education. We don't, at present, educate children to use their senses: we teach them as quickly as possible to master abstract symbols and the processes of conceptual thought, and by the age of eleven or twelve the child has become a thinking-machine of sorts—a machine which will, in the course of time, take its place in the counting-house and be able to absorb a daily portion of newspaper dope. But this machine has lost the faculties it had whilst still an unspoiled child. It has lost its instinctive sense of rhythm and harmony, its vivid imagination and spontaneous delight. This is perhaps the essential problem, for what is the meaning of culture to people who are mentally blind and deaf; and what is the use of liberty to people whose sensuous faculties are stiff with confinement, wasted for want of exercise?

Though the workers of the world may lose their chains, what will their new liberty benefit them if they find they cannot any longer move their limbs like free men? The only freedom that matters is the freedom to dance—the freedom to escape from the routine and necessary steps of our economic activities, and to take the air like gods. I am talking like a poet, but the poet in each one of you knows what I mean. You know, like Hölderlin, that there is a spirit which infuses vigor and nobility into human activity and serenity into suffering, which brings into cities and dwellings love and brotherhood. That spirit is the spirit of true culture, and its descent among us is the breath of true liberty.

New Year Letter

THE DOUBLE MAN. By W. H. Auden. Random House. $2.

IN 1931 Pope's ghost said to me, "Ten years from now the leading young poet of the time will publish, in the Atlantic Monthly, a didactic epistle of about nine hundred tetrameter couplets." I answered absently, "You are a fool"; and who on this earth would have thought him anything else? But he was right: the decline and fall of modernist poetry—if so big a swallow, and a good deal of warm weather, make a summer—were nearer than anyone could have believed. The poetry which came to seem during the 'twenties the norm of all poetic performance—experimental, lyric, obscure, violent, irregular, determinedly antagonistic to didacticism, general statement, science, the public—has lost for the young its once obsessive attraction; has evolved, in Auden's latest poem, into something that is almost its opposite. New Year Letter (which, with many notes and a few lyrics, forms "The Double Man") is a happy compound of the Essay on Man and the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, done in a version of Swift's most colloquial couplets. Pope might be bewildered at the ideas, and make fun of, or patronizingly commend, the couplets; but he would relish the Wit, Learning, and Sentiment—the last becoming, as it so often does, plural and Improving; and the Comprehending Generality, Love of Science, and Social Benevolence might warm him into the murmur, "Well enough for such an age." How fast the world changes! and poetry with it! What he would have said of the more characteristic glories of "Gerontion," the "Cantos," or "The Bridge," I leave to the reader's ingenuity.

New Year Letter contains Auden's ideas about everything (Life and the Good Life, Art and Society, Politics, Morals, Love, the Devil, Economic Man), organized inside a successfully concrete framework of what he has read and seen and met with. Auden's ideas once had an arbitrary effective quality, a personality value, almost like ideas in Lawrence or Ezra Pound. They seem today less colorful but far more correct—and they are derived from, or are conscious of, elements over most of the range of contemporary thought. Sometimes the reader exclaims delightedly, "What a queer thing for a poet to know!" (This replaces the resentful remark of the 'twenties: "What a queer thing for anybody to know!") The poets of the last generation were extremely erudite, but their erudition was of the rather specialized type that passed as currency of the realm in a somewhat literary realm. About Darwin, Marx, Freud and Co., about all characteristically "scientific" or "modern" thinkers most of them concluded regretfully: "If they had not existed, it would not have been necessary to ignore them." (Or deplore them.) In their comparison of the past and the present, the present came off, not even a poor, but a disgraceful second; "and this was not surprising," as Carroll says, since the values by which they judged—the whole climate of their judgment—were desperately and exclusively those of the past. They constituted a forlorn hope we must admire but understand. Auden's culture and doctrines are more accessible and plausible than theirs to the ordinary cultivated person, whose thought is not now essentially religious, literary, reactionary, or anti-scientific. And the manner of Auden's knowledge surprises as much as the matter; there is none of the atmosphere of stupefying scope and profundity of information that has accompanied Pound's and Eliot's application of the methods of the industrial revolution to literature: so far as Auden's tone is concerned, London and Rome are still untouched by American hands, the great Volkerwanderung of the barbarian scholars has never occurred.

New Year Letter seems to me, within certain limits, a great success. It is thoroughly readable: Auden handles with easy virtuosity humorous and serious material—sometimes his method of joining them verges on simple Byronic alternation, but they tend to be swept together by the tone and verse-movement, rapid, informal, and completely adaptable. The poetry, strained through so many abstractions, is occasionally a little pale; but it is poetry. Auden has accomplished the entirely unexpected feat of making a successful long poem out of a reasonable, objective, and comprehensive discussion. It is kept concrete or arresting by many devices: wit, rhetoric, all sorts of images (drawn from the sciences, often); surprising quotations, allusions, technical terms, points of view, shifts of tone; he treats ideas in terms of their famous advocates, expresses situations in little analogous conceits; and he specializes in unexpected coordinates, the exquisitely ridiculous term—he is remarkably sensitive to the levels and interactions of words. The poem is not quite first-rate. It lacks the necessary finality of presentation; it is at a remove; the urgency and reality have been diluted. Evil is talked about but not brought home; there is a faint sugary smell of tout comprendre est tout pardonner; everything is going to be all right in the end. When one remembers his earlier poetry at its best, one feels unreasonably homesick for the fleshpots of Egypt. But these are almost too many qualifications: it is a valuable, surprising poem.

In the notes there are quotations, aphorisms, exposition, verse, a few poems: if not God's plenty, at least, plenty. Some notes are valuable in themselves, some amplify or locate the poem's ideas; but these water a positive desert of Good Sense: machine-made parables, forced definitions, humorless half-truths, with which we wearily dissent or impatiently agree. (The notes specialize in neither the High nor the Low, but the Mean Sublime.) To the question, "What is the only thing that always remains work, that can never give us aesthetic satisfaction?" Auden replies, the ethical; the victims of his insistent raids on the Moral can ruefully agree. The lyrics called The Quest (conscientiously flat, abstract, and characteristic parables) seem to me rather uninterestingly unsuccessful.

I've made my review general because I wanted to emphasize, like the advertisements: "This poem's different"; some people who don't ordinarily read modern poetry might enjoy New Year Letter. Since I've no space for what I should like—a careful discussion of its ideas and technique—let me finish simply by saying that it is worth buying.

RANDALL JARRELL

The Problem Stated

MODERN DEMOCRACY. By Carl L. Becker. Yale University Press. $2.

IN HIS "The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth Century Philosophers" Professor Becker revealed with what skill and profundity he could portray the essential spirit of an age and how nicely his gentle cynicism could discount its foibles and illusions. In this slight, and yet weighty, book he proves himself as able a social philosopher as he is an historian of philosophies. The whole problem which confronts the democratic world has not been stated more lucidly, neatly, and wisely than in this brief analysis.

The first of the three chapters is, in a sense, a recapitulation of the earlier book. It traces the democratic ideals and hopes of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and describes the faith which now seems "somewhat naive" to us because we know that it "placed a far greater reliance upon the immediate influence of good will and rational discussion in shaping the conduct of men than is possible for us to do." The second chapter describes the "earthly counterpart" of this "ideal form laid up in heaven." It might be said in passing that the sorry realities of a dying capitalistic society have a somewhat different relation to eighteenth century hopes than the inevitably imperfect realization of a plan has to the ideal pattern. They are, rather, a tragic refutation of imperfect plans and foolish hopes. But this slight defect in the logic of the book does not impair the value of the analysis of present reality in the second chapter. We see how the "liberal-democratic ideology which middle-class liberals professed in theory and denied in practice" destroyed the power of the landed aristocracy only to become an ideological instrument for the new plutocratic oligarchy of modern civilization. Industrial society has maximized and centralized economic power; and the economic oligarchy has used the old ideas of freedom to preserve its irresponsibility and to prevent political control of its power. "If the democratic way of life is to survive," he declares, "we must distinguish the kinds of individual freedom which are essential to it from those that are unessential and disastrous." In the former category he places those "which the individual enjoys in his intellectual and political activities," and in the latter are "the relatively unrestrained liberties of his economic activities."

The problem of democracy is how to curb "the flagrant inequality of possessions and opportunity" without destroying essential liberties. The Russian experience proves that the loss of political and intellectual liberties is a high price to pay for economic equality. Yet it is still possible for Western civilization to stumble into a solution as bad as the Russian or the German one if we do not solve our economic problem. Dr. Becker is certain that an economic oligarchy must be brought under social control if democracy is to be saved. He thinks it is possible to do this without revolution or dictatorship, though he is of course not certain that it will be done. He thinks it important that though no ruling class has ever surrendered power voluntarily it is a non sequitur to conclude that it would surrender only under the compulsion of "naked force." He recognizes to what degree the international conflict complicates the problem of achieving domestic justice but he does not for that reason suggest that democracy ought not to defend itself against external perils. None of his conclusions are altogether new nor is the analysis which leads to his conclusions novel. The value of the book lies in the clarity and economy of thought and word with which the problem of democracy is analyzed so that one feels oneself carried toward his conclusions by an irrefutable logic.

The publishers of this book ought to be reminded that books are priced not according to their intrinsic worth but according to their size. This book, containing no more than 25,000 words, ought to cost only half of the $2 demanded for it.

European Poetry Displayed

A REVOLUTION IN EUROPEAN POETRY: 1660-1900.

By Emery Neff. Columbia University Press. $3.

DR. NEFF'S book is described on its jacket as "the only short history of European poetry since the Renaissance." It is incredible that this should be true; but as one considers, it seems all too possible that it is. Dr. Neff traces the enormous influence of French literary taste, during and after Louis XIV's reign, upon the countries of Europe; and the ferments produced in this taste, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, by German literature and thought, a revived interest in Greece and Rome and the Orient, and political dislocations. At the end modern poetry emerges, after the appearance in France of Baudelaire, Rimbaud, and Verlaine.

Such an account is long overdue, and one is grateful for a new emphasis, not usual in histories of literature written in English, upon the European scene as a whole, rather than upon what went on in England alone. And although it is addressed specifically to "students and teachers of comparative literature," the general reader can share in this panoramic outlook, and watch the interplay of forces which lead to increasingly complex expression in modern poetry. In America interest in these European sources was dropped when the 1930's arrived with their material difficulties. "Axel's Castle" was not followed up, as it should have been, by further detached discussion and by translations of works cited. The result has been that American poetry in the past decade, when not completely provincial, was muddled as to its derivations.

The subject, as the author states, is, of course, immense. His method, on the whole, is admirable. He condenses in a masterly way, and writes coolly and clearly. He has refused to use the tags "neo-classical," "romantic," and whatnot; and, these often academic partitions once removed, the narrative moves with breadth and sweep. J. G. Robertson has said:

There is manifest danger in the ineradicable instinct of our minds to classify and schematize. We love our antitheses; classicism-romanticism; idealism-realism; collectivism-individualism. But with fuller knowledge comes clearness that such antitheses are inherently unreal; the evolution of thought shows no such sharp contrasts, no such hard and fast lines. Nature makes no leaps; and the progress of human ideas, far from being a geometric progression, is an infinitely complicated growth, where one thought passes into its antithesis imperceptibly, like a dissolving view.

The need for these antitheses seems most real in a comparison of the arts of language. Because language is the carrier of ideas, it is easy to believe that it should be very little else than such a carrier. Comparative histories of architecture, painting, music, and even of "taste," escape bias more easily than comparative studies of the arts of language. Then it must be remembered that there are barriers in language. Linguistics are not needed in order to appreciate Palestrina, Mozart, Couperin, Purcell; or Piranesi, Dürer, Watteau, Constable. With poetry the ear and eye are not enough.

It cannot be said that Dr. Neff does much toward clarifying the inner qualities of the poetry with which he deals. He tends to tie up the spiritual with the turn of events and historic processes: changes of government, wars and their aftermaths, industrial changes, and alternate political enthusiasm and disillusionment. It has been said: "The critic . . . to reach the essence of poetry, must realize that he walks into a domain where the essential does not coincide with the most general, but with the most 'interior.'" But when we grant Neff's slight set toward the idea that poetry stems directly from the specific event (or in reaction against the specific event), his account of the historic background is thorough in the extreme. And when poets can be directly related to this background, he seldom makes an error, and very rarely an omission. He gives as admirably concise a description of the nature of French seventeenth-century taste as of Goethe's development and the development of "Faust." He is also brilliantly thorough with the post-Napoleonic period: the rise of money; the struggle for civil rights and the rights of labor, in England and France; and the reactions of certain poets to these upheavals and transformations. He does a splendid job of disentangling the beginnings of modern criticism, giving Lessing and Herder their just due; and he performs another service in bringing out and relating to their age the great and neglected talents of Hölderlin, Leopardi, and Vigny.

Historical events, however, can never completely explain poetry. Poetry is often generations in advance of the thought of its time. It is often a throwback. Many imponderables make up the climate of literature. The often irrational turns of taste; the almost religious currents of guilt, fear, desperation, and disillusion (or of peace and release) must be taken into account in the study of any art. Comparisons must include differences as well as likenesses. The gaps in Dr. Neff's scholarly (and truly valuable) correlation of poetic works, important events, and sources of ideas are consistently lacunae where might appear the poet or thinker out of series: the man who carried the past in him unresolved, or the man, not of his time, who is to be a force in the future.

For example, the works of Vico (not mentioned) were known, according to Robertson, to both Goethe and Herder. In 1681, when Boileau's "Art Poétique" (of which Neff makes much) was being translated into English, Edward Young, the first precursor of the English Gothic Revival (of which Neff makes little) was born. Gray's enthusiasm for Ossian is put on record; but there is no mention of Gray's friend, Horace Walpole (whose Strawberry Hill has been described as "less an archaeological reconstruction than the expression of a state of soul"). Neff, with partial truth, traces Gothic interest to Germany and Bürger's "Lenore" (1774). But Walpole was reviving Gothic in England twenty years previous to this; and certainly native English Gothic stands behind both The Ancient Mariner and Christabel. (Neff does not speak of Gothic but of "Wonder"; but how much more than "Wonder" was this secularized return of medieval Catholicism into Protestantism, always accompanied by a mask of anti-Papistry!) Byron paid open tribute to William Beckford, another precursor, and to Beckford's "Vathek" and Johnson's "Rasselas," as sources of Eastern color. "Vathek" appeared twenty years before Kubla Khan was written.

It is, of course, ridiculous to push back influences too far; but should not that friend of Winckelmann, Piranesi—the "picturesque" artist who was, oddly enough, responsible for "Adam" in England and "Empire" in France—be given some notice, along with Winckelmann? And, if it is rather one-sided of Dr. Neff to emphasize the classicism in eighteenth century England at the expense of the century's Gothic side (the two streams went on concurrently, according to good authority, from 1750 to 1830), it is certainly impossible to explain how German influence got into France without mentioning Madame de Staël. (Neff does not allow Madame de Staël in his text; merely in his appended chronology.) Madame de Staël, according to Thibaudet, smuggled Romanticism into France "through the 'gulf' of Geneva and Coppet." Again, though Dr. Neff states outright that his method is necessarily selective, it is certainly odd that so much is made of Hugo and Leconte de Lisle (both of whom, of course, bring out a great many of the points Neff stresses: the political enthusiasms of the one; the disillusion with politics, and consequent "escape" into exotic themes, of the other) while nothing whatever is said of Béranger, Gérard de Nerval, or Banville. Béranger, the most popular post-Revolution poet in France, died in the year of "Bovary" and "Les Fleurs du Mal" (how ironically these events complete one another!). Nerval was "the only French poet able to bring the actual feeling of the German ballad over into French poetry; the one French poet of the time completely

Dr. Neff ends his book with the usual sad thoughts on "fin de siècle." But in 1900 poetry in Europe was just about to pass into a new era of brilliance: Yeats, Rilke, Valéry, Apollinaire, were alive and soon to produce modern work unmatched in depth, subtlety, and complexity. The true synthesis, of which Neff certainly has a conception, must not only range widely but plunge deeply under the surface of events. One need not be either morbid or a mystic to know that this is true: such syntheses have been accomplished time and again in histories of arts other than literature. Certainly it is in the direction of "Einföhlung" that the liberation and future of comparative literature lies. Meanwhile, Dr. Neff has written a valuable book which should serve as a rational point of reference for students and the general reader alike.

LOUISE BOGAN

The Right to Continuity

TOWARD A PHILOSOPHY OF HISTORY. By José Ortega y Gasset. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

THE last time I saw Ortega—we were seated on a bench in the Bois de Boulogne in Paris a few weeks before the war—he said: "Until now I have been only a journalist, an occasional writer. It is only now that I am beginning a scientific work, the sum of my thought on history and society." I was happy therefore to find again in the present volume the old Ortega who is pleased to call himself a journalist but whom I persist in regarding with Paul Valéry as our greatest musician of ideas.

This collection of meditations and lectures has unity only in its depth, in its style of thought; but it is an exemplary style. Ortega is a virtuoso in the plastic presentation and illustration of ideas. Let us try to follow the development of one of the fundamental themes of this book: "Life is an affair of flutes. It is overflow that it needs most." Ortega projects first a new theory about the "sportive" origin of the state. According to him, it is the excess of vitality in the companionships of young men gathered together for the abduction of women and for barbarous adventure, the dionysiac play of juvenile energy avid to expend itself freely, which creates, as a by-product, the discipline and the martial order preliminary to civil legality. From the same idea of vital exuberance Ortega proceeds to develop an essay on technique. Man is the sole being in the world who has the primordial need and the power to disengage himself from nature. He can do it by suicide. He does it especially by fabricating a world which conforms to his inexhaustible fantasy and to his need for frenzy: the world of technique. The bow is a useful instrument, but it was perhaps first an instrument of music. The energy which invents a tool, domesticates fire, spends its effort in creating machines which permit more leisure—this energy greatly overflows immediate necessity and utility: it is pure excess, a projection of the imagination. So much for the ideas. But this whole complex of sociological analyses is finally summed up in a counterpoint of images of marvelous elegance: "The expression most fragrant with the scent of life . . . is to my mind the word incitement." This expression would have no meaning in physics, where one knows only the causes producing proportionate effects. It is the very word for unforeseeable life. The reaction of a thoroughbred to the lightest incitation of the spur "is a release of exuberant energy." The horse then becomes a splendid image of stirring life. "Thus we imagine the magnificent stallion whom Caligula called Incitatus and made a member of the Roman Senate." Here the thought of Ortega reverts to his poor Spain with its energies mutilated or put to sleep. And he tells this story: Workers were digging in a garden in Cordova. They uncovered the head and then part of the body of a bronze horse of the Roman epoch. The proprietor of the patio, deciding that the excavation was too expensive, ordered the statue to be covered with earth again. "And there he remained in his tomb, incredible though it seems, the Spanish Incitatus with his fine strong neck and his sensitive, foam-flecked mouth. . . . But one might fancy that if one held one's ear to the ground one would hear the desperate subterranean neighing of the great bronze horse." Who may yet incite him? So in this book I hear our buried Europe, our past.

Let us note that Ortega is not at all driven by the modern and puerile urge "to give concrete examples" in order to economize the effort of thought. His images rise from the depths of a prolonged meditation, of which he wishes to distill only the quintessence in a symbol durable and chiseled, like the bronze of the Spanish Incitatus. A theoretical formula weakens and limits, but a symbol orients and incites. These essays, which will please the American reader because of their freedom from abstraction and because of their plasticity, are in reality the last flowers of a European thought desperately ripe, which takes on the perfect elegance of an apparent facility, of a sparkling conversation.

But one will find also in this book the beginning of something very important: the elements of a philosophy and of a politics of continuity. Ortega is in process of discovering that the reality of man is not in his reason but in his history, in the trajectory of his past which alone orients his invention. Koehler has shown that memory alone distinguishes man from the ape. The chimpanzee does not lack intelligence, but for want of memory he is obliged each morning to begin his study of the world all over again. Incapable of possessing his past, he cannot evaluate his present action. On the other hand, "man's real treasure is the treasure of his mistakes. . . . It is because of this that Nietzsche defined man as the being with the longest memory."

Ortega expresses here the great, hard lesson, the only lesson which Europe, fatherland of Memory, can bequeath to younger civilizations. It is, in a certain sense, a "reactionary" lesson. In opposition to revolutionary utopianism Ortega repeats that the first right of man is the right to continuity. He affirms the objective existence of social structures, of the accumulated past, which one cannot ignore or sweep away without depriving creative action of all meaning. This position has the evident advantage of transcending the old right-left conflict at the moment when confusion is such that "today we are offered a prospect of tyranny from the left while the right promises revolution. . . ."

ALLENBY: A STUDY IN GREATNESS. By General Sir Archibald Wavell. Oxford University Press. $3.

MANY readers are likely to turn to this book, not so much because of interest in its subject—the most successful British general of World War I—but because they seek light upon its author—unquestionably the outstanding British military leader of World War II. From this angle General Wavell's study may prove disappointing. Superficially it does little to satisfy curiosity about its author, who effaces himself completely.

Nevertheless, reading this book against the background of dispatches from Cairo during the past six months, we realize how well General Wavell has digested the lessons Allenby taught him. He would be the first to deprecate any comparison, but it seems to me that his own achievement in Libya outstrips that of Allenby in Palestine. It is true that in the Turks and their German advisers Allenby had a tougher adversary than Graziani's Italians. On the other hand, Allenby's army had a marked superiority both in men and material over that of the enemy, while in Libya Wavell faced odds of a magnitude that the world has yet to appreciate.

It is not easy to describe to the satisfaction of laymen the course of a modern campaign, but General Wavell, with the aid of some useful maps, has contrived to give an extremely lucid account of the battles in which Allenby drove the Turks out of Palestine.

When Allenby took over the command in June, 1917, the Eastern Expeditionary Force was in a discouraged mood. After its two attempts to carry Gaza had been heavily repulsed by the Turks, it was holding a line south of this strongly fortified city. Morale rapidly improved, however, when Allenby, never an office-general, moved his headquarters from Cairo to near the front and, in a series of first-hand inspections, impressed his initiative and resolution on the army.

Meanwhile, he was maturing his plans for breaking the Turkish lines. The first essential was intense and detailed organization of communications and supply. His scheme involved a large-scale cavalry operation against the enemy's left wing at Beersheba, and for this to be carried out under desert conditions, water supplies had to be calculated almost to the last half-pint. The thrust at Beersheba was devised to turn the Turkish flank and render the position of the Gaza garrison untenable. The strictest secrecy had to be observed, and elaborate stratagems were employed to persuade the enemy that the desert operations were merely a feint.

The success of this ruse was confirmed when Allenby opened the battle with a heavy land and sea bombardment of Gaza that diverted the Turkish commander's attention from the strong concentration of troops on his right wing, so that he failed to reinforce the comparatively light defenses of Beersheba. These were quickly mastered by a British infantry corps after a great night march across the desert. Meanwhile, a cavalry division had ridden in a wide circle around the Turkish flank and, after heavy fighting, charged into the town of Beersheba in time to save its precious wells from destruction. Whereupon Allenby swung his infantry against the Turkish center in a move threatening to bottle up the Gaza garrison. As a result this stronghold was abandoned and the Turks, with the British at their heels, started a long retreat. A month later Allenby was in Jerusalem.

There are a good many points of resemblance between this battle and that of Sidi Barrani, which was also captured by a carefully concealed and sweeping flank attack. But this time tanks played the role which Allenby assigned to his cavalry. Wavell's relentless pursuit of the Italians was also patterned on the tactics of his old commander. "In pursuit," he quotes Allenby as saying, "you must always stretch possibilities to the limit. Troops having beaten the enemy will want to rest. They must be given as objectives not those that you think they will reach, but the farthest they could possibly reach."

The portrait of Allenby painted in this book is, in many respects, that of a conventional British officer. But he had one outstanding characteristic to raise him above the ruck of his fellow generals—a ranging mind that sought information outside the narrow boundaries of his profession. He was widely read and widely traveled and he would always listen to men who had the facts. Consequently he was more able than the average soldier to tackle problems ignored by the textbooks. A notable example was his quickness to adapt his tactics to those of the enemy when, during the South African war, the "unsportsmanlike" Boers refused to recognize the time-honored barrack-square rules.

But, as Wavell declares, in the military profession "character is of greater importance than brains or experience," for without courage, drive, and a complete sense of responsibility the most brilliant plans are liable to collapse. These qualities Allenby had, as he had also an unswerving loyalty to his superiors and a rare ability to trust his own subordinates. Nevertheless as a leader he was respected rather than liked. His army nickname—"The Bull"—was earned not so much by his massive physique as by his extreme irascibility. "He lacked," says his biographer, "a measure of self-control, a little humanity, the power to communicate enthusiasm, and to inspire disciples."

These qualities, absent in Allenby, are, according to those who know him, outstanding in Wavell, which helps to explain the way in which he has welded his very heterogeneous forces into the amazingly effective Army of the Nile. His own nickname, "Archie," certainly suggests affection, and stray quotations from his talks to his men, which have reached me, indicate a realization that the soldier in a democratic army must be treated like a man and not as a robot. His dictum that the ideal infantryman should have "the qualities of a successful poacher, a cat burglar, and a gunman" sounds like a quotation from Tom Wintringham, former captain in the International Brigade. And still more alien to the spirit of brass-hattery is his New Year's message to the army: "Have you ever thought what a world we could make if we put into peace endeavors the same energy, the same self-sacrifice and cooperation as we use in the wastefulness of war?"

KEITH HUTCHISON

A Poetry of Wit and Conscience

SELECTED POEMS. By John Peale Bishop. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

MR. BISHOP is one of the few men now writing in America or elsewhere who recognize the privileges, tests, and ordeal of the aesthetic discipline. He descends from the second generation of poets who imported the lessons and enrichment of French Symbolism, but the American theme and sentiment in his work, its insistence on the emotion of the repatriated exile and the plight of the artistic apprentice coming to terms with a domestic tradition, make him more a figure in the line of Stickney than of Pound or Eliot. The affinity of his later poems with the moral and traditional problems of Ransom or Tate is not emphasized; his lyrics on Southern or New England subjects mix almost indistinguishably with those on the conflict of culture and character, past and present, tradition and conscience, in the wider context of aesthetic, European, and historical symbols. But the unity in these selected poems derives from his effort to return, after widely eclectic experiences in art and the sophistication of New York and Paris, to his native roots and loyalties, his moral plight as an individual, and to the recovery of his local habitation and a name. It is possible to trace almost systematically his translation of the images of his earlier discoveries in art (France, antiquity, Shakespeare, English classicists, Provençal poetry, pictures, books) into the imagery of his American inheritance (Virginia, Cape Cod, colonial houses and villages, local legends, Connecticut summers and winters). Yet these contrasts remain fixed within a framework of wider references and derivations—in allegories of personal doubt and conflict or in the analogies of ancient myth and folk tradition. Mr. Bishop still respects the impersonal discipline and objective moral sense of his Symbolist teachers. His work asks to be considered as poetry before it makes its appeal as a private history or an American document.

The difficulty of his task is thus a high and honorable one, since he tends to hold aloof from the topical, social, or dramatic claims that make the poetry of his contemporaries exciting. He has attempted to make objective and critical his natural impressionability of temper, to apply it to a moral judgment upon himself, and to make his language and symbols self-sufficient in that purpose. On that score he wins respect and meets his severest test as a poet. For this specific poetic ambition in his work never succeeds in rising wholly free of his limited personal situation. His symbolic poems remain deliberate and bookish; his moral allegories lean too heavily on intimate references and appeals to gain the air of a genuine imaginative freedom. A sharp diffidence of taste keeps him from exploiting his American character, just as his knowledge of the full scope and complexity of his moral problem has kept him from making extravagant capital of his literary and cultural privileges. As a result, he has relied on decorum to mediate between these opposed attractions to the point where decorum neutralizes, chills, and enervates their separate passions. Baudelaire and Rimbaud made their greatest poetry directly out of their private havoc and torment; Mallarmé made his out of his sense of symbolic absolutes; each of them made it by finding a reality for his words and style that would make a reality of his particular vision. The lesser Symbolists fell between these powers. Vielé-Griffin and Merrill were masters of the discretion, the taste, and the scrupulously self-conscious sensibility that must be counted on to take the place of intense symbolic vision or supremely passionate selfhood in a poet.

It is in their line that Mr. Bishop stands; his work has everything that taste, finish, and conscience can give it; it has what Mr. Tate has called "a settled view of the nature of man which is essentially religious and committed to the belief that poetry must look at man under the head of eternity." The virtues of that view are intelligence, seriousness, and a severe self-respect, but there can be no question about what keeps it from achieving a fully created and impassioned art.

The poems that show the greatest delicacy and control of medium here are those that express most pointedly the subtle poise and aristocracy of Mr. Bishop's intelligence—In the Dordogne, Trinity of Crime, The Ancestors, Another Actaeon, Speaking of Poetry, October Tragedy, Behavior of the Sun. The American poems in Part IV are prevented by moral and personal earnestness from achieving the same balance of formal mastery and wit. But when Mr. Bishop projects his emotion of conflict and pathos less guardedly he achieves something which is to me finer than what he arrives at in either of these groups—the more genuine lyric pathos, with its rhythmic and verbal realism, that comes in Encounter, Crucifixion, and The Tree. It is in these poems that we get the authority of words and emotion that indicates a true union of sophistication with conscience and that forms a likely basis for Mr. Bishop's fuller mastery of his problem.

Newman's Wagner

THE LIFE OF RICHARD WAGNER. Volume Three, 1859-1866. By Ernest Newman. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

AS IMPORTANT as anything that has happened this year is Ernest Newman's publication of the third volume of his "Life of Richard Wagner." It appears four years after the second volume; and this delay is inherent in the very nature of what Newman is doing. Where other biographers, he claims, have repeated what he calls fable convenue, he is piecing together the story of Wagner's life and period from source material; and he offers his work not only as biography but as an example of correct biographical procedure. The staggering quantity and complexity of the material would make his way of destroying legend and establishing truth difficult enough; but in addition there is the fact that the letters and other documents have been made available only gradually; and he has been delayed by the constant inflow of new material.

To the process of writing this biography Newman brings his lifetime of absorption in the subject, his incredible industry and patience, his eye for what is significant in a document, his ability to piece details together and weld them—with the aid of a lively, if somewhat unconcentrated style—into a fascinating narrative. Since he offers the work as an example of the correct biographical procedure that he opposes to the fable convenue of other writers and to the original work of Glaserapp, who "is so blind a partisan that his interpretation of a document, the amount of selection he may make from it, or the general use to which he may put it, can never be relied on," it is well to bear in mind that a few years ago Newman published a similar book on Liszt in which—Carl Engel was able to point out—his intense desire to correct a legendary falsehood led him to misuse documents in the same way as others had misused them on behalf of the falsehood. It may be, then, that Newman will be corrected by those who know the material he has used; but with that reservation one may allow oneself to be fascinated by a narrative which, in this volume, takes Wagner from the Paris production of "Tannhäuser" in 1860 through the disaster of the Vienna "Tristan," the generous patronage of Ludwig II and its end in further disaster, to the flight from Munich and settling with Cosima in Tribschen in 1866.

The truths that Newman establishes concerning these matters in place of long-accepted notions would take more space than I have; I prefer to point out, as Newman does, their bearing on another long-accepted notion which he is concerned with throughout this work. This is the notion—with which some composers of our own time have explained the indifference or dislike their music has encountered—that the work of a great artist is never rightly understood and valued by his contemporaries; and Wagner's career has been considered an outstanding example. But Newman has long disputed the notion; and he has shown that if Wagner was bitterly attacked he was as warmly defended; and that whatever the opposition of directors of opera houses and musicians whose comfortable routine was upset by his artistic demands, composers whose position was threatened by his ability, pedants who were outraged by his originality, some critics whose ideological positions were bound up with the established order in opera and operatic performance, other critics whose Jewish employers were offended by his anti-Semitism, government officials and others who were scandalized by his personal conduct and political heresy, and those who simply did not find his music to their taste, as some do not even today—this opposition was outweighed by the interest and enthusiasm with which other musicians and writers and the general music public in Germany welcomed his operas from the start, and which later, at a time when he was an exiled revolutionary, compelled the directors of the opera houses to beg him for permission to produce the works—permission which in some instances he refused out of fear that without his supervision the production would misrepresent the work. In 1852, Newman tells us in his second volume, "there arose that extraordinary demand for Wagner's scores that showed how swiftly the tide had begun to flow in his direction. . . . The Wagner operas created the greatest enthusiasm everywhere. Special trains were run to Schwerin, Weisbaden, and other places from neighboring towns. Schwerin alone gave fourteen performances of 'Tannhäuser' during 1852." Even the large court theaters—including even that of Dresden—had to yield to public interest: there were five performances of "Tannhäuser" in Dresden in 1852, twenty in Leipzig the next year. And what defeated Wagner in Vienna and Munich—Newman shows in the present volume—was again intrigue motivated in the ways I have described.

That was in Germany; and in this volume we learn about Paris. Newman's research and reasoning were answered a few years ago in the New Republic by Paul Rosenfeld—answered in part in anecdotal terms suitable for the Etude; and in the case of Wagner Mr. Rosenfeld cited a cartoon published in one of the French comic papers, which he characterized as "those clear mirrors of the man in the street"—a cartoon in which a mother said to her child who was playing the piano: "My child, you are striking nothing but false notes," and the child answered: "Oh, mama, these aren't false notes. This is 'Tannhäuser.'" The real significance of this cartoon we learn from the statement on the first page of Newman's third volume, amplified on later pages: "Wagner had to contend with the enmity of the corrupt Paris press, which, it is no secret today, was handsomely taken care of by the rich Meyerbeer." The press was, then, a mirror of the Paris professional musicians, whose fear and resentment of this dangerous outsider expressed itself also in persistent and vicious undercover mischief-making. But in Paris, as in Germany, Wagner had his supporters; and whatever the effect of the press on the man in the street it did not prevent the man in the concert hall and opera house from being interested and impressed. At the performances of "Tannhäuser" the interest and enthusiasm of the general public were defeated by the unprecedented organized rowdiness of the aristocrats of the Jockey Club, determined to slap down not only an alien composer who dared to defy their wishes, but through him Princess Metternich, and through her the policy of rapprochement with Austria. But "Wagner selections proved the greatest attractions at the Musard and Padeloup concerts during the next few months. Carvalho was only restrained from producing 'Tannhäuser' at the Théâtre-Lyrique by the fact that he could not find a suitable tenor. Roger . . . for his benefit at the Opéra-Comique . . . chose the third act of 'Tannhäuser' . . . —an unmistakable sign of the interest Paris still took in the work."

This seems conclusive; but I am sure we have not heard the last of "Oh, mama, these aren't false notes. This is 'Tannhäuser.'" B. H. HAGGIN

NIETZSCHE. By Crane Brinton. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

IN THE age-long lawsuit, Taine vs. Carlyle, or Environment vs. Hero, the issue is still unsettled. Yet whenever a scapegoat has to be found for a national disaster, or an idol for exaltation at a triumph, public opinion is inclined to side with the defendant. Even so it seems idle to guess what rank Napoleon would have reached had he been born thirty years later or whether the Fuehrer would even now be adorning Viennese walls had he begun life thirty years earlier.

Nonetheless hero-worship may prove quite useful: it has in Professor Brinton's book, which possibly would not have been written at all if it were not a part of the Nazi credo that Hitler and Mussolini answered Nietzsche's call for supermen.

Whatever the occasion, Crane Brinton's book is most welcome even if it does not exactly vindicate the editor's presumption that Nietzsche was one of the paramount "makers of Europe." An amazingly scrupulous study of the vast body of writings on Nietzsche supports the opinion that the philosopher whom a cruel fate, a loving sister, and "gentle" and "tough" Nietzscheans pushed into immortality, was indeed no genius, although he successfully overcompensated his "forty different kinds of inferiority complex." His "originality was largely a matter of intemperate vocabulary. . . . He is the nineteenth-century intellectual in a frenzy." His work contains "a great variety of ideas, sometimes mutually contradictory, difficult if not impossible to reduce to a system." "Nazi professors of philosophy and, perhaps, 'lustier anti-Christians like Mr. H. L. Mencken' may take exception to Professor Brinton's exquisite humor, but he is far from being unfair to Nietzsche's oeuvre."

Nietzsche may not have cleared and refreshed the air of European philosophy, as Will Durant wrote, but his "work is packed with admirable observations" which "bring to light . . . some of the basic illusions men live by" and he ranks "high among writers who have helped us to know ourselves." Moreover the author disproves the assumption put forth by British propaganda in World War I that Nietzsche's doctrine of the superman, his chapter Of War and Warriors in "Zarathustra," justified his being listed as one with Treitschke and Bernhardi in a "guilty" triumvirate. But does not the attempt "to make of him a kind of John the Baptist for the Savior Hitler" prove that he was a forerunner of the Third Reich? Nietzsche admired Voltaire and Heine and wrote in the "Genealogy of Morals": "What a blessing a Jew is among Germans"; he despised the Deutschland ueber Alles patriots; and he was fond of calling himself a "good European." All this offers little support to the Nazi claim. Professor Brinton himself points out many contradictions to the effort to enlist Nietzsche as "one of the pillars of the Nazi society." Therefore the statement that a bowdlerized Nietzsche, sufficiently "sublimated" in interpretation, "can suit almost anyone and serve almost any case" is the only excuse for the author's decision that Nietzsche "fits into National Socialist needs" because he damned democracy and praised authority.

Nietzsche's "will to power," a philosophic rather than a scientific term, differs essentially from ruthless Nazi aggression: neither Hitler nor Goebbels is exactly the prototype of the "blond beast," and the Nazi variety of supermen can hardly be associated with Nietzsche's abstractly planned new nobility. They are, indeed, as wide asunder as are the comic-strip hero and G. B. Shaw's conception—in "Man and Superman." And Nietzsche attacked theories of "race" as products of "herd morality."

This apparently will not do. But whether "gentle" Nietzscheans like it or not, the master has become part of the Nazi gospel, just as Andler, his French biographer has made of him—a socialist. I wonder if it would not be timely to suggest that famous authors, poets, and scholars be somehow insured against the misuse of their reputation for the support of the successful politicians and gangsters of history? If so, Professor Brinton's work could become a useful pattern. In addition, it is a most readable book, throwing a brilliant flashlight of erudition into the blackout of German philosophical terminology.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Gumtown as Social Laboratory

LIFE, LIBERTY, AND PROPERTY. By Alfred Winslow Jones. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

LARGE aggregates of human beings in a complex social order do not lend themselves readily to scientific analysis. Alfred Winslow Jones, who attempted such an analysis of Akron, Ohio, is exceedingly frank in admitting the difficulties met in the effort and the shortcomings of the data upon which his conclusions are based. Within these acknowledged limitations he has developed a technique and amassed a set of facts which are extremely interesting and which pave the way for much needed further study along these lines. The technique is not new. It consists of sampling public opinion, but within that familiar framework the approach has been subjected to many refinements so that the results impress the reader as being far superior to those gathered by nation-wide surveys of opinion which in recent years have been bandied about with pontifical certitude. The principal difference lies in the fact that the latter type of survey deals with current, "hot" issues, the views on which have been shaped to a large extent by widespread discussion in the press and over the air waves; whereas the Jones survey deals with eight questions only one of which was of immediate and personal concern to some of the people whose opinions were sought.

The 1,700 persons in and around Akron who were interviewed represent a thorough cross-section of the population, including business executives, small-business men, farmers, teachers, clergymen, clerks; trade union, company union, and non-union workers, and left-wing political parties. The questions were cast in the form of seven episodes representing organized infringement upon the rights of corporate property and one over-all question providing ten categories for the assignment of net corporate profits, ranging all the way from absentee owners to employees of the company. The episodes of infringement embraced bootlegging of coal in Pennsylvania; a stay-in strike by utility workers in the Saginaw Valley, Michigan; a threat by one of Akron's rubber companies to move its plant, with the consequent probable abrogation of some five thousand jobs; prevention by a group of farmers of a mortgage foreclosure at the depth of the depression; the ousting by police, with the aid of tear-gas, of sitdown strikers from the Fansteel plant in North Chicago; migration of a garment manufacturer in violation of a union-contract clause; and interference by neighbors to prevent the eviction of an unemployed worker for non-payment of rent.

Attitudes on these happenings, and on the distribution of profits, ranged all the way from complete defense to complete denial of property rights. But the extremes were represented by very small minorities, with big-business executives poised on one end and adherents to left-wing ideologies on the

A "Natural" for Nation Readers

Eighteen years as a roving correspondent for The Nation have made Louis Fischer's name a familiar by-line to Nation readers. He first specialized on Russia and Germany. Then he studied and wrote about England, France, Italy, and the smaller countries of Europe and the Near East. He played a notable role in Spain during the war. He knows Europe, its leaders and its people. The book consists entirely of new, hitherto unpublished material. Louis Fischer reveals history and, at last, himself.

MEN AND POLITICS pulls together the whole picture of Europe and the world in the past two decades. Louis Fischer's autobiography is full of interpretations, character sketches of famous statesmen and journalists he met, anecdotes; it is lively and penetrating. Louis Fischer never wrote this way before. He has put on paper his personal experiences, his problems, and his doubts. He admits his mistakes. He mentions his prophecies. This autobiography of The Nation's foreign correspondent is also a biography of the world that is now enveloped in the smoke screen of war.

other. Organized workers were far less extreme in their defense of labor and human rights than were employers in their defense of property rights. But the population as a whole recorded a score of 76 per cent for the central tendency. This led the author to conclude that the "central morality or ideology of our society bears on the workers so heavily as to make it unlikely that they can shake it off as long as the conditions that have created and perpetuated it persist." This central morality "is humanitarian and approves of acts in the interest of human welfare and alleviation of suffering even if they entail the infringement of corporate property. It approves of trade unions, and would like to see a well-led, unified, strong labor movement, but one that refrained from violence. The central morality is not pacifist, however, and would even approve of violence if there were wrongdoers that it thinks could be met in no other way."

In other words, while corporate property, as distinguished from other private property, is safely respected for the present, there is nothing to guarantee the permanence of this status. Akron, despite its highly industrial character, its wide approval of militant unionism, respects private property, but not, according to the findings, without reserve. The depression years resulted in significant shifts in the public attitude on social problems and their relation to property. Further shifts are possible if economic maladjustments become more aggravated.

It is a highly provocative book. Experts may argue and probably disagree on the validity of the techniques it employs, but the conclusions arrived at appear well borne out by observation and by history. The most readable parts of the book are the verbatim recordings of actual interviews. These reveal a degree of confused but independent thinking which is a most heartening testimonial to the vitality of our democracy.

DRAMA

No Such Animal

IN "Watch on the Rhine" (Martin Beck Theater) Miss Lillian Hellman has demonstrated once again that she is a playwright of unusual resource and skill. The present work is being widely hailed as the best of the anti-Nazi dramas and there is, at least, no doubt that it is vastly superior to most. But I am not sure that I want to go much beyond that very qualified statement and I certainly do not believe that the author has solved completely the problem of writing on the subject a play whose chief interest is more than topical.

The problem is a very difficult one—perhaps nearly unsolvable—despite the current assumption that the existence of an important subject in which nearly everybody is interested ought to make important plays practically write themselves. Actually, the fact that nearly everybody is interested and that nearly everybody is informed creates the first of the difficulties even in the case of a frankly topical treatment. It is hard for the playwright to tell us anything we do not already know or to dramatize cruelty more effectively than events have already dramatized it. Thus, for example, Mr. Rice's "Flight to the West" is interesting of course but not as interesting as almost any daily paper, and Mr. Rice demonstrates nothing not demonstrated at least as impressively in a good news dispatch. Truth may be usually stranger than fiction, but facts stranger than any a playwright can invent are not always so clearly present before our very eyes.

Miss Hellman has tried to avoid this most obvious difficulty by choosing as her subject, not the major events, but a minor incident which must have repeated itself with variations a great many times and which implies the whole background of horror. Her scene is a quiet and prosperous home outside Washington. Her principal characters are an American family, two Rumanian refugees, and a daughter of the family who has just returned after twenty years abroad with a German husband gradually revealed to be an underground worker against fascism now planning to return to Germany with money he has collected in the United States. Through the machinations of one of the Rumanians, a blackmailer working for whichever side will pay him best, the Americans have gradually brought home to them, not only the atmosphere of Nazi intrigue, but also the fact that it can reach out into their own home, and the play ends with the mother and son of the house willingly conspiring in the escape of the German son-in-law after he has disposed of the blackmailer on their drawing-room floor.

Miss Hellman's drama is most effective in those portions least directly concerned with her main theme. She has obviously determined to avoid the flat didacticism and the thinness of characterization usually so painfully evident in thesis plays, and what is more she has succeeded. The atmosphere of the home is amusingly created and one of her characters, the solemn little son of the German, is a fine and pathetically humorous bit. So too, the domineering head of the home (beautifully played by Lucile Watson) and the anti-fascist himself (very effectively interpreted by Paul Lukas) are well conceived if somewhat more conventional characters. But the principal action itself does not escape a continuous suggestion of the artificially contrived, and at the very moments when the tension should be greatest one begins to feel that one has been through all this before, that an old-fashioned melodrama is being acted over again and that to call the villain a Rumanian spy in the pay of the Nazis or to insist that "the papers" are this time anti-fascist funds is not quite enough to make the whole seem real.

I am well aware of the fact that Miss Hellman might easily reply that such things as she has made the basis of the play do actually go on and that it is not her fault if this is a melodramatic world in which accredited dignitaries of the German government behave like villains of the ten-twenty-thirty. It is not, I grant, her fault; but it is, nevertheless, her misfortune. I am willing to admit that this is another instance in which life is imitating art but, from the standpoint of the playwright who would deal with this phase of contemporary life, it is too bad that life has chosen to imitate a form of art so elementary. In the theater one must accept the fact that we are easily reminded of theatrical convention no matter how ready we may be to admit intellectually that pro-Nazis actually behave like early Owen Davis scoundrels.

Let me suppose, to take an extreme example, that the Gestapo should suddenly take to tying its victims to buzzsaws or to placing them bound on the tracks of the midnight express. Indeed, and for all I know, it may actually be doing just that. But the incident would still not make a very good scene for a play and if I saw it on the stage I would still believe more firmly that it had happened before in plays than I would that it was also happening in Germany. The main difficulty with Miss Hellman's play is somewhat similar. Truth, as I previously granted, is stranger than fiction. But the artist must see to it that his fiction does not seem as strange as truth sometimes does and, above all, he must take care that his fiction does not too strongly suggest other fictions. Miss Hellman fails to do quite that. Her play is least convincing when it aims to come closest to fact. And one can so easily look at a giraffe while continuing to believe that there ain't no such animal.

Screen Actors: Class B

Hollywood, April 2

ON Hollywood Boulevard it has recently been possible to observe a picket patrolling the entrance of the discreet office building which houses the Hays office. This time, however, it was not the Hays office which was attracting the attention of the picket, but Central Casting. Central Casting is an organization, also sponsored by the producers, which handles all the extras in Hollywood and with which anybody who hopes to obtain work as an extra, at any of the studios, must be registered. The picket represented a disgruntled band of extras, mostly old-timers, who maintained that Central Casting was unfairly favoring certain picked extras, was neglecting the old-timers, and should hand out what work there was in more even proportions. These accusations have just been investigated by the Screen Actors Guild and found unsubstantiated.

Central Casting considers the whole affair most annoying. A gentleman in the office was very angry. "Nowadays all you have to do," he said, "is go get a sign printed to make all the trouble you want to." He went on to explain that Central Casting was pretty helpless as regards apportioning work. Old-timers suffer from old age and the greatest demand is for young extras; the studios, as part of their war-time economy campaign, are cutting down on the number of extras used in crowd scenes, and work which was scarce before is today even scarcer now that the foreign markets are shut down; and moreover directors often ask by name for the extras they require. It is this which leads to a conviction amongst many of the extras that favoritism rather than talent determines the choice of who shall work, which is as a matter of fact to a certain degree true. But, as the gentleman at Central Casting pointed out, directors naturally prefer to work with extras whom they know and can rely upon.

Since the days when D. W. Griffiths employed most of the population of Hollywood for weeks at a time to represent Babylonians or Israelites in gigantic spectacles, conditions for the extra have changed very much. A note at the top of the form that every applicant to Central Casting must fill in reads: "Since January 2, 1926, Central Casting Corporation has continuously called to the attention of those engaging in extra work this statement, 'The great variation of types of picture made, requiring all races and nationalities, children, etc. makes extra employment most casual. It may be months before a picture will be made requiring your services. There is no guarantee of work.' Nevertheless there are some 7,000 people registered as extras at Central Casting. On any one day it is very rare to find more than about 600 working; the maximum number employed last year was 1,300 and fell on occasions as low as about 70 per day."

Everyone who is registered at Central Casting must be a member of the Screen Actors Guild to which they have to pay, as Class-B members, an entrance fee of $50, and $18 a year dues. Of the 7,000 registrants about 2,000 might possibly make a living wage (Central Casting is doubtful) and a mere handful might make anything like good money. A really flourishing top-flight dress extra (an extra with an elaborate and expensive wardrobe) might make as much as $3,000 a year but not more than five or six in the entire industry are doing it. Having joined the Guild it is then necessary to provide Central Casting with two photographs (full face and profile) and a mass of personal information. The classification form includes questions as to whether your eyes are crossed, whether you can throw a boomerang, if you can hunt (fox), and if your previous occupation was that of clergyman or gambler. After filling in the form you are then classified, filed, indexed, cross-indexed, and put in one of the four categories of extras which, according to their possessions or accomplishments, get various salaries a day—$16.50, $11, $8.25, or $5.50. The $16.50-a-day class consists exclusively of dress extras wearing formal evening attire; other classifications are rather arbitrary, but, roughly speaking, $11 a day are paid for good-looking dress extras not in formal attire, dance extras, and extras representing the beau monde in general; the $8.25 group represents a drop in the social scale but a fairly good all-round appearance, while $5.50 is paid for ordinary crowd work. Any extra who says so much as a word of dialogue, or a dance extra who does any solo or adagio work (throwing your partner around), gets $25 a day.

This sounds fairly good until it is pointed out that the greater part of an extra's life is spent not in the studio but on the telephone. About 2,000 extras spend their day telephoning Central Casting at least once an hour to ask if any demand has come in from the studios for their services. The telephone operators at Central Casting broadcast their names through to the filing department where calls from the studios are received on teletype machines; if the extra is required he is told to report at the studio but far more often than not he is told to call back later. Since Central Casting sometimes gets a rush call from the studios and rings the extras, most of them are so nervous about missing something that they either spend the day at home beside the telephone or employ a service to relay their calls wherever they may be. And any extra who works more than about three days a fortnight is very lucky indeed.

That this is a miserable form of making a living can be very easily seen. The Guild has already accomplished much for the extras, having, for instance, raised the minimum daily wage from $3.50 to $5.50, but there still remains a great deal to be done. The extras would be in a position to hurry things up a bit were they not so divided amongst themselves. For example, there is a continuous feud between the dance and dress extras: dress extras are often to be seen in films immaculately attired in evening dress ($16.50 a day), expressing polite amusement at the hectic activities of dance extras ($11 a day), which seems to the dance extras most unfair. Moreover, the various classifications are continually trespassing on each other's territories (dress extras dancing polkas, etc.) and so it would seem that in order to make the extras' life tolerable there will have to be drastic revisions in the methods of hiring and classification.

CHRISTENING PARTY

A few days ago the press was asked to a party to choose the title of William Dieterle's latest production based on the Saturday Evening Post story, "The Devil and Daniel Webster," by Stephen Vincent Benét. The party was held on a sound stage decorated to represent several acres of New England farm land. On the set were two houses, two barns, several carts, some livestock, and a great deal of mud. The only oasis of dry land was temporarily occupied for the filming of a final sequence of the picture (which to judge by the squeals of the livestock must have represented a mass slaughter). Later when the party waded to dry land the livestock was found to be tranquilly alive and the party proceeded most pleasantly with the assistance of refreshments and an orchestra. Mr. Dieterle related the story of his picture, which he said everyone liked, though few approved of the title. Meanwhile, forms were being handed out with a list of substitutes which included "Temptation," "The Devil to Pay," and "A Certain Mr. Scratch." Given these alternatives the press almost unanimously chose "The Devil and Daniel Webster."

RECENT FILMS

Ernst Lubitsch has always been the protagonist of the eccentric and the champion of the individualist, but "That Uncertain Feeling" finds him poking rather heavy fun at artists and psychoanalysts on the side of the dreariest of commonplace husbands, and deserting rococo for modern-hotel-style décor. Merle Oberon and Melvyn Douglas, in an atmosphere intended to represent chic sophistication, gambol within the bounds of wedlock and decorum, and Burgess Meredith as a pianist with "artistic" temperament causes some slight amusement and distraction. Mr. Lubitsch is so much more at home against a European background that he should be banished, cinematically, from American soil for life.

"The Lady from Cheyenne" gets away to a bad start by giving the impression that it is going to be just another spectacle of the bold bad West with virtue, law, and order triumphant once more over Edward Arnold. However, with the arrival of ravishing Loretta Young on the scene and with the aid of some excellent and amusing dialogue the prospect brightens considerably and the film turns out to be a very enjoyable little fable about woman suffrage. The picture is highly recommended for a pleasant and emotionally undisturbed evening.

Letters to the Editors

This England

Dear Sirs: The January 11 and 18 issues of The Nation have just arrived here. I found the Lerner-Schuman-Dennis correspondence particularly interesting. Lerner keeps his head. I don't quite know what "democracy" is—but as Nevins once said, "We know freedom when we don't see it," and as long as men are willing to die for it there is still hope for the world. We are already relatively a socialist state here, and shall become more so, when we feel the real pinch of the cost of the war. There is far greater equality of spendable income than there was—and far fewer profiteers than in the last war—because very soon all surplus income over a modest limit will have to go on the war. I'm surprised the rich don't kick more than they do. It is partly because they fear Hitler more than they fear losing their money—partly because the Blitz is teaching many that life is sweet even in a 7' x 4' shelter. Of course there are still grave inequities and inequalities, but they are increasingly resented. After the war, of course, the devil will cease to be a monk.

Is there still freedom here? Well, there's still a remarkable amount of it. We've not yet jailed all our Communists—only some of them—and God knows they've asked for it. The wholesale internment of aliens raised a righteous storm that has resulted in a much more liberal policy. But a country in which Churchill, the King, and any minister can wander freely about among dockers and others without a noticeable bodyguard and get heartily cheered, cannot fairly be described as unfree.

Is Britain fighting for freedom or Empire? Well, of course it is in fact fighting for survival—and that goes for all of us. The survival of Britain means the survival of the "non-conformist conscience," of heretics, humanitarians, and generally of the salt of the earth.

I should judge that America hovering on the brink is less happy than Britain. I at any rate am much happier now that we are standing up to Hitler than when we were trying to live as escapist isolationists, dabbling in the disgrace of "non-intervention" in Spain, China, Czechoslovakia, etc. All that worries me is the revival of anti-German feeling that we got in the last war (though on a somewhat less rabid and stupid scale, perhaps?), and the knowledge that bitter experience has not yet been bitter enough to teach the average man a little practical Christianity and common sense. It is of course the erstwhile "appeasers" who have now become the racial fire-eaters—the strange and perverted working of a guilty conscience, no doubt.

Democracy Must Work

Dear Sirs: As one whose ancestors fled from tyranny to find freedom in a new land, may I make a plea for us to guard as with our life the rights and freedom of all within our shores. Let us adhere to the letter of the word as it was intended—I mean of freedom—freedom of thought, belief, religion, politics. It must be clear to you as it is to me that this freedom is as threatened today here as it was in Germany when Hitler came to power. As it began there with attacks on Communists, so here we have removed to a safe place the head of the Communists, Earl Browder; we have imprisoned men and women for exercising their right to petition for the ballot; we are carrying on a strange and undemocratic investigation in our schools that results in the firing and arrest of one man because he did not believe as certain people would like him to. And now labor is coming in for its share of persecution with one fine Representative going so far as to advocate the electric chair for strikers!

Where are we headed? Into a deep blackness—unless we make our democracy work as our fathers intended it to.

Books Wanted

Dear Sirs: A campaign is now under way to secure books for the newly completed library of the five lodges of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee comprising the employees of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company at Fairfield, Alabama.

The library which has been established in the joint headquarters of the five organizations is the first attempt to furnish members of C. I. O. organizations with reading material which cannot be found in the regular libraries of Alabama. Not only are the libraries of our state few and poorly stocked with material expressive of liberal and progressive ideas, but they are inaccessible to the vast majority of workers.

The cost of providing books of this kind is far beyond our limited means and we are therefore appealing to outstanding liberals and educators for a donation of one book, or more, which will go toward filling the shelves of our library.

Any donation will help to mold the ideas of the workers of our district—today in the forefront of the battle for economic security and freedom in the South. The address is The Steel Workers Library, C. I. O. Hall, 5305 Valley Road, Fairfield, Alabama, and we would be glad if you would autograph your gift.

Dear Sirs: In this time of national emergency I hope you will consider that maintaining the morale of American merchant seamen is important to national defense.

Merchant seamen do not have the library privileges afforded to civilians, nor even to soldiers and sailors. If you would bring our need for books to the attention of your readers, I feel sure this would be a worthwhile contribution not only to seamen, but also to national security. HERBERT L. Do We Need Rhythm?

Dear Sirs: We in this country (including the highest statesmen, educators, and ministers) do not seem to have a clear idea of just what democracy is. We criticize the idea of a dictatorship and say we want none of that in America. We say, "We want the American democratic way over here."

But if we should analyze carefully and boil things down, we should find that fascism does not set up a cruel, ruthless dictatorship form of life. Rather, it founds really just another form of democracy. A totalitarian dictatorship is, strange as it may sound, a democracy.

The fascist countries merely employ a dictator to see that democratic principles prevail. He calls the beat and maintains the cadence and rhythm of democracy in his country. He is there to discipline those groups or individuals who get out of step, those who would "chisel" or act unfairly toward the whole social group, those who would assume disproportionate or undeserved importance, those who would destroy the harmony of the nation.

But, in this country, we do not like the idea of being disciplined, of ever being called out of step. The idea of discipline really is the heart of the matter.

It looks very much as though Hitler will come to set up a disciplined democracy for us unless we set it up for ourselves before he gets here. There must be order and there will be order, regardless of who sets it up. Of that, we may be certain.

for example, that "Until two weeks ago this blight (i. e., Communist influence in the Teachers Union) was treated pretty much in the spirit of Mark Twain's remark about the weather. Everybody talked about it but nobody did anything."

From November, 1932, to April, 1933, I was a member of a committee of five elected by the membership of the Teachers Union to investigate Communist factionalism in the union. Another member of the committee was Charles J. Hendley, the present president. The chairman was John Dewey, who wrote the final report.

That report, issued April 29, 1933, analyzed the situation then facing the union, and urged remedial measures. The union held a large membership meeting, at which the recommendations in the report were debated. Some of them were adopted.

When matters became progressively worse, we decided on a major operation. Nothing else, we were convinced, could save the cause of unionism and liberalism among teachers. So, in 1935, we petitioned the American Federation of Teachers to grant us the power of reorganizing our local. To our members and to the A. F. of T. we analyzed the situation in much the same manner as the writer of your article, but more thoroughly. The convention of the A. F. of T., which was held at Cleveland in August, 1935, rejected our petition. And thereupon we organized the Teachers Guild.

Now, between 1933 and 1935, did we get the support of The Nation, the Post, and other organs of liberal opinion? Quite the contrary. It was explained in those journals that we were impatient with minority opinion, that we were seeking to retain power by undemocratic methods, that we were "red-baiting, etc." The Nation, with its tremendous influence among liberals, could have assisted us in our struggle against the well-organized program and unscrupulous tactics of the Communists in our union. But in those days The Nation and the Post were catering to the party line.

Millions for Defense

Dear Sirs: Several of The Nation's comments on ways and means of financing national defense have suggested to me some of the following thoughts on this important problem:

Let Congress tax incomes of a total of 25 per cent of the nation's annual income, a sum which, according to Dr. Harold G. Moulton, is ample for all needs and will enable us to pay as we go for armaments, the tax to be so arranged that the heaviest burden falls on those best able to pay. However, since the burden will fall heavily on a great many, let the government issue "tax-refund warrants" for a certain part of the taxes paid, say, 50 per cent (to people in the lower income brackets), these warrants to bear interest at a rate to discourage speculation in them, and to be paid off within a specified number of years after the national defense emergency has come to an end.

Now, assuming that the government will have to spend huge sums for four years, it will have to raise the equivalent of the nation's income for one year. About 5 per cent of this sum will be represented by tax warrants payable in ten years or so. It will therefore be necessary to continue the high tax rate long enough to enable the government to refund the sum of these tax warrants when due, with interest. The tax rate may be reduced, of course, as the fund raised for the repayment of these warrants increases, and no further warrants would be issued.

In this manner, it seems to me, many evils will be avoided and the costs of rearmament met out of taxes. I assume that the person holding a tax refund warrant will be able to borrow money on it if necessary, so that the high rate of the tax will not be felt so keenly. It may be possible to issue stamps or other negotiable paper for the amount of the tax refund, but, since stamps will be equal to money, that may tend to bring on a certain amount of inflation while the effect of tax-refund warrants will be that of borrowing future taxes from the taxpayer and refunding them with interest.

The Shape of Things

RECOGNIZING THAT IT IS INFLATION, NOT strikes, which constitutes the major threat to the defense program, the President last week created an Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply, with Leon Henderson as its head. It is not yet known precisely what powers Mr. Henderson will exercise in attempting to stabilize the price structure, but the President's wide powers to commandeer industries that do not cooperate in the defense program would seem to give him adequate authority to deal with any situation. The price situation is not yet critical, but food prices have risen 6 per cent in the past year, textile products have advanced 5 per cent, building materials are up 6.4 per cent. These advances are not so very much smaller than those which occurred in 1915 and the early part of 1916 during the first World War. But Mr. Henderson believes that with appropriate pressure and a judicious use of price "ceilings" it may be possible to avoid the rapid inflation of late 1916 and early 1917. The difficulties are greater than are usually admitted. The recent wage increases granted as a result of labor pressure will undoubtedly be seized upon as a pretext for a general increase of prices. But we think Mr. Henderson will find that in many cases the swollen coffers made possible by capacity operation can easily absorb high wage costs.

ONCE WHEN HE WAS TAXED WITH THE appointment of the ineffable Judge Herbert O'Brien, Mayor LaGuardia admitted: "When I make a mistake it's a beaut." His Honor has just delivered another beaut. It goes by the name of the Wicks bill, and it is a measure which makes it a felony for an employee of a transportation service, public or private, to leave his vehicle "unattended." The bill, calling for a penalty as high as twenty years' imprisonment, was sent to Albany by the LaGuardia administration and was passed by both houses at his express request. Ostensibly it was designed to prevent a serious traffic tie-up and the stranding of passengers in the event that the Transport Workers' Union calls a subway strike in June. In cold fact transit strikes do not as a rule involve the abandoning of vehicles on public streets or subway tracks, and the extreme vagueness of the Wicks bill on this point raises legitimate suspicions that its authors intended it as a weapon for terrorizing would-be strikers. It is all very well for a handful of its proponents to contend that under the terms of the measure drivers can still leave their vehicles at the proper terminals at the end of a run and then go out on strike without violating the law. That is not what the bill says, and if Governor Lehman signs it, would-be strikers will have to stand guard over their charges in barns, garages, and terminals until somebody else appears to relieve them—or take their chances with the courts. At best the bill is loosely drawn and dangerous. At worst it is a devious scheme to deprive transit workers of the right to strike.

THE MILITARY POSITION OF BRITAIN AND its Allies in the Near East may not be entirely hopeless, but the news is undisguisedly serious and there may be worse to come. As we go to press, the German radio is spreading reports that Yugoslavia has asked for an armistice. We suspect that this story, like those of British plans for evacuating Greece that come from the same source, represents an attempt to supplement the work of the Panzer divisions by sowing seeds of doubt, dissension, and panic in the Allied ranks. Reports from other sources suggest that, far from making ready for capitulation, the Yugoslav army is rallying in the western mountains and is striking both at the Italians in northern Albania and at German communications around Skolpje. Meanwhile the Greeks and the British have still to establish a stable defense line, but they seem to have slowed up the German advance, and in the new mechanical warfare the maintenance of momentum is of the utmost importance. The extraordinary ability of the Germans to keep going despite the difficulties of the desert constitutes a major hazard for the British forces in Egypt, thinned as they have been by the necessity of sending aid to Greece. The threat to Suez has now assumed alarming reality.

THE TROUBLE WITH SENATOR WHEELER IS that he can't get his mind off Europe. Obsessed with affairs across the wide Atlantic, he is rapidly becoming the Horrible Example of how isolationism sweeps its victims along from uttermost neutrality to a sneaking inclination toward the aggressor. The Montana Senator has come so far from his mood of unsullied neutrality that he is now apportioning war guilt, telling audiences who is responsible for the destruction of the French Republic and who has brought England to its present pass. And you may rest assured, Dr. Goebbels, that it is not you and your Führer whom Senator Wheeler finds guilty. Neither is it the spies and agents you sent into France and England, nor the native traitors, nor the fools who tried to appease you by giving you other countries to satisfy your appetite. No, the guilty parties, says Senator Burton K. Wheeler, were the Englishmen and Frenchmen who sought to defend their countries by checking the onrush of the berserk regime of Nazi Germany. These are the warmongers, he says, and "the same type of warmongers will destroy the United States" unless our appeasers prevail. Senator Wheeler's analysis has become one with that of the Völkischer Beobachter, and Herr Goebbels may compliment himself on breaking the isolationist shell of a mind that has stood thick and firm against the appeals of every democratic spirit in Europe.

THE NEW BRITISH BUDGET WITH ITS SHARP increases in direct taxation is frankly directed as much toward cutting down purchasing power as it is toward raising revenue. The gargantuan appetite of the modern war machine takes a huge bite out of a nation's productive capacity and thus reduces the volume of goods available for civilian consumption. But at the same time the increase in government spending wipes out unemployment and greatly swells total money incomes. Enlarged purchasing power in conjunction with a decreased total of goods in the market must lead to higher prices, for inflation is the natural economic remedy for the failure of supply to meet demand, when supply is a fixed quantity. But inflation is also a grossly unfair way of deciding how a limited amount of goods is to be distributed among different categories of income-receivers, since it means that those with rigid incomes bear the whole burden. The most important fiscal job of a war government, therefore, is to trim spendable income until it matches the volume of consumable goods. This can be done by direct taxation of incomes, by indirect taxation of non-essential articles, and by encouraging people to forgo the expenditure of part of their incomes so that they can lend to the state. All these methods have been employed in Britain, but revenue plus private savings have not equaled public expenditure. Consequently the government has been forced to resort to credit inflation through borrowing from the banks.

UP TO THE END OF LAST YEAR THE COST OF living in Britain had risen by 26½ per cent despite rationing and price restrictions, and the rising tendency continues. The new budget represents a real effort to check this trend by further diminishing spendable incomes. Income tax is raised from a 42½ to a 50 per cent base, while the level at which surtaxes are imposed is lowered from $8,000 to $4,000. At the other end of the scale two million more persons are brought into the income-tax-paying class by reduction of the exemption limit on unmarried persons from $400 to $320 and on married couples from $680 to $560. Further, the exemption on one-sixth of earned income is to be reduced to one-tenth. However, the extra tax which anyone pays as a result of smaller earned income and personal allowances will be credited to him after the war in the Post Office Savings Bank. This proposal represents a triumph for Maynard Keynes, who more than a year ago was urging that taxation should be supplemented by compulsory savings so as to balance the relationship between money incomes and purchasable goods. The drastic increases in income tax suggested by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer are expected to swell revenue to nearly one-half of total expenditure, as compared with less than one-third for the fiscal year which ended March 3. Real savings, it is hoped, will finance most of the remainder. However, actual expenditure has been steadily forging ahead of estimates ever since the war started, and this budget may prove inadequate. It may be necessary for Britain to adopt a proposal now being discussed in London for a strict limitation of everyone's weekly or monthly expenditure.

THE AXIS OIL SUPPLY HAS CLAIMED NEW attention as a result of the Balkan campaign. For the campaign not only requires huge supplies of liquid fuel but has been taking place perilously close to the chief sources of supply. A large part of Rumania's oil is shipped to Germany by way of the Danube, and this traffic has been temporarily interrupted at the Iron Gates by concrete barges sunk by the Yugoslavs. Unfortunately for the Reich, much of the Soviet oil is also transported on the Danube. Although it may be assumed that the Germans will soon clear the river of obstructions, the tie-up and resulting shortage of barges will undoubtedly make an appreciable dent in this year's deliveries. Considerable speculation has arisen as to why Great Britain has not taken advantage of its position in Greece to bomb the Rumanian oil fields. Hanson Baldwin, writing in the New York Times, has pointed out that Britain has neither the planes nor the landing fields in Greece necessary for such a task. Furthermore, he declares, the wells are so scattered and so well capped, and the pipe lines so effectively buried, that they do not provide really good targets. The stakes, however, are so high that we should not be surprised to see an attack attempted if Britain is able to hold on to its Greek bases.

THE ADVENTURES OF LOYALIST SPAIN'S jewels make a romantic story as Louis Fischer tells it. But it is a discreet story, minimizing, as good romance is likely to do, the political significance of the events described. Mr. Fischer ventures only the comment that Indelacio Prieto, who grabbed the treasure on its arrival in Mexico, "could use the money to assist Spanish refugees." That Prieto has failed to do so is admitted. No loyalist refugees have escaped from France on the proceeds of a single black pearl. And thousands of them, waiting in vain for ships and help, must have wondered why. The difficulties of getting Spaniards out of France are great, as we point out on another page. But money and political influence are powerful levers, and Prieto could have employed both to break the diplomatic log jam and free the men to whom he owes his loyalty. Instead he has sat tight on his cache of jewels presumably awaiting the day when they can be employed in more politically useful ways. And he has also tried to sit tight on the Vita, the yacht which carried the treasure to Mexico. When troops arrived the other day to take over the yacht as a foreign vessel harboring in a Mexican port, Prieto was found on deck armed with a pistol, a heroic position from which he was immediately removed. It is unfortunate that he cannot be as readily pried loose from the jewels.

War of Ships

THE crashing advances of the German Panzer divisions in the Balkans and in North Africa have monopolized the headlines during the past week. Yet grave as the turn of events in the Near East is, we must recognize that the focal point of danger is still the Atlantic.

The toll of the U-boats and the German long-range bombers has been rising. Revised British figures of March sinkings give a total of 375,000 tons, and we must presume a proportionate quantity of damaged shipping to add to the pressure on British yards. If the present rate of loss is maintained throughout the rest of this year it is estimated that five million tons of ships and their cargoes will disappear beneath the waves of the Atlantic. Hampered by air raids, the British shipbuilding industry is unlikely to produce more than one million tons of new ships in the course of the year. In this country we are rapidly expanding our shipbuilding capacity, and in 1942 we may be able to turn out three million gross tons. But during the crucial current year most experts agree that output will not exceed one million tons.

The perilous position in the Near East is very closely connected with the shortage of shipping. Britain had troops to spare for Greece, but the transport of a division with full equipment requires 100,000 tons of shipping, and by the Cape route the round trip would have taken four months. According to Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner, the original British plan to send six divisions to the Balkans was abandoned because the necessary ships could not be spared, and instead three divisions were organized by drawing heavily on the army in Libya. The very painful consequences are now visible.

In Britain itself the shipping shortage is reflected by a growing stringency in the food situation. There does not, as yet, seem to be actual hunger, but belts are tightening and the standard of diet is deteriorating. For example, lack of feed for cattle, much of which is normally imported, is diminishing the milk supply. In this country we find supplies for Britain, either bought outright or furnished by means of the Lease-Lend Act, piling up on the docks. In February exports from the United States to the whole British Empire totaled only $180 million as compared with $224 million in January, and the amount dispatched to Britain itself was only $77 million.

Compare these figures with the quantities of goods which can be made available under the new authority granted to the President. The total appropriation under the Lease-Lend Act is $7 billions, and while much of the material represented by this sum cannot be delivered until new production facilities are completed, it is believed that military and other equipment in stock and foodstuffs amounting together to $500 million could be made available almost immediately. But if half the goods we supply remains on the docks and a sizable fraction of what is actually shipped ends at the bottom of the sea, the Lease-Lend Act is going to be reduced to a fairly impotent gesture.

The Administration has recently taken a number of steps to improve the situation. Congress is being asked to approve a bill making possible the purchase of the thirty-nine Danish vessels placed in custody of the Coast Guard a few weeks ago, and the question of confiscating the sabotaged Axis ships which were seized at the same time is under consideration. The President has also lifted the ban on the entry of American merchant vessels into the Red Sea and adjacent waters on the ground that, with the defeat of the Italians in East Africa, this is no longer a belligerent area. This move may make possible the direct shipping of supplies to Egypt for the use of Britain, Greece, and Yugoslavia, but unhappily it is by no means certain that such help will arrive in time to be of use. A fourth step toward alleviating the British shipping position is the agreement signed with the Danish minister, Henrik de Kauffmann, for American protection of Greenland. This action is partly defensive, for as Joachim Joesten points out on page 471, there is little doubt that the Nazis have been taking a more than scientific interest in that island. But it may also make possible the opening of a summer route to Britain for both planes and ships.

It must be recognized, however, that all these measures are at best palliatives. If Britain is to pull through this year it must have the use of more ships and it must find means of affording them better protection, for the tonnage available in the world for the use of the democratic nations is dangerously near the margin of safety.

With its import needs enlarged by the defense program this country has now few if any ships to spare for Britain. Some might be transferred from coastal routes and their freights switched to the railroads. But the most obvious way of economizing shipping which remains open is the formation of an Anglo-American shipping pool operating under a joint high command which could decide questions of priorities, coordinate routings, and prevent congestion in ports.

Yet, however efficiently shipping is used, losses will continue to be heavy unless the North Atlantic passage can be better guarded. This is the question we must face, for it is a question which will be decided by the public rather than the President, who is unlikely to make a move involving the risk of "a shooting war" unless certain of popular support. And in reaching a decision we must remember that our alternative to providing convoys is not sitting tight and playing safe. We are confronted with a choice of risks. Convoys may bring us fully into the war, but unless the U-boats are mastered, Hitler is very likely to win a complete victory. And such an outcome to the war, the country is agreed, would place in deadly jeopardy the United States and all it stands for. That is the major premise on which both the defense program and aid to Britain are based. Can we afford to ignore the logical conclusion?

Ford Knuckles Under

THAT troglodyte of American labor relations, Henry Ford, has finally been brought to his knees. The success achieved by the United Automobile Workers in forcing the manufacturer for the first time to deal with representatives of union labor, outside a few skilled trades, is a historic victory for the American working class. Bethlehem and Ford were the major holdouts left against the Wagner Act, and their submission will mark the firm establishment of collective bargaining in the mass-production industries. Day-to-day shifts in the struggle and the ebb and flow of public opinion make it hard for contemporaries to realize the progress unionism has made since 1937. Ford's example was an encouragement to diehard industrialists, a symbol of the determination of some big business men to remain above the law, and the union's victory is also in the true sense a victory for law and order and for democratic processes. No doubt Ford and his strong-arm squad will try their best to wriggle out of the situation in which they find themselves, but in our opinion a decisive battle has been won. The spontaneous strike at the River Rouge plant shows how deeply Ford employees have come to resent the spy-ridden dictatorship under which they have been forced to live, and the spirit demonstrated in the strike can only be strengthened if Ford goes back to his old tactics.

The strength of the strike spirit was in fact as much a surprise to the union as to Ford, and if the House Military Affairs Committee is really interested is getting at the facts behind recent strikes it might profitably ask Ford a few questions. Why were Ford officials mysteriously unavailable during the first eight or nine hours of the stoppage when union officials, at the request of Governor Van Wagoner, were trying to get in touch with them and stop the strike? And why did Ford officials persist in turning down the union's offer to permit its men to go on working on the few defense contracts Ford has. There is good ground to suspect that Ford (1) welcomed the strike and (2) wanted work to stop on the defense contracts so that he might have an excuse to break the strike and weaken the union. The Ford strike, like recent walk-outs at Bethlehem, illustrates the fact that the defense argument cuts both ways and that if unions handle themselves wisely they can benefit by the defense program to force recalcitrant employers to obey the law. We recommend to our friends on the extreme left study of the contrast between the whooping and hallooing by a few Southern Legrees in Congress and by the press and the recent victories won by labor on the picket line and before the Mediation Board. The Coxes and the Sumners provide excellent copy for the Daily Worker, but fortunately neither they nor our newspapers are representative of a majority of the American people.

The artificially created hysteria in Congress and the press has begun to abate. The strike in Big Steel has been averted with the granting of the union's demand for an increase in wages of 10 cents an hour, retroactive to April 1. At this writing a settlement of the coal strike, at least in the Northern mines, seems imminent. The successes of the National Mediation Board in dealing with some of the most troublesome disputes have taken the wind out of the sails of those who were hoping to make defense an excuse for depriving American workers of their rights. The anti-labor House Military Affairs Committee is continuing its hearings this week, but the President's refusal to permit J. Edgar Hoover to testify will deprive it of some sensational headlines. The testimony of Secretary Perkins on the inaccuracy of Hoover's information on "communistic influences" in the Vultee strike raises the question of whether he is still using the odoriferous "Red" Hynes as his chief liaison man for Los Angeles and Southern California. The matter-of-fact survey presented to the committee by Miss Perkins on the remarkably small number of strikes we have had was overshadowed only by the testimony of Knudsen on the mysterious stories of sabotage in the Ford plant during the strike. Ford officials asserted that $1,000,000 worth of machine tools was destroyed during the strike. Knudsen said he "could hardly believe" these reports. He said even Nazi raids on Coventry hadn't been able to do that much damage to machine tools.

Food and Refugees

SEVERAL weeks have passed since the Vichy authorities peremptorily disembarked a group of Spanish refugees who, with all the necessary papers, were on board a ship bound for Mexico via Martinique. It has been established beyond question that Vichy's action was the result of direct pressure from Berlin and Madrid. Hitler has forbidden Spanish refugees of military age to leave France because, according to his own statement, he considers them presumptive enemies no matter where they go. Franco, for his part, is determined that no more Republican leaders shall escape from Europe because he fears that they may some day return to lead the discontented masses in a revolt against his rule. Although he has not yet persuaded Vichy to repatriate many of the former Loyalist leaders, he believes Vichy will ultimately tire of feeding them and turn them back voluntarily.

The Mexican government has vigorously protested this flagrant violation of the Vichy-Mexican agreement of last fall whereby the refugees came under its diplomatic protection. But against the combination of Hitler, Franco, and Pétain, Mexico is of course practically helpless. No country except the United States is in position to bring effective pressure on Vichy and Madrid to obtain the release of the refugees, and so far there is no indication that Washington is making use of its power. During the present week three American Red Cross ships are scheduled to sail for Europe with food. Two of these are bound for unoccupied France and one for Spain. Others will presumably follow. Under present arrangements the ships are scheduled to return empty across the Atlantic. An unofficial dispatch from Vichy suggests that the food for Spain be made conditional on permission for the refugees to leave France. We should prefer to go a step further and insist that no more food be furnished to either Vichy or Madrid unless the ships are permitted to return with Spanish refugees destined for Mexico. Vichy cannot openly oppose such terms, since the departure of the refugees would materially alleviate its own food shortage. Franco would hardly dare oppose it in view of the critical food situation in Spain. The only real opposition, presumably, would come from Hitler, who is not particularly concerned with keeping either Frenchmen or Spaniards from starvation.

The situation boils down to the question whether either Vichy or Madrid has any existence except as a Hitler puppet. It may well be that they do not. But if this is the case, it is useless to pretend that the food being shipped to unoccupied France and to Spain is being sent against Nazi wishes. Under these circumstances the shipments ought to be stopped outright. If, on the other hand, the puppet regimes possess a certain bargaining power of their own, however restricted, it is obvious that the United States should take the utmost advantage of that fact. Recent uncensored reports from Spain appearing in the Christian Science Monitor indicate that Franco, at least, does possess a type of bargaining power. The food situation is reported to be so critical that Hitler dare not pass through Spain en route to Gibraltar lest revolt be provoked which could only be put down at great cost. In case the United States imposed conditions for the delivery of food, Hitler would have a choice between submitting to the conditions or digging into his own meager food reserves.

It is useless to rail at Hitler and Franco for their inhumanity or at Vichy for its weakness when our own State Department has failed to use its considerable power to save the Spanish Republican refugees. There are those who say that Washington in this respect is as hopeless as Vichy. But we dare not accept this verdict.

Blitzkrieg and Dismay

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE most important effect of the Nazi drive in the Balkans and North Africa will be its effect on American opinion. Lives lost, territory cynically shunted from one sovereignty to another, ancient cities devastated, even the conquest of valuable resources and strategic positions—all these in the end will matter less than would a growth of fear and hopelessness in America. Already this mood is beginning to be expressed; it will be fostered and politically exploited by every defeatist group; unconditionally it must be rooted out of the American mind. For if fear should become a dominant factor in the making of American policy, not a campaign but a war—and the hope of democratic survival—will be lost. Hitler is advancing in the East, as he advanced in the West a year ago, over the bodies of nations which had been disarmed, politically and physically, by terror. Even the magnificent tenacity of the Greeks and the courage of the Yugoslavs are proving a poor substitute for a long-sighted policy of combination and preparation.

The Battle of the Balkans is not ended. In Greece the British forces have not yet, as we go to press, engaged the Nazis in force. The Allied lines are being reformed in the mountains, and British reinforcements are said to be coming in from East Africa. And Russia's sensational agreement with Japan creates new possibilities. The flood of contradictory interpretations of that move are evidence enough of the ambiguity of the newest Moscow line. It seems clear at least that, whatever its effect in Europe, the pact with Japan cannot but help the Axis by increasing the direct threat to British positions in South Asia. But this help may be partly offset in the Balkans. Moscow's anger at Hungary's cynical invasion of Yugoslavia and its continued verbal support of the Yugoslavs are significant; no nation—and surely not the Soviet Union—incur the displeasure of the Third Reich just for the moral satisfaction of it. Russia may be forced to defend its own frontiers, and the settlement with Japan certainly puts it in a position to face that risk with some show of strength. A show of strength may in turn avert open conflict—such is the logic of war diplomacy. It may even give Stalin a bargaining position from which he can pick off, without fighting for them, the Carpatho-Russian lands handed over to Hungary after Munich.

But no discernible combination of events seems likely to prevent a German victory in the Balkans, with Nazi rule running at least to the Dardanelles and the Russian frontier. The threat to Irak and the Suez Canal, though less imminent, is obviously a real one. And behind these military possibilities lie their political consequences, less tangible but just as important. What will be the effect of Hitler's successes on the Arab world, on Latin America, on the underground opposition in the Nazi-occupied countries, and, finally, on public opinion in America?

I spoke the other day to a group of college women in New Jersey—alert, middle-class suburbanites, well-read and interested in public affairs. I talked about Latin America and the way the Axis threat had affected opinion in the various countries. After the meeting a woman said to me in a puzzled tone: "You seem so certain that we can tolerate only one outcome of this war—a defeat of Hitler. But suppose it doesn't work that way. Most of the people here in this room want Britain to win. And we want the United States to help Britain win. But suppose Britain loses? If that should happen, a lot of the things Lindbergh has said would make sense. That's the way it seems to us. We'd have to get on with Europe somehow, Hitler or no Hitler. And so would Latin America. Isn't that so? And aren't you going too far when you assume Hitler must be defeated?"

That woman expressed an anxiety and division of feeling that haunt a large proportion of our people today—people who are not wholly pacifist or isolationist, and surely not pro-Nazi, but whose minds hang in a permanent state of unresolved doubt. Such people have been legion in every non-fascist country. They are the Britishers who anxiously, eagerly welcomed Chamberlain back from Munich and nourished their diminishing hopes on his promise of peace. They are the French who raised their shoulders at the idea of dying for Danzig. They are the Argentines or Brazilians who today prefer to keep an open mind about Nazi intentions in Latin America rather than alienate a nation which may control the world market for meat or coffee. They are just people—with a normal desire for a decent peaceful life who shrink from facts which war with that desire.

The effect of Hitler's successes in the Balkans and in Africa on this mass of unresolved opinion will be bad. Half consciously many minds will run for cover, taking shelter under convenient rationalizations. They will afford an easy target for the various pro-Axis propagandists—from right to left. In the United States they will present an obstacle to the swift application of measures demanded by the changing emergency.

It will be a major and necessary job for the Administration to crystallize this amorphous opinion behind a program which must be the more bold and drastic the further Hitler pushes his armies. I have long believed that the President and his chief colleagues should supplement their policies with a much more frank and continuous exposition of them. In spite of Mr. Roosevelt's open defiance of Axis intentions and the eloquent testimony of the Lease-Lend Act, each step in the Administration's policy has been taken or proposed with a minimum of explanation. And each possible future step has been dismissed as improbable: the question of convoys is a good case in point. Even more serious, the meaning of fascism, for the world and for the United States, has been too often forgotten in the stress of military development and the need to hurry the job of preparing a defense.

The political nature of the struggle in which we are engaged needs constant clarification. It is necessary for Americans to be made aware of the lines of battle that cut across national boundaries. We must learn to feel that our cause is one, not only with British airmen over the Channel and Greeks in their mountain passes, but with Spanish Loyalists rotting in French concentration camps and French dockworkers demonstrating for Yugoslavia in the streets of Marseilles. We must know that this war is being fought in newspapers in Buenos Aires and in factories in Norway. We must believe that it can never end until the concrete realities of freedom have been reconquered by free men. The courageous and lofty words of Croce on another page of this issue express the only true philosophy for the struggle against fascism.

The United States plainly intends to give all possible aid to the nations that are still holding out against Nazi aggression. We have set our face against a world run by Hitler. If such a world is born out of this war, it will be over our defeated efforts. We have desired to limit our efforts to moral support and material aid. We have believed that our best chance of avoiding armed conflict lay in multiplying supplies for Britain and speeding their delivery. We have believed that the alternative would be a fascist victory and our own more certain involvement in the war. But the course we have followed also involves the danger of war; and we are not going to turn back from it as the danger increases.

This I believe to be our actual policy and the only one we can afford to adopt. It is a policy which calls for great courage and determination, and these grow only out of understanding. It is the manifest duty of a national Administration which—at least in the person of the President—understands the political meaning of this struggle constantly to clarify it for the people. Otherwise American policy will have to be carried through in the face of doubt and anxiety, and the way of the appeaser will be made easy.

The TNEC Recommends—What?

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 12

IT IS said that the truth shall make men free, but this is only so if they are prepared to act upon it. I think this is the text on which to sum up the work of the TNEC. Mr. Roosevelt's proposal three years ago for a monopoly inquiry was the greatest message he ever sent to Congress, and it will prove to our supercilious posterity that we knew very well what was wrong with us, even if we never got up courage enough to do more than swallow aspirin tablets. "Unhappy events abroad," Mr. Roosevelt said on April 29, 1938, "have retaught us two simple truths." One was that liberty is endangered "if the people tolerate the growth of private power to a point where it becomes stronger than their democratic state itself." The other was that "the liberty of a democracy is not safe if its business system does not provide employment and produce and distribute goods in such a way as to sustain an acceptable standard of living." In these sentences the one great democratic leader of our time provided the epitaph of an age.

If these opening remarks have the flavor of a post-mortem it is because I have just finished reading the final report of the TNEC. The committee has brilliantly paraphrased the instructions given it by the President, and it is not easy to throw off the spell of its rhetoric. I give a sample sentence. "If the political structure is designed to preserve the freedom of the individual," the report declares manfully, "the economic structure must not be permitted to destroy it." This seems to be the energetic language of men rolling up their sleeves, but as one reads further it appears that this is but an interlude between the coffee and the marrons glacés. It is after-dinner statesmanship. When the committee gets down to the job of outlining a program of action its recommendations are ignominiously trivial. It spent three years digging up the facts, and then reentered them with as much dispatch as was decently possible.

Investigations like those of the TNEC and its many predecessors serve several purposes. They turn the nation into a vast schoolroom for instruction in the ABC's of our economic life. This the TNEC did, though in some fields, notably milk and insurance, the committee was careful not to look too far beneath the surface. These inquiries make the passage of social-reform programs possible by putting a few masters of enterprise in the pillory and letting the public have a good look at them in their moral undershirts. This is what Samuel Untermyer in his conduct of the Pujo inquiry did for Woodrow Wilson and what Ferdinand Pecora and Hugo Black later did for Franklin D. Roosevelt. But some smart press agent put the TNEC off the track very early in its career with the phrase "witch hunt." The practice of calling a spade a shovel was thus given a bad name, and the committee's conclusions were kept as innocuous as possible.

Congressional investigations are supposed to outline programs that come within shooting range of the evils uncovered. In this respect the TNEC, for all its 500-foot shelf of testimony and monographs, will not bear comparison with the best inquiries of the past. The recommendations of the Pujo committee in 1913 anticipated and surpassed the stock-market, banking, and security-selling reforms instituted by the New Deal. The original idea for the Wagner Act may be found, with much else, in the final report made by Basil M. Manly as director of the Industrial Relations Commission in 1916.

But aside from what seem to be excellent proposals to eliminate the use of the patent as an instrument of monopoly, the guttering candles lit by the TNEC will provide no beacons for the future. Its recommendations on insurance are the worst of all. Of industrial insurance, the greatest racket in the business, plundering the poor and ignorant, the report says, "A fundamental change in the conduct of industrial insurance should occur." The sentiment is unassailable. And if it doesn't occur? Then, the committee says daringly, "its eventual elimination may be necessary." And on what are we to rely for the fundamental change? "The primary responsibility for the change lies with the companies issuing such insurance and the states which supervise them." A campaign of scare stories calculated to make holders of life insurance believe that the TNEC was about to Sovietize their savings frightened the committee into limiting its proposals for federal supervision to a few timid suggestions. These are prefaced with a choice bit of understatement. If these suggestions are not adopted, the committee ventures, "state regulation may eventually decay."

One way to strike at monopoly would be to abolish the holding company. The way to do it would be to revive older laws which forbade one corporation to hold stock in another. The evils of the holding company have been demonstrated over and over again in railroad finance, in utilities, and in industry as a whole. As late as 1914 Bouvier's law dictionary was quoting legal authority to the effect that "the most vicious of all the provisions in the [corporation] statutes . . . is that authorizing one corporation to own and vote stock in another." The committee, after proposing to plug one of the loopholes in the Clayton Act in a way which would give the judicially enfeebled Federal Trade Commission a check on mergers, does make a recommendation on holding companies. But it seems to face two ways at once. It "recommends an outright prohibition on the acquisition of stock in or holding-company control of competing companies," but "with suitable exceptions for bona fide investments and the control of true subsidiaries by parent corporations." The second part of the sentence seems to cancel the first, as is true of the explanation which follows: "These recommendations would . . . outlaw stock acquisition and the holding company as methods of combining competing corporations without disturbing the legitimate use of the holding-company device in the relations between parent and subsidiary companies." After a forthright proposal of this kind one is prepared for the separate statement appended to the report by the TNEC's vice-chairman, the Texas sage, Hatton W. Sumners. Sumners thinks that what is really wrong is that we "have forgotten that there is a living God." Though he proposes the electric chair for strikers, Sumners thinks prayer drastic enough for the malefactions of big business.

Feeble and equivocal as are the committee's proposals to deal with "the growth of private power," they are sturdy by comparison with its nebulous and wordy treatment of the problem of providing steady employment and a better distribution of income. In three short paragraphs dealing with "the lower third" of our population the committee is satisfied with "nothing short of a program specifically designed to amplify their daily diet, to train them for suitable occupations, to make available the benefits of low-cost housing, and to give them opportunity to develop their cultural attributes." To achieve this the members of the committee boldly "commend such efforts as the food-stamp plan, slum clearance and low-cost housing, the extension of hospital and medical facilities, and the development of vocational and cultural programs for the less privileged of our people." The committee might at least have been specific enough to propose free piano lessons for share-croppers.

Can Tammany Come Back?

BY WILL CHASAN

NEW YORK CITY may be in for a rude shock next November. Two successive victories by Reform Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia have fostered the impression that Tammany Hall, corrupt ruler of New York politics for more than a century, has been finally deposed. But a cold appraisal of the city's rival political forces does not encourage this view. There is reason to believe that the political alignment which kept Democratic bosses in office until LaGuardia's first election in 1933 has not been basically altered, and may reassert itself this fall.

Most New Yorkers do not realize that LaGuardia's triumphs in 1933 and 1937 were not the result of a permanent shift in political strength. Both were produced by unusual combinations of circumstances. His election in 1933 was aided by the Seabury committee's graft disclosures, but would have been impossible had there not been a split in the Democratic Party. His total vote—421,689 on the Fusion ticket and 446,883 on the Republican—was 327,000 less than the combined vote of the rival Democratic candidates, O'Brien and McKee. His reelection in 1937 was due largely to a huge labor-party vote which has since declined and to dissension in the Democratic Party, whose strength was vitiated by a bitter primary fight. Another factor was the findings of the Dewey investigation, which were announced shortly before Election Day. The Democratic machine, in brief, was defeated by a temporary piling up of misfortune and not by a superior political force.

Nor is any such force on the city's political horizon. The Republicans, senior partners in the LaGuardia coalition, have been strengthened by offices and patronage which have accrued to them as a result, but they are still a hopeless minority. This is not entirely unfortunate, since the Republican organization in New York is not distinguished for its liberalism and its concern for clean government is strictly that of a party out of power. The Fusion Party's influence is a thing of the past. In 1933 it was the channel through which popular indignation against municipal corruption expressed itself, but it has since disintegrated. Indignation is no lasting basis for a political party, and Fusion's divergent elements had nothing else to hold them together. The American Labor Party, third of the triumvirate linked against Tammany, polled 483,000 votes for LaGuardia in 1937, its first foray into municipal politics. Political observers thought that it might play David to the Democratic Party's Goliath. However, like Fusion, it is now in decline, although for quite different reasons, one of them being the disruptive effect of a Communist clique. Despite internal difficulties, the A. L. P. might have achieved (conceivably it still may) sufficient strength to divert the course of New York politics permanently into new channels. Its failure to do so stems from the same lack of political acumen that has capsized most liberal parties in the past. "What reformers don't get," Frank Hague told George Creel in 1936, is that "politics is a business" and "not a revival meeting." The A. L. P. leaders have been no exception. The end of the party's influence is by no means in sight, but its present debility does not brighten the outlook.

Although the city administration has eluded its grasp for more than seven years, the Democratic Party is not gravely weakened. Its clubs have not been so completely cut off from the patronage troughs as is popularly believed. The Bronx and Kings County administrations remain in its hands, and numerous jobs have been retained in other boroughs. Generous amounts of federal and state patronage have helped to build up a fairly substantial political diet. The essential vigor of the Democratic machine is shown in its continuing ability to dominate local elections, probably the clearest test of straight party strength. Practically the entire Democratic slate of state assemblymen and senators has regularly been voted in, and in 1939, the year of the last City Council election, it obtained a two-thirds majority. A significant aspect of the 1939 elections was the defeat of several candidates specifically indorsed by LaGuardia.

Against this background the outlook for the reform groups is distinctly unfavorable. It is unlikely that Democratic chieftains will make the mistake of naming a candidate associated in the public mind with the party's unsavory past. It is worth noting that Manhattan's Tammany leaders, mostly deeply incriminated in that past, will not decide the party's choice. In political terminology Tammany is still synonymous with the New York Democratic Party, but actual control of party policy passed out of its hands more than a decade ago as a result of the growth of other boroughs. Moreover, since 1933 its prestige has declined because it has been less successful than the Bronx and Brooklyn organizations in electing its candidates. The position of Tammany leaders within the party has been further undermined by Roosevelt, whose animus against them dates back to 1932, when at Smith's behest they opposed his nomination. This hostility, among other things, has deprived them of choice federal patronage such as federal judiciary appointments. In Bronx and Brooklyn these have been guided by organization recommendations, but in Manhattan appointments Tammany has been ignored. Power to decide party policy and select candidates now reposes in Bronx and Brooklyn leaders, and the Democratic candidate will be designated by them.

Although there are no definite indications of who will be the candidate, the two names most frequently mentioned are William O'Dwyer, Brooklyn district attorney who cleaned up Murder, Inc., and Sam Foley, Bronx district attorney and close associate of the national chairman of the Democratic Party, Bronx Democratic boss Ed Flynn. Flynn's recent offer to withdraw Foley is part of some intricate bargaining with Brooklyn leaders, and does not necessarily remove him from the picture. In any case, O'Dwyer would make the better candidate because he is more widely known and has a forceful personality and a good labor record, acquired during a term as Brooklyn county judge. Brooklyn Democrats like O'Dwyer, and he is popular among Tammany leaders. Some of the latter are skeptical of the kind of mayor he would make because, as one of them told the writer, "O'Dwyer was a cop and he'd probably think that everybody was a crook. He'd lean over backwards and be hard to deal with." The same leader suggested that Foley might make a less effective campaigner but a better mayor. "Foley," he said, "has a reputation for honesty, but would be less difficult than O'Dwyer." Either O'Dwyer or Foley probably could win easily against any candidate but LaGuardia.

However, it is fairly certain that LaGuardia will run, although he has not yet announced his candidacy. It is even reported that Roosevelt is trying to get the Democratic nomination for him. Flynn, who holds the whip hand in New York Democratic politics by virtue of his control of state and federal patronage, intimated as much several weeks ago in a speech in North Carolina. But an effort to impose LaGuardia on the Democratic Party probably would fail. The opposition of Tammany, in Manhattan, and of embittered district leaders in other boroughs could thwart it. The attempt, moreover, would disrupt the Democratic organization sufficiently to insure LaGuardia's victory should he then turn around and accept the nomination from a Republican-Fusion-American Labor Party alliance. Even indorsement by Roosevelt, who is indebted to LaGuardia for his help in the last Presidential campaign, might easily have the same effect.

LaGuardia as a Democratic Party candidate seems incongruous, but some Democrats feel that his nomination might be good strategy. It would guarantee the election of every other important Democratic candidate without a knock-down-and-drag-out fight. LaGuardia would be mayor, but he would be a hostage of the Democratic Party—a restless, irascible, vitriolic hostage, but a hostage none the less. The strategy has a precedent; in 1903 Boss Murphy placed two leading Fusionists on the Tammany ticket.

The outcome of a straight contest between LaGuardia and O'Dwyer or Foley or any candidate of equal caliber who has the solid backing of the Democratic Party is difficult to predict at this point without the aid of a crystal globe. LaGuardia has been an excellent mayor, and he has enormous personal popularity and the advantage of office. On the other hand, it is questionable that these can compensate for the decline in organizational support caused by the weakening of Fusion and the Labor Party. In 1937 Fusion polled 159,000 votes for LaGuardia, but there is little chance that it now can muster more than 100,000. A factor which may cut further into the Fusion vote is that last year many influential Fusion backers supported Willkie and were indignant over LaGuardia's stand for Roosevelt. Obviously the same is true of numerous Republicans. It hardly seems within the realm of political possibility that the Republican Party will bolt LaGuardia entirely, since that would mean forfeiting the very tangible benefits of their association. But there is a chance that sections of the Republican organization might find inducements for doing so.

The Labor Party's 483,000 votes in 1937 probably will dwindle to less than 300,000. Its inability to poll more than 317,000 for Roosevelt last November is an indication of this. Moreover, important sections of the party, notably the New York County organization, are under Communist influence, and hostile to the Mayor. Ironically, the labor vote which supplied his margin of victory in 1937 may prove LaGuardia's undoing in 1941. The left-wing C. I. O. unions which provided his most vigorous labor advocates in the last election now view him with disfavor. The old-line A. F. of L. unions have always been Tammany adjuncts and can be counted on to remain in the Democratic camp. A candidate like O'Dwyer would enable them to do so without losing face. Barring Roosevelt's indorsement or some unexpected turn of events, these influences could pull LaGuardia's vote below the victory line. Only a first-rate conflict in the Democratic Party, like the one which hopelessly split it in 1933, would permit the election of any Republican candidate other than LaGuardia.

What is important is that no matter who emerges as mayor next November, the old Democratic machines will still be around and dominant. They will control the City Council and possibly the Board of Estimate and other key positions. Without a drastic change of fortune for either Fusion or the Labor Party, which there is no reason to expect, LaGuardia's reelection would simply postpone their complete capture of the city. Democratic leaders intimate that the party has reformed and that if they are intrusted with office there will be no repetition of the Walker scandals. Some of them may even believe this, but talk of a reformed Democratic Party is absurd.

The shift of leadership from Tammany to the Flynn and Kelly machines in Bronx and Brooklyn does not pre-empt any change in ethics or policy. Once back in office, it no doubt would refrain from the more obvious forms of corruption—at least until it was firmly entrenched. But the Olvanys, Marinellis, and (Tin-Box) Farleys are still the party's ruling types in municipal politics, and they will continue to shape its character. A person like O'Dwyer or former United States Attorney John Cahill, a Flynn man who may turn out to be the Democratic dark horse, would compel some restraint, but sooner or later characteristics ingrained by more than a century of looting public funds would come to the top.

The return of the party under whose aegis the old Board of Aldermen came to be known as the "Den of Forty Thieves," might have another, more ominous aspect. The New York Democratic Party has always been under the thumb of conservative elements and has been a reactionary force in state and national politics. There is no contradiction between this and Flynn's adherence to the New Deal, which is about as deep-rooted as that of the Southern Democrats, and has the same motivation. At a time when liberal forces in the national Democratic Party are hard pressed to find allies, control of the city could make New York Democrats a powerful foe.

Liberty and Action

BY BENEDETTO CROCE

A MORE special examination is needed of the concept of liberty in relation to action, not now viewed as the criterion of historical interpretation or as general moral direction, but as determinate action in determinate circumstances. If we omit from our survey of the sphere of practice the eternally Vulgar of mankind—those exclusively intent (or intent in the degree of their vulgarity) upon their private business, upon the means of subsistence, upon comfort and pleasure; and if we consider only true men, animated by the earnest search for the common good and so by the moral ideal—those who effectively carry forward mankind with their work—all such are, intrinsically, representatives of liberty. They vary, certainly; they disagree and fight each other on particular issues, but the historical result, which emerges through cooperation, composition, and elision from their different or contrary tendencies, is the creation of a new and richer form of life, and thereby involves the progress of liberty.

The same thing is to be said of the parties which are based upon the variety of men and their problems and tendencies, and designate their changeable groupings. These, provided that they have moral worth and consistency, that is, the will for the common good, and are not mere factions and bands, are also all intrinsically liberal.

Now, if this is how things are, how is it that in the past people have spoken, and even now speak, of a liberal party, specifically liberal, which seems to wish to claim for itself the prestige of liberty? Is there then a party which is not a historical formation or subject to contingency, which champions a philosophical and eternal principle, a philosophical party among political parties, something more and something less than they, and at bottom different, something which therefore does not connect well with them, and like an interloper or intruder becomes tiresome and may seem even ridiculous?

Nothing of the sort. The liberal party is really a party, because it represents a historical situation, and its name, which, like all names, has good etymological rather than logical reasons, is the name of a political party and not of a philosophical school. Its historical character leaps to the eye directly one tries to carry the name to epochs other than its own. Thirst for liberty, fights for liberty, the glory of liberty emerge from every period of history—liberty "which is so dear, as they know who give up their lives for her." Nevertheless, there was no party properly and consciously liberal in the medieval hierarchy, or in the freedom of Greece and Rome, or even in the early centuries of the modern era, when people were working to free themselves from feudalism and theocracy, and fashioning the arms and the rule of the absolute monarchies.

The liberal party came into existence to challenge at one and the same time the outworn and exhausted absolute monarchies and the no less outworn and empty ecclesiastical absolutisms, Catholic or otherwise. Having run through a sort of pre-history in the struggles for freedom of conscience, in the English revolution, in the period of "Illuminism," and in the French Revolution, it took form and consolidated itself after the fall of Napoleonic dictatorship and for a century was the dominating factor in European life. In its days of power, like any other party which wins to office, the liberal party made use of the strong hand: it enjoyed or procured the support of certain economic classes, behaved variously in various countries, from time to time carried out necessary agreements and transactions, customary in the world of affairs and so in the world of political affairs. Yet in so doing it did not lose and squander amid material considerations of circumstances and methods that liberty of which igneus est vigor et caelestis origo, liberty which is spiritual and moral strength, operating certainly by means of those circumstances and with those practical methods, but never coinciding with them or resolving itself into them. It was said and it was repeated that, when it had risen to rule and become well established in power, and had passed beyond the danger of counter-offensives by the former regimes, the liberal party then lost its splendid virtues, enthusiasm, dash, self-dedication, readiness to fight and to lose its life for the sake of its soul. And cries of distress and alarm were raised as its accustomed forms, the well-marked political divisions of conservatives and liberals, of right and left, and so on, were seen to disappear and to be succeeded by other more prosaic divisions on special or economic questions. None the less it was natural that all this should happen, and that when the war was over the warlike spirit of the past time should be laid down with the weapons of war. The triumph of the liberal party carried in itself, as its logical correlative, the gradual end of that party itself, which had accomplished its goal, and which in order to be of further service had to become something else, had in fact to yield its place to something else.

It was not properly speaking the liberal party—already in some sort thrust into retirement as the effect of its own victory—that entered, as they say, upon a period of decadence and crisis. It was the liberal settlement, which it had advocated and realized and consolidated, that began to be plotted against, threatened, and undermined by a double range of forces, related to each other but not identical. In the range of the intellect these forces were the check to mental, dialectic, and historical modes of thought, modes which had been initiated toward the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century, and prevailed in the first half of this latter century, but were now ousted by positivist materialism, and later by a species of irrationalism and mysticism. In the range of social affairs the forces at work were the profound economic changes which robbed certain classes of importance and increased that of others, indeed almost dissolved some while bringing others almost newly into existence or to positions of extraordinary power. This is not the place to describe a process which in its essential lines is clear to everybody's mind, in its past and present development and acceleration.

Questions badly framed and answers worthy of them, solutions which solve nothing, and stupid proposals have followed in the train of this so-called "crisis." The chief and commonest of these brings into doubt the very principle of liberty, and inquires whether human life cannot be better conducted by substituting for thought and criticism an instilled and obligatory belief, and for the deliberations of the will, obedience—an inquiry shown up by the mere formulation of it as unworthy of further discussion. Many, too, are those who resort to the reading of omens to determine whether the future belongs to liberty, or to authority, or to slavery, revealing an anxiety sometimes perhaps not without a hint of nobility. This anxiety, however, directing itself to the solution of a fantastic theoretical problem and vainly circling around it, can but increase to the point of agony and delay recourse to the only means to health, which is to follow the never uncertain path of duty and to nourish in oneself and in others the virtues of liberty.

It is obvious that the great ages of poetry and art are followed, as Dante would say, by the gross ages, and none the less we always long for and desire and prepare with zeal and effort for the coming of the ever-flourishing and classic beauty; so, too, the great ages of thought relax and are succeeded by an age of mere echoers, compilers, or, indeed, by positively forgetful and unintelligent generations, yet the ideal always remains thought, which creates truth, and never becomes not-thought, nor do we devoutly prepare ourselves to become stupid and shortsighted in honor of a stupid and shortsighted century. Not otherwise is it with the ages of liberty, moments of moral brilliance which yield to periods of less splendor and force, of uncertain light, or even of darkness and night. In this extreme case we rediscover the meaning of Vico's cursus and recursum, and of Goethe's saying that God, when he sees a society increasing in wisdom and understanding, but necessarily ever less energetic because less pugnacious, wearies of it, and breaks the universe into fragments to make room for a new creation. Nevertheless, when periods of barbarism and violence are approaching it is only for the vile and the foolish that the ideal becomes unfreedom and slavery; for others it remains that which alone can be called human, the only ideal which always works. We always tend toward liberty and work for it even when we seem to be working for something else; liberty is realized in every thought and in every action that has the character of truth, poetry, and goodness.

Moral action, then, must not be governed by what is about to happen in the near future, or by what will happen when it happens. For if we suppose that human society enters for one or two centuries, or even for a thousand years, upon a condition of servitude, that is to say, of liberty attenuated and reduced to a minimum, of the least possible creativity, approximating the condition of animals, this incident—an incident as short against eternity as a wink of the eye—does not affect morality, does not interfere with its task, or change it. This task is ever to kindle liberty from liberty, and from time to time to select the means and materials adapted to this end. And since new adversaries have moved against it, taking the place of those that, like the absolute monarchies, had been vanquished, while others, weary but not extinguished, have again scrambled to their feet, or at least to their knees, the liberal party, which had been thrust or had thrust itself into retirement for lack of adversaries, today finds the adversaries and with them the ideal conditions for fresh activity.

But at this point the greatest doubts and objections are usually raised, because, it is argued, a liberal party cannot work effectively when the actual conditions in which it was formed and worked in the past no longer exist. For example, there is no longer the same local life and local autonomy, no longer a landlord class which has the capacity and the leisure to take part in the administration and government of public affairs and to pursue political studies, no longer are there industrialists interested in competition and in free trade among nations.

In place of these, we see everywhere the centralization of administration and government, masses of city workers and agricultural laborers with their respective mass leaders, industrial monopolies, and so on. What such noble minds as De Tocqueville, in the middle of the nineteenth century, and Italians of the right after 1870, caught a glimpse of as they reflected on the future of liberty, seems now to have happened, and that in an irreparable fashion. The facts have turned against the liberal settlement, and we are invited to resign ourselves to mass governments and to dictatorships.

Those who make this objection forget, in propounding the material conditions, that the fundamental and sole necessary condition for a liberal party is the rebirth of oppression or tyranny, whether lay or ecclesiastical, whatever its particular forms may be (demagoguery, dictatorship, Bolshevism, and so forth)—the thesis which substantially provokes its antithesis. And they forget it because, unaware or ignorant of its igneus vigor and its caelestis origo, which we have recalled, they fallaciously posit liberty as a material and economic fact among material and economic facts. Hence it is natural that they consider it finished with the material conditions with which at one time it was bound up and consider that it cannot be restored until those conditions are reproduced.

"WAIT, MAYBE I DON'T GO! I AIN'T SO SLEEPY.."

But why should liberty desert the world, and man descend from being a man to being a slave or a sheep, just because, instead of the few roads and the poor communications of other days, human society has now at its disposal railways and airways, telegraphs and telephones and radio, means of understanding which facilitate centralization of government and business? Or because, instead of individual cultivation of land, we are now adopting or may adopt agricultural associations or even state agricultural institutions; and instead of free trade, trade which is more or less regulated? Liberty has no objection to make, in principle, to these or similar economic changes, if calculation and economic experience, which are alone competent in these matters, approve of them, in the given conditions, as more useful and more productive than others. Liberty objects to and opposes only this: nationalization of the soul, the sale of that which cannot be sold; and it accepts or rejects all economic changes only with regard to this, its supreme principle.

The premises having been thus reestablished in their true aspect, the correct conclusion to be reasonably drawn is not that a liberal party has nothing more to do in the world and is henceforth, as the journalists say, an "anachronism," but rather that it has enough and too much to do because the antithesis of its thesis has arisen. But a liberal party cannot do its work with the same means that it once used, because its antithesis has not the same form that it used to have. Therefore it has to look for new means, and, constant in its goal, faithful to its own religion, it must renew itself on the practical side, must study other methods of penetrating into minds and hearts, ally itself with other interests, and give life to a new ruling class.

And if someone asks that the program of the regenerated liberal party should be particularized and that the precise norms for carrying out its intention should be described, the request can be met with a smile at the simple-minded questioner. What he would like is to possess, in a few short rules, what must be a varied and complex movement finding its way as it makes it and its means to action in acting, a labor of good sense, of course, of patience, of practical and political skill, of greater or of smaller scope as it may be, not waiting upon programs but putting itself into action every day and every instant. And, to clear up this assertion by an example, in this very instant the writer of these pages is in his way collaborating toward that end, dissipating the clouds of certain bad political reasonings and allowing to flow in with the rays of the sun a little of that warmth of which the need is great. Strong impulses, the opening of new ways to action, resolutions in moments of crisis are more especially reserved for the apostles and political geniuses. There is no reason to suppose that there will be less of these in a world which has need of them, and by its own efforts and labors strives to call them into existence.

The Case of the Spanish Jewels

BY LOUIS FISCHER

TOWARD the end of 1938 the Spanish Republican government rented a handsome villa in Deauville, one of the most fashionable seashore resorts in France. In the villa lived several well-dressed men and several beautiful Spanish ladies. They led the life of rich South Americans spending the season at the playground of Europe's high society.

As Franco's army pushed closer to Barcelona in December, 1938, Dr. Juan Negrín, Loyalist Prime Minister, began to worry about the government's treasures. When the civil war started in 1936, many wealthy Spanish aristocrats, landlords, and industrial magnates fled Republican territory precipitately and could not smuggle out their jewels. The Republic gathered up these fabulously valuable gems. It ransacked private mansions and palaces in the mountains. Its agents tapped walls to find secret safes. In the deserted house of a countess of ancient lineage in Madrid, they confiscated a cache in which was a necklace of black pearls, a diamond tiara, and like knickknacks, worth several million dollars. Similar valuables left in bank vaults by Fascists who were executed or imprisoned were added to the government hoard. Some of the jewels were family heirlooms that had been brought from the Golconda in India when sixteenth-century Spanish explorers sailed around the Cape of Good Hope in search of the wealth of the East.

All articles were carefully catalogued and described. A special guard responsible to Dr. Negrín was put in charge of the collection. Negrín told them they would pay with their lives if anything happened to it.

The entire treasure was in the city of Figueras, near the French border. It had been transferred to that town shortly after the beginning of the siege of Madrid. There was a hoary fortress at Figueras with several subterranean levels which no aerial bomb could demolish.

No one person ever had access to the treasure. Nothing could be taken from it without the written permission of the entire board of custody, which consisted of officials of the Finance Ministry. When the League of Nations' commission which counted the foreign volunteers in Loyalist Spain prior to their repatriation finished its labors, Dr. Negrín and Alvarez del Vayo, the Foreign Minister, wished to show their appreciation of its impartial efforts by giving its chairman, the Finnish General Jalander, and its secretary, Lieutenant Colonel Basch of France, two small presents in the form of inexpensive jewelry. They had to make a special request of the board of custody, which voted to grant it.

As the front crept nearer to Figueras, Negrín gave orders to have the entire treasure transported to the chic villa in Deauville. But this was merely a temporary expedient, for if the Loyalist regime collapsed, the jewels would not be safe from the French authorities or from Franco spies. Spanish Fascists had been reported loitering in the vicinity of the villa. Negrín therefore gave instructions for the purchase of an ocean-going yacht.

Catalonia fell. Half a million Spaniards preferred exile in France to life with General Franco. Negrín, Del Vayo, Azaña, and other Loyalist leaders also took refuge in France. Negrín immediately ordered his officials to remove the jewels from France to the Western Hemisphere.

One night in the second week of February, 1939, the well-dressed inhabitants of the Deauville villa put on working clothes and carried huge cases filled with diamonds, sapphires, emeralds, pearls, and gold and platinum jewelry down to the sea and loaded them on the yacht Vita. The estimated value of the jewels was $50,000,000. The cargo also contained strong-boxes packed tight with stocks and bonds.

The treasure on the Vita was in charge of Señor Puente, a young officer in the Carabineros who had just been promoted to the rank of colonel. He belonged to the Spanish Socialist Party, and Prime Minister Negrín trusted him. Negrín instructed Colonel Puente to place the jewels in the safe-keeping of President Cárdenas of Mexico. They would remain in Mexico until a favorable turn in the wheel of history made it possible for the anti-fascist Republicans to return to Spain and set up a government. Then the treasure would constitute the Republic's financial foundation stone.

The Vita, under Colonel Puente, left Deauville at full speed, and its swift engines carried it quickly away from the shores of Europe toward America. Then it slackened its pace and cruised leisurely. It stopped in a West Indies port to refuel and take on fresh water and food.

Meanwhile, Dr. José Puche, Chief of the Health Service of the Republican army, was racing from Europe to Mexico to act as Negrín's contact man with President Cárdenas.

Colonel Puente was an old admirer of Indelacio Prieto, veteran Socialist leader and former Loyalist Minister of War. Prieto had been ousted from the government by Negrín and sent as Spain's special plenipotentiary to the inauguration of Pedro Aguirre Cerda, the new Chilean Popular Front President. That decorative mission completed, Prieto, filled with resentment against Negrín for having supplanted him and eliminated him from active participation in Spanish politics, took up residence in Mexico City.

From the high seas Colonel Puente sent a radio to Prieto in Mexico. When the yacht Vita anchored at a Mexican port, its jewels were turned over to Prieto. Negrín's special emissary, Dr. Puche, arrived too late.

When the Spanish war ended, Dr. Negrín himself went to Mexico and saw President Cárdenas. He also tried to see Prieto. However, Prieto refused to meet him. An acrimonious exchange of letters took place between Prieto and Negrín. One of Negrín's letters was thirty-eight pages long. Nothing helped. The Mexican government denies that it has any legal control over the Vita's treasure. Prieto has full access to it and can from time to time attempt to market its gems and valuable papers. Negrín has lost it. Prieto could use the money to assist Spanish refugees.

The beautiful Vita, flying the flag of Panama, rides at anchor in the harbor of Acapulco, Mexico.

Hitler Loses Greenland

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

IT WAS inevitable that the United States should take action about Greenland. Hitler's designs on this last Danish colony antedate his invasion of Denmark. Years before that invasion he had begun to fan the flames of the ancient feud over this strategic island, with a view to pocketing it at the moment when the two lawful claimants were going at each other's throats. It has long been known in Scandinavia that those activist Norwegians who, under the name of "Dansk-Norsk Ordning," agitated for a reoccupation of Greenland, despite the Hague Court decision in favor of Denmark, were among Quisling's most servile followers. A good example of them, and one of the most fanatic, is Gulbrand Lunde, Minister of Education and Propaganda in the Quisling government.

Since the occupation of Denmark and Norway by the Germans last April, the Quislingists have been highpressuring Berlin for a new "arbitration" that would take Greenland from Denmark and place it under Norwegian sovereignty, as part of the price for the Norwegian Nazis' recent active, if inefficient, intervention in the war—as compared with Denmark's stolid passive resistance. The idea was well received in Berlin because it fitted Germany's own military schemes so well. After "awarding" Greenland to the dummy government in Oslo, the Nazis could have occupied the island in Norway's name. This seemed the easiest way to settle the issue in a pseudo-legal manner, for the Danish government would probably have refused active help in a seizure of Greenland by the Nazis.

Its recalcitrant attitude was clearly evident in the bold action of the Danish minister in Washington, Henrik de Kauffmann, both on the Greenland question and in the matter of the seized Danish ships. Few representatives of subjugated countries have displayed such courage. However, given the mentality of the Nazis and their complete power in Copenhagen, it was obvious that Mr. de Kauffmann's days as the official representative of King Christian in this country were numbered. Although he undoubtedly acted with at least the left-handed support of the Danish King and his Cabinet, it was inevitable that the Nazis would quickly force Copenhagen to repudiate the agreement and to disavow or recall its minister to the United States.

Greenland has popped up again and again as one of Denmark's hottest issues. The Danish Nazis have always accused Prime Minister Stauning of planning to sell the island to the United States, one way or another. As late as November, 1940, the Danish Nazi organ Faedrelandet (the Fatherland)—now also called Forraedrelandet (the Traitors' Land)—violently assailed Stauning because he had done nothing to prevent the United States from "establishing air bases in Greenland."

At the time such air bases had not yet been constructed but they were doubtless being prepared. What probably caused this outburst of Nazi wrath was the interception of a German "meteorological" expedition of some fifty armed men by the Norwegian gunboat Fridtjof Nansen, which was patrolling the Greenland waters in cooperation with the British. The Nazis were captured and interned as soon as they set foot on the Greenland coast. About the same time, Norman Davis, an emissary of the American Red Cross, uncovered on a visit to Greenland the beginnings of a Nazi fifth column. It was operating there under the leadership of a Herr Moritz, a German citizen who had come to the island on the pretext of dealing in seal hides and fats, but who actually had been sent to pave the way for a coming occupation.

German strategists have long been toying with the idea of an Arctic Blitzkrieg that would bring all of the Danish island possessions (Greenland, Iceland, the Faroes) under Nazi domination. The coup was to be carried out by a force of seaplanes and seaplane-carriers stationed at Trondheim in Norway, the nearest point to the islands. If successful, it would have brought about the almost complete encirclement of Great Britain.

There is another interesting aspect of the Greenland question. For some time rumors have been rife in Scandinavia that King Christian of Denmark has had his fill of German "protection." It would seem to be only a matter of months, perhaps weeks, before the King abdicates and the present government resigns. Such a move would doubtless be followed by the setting up of a free Danish government like the several governments-in-exile now operating abroad. Although Greenland may not be suitable as the seat even of a government in exile, it would be an asset in any attempt to reconquer the Danish mother-country from abroad. Economically of course Greenland is more of a liability than an asset, although it possesses the most valuable cryolite mines in the world. But it has great strategic importance by virtue of its position on one of the principal North Atlantic sea lanes.

Everybody's Business

Bankers Hate Competition

AFTER long and patient investigation and extensive public hearings, at which all interested parties were given an opportunity to express their views, the SEC has decided to enforce competitive bidding in connection with the issue of new securities, or the sale of outstanding ones, by all registered public-utility holding companies or their operating subsidiaries. The new rule applies not only to issues underwritten by bankers and offered to the public but also to private placements. That means that an insurance company which wants to buy a whole bond issue from a utility company will no longer be able to make a private bargain but will have to submit its sealed bid in competition with other institutional investors and bankers.

This provision may give some slight consolation to the investment bankers as a body, since they have been complaining about the way they were losing business through private placements, but it will not reconcile the small Wall Street group whose long-standing near-monopoly of high-class utility issues is seriously threatened by the new rule. Their indignation is likely to be heightened by the knowledge that a great deal of issuing business, which under the old "tied-house" system would surely have fallen into their laps, is now in prospect, owing to the progress being made in breaking up the utility holding companies. In the course of integrating their properties these companies must dispose of extraneous interests, and consequently large blocks of securities now in their portfolios will be offered to the public. After May 7 all such offerings, when a total of more than $1,000,000 is involved, will have to be thrown open to competitive bidding by prospective underwriters.

The elimination of banker influence over utility managements is a duty clearly laid upon the SEC by Congress. The Public Utility Act of 1935 requires the commission to withhold approval of a security issue if it finds that "the terms and conditions of the issue or sale of the security are detrimental to the public interest or to the interest of investors or consumers." Such interests, Section 1 of the act states, are injured "when subsidiary public-utility companies enter into transactions in which evils result from an absence of arm's-length bargaining or from restraints of free and independent competition."

In attempting to insure arm's-length bargaining in respect of utility security issues, the SEC has hitherto relied on a rule prohibiting the payment of any underwriter's fee, except where participation was limited to 5 per cent of the total offering, to any affiliate unless the affiliate had been awarded the securities as the most favorable bidder in open competition. But this rule proved difficult to enforce. Leading investment bankers continued to negotiate, as managing underwriters, with concerns to which they were affiliated. When the SEC challenged their right to obtain an underwriting fee, they always blandly denied that any affiliation existed between them and the utility concerned. In more than one instance such denials have irresistibly reminded me of the equally vehement protests habitually made by notorious followers of "the party line" when it has been suggested that they are affiliated with the Communist Party. Under such circumstances some weight must be given to constructive evidence. In explaining the transmission of sound and light our physicists have been forced to hypothecate the intangible something they call ether; so too we can only account for the concentration of utility underwriting among a handful of Wall Street houses by hypothecating an invisible but magnetic link between them and certain electrical empires.

Such a link, the SEC recently ruled, exists between Morgan, Stanley and Company and the Dayton Power and Light Company, and as a result it ordered the surrender of an impounded underwriting fee earned by the investment bankers in connection with the Dayton company's bond issue in February, 1940. The ruling pointed out that partners of J. P. Morgan and Company held a large part of the preferred stock of Morgan, Stanley and Company and thus had an incentive to get business for the latter. Further, it was asserted, J. P. Morgan and Company occupied an influential position in the United Corporation, a holding company they had organized in 1929, so that its wishes in regard to the choice of an underwriter for the corporation or its subsidiaries would carry unusual weight. As the Dayton Power and Light Company was controlled by Columbia Gas and Electric Corporation, which in turn was a subsidiary of United Corporation, the SEC came to the conclusion that negotiations between the Dayton company and Morgan, Stanley and Company were of the arm-in-arm rather than of the arm's-length variety. This inference Morgan, Stanley and Company hotly challenged, declaring that the decision of the SEC was "not based on facts but . . . on what the commission thinks was liable to happen. Such a result belongs to the world of make-believe." In other words, the SEC has no right to assume that the consistency with which United Corporation has handed its underwriting first to J. P. Morgan and Company, and then, when these bankers gave up their investment business, to Morgan, Stanley and Company, is evidence of anything but a purely platonic friendship. It seems easier to believe in ether.

Under the new competitive-bidding rule there will no longer be any necessity for long arguments about affiliation. Every utility holding company or subsidiary of a holding company will, when issuing securities, be obliged to invite bids and award the underwriting to the banker offering the most favorable terms. Opponents of this rule claim it must lead to overpricing and will thus prove injurious to investors. But, as in any other open market, overpricing of securities will provide its own corrective. If a banker is awarded an issue of bonds at 105 and finds on reoffering them at 107 that investors consider the price too dear, he will suffer a loss, and the next time both he and his competitors will be more cautious. On the other hand, underpricing, which is very apt to occur when issues are sold by private negotiation, means that the company concerned is burdened with higher charges than market conditions warrant, and this is detrimental to all its existing security holders.

An even stranger objection, which has been seriously advanced by banking interests, is that the enforcement of competitive bidding would interfere with free enterprise. Thus the National Association of Security Dealers in a memorandum presented to the SEC declared: "Compulsory competitive bidding would lead in practice toward complete government control of the market." Really, it is time a movement was launched to introduce Adam Smith to Wall Street.

In the Wind

A NEW POLITICAL PARTY which will follow the Communist line on foreign and domestic problems may come into being shortly. The American People's Meeting, convened in New York on April 5, appointed a committee to draw up plans for the new organization. It will be based to a large extent on the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party, now virtually controlled by Communists, the left-wing of the American Labor Party, and the remnants of the Washington Commonwealth Federation. John L. Lewis may head it.

THE REUTHER PLAN has been rejected, according to the American Machinist, manufacturers' journal, because it would mean "labor participation in management" rather than because of "the irrelevant arguments as to whether the plan could actually produce 500 planes a day."

IN NORWAY the Nazis are trying to stimulate the sale of their publications by offering as prizes autographed pictures of Quisling, copies of a book by him, or a day spent in his company. The sales remain small.

AMERICAN Trotskyists are enjoying a boom. Their newspaper, the Militant, formerly the Appeal, has increased in size, thanks largely to contributions from people who admired Trotsky and wished to help his political heirs after his murder. The Trotsky Memorial Fund has far overshot the expected mark.

THE DEAN OF CANTERBURY, author of "The Soviet Power" and current idol of American fellow-travelers, visited Ivan Maisky, Russian ambassador to Great Britain, a short time after the last Soviet election. Immediately upon being introduced the Dean said: "First let me congratulate you on your government's remarkable victory at the polls."

ELIZABETH DILLING, author of "The Red Network," now writes under the name of the Reverend Frank Woodruff Johnson. As the Reverend Mr. Johnson she is the author of a book called "The Octopus," an anti-Semitic tract which is being widely circulated by American fascists.

A FEW WEEKS ago a Guatemala City evening paper printed a letter criticizing the government. Immediately the rumor was spread that this unheard-of event was designed to prove to the just-arrived editor of The Nation that freedom of the press existed in General Ubico's tight little dictatorship.

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Gone with the Mules

SYMPATHY for the tenant farmer is spreading in spite of the war. This is what they tell me in the office of the organization for share-croppers in New York. I know the ladies of the New Hampshire Federation of Women's Clubs have asked to hear a speech about him in May. The ladies' interest in the tenant farmer is splendid, but it is also a little late.

Tenancy is decreasing. Indeed, in the group of states where the plight of the tenant farmer has seemed saddest—the sixteen Southern states from Maryland through Texas—the figures show that there were nearly 350,000 fewer tenants in 1940 than there were ten years before. Those who hoped to abolish tenancy can cheer. Cheer again: land ownership in the same region is increasing. There are nearly 150,000 more farmers who own their own land than there were in 1930, and land ownership has always been the pattern of the American dream.

But if the ladies of New Hampshire and elsewhere will excuse me, I am not going to wave any flags until I have done a little problem in subtraction:

Fewer tenants	339,047
More landowners	143,048

That 195,999 is not a figure in pure mathematics. Every item in it is a family of people unaccounted for in the statistics. They are the families which have been pushed even out of the status which touched hearts as far north as New Hampshire. There are more like them. Rural populations have increased while the chance to be even a tenant has declined.

Take Mississippi. Everybody does take it when they want scenes and statistics of sadness. It has 11,315 more landowners than it had in 1930. It also has 32,798 fewer tenants. That means that at least 21,483 families which once may have deserved our sympathy as tenants have now not even that precarious and sometimes seemingly persecuted relationship with the land. They have been set free from tenancy, which means they are free to squat in idleness, to stand on small-town street corners, to hope only for occasional day labor—free to starve but for the intervention of relief. Share-cropping begins to look like a system of security which white men and black men once had but now have lost.

The explanations are simple; possibly they indicate progress. In every Southern state which had as many as 100,000 tenants in 1930, the average size of the farms had increased by 1940. A strange thing is that when the Farm Security Administration helps tenants to buy land, it has in most cases insisted on farms larger than the average in the neighborhood. Sensible farmers did the same thing—when they could. Farms of adequate size are essential for farmer security, but adequate-size farms in most Southern states are within reach of fewer people than the Southern land contains. Profitable farming practices have put wider acreages to work with fewer men, and the heartless plantation owner with the machine is changing a South which, recent statistics show, has more than half the country's farmers but less than a fifth of the country's farm implements.

Man's story is the mule's, but sadder. Man and mule worked so long together in the South. Burrhead and redneck moved up the cotton rows behind the good, brown, much-respected beast. They understood each other and sometimes they thought they understood the land and the cotton—at least until they took the cotton to the gin. Now man is separated not only from the land but from the mule also. More than a million mules disappeared from the Southern scene during the ten years before they were counted in 1940. But last fall Milo Perkins reported that there were a million more people on the cotton farms of the South at the beginning of the present war than there were when the first world war began. Maybe men ought to die like the mules. Maybe men ought to breed with at least a mule-dealer's understanding of possibilities. They don't. In the South they will not soon. There is no such religious opposition to birth control in the South as there is in New England, nor any such general practice of it either.

The share-cropper may disappear. The people who once could hope to be share-croppers will not. They will be fed or they will steal. They would just as soon steal a factory as a hen. Indeed, when the situation was less acute, New Hampshire blamed them in part for the collapse of the state's biggest cotton mill. The people who could once hope to be share-croppers will not mind the accusation again. They will be glad to deserve it. Maybe the ladies in New Hampshire are wise, even if they are late, in wanting to hear about share-cropping. It may be high time they began to listen. And if I were going to talk to them, I'd say, "Look out, ladies, Mississippi is a good deal closer than you think it is." And I'd hate to see New Hampshire gone with the mules.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE annual report of the New York Public Library tells us what we already knew: that the reading of books dropped sharply during the Blitzkrieg days of last spring and summer as the result of that obsession with newspapers and the radio which all of us experienced. In general, literature tends to fall not only into disuse but into disrepute in such times as the present. The writer who has the strength to go on writing according to his bent and his conscience is likely to be considered weak or irresponsible. Similarly, though a great deal of lip-service is paid to the "heritage of the past," which is distorted to fit its particular use, all the circumstances conspire to persuade us, as readers, that it is almost a moral duty to keep up with the latest edition of today's newspaper, and that, conversely, any desire to experience the resolutions and pleasures of "pure" literature is at best queer, at worst an unworthy impulse to escape. No one would expect a prize fighter to fight all evening with no time out for rest and refreshment, but if you are caught reading Dante or Jane Austen between the rounds of the war of nerves you are likely to be considered not quite patriotic.

Especially in the United States, where this suspicion of "the classics" is endemic, the tendency toward literature-baiting is likely to grow. It is a stupid and self-defeating attitude rising out of an ignorance, induced by non-reading, of the reasons that motivate the desire to "escape" into the republic of letters—a desire which one encounters these days, despite the general disapproval, in strange as well as in familiar places.

One of the primary appeals of the great literature of the past in a time of disorder, though less obvious than some others, is outlined, in a different context, by T. S. Eliot in Tradition and the Individual Talent, one of the essays in "The Sacred Wood." The historical sense, he writes, "compels a man to write not merely with his own generation in his bones, but with a feeling that the whole of the literature of Europe from Homer, and within it the whole of the literature of his own country, has a simultaneous existence and composes a simultaneous order." And again, "The existing monuments [of literature] form an ideal order in themselves. . . ." It can be described as an order because all great art has sprung from a common and unifying source, the human mind and imagination driven by the two compulsions, for free play and, paradoxically, for some kind of system—of religion, philosophy, politics, or art—that will transcend and establish control over contemporary chaos, personal or social. Most of the particular systems have fallen of their own inadequacy; what remains to us are the "monuments" of idea, form, and evocation which comprise Mr. Eliot's "ideal order."

It is these elements of order, underlying unity, and cumulative, uncoercive authority—and the fact that even a skeptic can accept the poets' miracles of Dante and Shakespeare—that make the "sacred wood" a source of strength and renewal when the times are out of joint. And so if I were a committee-fancier, I should advocate as one form of defense against fascism at home and abroad, not a subtle burning of the books but an Association for the Actual Reading of the Great Works of Literature. I specify actual reading, for one characteristic of the sacred wood is that it does not exist until one enters it; but actually to enter it is to acquire a historical sense, to oppose to what may seem to schoolgirls a tidal "wave of the future," not the all-too-feeble breakwater of contemporary and negative "anti-fascism," but the firm shore of a past which nevertheless "has a simultaneous existence" and composes an order simultaneous with the present. As Benedetto Croce declares in the title of his new book, history is in essence the story of liberty. That is doubly true of great literature; and actually to read it is to gain a fresh faith in the invincibility of the free human spirit which it is the primary and futile purpose of fascism to destroy.

Croce's book, by the way, has been received with acclaim in England. The Manchester Guardian, according to a cable to the American publisher from George Allen and Unwin, declared that the "greatest living Italian has struck blow for liberty," while the Spectator called it the "most powerful because most profound statement of the principles for which we are fighting."

Also by the way, I should like to register my profound disgust with one of the most recent examples of literature-baiting, the publicity-seeking announcement of Books Abroad, a journal published at the University of Oklahoma, that the "Divine Comedy" had won the most votes in a poll of "eminent critics" to determine the world's worst book. Twenty-six "critics" (the quotation marks are mine), according to Publishers' Weekly, "let down their hair and cooperated in the effort to choose the duds of literature, but Lewis Mumford and Rolfe Humphries declined to take part in what they considered a presumptuous enterprise." I salute Messrs. Mumford and Humphries.

EDGAR ALLAN POE'S "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" was published a hundred years ago this month. And the Virginia Quarterly prints in its current issue an article called The Case of the Corpse in the Blind Alley which may be taken, according to the editors, as commemorative of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the detective story. It is a blistering attack by Philip Van Doren Stern on the art as it is now practiced.

In the course of his criticism, which I found both convincing and interesting, Mr. Stern punctures the common belief that detective stories are enormously popular—"they are popular as a type, but no one of them is read widely." For mystery stories are not sold in any great quantity directly to the public; probably as much as 85 per cent of all copies circulated reach their readers through rental libraries. This system insures a minimum sale of about 1,500 copies for almost any mystery; it also places a top limit of about 3,500 copies for even the best ones. But while Mr. Stern grants that this state of affairs may serve to keep good authors from entering the field, he thinks the principal difficulty is the fact that the mystery story is today being written for a purely professional audience (mostly men) clustered about circulation libraries, which demands not a book but a drug and is in a position to enforce its demand. According to Mr. Stern, it is forever complaining that mystery stories get worse and worse. "Yet heaven help the writer who tries to give them anything but the old familiar brand!"

What the murder story requires if it is to recover its standing as literature is what any story requires—characterization, atmosphere, maturity, and an understanding of human action and motive. "Mystery story writers need to know more about life and less about death—more about the way people think and feel and act, and less about how they die," says Mr. Stern and ends with the wry remark: "It is surely strange that an age so deeply concerned with death as our own has not yet made its mark upon an art that deals only with killing."

MISCELLANY: Bills to make permanent the present temporary postal rate of 1½ cents a pound for books (it extends only to July 1) have been introduced in the House and the Senate. "By far the greatest of the benefits," says Publishers' Weekly, "have been enjoyed by book-buyers, libraries, and readers in the more distant parts of the country, those least well served by bookstores and libraries." That is exactly what the low rate was designed to accomplish. Drop a letter to your Congressman. . . . The committee formed by friends of James Joyce, shortly before his death, to obtain financial aid for him and his family points out that the expenses incident to his illness and death make the raising of funds all the more necessary, and asks for contributions, however small. Joyce's wife is in Zurich; his daughter Lucia is still in a sanatorium in occupied France. The committee includes, among others, Mary and Padraic Colum, Bennett Cerf, B. W. Huebsch, Eugene Jolas, and Edmund Wilson. Checks should be made payable to Mrs. Maria McD. Jolas, Chairman of the Joyce Fund, and sent to 1049 Park Avenue, New York City.

The Fear of Abundance

THE DEVIL OF THE MACHINE AGE. By J. Russell Smith. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.50.

"FOR ages," writes Professor Smith, "we worked to overcome scarcity, but now, forced by a new technology, we strive to plan scarcity. . . . Abundance with its glutted market has become the devil of the machine age; relative scarcity its god." [His italics.]

The purpose of this popular sermon in economics is to show how planned scarcity is paralyzing our economic system. Everyone of us, in his capacity as producer, seeks to restrict the output of his product in the hope of maintaining its price—that is to say, the amount of other products for which it can be exchanged. Through trade associations, gentlemen's agreements, combinations, and sometimes through outright monopolies, manufacturers attempt to limit production to the amount which the market can just absorb at a prearranged price and profit. If the capacity of the market diminishes, then output must be reduced even though plant and labor are rendered idle. Labor organizes for the same purpose: to maintain or raise wage rates, to diminish hours, and to restrict recruits to its ranks. For if labor is to maintain its price, it must contrive to make itself scarce. And so it is with the farmer, but his problem is more complicated owing to the vagaries of nature and the difficulties of organizing so scattered a group of producers. Consequently, he depends on legal restrictions obtained by political pressures.

But if we are all producers, so are we all consumers, and in that capacity we are anxious to buy as cheaply as possible. Thus we regard competition as a sovereign remedy for every industry save our own. But most of us think of our standard of living chiefly in terms of money income, that is to say, what we receive as producers, and much less in terms of its exchange value. We lay relatively less stress, therefore, on our economic interests as consumers and normally do not organize to protect those interests. Nor do we realize that if all producers succeed in restricting output and maintaining prices nobody gains an advantage, and there must be a smaller supply of exchangeable goods and less real income for everyone.

That, as Professor Smith points out, was roughly the result of the attempt under NRA to maintain prices at a point where everybody could make a secure profit. For that reason the Supreme Court decision in the Schechter case was "a face-saving godsend" to a great many people in industry and in the Administration. But the stronger producer groups continue their restrictive practices even though the recent activities of the Department of Justice have made them more cautious.

At the present time the nation is trying to raise production to new heights under the stress of the war emergency, and, in certain directions, we find ourselves struggling once again with the problem of scarcity. But the question of how to turn potential abundance into a blessing instead of a curse will demand an answer even more insistently when the war ends. We shall have to find a way of organizing abundance so that all may work and the fruits of their labor be fully distributed.

Have the business men of this country got a solution for this problem? Professor Smith is skeptical, but he insists that "in the long run the resources of the country will be made to support its people," and that if this cannot be achieved within the framework of private enterprise, it will be done by the government's taking over a substantial part of industry. Professor Smith is no admirer of state socialism, and business men, therefore, may pay attention to what he says even though he makes mincemeat of some of their most cherished prejudices. He writes with admirable common sense and he brings to the subject of economics the geographer's constant awareness of physical realities—an awareness which seems lacking in all too many economists.

I have only two mild complaints to offer. I wish he had developed more fully the positive remedies he puts forward for curing artificial scarcity. And some protest must be made to his publishers in regard to the pricing of this book. A dollar and a half is altogether too much for a slim volume of under a hundred pages and must serve to restrict the abundant circulation it deserves.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Sammy Glick

WHAT MAKES SAMMY RUN? By Budd Schulberg. Random House. $2.50.

IF YOU have frequently looked with fascination at the unmistakable lineaments of big business and have tried to solve the mystery of what must have been the living transformation of the individual into the corporation, then you will follow the quest for the answer to the question posed in the title of Mr. Schulberg's book along with Al Manheim, through whose eyes we pursue Sammy's life history. Sammy Glick's progress from newsboy to grand mogul of Hollywood is accomplished through singleness of purpose, moral anarchy, and the recognition of the nature of the race he runs faster than the treadmill he runs upon. Sammy steps into everyone's shoes—and wears them, and it is with a sense of utter inadequacy that we see the sureness of his footing, as well as the amount of his salary, increase, and watch his features, his walk and talk and personality, alter as he appropriates the trademarks of intelligence, culture, and charm of those pedestrians who pick themselves up to find Sammy far ahead rounding still another corner of his career.

The question is, of course, not answered, as it could scarcely be since it's the riddle we live under, but it is the measure of the honesty and sincerity of the book that Mr. Schulberg explores the question seriously and, what is more, finds his own attempts at a conclusion inconclusive. In the search for an answer the line of the plot is deftly played out in the person of Al Manheim, whom the problem obsesses. Al would like merely to free his mind of Sammy by a hatred worthy of him, but in the widening circles of his search he finds hatred inadequate and is forced through the very excitement and urgency of the chase into the battlefield of the individual and society. In his search Al is educated; Sammy is left alone with the fear of being overtaken: "You can't have your brothers and eat them too."

This is Mr. Schulberg's first novel, and he is more concerned with saying what he sees and feels than with how he says it, and that is as it should be. The book is uneven; the first part is badly written and developed; there is too much of the paltry patois of small-story sophistication and type-writer chatter. One finds a paucity of expression ("her body trim and cool and confident"), and the snappy conversation is at times oh so nugatory. But each of these charges is controverted as one turns the pages, and it is a pleasure to watch the author write through and past what really is his "first novel" to find his own form and content. Toward the end Mr. Schulberg does say what he wants to say, the writing is good, the plot blooms, and the form is there. Hollywood, that junction of theater and audience, is more honestly, amusingly, and instructively covered than in any other book I know. It is an integral part of the story and the natural habitat for Sammy.

I do, however, protest against the niggardliness of the expression of sincerely felt emotions that recalls bright books now faded. The careful indifference, the special argot of understatement and underplaying, the determined bathos of the characters before the probity of their feelings are exasperating. And the quantity of Scotch consumed in the course of the book is alarming, far too expensive for the sober writer's budget, to say nothing of the sober reader's. One remembers the flowing bowl of the twenties, both literary and economic, and ponders the reason why the novelists of that generation are still suffering from hangovers.

De Gaulle on Warfare

THE ARMY OF THE FUTURE. By General Charles de Gaulle. With a Foreword by Walter Millis. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

OF ALL De Gaulle's writings, this is the best known. It was first published in France in 1934 under the title, "Vers l'Armée de Métier." It contains one of the first concrete proposals for an armored force, and in 1937 Paul Reynaud produced some rather convincing evidence to show that General Guderian had leaned heavily upon this book in forming the new German Panzer divisions. The French High Command, however, saw little in the book, and soon after it was published, Weygand went to the length of directing a certain Lieutenant Colonel Didelet of his staff to write an article attacking De Gaulle's ideas. It was shortsightedness such as this that lost the war for France.

De Gaulle envisioned an army of six large armored divisions, which, with supporting infantry, artillery, aviation, and services, would number about 100,000 men. The tanks would be supported in their break-through mission by attached air units, and the infantry and artillery would follow up to develop and hold the positions taken by the tanks. In describing how this armored army would operate, De Gaulle brings in all the features of the modern battle—the crushing blow of the armored units followed by swift, outflanking maneuvers, the relatively small number of casualties, and, finally, the rapid collapse of the enemy. Indeed, De Gaulle so closely approximated the Sedan break-through—where the Germans actually broke the French armies with a force of between five and seven armored divisions—that his book must rank as an outstanding example of military prophecy.

However, this prophetic theme obscures the main point of the book, which is indicated in the original title—"Toward a Professional Army." De Gaulle contended that future battles would be decided by the armored-air team. He proposed that the principal defense forces of his country should consist of the armored army previously described. This would mean, on the one hand, a much smaller number of men required for military service, and on the other, a much greater amount of equipment. Moreover, this equipment would be of such a highly technical nature that it would be obviously impossible to train part-time conscript soldiers to use it efficiently. Therefore De Gaulle suggested that the mass army—"the nation in arms"—be abandoned, and that a return be made to the old small professional army of long-service volunteers.

De Gaulle advanced many irrefutable reasons for this return to the eighteenth-century-style army. It would be vastly more efficient in war, much less costly in men, and cheaper to operate in the long run. De Gaulle further states that a really professional army would be indifferent to politics. He does not consider the question that it might also be indifferent to democracy. The problems raised by De Gaulle are by no means solved, nor will they be for some time to come, but it is plain that the military establishments of all nations are moving along the lines he indicated, "toward a professional army."

HARVEY S. FORD

The Soong Family

THE SOONG SISTERS. By Emily Hahn. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THE famous Soong sisters are already fairly well known to Americans, though this reviewer knows of only one other full-length biography—"Three Sisters," written by Pearl Buck's sister, Cornelia Spencer, which appeared in 1939. Emily Hahn is the clever American novelist whose sketches and stories are familiar to readers of the New Yorker. She has lived in China during the past five years, and her material for "The Soong Sisters" was collected with the cooperation of Madame H. H. Kung and Madame Chiang Kai-shek. The elusive Madame Sun Yat-sen, however, refused to be interviewed and was therefore rather neglected and misinterpreted in the story. This has always been the stumbling block confronting writers who have aspired to do such a composite biography. Evidently Madame Sun prefers not to be considered a pillar of the ruling "Soong dynasty," but an independent torch-bearer for her husband's revolutionary principles. For her own story, we shall doubtless have to await an autobiography.

The Soong family is the most fascinating human-interest story in China, and Miss Hahn has made good use of her material, especially in the case of the father, Charlie Soong, and in giving a new personalized portrayal of Madame Kung, least known of the three sisters. The author, however, failed to make the most important point about Madame Kung, which is that her financial wizardry has built up what is probably the greatest personal fortune in modern Chinese history. With delicate irony Miss Hahn merely remarks that Madame Kung learned "how much science there is in banking."

This Soong family is almost as much American as it is Chinese, though we have few family Alger stories to match its history. Apprentice Charlie Soong ran away from his uncle's shop in Boston to become cabin-boy on a coastal side-wheeler. He wanted a modern education and was adopted by a Confederate general, who sent him through Vanderbilt University. Charlie went to Shanghai in 1886 as a preacher for the Southern Methodist Church, but made his fortune selling Bibles and foreign machinery. He married the daughter of one of the earliest Christian families in China, and their six children were all educated in the United States from an early age. The three attractive and highly intelligent daughters were sent to Wesleyan College for Women at Macon, Georgia; Eling (usually spelled Ai-ling) and Chingling at the age of fifteen, and Mayling at nine.

Charlie Soong was a secret follower of Sun Yat-sen, "Father of the Chinese Revolution," and on their return to China both Eling and Chingling became Sun's secretaries. Eling resigned to marry H. H. Kung, a Y. M. C. A. secretary. She had four children, developed into an extremely competent lai-tai, and has been the power behind her husband's throne ever since. Dr. Kung is now Minister of Finance.

Chingling married Dr. Sun shortly after her return in 1913 and became his right-hand helper and an active revolutionary in her own right. Since Dr. Sun's death in 1924 his widow has been a living symbol of integrity not only in China but for socially conscious people everywhere. She is now in her forties, still beautiful, still bent on achieving the social changes so long delayed in China, and still the idol of youth and of the common people of her country.

Mayling came home from Wellesley in 1917 and was Shanghai's reigning society belle until 1928, when she married Chiang Kai-shek, who soon established himself as the de facto head of the Chinese government. Madame Chiang's charm and energy have been an important asset to that government, especially in winning foreign sympathy. Her books have been widely read abroad.

It is to be regretted that this biography, because it evasively skirts internal family feuds and the political problems which determine the character of its subjects and their role in China, falls short of being a critical work. It is not without authority, however. It is that part of the story which Madame Chiang and Madame Kung wish to see presented to the public, and is to be considered in the general class of "authorized biography." Miss Hahn is eminently qualified to have done a much better study had she not been obliged to pussyfoot in order to secure the necessary cooperation. Nevertheless, "The Soong Sisters" is a delightful and well-written book, and the author has handled a delicate subject with much skill.

Labor and National Defense

LABOR AND NATIONAL DEFENSE. A survey of the Special Labor Problems Arising from America's Defense Activities and a Program for Action. Published by the Twentieth Century Fund and compiled by a research staff headed by Lloyd G. Reynolds of Johns Hopkins University, assisted by Russell Nixon of Harvard University and Charles Killingsworth of the University of Wisconsin. $1.

THE Twentieth Century Fund has rendered an invaluable service by its timely publication of a report on labor in its relation to national defense. Its findings and recommendations are as up to the minute as the morning newspaper, without the distortion, confusion, and alarm which characterize so many of the current press accounts of happenings on the labor front.

Pressed into the book's 130 pages are brief factual analyses of labor requirements and supplies, with all of the complexities involved in the training, allocation, and full utilization of the various skills; the matters of wages, hours, collective bargaining, as well as available procedures and government machinery for adjusting disputes arising out of these issues, and a program designed to cope with immediate problems in the sphere of employer-employee relations. The recommendations are the responsibility of the Fund's labor committee, under whose auspices the study was made, headed by William H. Davis, one of the three public representatives of the recently created National Mediation Board; its other members are William Chenery, editor of Collier's, Frazier MacIver, vice-president of the Phoenix Hosiery Company, William M. Leiserson, NLRB member, Sumner H. Slichter of Harvard, Edwin E. Witte of the University of Wisconsin, and Robert J. Watt of the A. F. of L. Philip Murray of the C. I. O., another member of the committee, was compelled to withdraw because of lack of time.

The report affirms that continuous, efficient production is imperative to the effort to build America's defense and to aid Britain, and that work stoppages are a grave hindrance to this effort. But how are stoppages to be prevented? "World experience," says the committee, "has demonstrated that the cooperation of labor cannot be gained by compulsion. Strikes in democratic countries can be prevented only by agreement between employers and workers—not by law." Disputes over working conditions are bound to arise. But these can be settled, with the aid of existing conciliation and mediation machinery, provided labor's pledge not to impede production during the conciliation period "be matched by a pledge on the part of management to make no changes in working conditions during that period."

The most difficult type of dispute, the report finds, is that over union recognition. On this point the committee accepts the principle established by the National Labor Relations Act. "The spirit of the statute and a decent respect for prevailing opinion demand, in this period of emergency, universal and ungrudging acceptance by all employers of the processes and implications of collective bargaining. This is a vital need in the interest of maximum defense production."

It is labor's "clear obligation," according to these conclusions, "to seek the legal remedy in preference to direct action." It is recognized, however, that the Labor Board's processes involve serious delay, and since, in the matter of organization, the time element is often the controlling factor, "either side is disposed to make militant changes in the status quo." For this reason the report recommends (1) priority treatment by the board of cases involving defense industries; (2) orders and procedures by an equity court designed to prevent irreparable injury to either party during the delay incident to protracted appeals from the board's decision. The latter, in the reviewer's opinion, is a very difficult, if not impossible, expedient. In recent arguments before the Labor Board by representatives of the Ford and Bethlehem corporations, it was made abundantly clear that they will accept no decision from that body until it has been passed on by the courts. This means years of delay. It is quite beyond the wisdom of any court, assuming its willingness, to estimate what such delay might cost the parties concerned.

The study recommends maintenance of established standards and good working conditions and, above all, maintenance of real wages by combating increases in the cost of living. It recommends retention of the Wage-Hour Law, and in this connection clarifies several points on which confusion has run rampant. It reaffirms first of all the more or less accepted fact that long hours are inefficient. But should the emergency call for a longer work week than the established forty hours, the Fair Labor Standards Act does not prohibit it. The law merely provides time and a half for overtime. This does not impose any hardship on defense industries, as the added expense can be passed on to the purchaser, and has probably already been figured into contract estimates. On the other hand, it may have two very beneficial effects: the need of added hours of work in defense industries, and overtime pay, may tend to attract more workers, thus preventing a possible labor shortage where speed is most urgent; and it could serve to provide increased earnings during the height of production with an automatic leveling off when the regular work week can be restored.

The essence of the program is flexibility rather than rigidity; its approach is human rather than legalistic. Machinery to carry out the program, it is suggested, should be chiefly of an administrative character, and should include, in addition to that which already exists, an over-all agency along the lines of the recently created National Mediation Board and "a network of joint agencies with equal labor and management representatives." The program is offered not as a blueprint, but more in the nature of an agenda. Its good common sense is refreshing and offers a welcome relief from the stuffy nonsense on the subject which has been spouted of late by tongue and pen in immeasurable volume. Proponents of the program are all men of extensive experience in the field of production and labor relations, and of unquestioned integrity. Their recommendations will undoubtedly be taken with all the seriousness they deserve by a good many Administration leaders, by the more progressive employers, and by a very large segment of labor. One cannot help wishing that this little volume could be put into the hands of all leaders of industry, every editor in the country, and all members of Congress.

ROSE M. STEIN

Can Old Age Be Delayed?

MUST WE GROW OLD? By Barclay Newman. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

WE ARE becoming an increasingly elderly nation. Insurance figures show that in 1930 our mean length of life was 63.2 years; one hundred and fifty years ago it was 35.5 years. Ninety years ago one-eighth of the population was forty-five or over; today more than one-fourth of our population is forty-five or over. There has recently been an increased medical interest in the problems of aging appropriate to these facts, and to a corresponding increase in economic and social concern for the aged. The Macy Foundation has just published, under the editorship of E. V. Cowdry, a 750-page digest and synthesis of current knowledge presented technically by a number of competent authorities.

Almost simultaneously there appears this popularly written summary of geriatrics. It is really more than that, however; it is a presentation of the formerly very dull subject of hygiene in a new and very stimulating form. There are no brush-your-teeth and get-eight-hours-of-sleep exhortations in this book. There is, rather, a courageous challenge, implied by the title, of the conventional assumption that age and death are inevitable, with nothing to be done about them. Perhaps, Newman reminds us, death is with human beings, as with animals, always an accident, always unnecessary. Time itself is certainly not lethal. The disorganized harmonic function associated with old age is brought about by many diverse factors, of which time is not necessarily one. Most glands do not show evidence of age changes which cannot be accounted for otherwise; for example, by the lack of iodine. Perhaps, after all, "growing old" and words allied to it are used "only because they summarize under one general heading a great list of phenomena, mostly still without known cause."

The author is neither presumptuous nor arrogant. As a scientifically trained man, he is well aware of the hazard of too great a deductive leap; he recognizes the distrust and condescension which the mere raising of the question will evoke from the tough-minded empiricists, some of whom he quotes. He would probably expect anything but gentle treatment from the present reviewer, committed as I am known to be to the death-instinct theory of Freud, according to which we are all determined to die by some force as ancient as life, and more powerful. But there are ways of attenuating or deferring this instinct.

Mr. Newman is encouraged by such writers as Dr. L. V. Heilbrunn (University of Pennsylvania), who wrote: "... the search for a remedy for this universal ailment is not as fantastic as was Ponce de Leon's quest for the fountain of perpetual youth. In the case of some lower animals, as for example flatworms, it is possible to make older animals grow young again; and although such a reversal of physiological age may never be possible to any great extent in animals as complicated as man, it nevertheless seems quite reasonable to suppose that when the nature of senescence becomes more clearly understood, ways and means will be developed to delay its progress."

There, in a word, is the theme of Newman's book; we have already made some steps in delaying the progress of age; can we expect to go further? What has been discovered recently in dietetics, endocrinology, cancer, blood chemistry, vitamins, and normal cell physiology that would encourage us to believe that, by taking thought, we may add days to our years, if not cubits to our stature?

Mr. Newman writes in a clear, sprightly, readable style. He cites sound authorities, and, except for the implications of the title, nothing he says would be objected to by the most orthodox medical scientists. Perhaps his optimism will be as good for us as for our patients.

IN BRIEF

IN MY FATHER'S HOUSE. By James Street. The Dial Press. $2.50.

A bucolic novel that opens like a leisurely idyl of family life on a Mississippi farm churns up the makings of a feud when Papa Abernathy shoots his daughter's fiancé for "putting in a crop before he'd built his fences." The narrator, Little Hob Abernathy, spins his tale with a good deal of boyish charm in the genuine idiom of rural Southern speech. You can't hurry him, any more than you can hurry a mule, but you'll like him for his honesty and his affection for living things.

WHAT THE CITIZEN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE ARMY. By Harvey S. Ford.

WHAT THE CITIZEN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE NAVY. By Hanson W. Baldwin.

WHAT THE CITIZEN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE COAST GUARD. By Hickman Powell. W. W. Norton & Company. $2 each.

These are useful introductory books by well-known authorities for the layman, or prospective draftee, who wants to know the essentials about the composition, operation, and function of the three principal services.

ART

SHOWS of the work of three great, or once great, abstract painters held in New York recently afforded an opportunity to consider the present condition of our most advanced painting. The demise of abstract art has been hailed again and again of late; nevertheless it continues to provide our most stimulating pictures. It is my opinion that the fate of our particular tradition of art depends upon that into which abstract art develops. True, three or four great painters still use representation—Picasso, Matisse, Rouault, Vlaminck—but they operate in very personal veins from which there is no issue for the future. They raise up no promising disciples, for those who follow them are imitators, eclectics, and little else. Representation may return, but it will return only on the basis of what we have learned from abstract art.

Of the artists who have produced the best painting of the last five years or so, without doubt one is Miró. His pictures continue to excite. They may puzzle the layman, but they do not bore his eyes. The show of his recent work at the Matisse Gallery impressed one with the extent to which the modern painter derives his inspiration from the very physical materials he works with. In spite of, and perhaps because of, the freedom it offers, canvas imposes upon the painter a style more or less proper to itself. In the course of time even this style with all its flexibility may become something that confines. The artist will grow to desire a medium the very difficulty and novelty of which will help him to conceive freshly. Klee took to painting on plaster, wood, and scratched canvas. Miró has begun to paint on burlap and fiber board, and with promising results. The coarse surface of the burlap has refreshed his invention, compelling him to tighten and compress his design in order to animate and set off the minuscule criss-cross pattern of the rough stitching. Since the burlap does not present a smooth surface, paint must be rubbed rather than brushed on, and so a new quality of "paintedness" is gained. And although the brick reds, the blacks, yellows, and livid whites are reminiscent of Miró's previous work, the result constitutes on the whole a new and brilliant phase in his development.

As if to emphasize the control exerted by the medium, the water colors executed during the same period make the sharpest contrast to the burlap paintings. Necessarily, paper and water call for different treatment, yet the difference between Miró's water colors and his oils, whether on burlap or canvas, is much greater than the difference, for instance, between the water colors and the oils of Cézanne. Miró's water colors are tenuous, precious, and not altogether satisfactory, but there is something too valuable to dismiss in almost everything he has touched in the last few years, at least to judge from the work that has reached this country. One painting must receive special notice: a long, narrow panel on canvas, full of echoes of primitive art, which with its long tentacular bands of dark blue against cobalt and its sudden touches of vermilion, yellow, and white, was the most completely successful single painting of the show.

How arduous is the career of the abstract painter, how difficult it is to sustain his freshness and growth, is made more evident by Léger's example. The exhibition of his latest water colors and drawings at Marie Harriman's was disheartening. I was never much struck by the bulk of his work, though he does have the ability to integrate seemingly discordant elements into solid, unified compositions. But for a long time he seems to have done nothing but repeat himself under various disguises. By force of repetition Léger's painting has become facile and empty, a matter almost of formula. His color has become more Currier and Ives than ever. Organic objects have replaced the mechanical ones and the abstract forms—Léger was never a consistently abstract painter—and they are used to attain a stale, poster prettiness. In picture after picture the various elements curl themselves into the same neat combinations. There is still that same effect of reconciled flatness and solidity which was one of the most pleasing qualities of Léger's earlier work, but this has become too facile and too decorative; the massiveness is all show. When the abstract artist grows tired, he becomes an interior decorator—which is still, however, to be more creative than an academic painter.

The show of Kandinsky's paintings at the Nierendorf Gallery was composed chiefly of his post-war work (one picture for each year of his career as a painter), but there were enough pictures dating from before 1914 to make manifest how much his work has fallen off since then. The early paintings are semi-abstract landscapes, spontaneous and turbulent in their color; we perceive in them the feeling that went into the actual handling of the paint. Since then Kandinsky's art has become non-objective and excludes all representation. Under the influence, I believe, of some false analogies with the mathematics of music, with music as an art of self-expression, and with platonic notions of essential form, he paints in precise geometrical figures, all ruled lines and circles drawn with a compass. Instead of a picture, however, a gimcrack is produced. The Slavic peasant colors which Kandinsky favors are rich and strong when brushed with the vigor and freedom of his earlier manner, but they become superficial when fixed with draughtsman's precision in dry, careful, spic-and-span diagrams resembling nothing so much as astronomical charts and patterns for dirndl dresses. I do not hold theories to be responsible for the decline in Kandinsky's art; Mondrian has produced very good painting in terms of pure geometry, and Mondrian has theories. It is simply that Kandinsky cannot do it, being the painter he is. All this notwithstanding, Kandinsky is even today not a negligible painter. He still turns out good pictures occasionally—very often under Klee's influence. They are best when smallest in format. And this is true of most contemporary painting. For as a rule the modern painter cannot cover large spaces successfully—the revival of mural painting has so far not disproved this. He is at his best when forced to compress and tighten; just as the modern poet finds a page and a half more than adequate to whatever he may have to say in any single poem.

The cases of Kandinsky and Léger demonstrate how easy it is for the abstract painter to degenerate into a decorator. It is the besetting danger of abstract art. We, with our tradition of easel-painting, are not satisfied to have our pictorial art in the form of decoration. We demand of a picture what we demand of literature and music: dramatic interest, interior movement; we want a picture to be a little drama, something, even if only a landscape or still life, in which the eye can fix and involve itself. It is the task of the abstract artist to satisfy this requirement with the limited means at his disposal. He cannot resort to the means of the past, for they have been made stale by overuse, and to take them up again would be to rob his art of its originality and real excitement. That so many abstract artists are not equal to the task does not compromise abstract art—as yet. And when one has exposed oneself long enough to contemporary art, one begins to realize that the unsuccessful pictures of a good many abstract painters are more interesting than the most brilliantly successful pictures of such painters as Grant Wood, Alexander Brook, etc., etc. CLEMENT GREENBERG

COLUMBIA'S new set of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, made by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, I will postpone until I can consider it together with the Victor set of Toscanini's performance with the N. B. C. Symphony, which has not yet arrived.

Comparing the new Stock-Chicago Symphony recording of Brahms's Symphony No. 3 (Set 443, $4.50) with Columbia's older but fairly recent Weingartner-London Symphony version, I find that I prefer the music in the form that Weingartner gives it—the first movement, for example, played with his poised control, his subtly inflected steady pace, as against Stock's sudden whipping up of pace at the beginning of the development section and the coda; or the concluding section of the second movement, taken by Weingartner with only slight broadening of the Andante, as against Stock's sentimental dragging. The recorded sound of Stock's orchestra is more voluminous and rich than that of Weingartner's; but Weingartner's has greater clarity and sharpness of definition and better balance. Moreover, the Stock recording loses considerable brilliance on a machine with less than the widest frequency range; whereas on such a machine the Weingartner violins continue to sing out. Even on a wide-range machine there is a marked loss of brilliance near the end of the third, sixth, and seventh sides of the Stock set; some sides of my copy produce a rattle on some machines with light and otherwise sensitive pickups; and some sides have noisy surfaces.

Reiner's performance of the Bacchante of "Tannhäuser" with the Pittsburgh Symphony (Set X-193, $2.50) is superb, but without the flaming tonal opulence of the Victor version. That is because Reiner and the Pittsburgh Symphony are not Stokowski and the Philadelphia, and because their performance is not as well recorded. It is one of Columbia's better jobs, with fidelity to orchestral color and sonority, but with occasional muddiness and occasional hollowness, and with a sudden raising of volume-level in the middle of the third side that is attended by bad rattling.

There is much finer recording of the sound of an orchestra on the single disc (11517-D, $1) of Debussy's Rhapsody No. 1 made by Benny Goodman and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, but there is an occasional rattle on this one too. The work, written as a test-piece for students of the clarinet, exploits the resources of the instrument and those of the orchestra in Debussy's exquisite style and—surprisingly enough—with some musical effect; and Goodman's phrasing is now beautifully sensitive and now engagingly lively, but without all the subtlety Debussy requires. As for the second volume of Rediscovered Music of Johann Strauss (Set 445, $3.50), most of it is pretty dull, the performances by Barlow with the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony are fair, the recording is coarse.

One outstanding April release from Columbia is the Budapest Quartet's performance—extraordinary in the ways that this unique group's performances are, and well recorded—of Beethoven's Op. 18 No. 1 (Set 444, $4.50). And a single disc (71026-D, $1) offers a beautiful and excellently recorded performance of Chopin's Barcarolle by Gieseking. The warmth and intimacy of Schumann's superb Piano Sonata in G minor are not in the work as it is now assaulted and battered, now sentimentalized by Sascha Gorodnitzki (Set X-186, $2.50). And Bach's Church Cantata No. 158, "Der Friede sei mit dir," I find neither interesting nor well sung by David Blair McClosky, baritone, who has recorded it with a few instrumentalists and a small chorus (Set X-191, $2).

Some outstanding jazz performances that were recorded here for English Parlophone several years ago are being released by Decca in albums entitled Gems of Jazz. The first (Set 200, $3.50) includes one of the finest of the performances, "Willow Tree" (18108), with exquisite singing by Mildred Bailey and beautifully sensitive playing by Teddy Wilson, Johnny Hodges, and Bunny Berigan; and almost as good is their "Downhearted Blues" (18109). While these are the best there are good things on the other records: "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise," with Jess Stacy, Gene Krupa, and Israel Crosby, and one of Mead "Lux" Lewis's performances of his "Honky Tonk Train Blues" (18110); "Twelve Bar Stampede" and "Feather Bed Lament" (18111), with Joe Marsala, Benny Carter, Pete Brown, and Billy Kyle; "Tillie's Downtown Now" and "The Buzzard" (18112), and "What Is There to Say" and "Keep Smiling at Trouble" (18113), with Bud Freeman, Berigan, and Claude Thornhill. The "Tillie's Downtown Now" is the performance on the A master; Parlophone issued the performance on the B master, which is better paced and has a better solo by Berigan and the more exciting piano solo by Thornhill.

For those who like American folk music there are Southern Prison Songs, excellently sung by Lead Belly and the Golden Gate Quartet (Victor Set P-50, $2.25); "The Old Chisholm Trail," Songs of the American Southwest, most of them sung with appropriate simplicity and gusto by Tony Kraber (Keynote Recordings, 133 West 44th Street, New York: Set 104, $2.75); and Two Centuries of American Folk Songs, sung by Elie Siegmeister's American Ballad Singers in arrangements and styles some of which I find excessively arty—for example, a street cry made into a canon (Victor Set P-41, $2.25).

Poll-Tax Corruption

Dear Sirs: Political corruption in the South is the bosom friend of the poll tax. If a voter cannot afford to pay the tax he can arrange with the ward boss for its payment—if he votes right. Many political machines buy receipts and distribute them on Election Day with marked ballots, and when the voter returns, he must redeliver the blank ballot received at the polls; this one in turn is marked, and the illegal process continues unabated. Many employers at sawmills and factories pay the tax, then file the receipts away; on Election Day the receipts are turned over to the employee with explicit instructions on how to vote.

A free suffrage has been one of the primary concerns of American democracy since colonial days, and we have eliminated property, color, and sex qualifications. But the state of Mississippi in 1890 initiated a reactionary process whereby the provisions of the Civil War amendments were circumvented. The purpose was to nullify Negro influence, and was born of a deal between Northern Republicans and Southern Bourbons. Southern editors since those days have discounted talk about democracy and have earnestly championed the cause of white supremacy. Southern poll-tax opponents are not, however, interested in the numerical increase of Negro or white suffrage. They would be contented if the tax did what its promulgators planned. But the tax is now an instrument of the political machines, which tap the voting population regardless of the quality of the voter. Today Southern poll-tax reformers are agitating for educational qualifications to weed out the undesirable Southern citizens, Negro and white.

Poll taxes allow Congressmen and Senators to stay in Washington long enough to enjoy the benefits of seniority. It is seldom that these men use their political dominion to support progressive legislation. They have consistently obstructed federal relief, public housing, wage-and-hour legislation, collective bargaining, and the right to strike. In the House of Representatives the Apocalyptic Horsemen, Martin Dies, Howard Smith, Clifton Woodrum, and Eugene Cox, are all from the poll-tax South. And their records speak for themselves.

The constitutional question is still open, for the Butler decision in the Breedlove case that "poll taxes are laid upon persons without regard to their occupation or property to raise money for the support of government or some specific end" was an examination of the tax in the abstract light of the right to tax and the power to collect. However, Justice Butler did not comment on the real question: Does the poll tax obstruct the franchise?

The Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution embodies the principle that the right to suffrage is of national importance, and is not to be left to the exclusive control of the states. If the states have the right to tax the franchise, they have the power to destroy representative government. There are other questions which the courts have to answer: Does the right to vote in a national election depend exclusively upon the laws of a state? Can a state tax a federal privilege? These are the questions which the Prittle test case is raising, and with enough support it should reach the Supreme Court this year. In the meantime, the Geyer bill (H. R. 7534), which was tabled during the last session of Congress, must be passed, as must any other important defense measure. This law, introduced by a California Congressman, makes it unlawful for any state to require the payment of a poll tax as a qualification for voting or for registering to vote in a national election.

Southern politicians argue that the repeal of the poll tax as a qualification to vote would litter the government with "niggers" and end white supremacy. But this is untrue, as every Southerner knows: literacy tests, residence qualifications, intimidations, and white primaries work remarkably well to disfranchise the Negroes. In North Carolina, a repeal state, the Negro's vote remains as insignificant as it is in Louisiana, a certificate state, where less than 1 per cent of the Negroes vote.

The repeal of the poll tax is the specific problem of the Southern whites, but it is of importance to every citizen in the United States as one step toward suffrage reform in a section where "less than one-third of the adults in twelve states that form one-sixth of the nation are able to take part in the democratic process."

Steel Capacity

Dear Sirs: I am troubled by an apparent contradiction between the economic theories of Keith Hutchison and I. F. Stone.

Mr. Hutchison, in his article of March 1, suggests that the leaders in the steel industry are against construction of new plant capacity: they are afraid that when rearmament ceases and we are in the midst of a post-war depression all this proposed new capacity will drive steel prices down.

Mr. Stone in his article advances the theory that the leaders of the automobile industry are ignoring suggestions that they use their idle automobile capacity for the production of planes, and instead are having new plants built for this purpose. He states that the construction of new plants has its advantages for the companies.

Why should the steel industry oppose, while the automobile industry apparently favors, an increase of productive capacity? This is a problem which I cannot resolve.

Right of Angary

Dear Sirs: Referring to the seizure of Italian, German, and Danish ships by the United States government, The Nation of April 5 states: "... the seizure has a firm basis in both international and domestic law. The action was taken under what is known as the 'right of angary.' This right has its roots in long-established custom going back into the Middle Ages."

You may be right. That may be the law. All I know about international law is the little I learned in an inadequate course on the subject taught by an under secretary of the United States Department of State. I often must refer to dictionaries to check words not used every day. Black's "Law Dictionary," third edition (1933), has this to say about Angary, Right of:

In international law. Formerly the right (jus angariae) claimed by a belligerent to seize merchant vessels in the harbors of the belligerent and to compel them, on payment of freight, to transport troops and supplies to a designated port. It was frequently exercised by Louis XIV, of France, but as a result of specific treaties entered into by states not to exercise the right, it has now come to be abandoned.

At the present day, the right of a belligerent to appropriate, either for use or for destruction in case of necessity, neutral property temporarily located in his own territory or in that of the other belligerent. The property may be of any description whatever, provided the appropriation of it be for military or naval purposes.

Requisition of neutral property is justified by military necessity and accordingly the right of angary is a belligerent right, although the claim of the neutral owner to indemnity properly comes under the law of neutrality.

It would be helpful to those of us who have long regarded Black as an authority if you would state rather precisely which of the paragraphs you think governs the case of our seizure of Italian, German, and Danish ships. Or did the passage of the Lease-Lend-Give-Away bill make us ipso facto a belligerent? JUNE PURCELL GUILD

Tribute to Zabel

Dear Sirs: May I ask a few inches of space to salute Mr. Morton Dauwen Zabel's review A Tribute to Milles (issue of March 22)? To find a critical vocabulary, critical standards, and a frame of reference with real meaning was a rare pleasure. This is a period when the inanities of Mr. Jewell and the obscenities of Mr. Craven are accepted as criticism and authority. The few real critics, such as J. J. Sweeney and E. M. Benson, seem to write little or not at all. Could not you, sirs, persuade Mr. Zabel to write regular art criticism for The Nation?

Welsh Vowels

Dear Sirs: Louis B. Salomon's interesting review of John Cowper Powys's "Owen Glendower" in your issue of January 25 is marred by an unscholarly reference to "bygone Cambrian celebrities without a vowel to their names." Perhaps it is too much to expect that the living daily language of more than a million people of the British Isles should be known to scholars on the other side of the Atlantic when so many scholars nearer to Wales reveal such striking evidence of their ignorance of it and its literature; but one cannot allow such a remark to pass unchallenged for all that. There are no Welsh words or names without vowels: Mr. Salomon's error arises from the fact that Welsh has its own orthography, which is not that of the English language—hardly a strange phenomenon in view of the fact that Welsh is a much older language and has a written literature going back to the days when English as now spoken was still an unborn tongue. Welsh has more vowels than English: for example, w is both a vowel and a consonant; so are y and u. So that the word Cwm, which, to an English-speaking person, is an unpronounceable word of three consonants, is actually a word with a middle vowel. In fact, the English have borrowed this noun to name some of their most beautiful valleys—coombe, as in Coombe Martin. The Welsh Cwm, more economical in its spelling, is pronounced pretty much like coombe, which to a Welshman without knowledge of English would be unpronounceable.

Possibly Mr. Powys was in the wrong, too, in not giving an English version of these names, seeing that he has Anglicized the name of Owen Glendower, which in the Welsh is Owain Glyndwr.

Farmer's Lament

Dear Sirs: Last February 17 dairy farmers went to the polls throughout the New York milkshed and voted 99.5 per cent in favor of amendments to the federal and state orders which will bring us a better hundredweight price for our milk. No one thought these amendments would give us everything we want; yet they are a decided improvement, and nothing prevents the orders from being further amended. But no good will be accomplished for the farmer by the increase in the fluid price classification. Increases in the fluid price classification will react against the consumer—the farmer's market—as it opens the way to instant increases in the retail price. This will certainly cut down consumption.

Fluid-milk consumption would not be as high as it is today if it were not for relief milk and penny glasses of milk provided for children in schools. If we insist on an increase in the fluid classification, many people buying bottled milk will begin purchasing evaporated and powdered milk.

The price set on the fluid classification is a fictitious one, and anyone advocating a raise in this price class is not trying to help the farmer. This is a smoke screen behind which the dealer is helped to the farmer's money.

Farmers are interested only in the blend price. Regardless of any plan which is put forward, whether it be the Young plan or any other, it is still the blend price that concerns the farmer. The Young plan is nothing more than the quota system, and farmers are not interested in the quota system.

Ways can and must be found to raise the blend price without putting an added burden on consumers.

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TOLD A RECENT PRESS conference that the American public was insufficiently aware of the danger to this country in the situation abroad. But, he added, it was gradually awakening. We believe that both these statements are true, but we also believe that full awakening may come too late. We appeal, therefore, to the President to talk to the people frankly and directly; to explain to them the perils he sees ahead of us and to state exactly what steps he thinks should be taken to meet them. If, as we strongly suspect, he considers that our main task today is to keep the North Atlantic route open and to maintain the maximum flow of supplies to Britain by whatever means necessary, let him say so. If he believes that this end cannot be secured without convoys, let him put this issue squarely before the public. Between the small percentage of Americans who for one reason or another are completely isolationist and the small percentage who are prepared to go into the war completely, the major body of Americans sways, pulled one way by a strong dread of involvement in the war and the other by an equally strong conviction that we cannot afford to let Britain be conquered. It is the task of democratic leadership not to impose a decision on the people but to help them resolve their doubts and to choose a definite path to follow. We beg the President to assume this task as his most urgent duty; to lay aside all considerations of political consequences and put before the country the full facts of our present situation. We are confident that the people will respond with an unmistakable mandate for action.

THE SPANISH PRESS HAS LAUNCHED A NEW series of attacks on Britain, thus indicating the extent to which German successes outweigh London's efforts to appease with trade credits. Pressure is also being directed against Portugal, which is told it must choose between Spain and Britain. Such ominous signs point to the possibility that Hitler's next move, after he has cleaned up the Balkans, may be against the Iberian Peninsula. That is a step which, as W. E. Lucas explains on page 495, he has hitherto hesitated to take because it would make Germany responsible for feeding Spain, already in the throes of famine, and would provide Britain with an opportunity to occupy the Azores, the Canaries, and the Cape Verde Islands. On the other hand, the conquest of Gibraltar would not only help to bottle up the British fleet in the Mediterranean but would also make possible German control of the whole of Northwest Africa. Two thousand more miles of coast bordering the Atlantic would be available for the use of German sea and air raiders, with corresponding hazards for British ships trading with both South Africa and South America. If Hitler is counting on finishing the war this summer by winning the Battle of the Atlantic, he can hardly fail to take over Spain and Portugal. Even though Portugal is a dictator state, it will scarcely welcome Nazi "protection," for it knows that the end result is likely to be its submergence in an Iberian empire ruled from Madrid—and Berlin. The Spanish government will offer no resistance, for it is in the hands of Hitler's devoted admirers, the Phalangists. They are obviously ready to adopt the Hungarian argument that, since German might cannot be withstood, it is sensible to cooperate with it and gain a scavenger's reward.

THE RENEWAL OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN Vichy and Berlin with the view of establishing a basis for "collaboration" is another pointer toward the probability of a German move into Spain. According to reports from Vichy, one of the conditions laid down by the Nazis is freedom to transport troops to the Spanish border through unoccupied France. On the other hand, it is said that the French government adheres to its refusal to allow Germany the use of the French fleet, which would be of immense value in protecting Spain against any countermove by the British navy. However, the pressure being put on Vichy is increasing. The Nazi-controlled Paris press is staging another campaign against the "men of Vichy," and a new attempt is being made to secure the return of Laval as the only man who can be relied upon to place Franco-German relations on a satisfactory basis. It is said that the Nazis do not insist on his reinstatement in all the positions he held before, but Laval himself is reported to be demanding full direction of home and foreign affairs and the title of "chief of the government," now held by Marshal Pétain, who would become a truly decorative "head of the state" with no executive authority. There can be hardly any doubt that Laval, once installed, would give the Nazis anything they asked, but he would probably have to call in the German army to protect him, for he is a stench in the nostrils of the French people, who after ten months' experience are daily growing more belligerently anti-Nazi. Indeed, Laval is already said to be terrified of assassination, a fate which seems to have overtaken Jean Fontenoy, one of his leading aides.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY ANTI-FASCIST refugees are reported to have been shot at Vernet, a concentration camp maintained by the Vichy government, when they took part in a protest against Vichy's decision to extradite some of them to Germany and send others to do forced labor in Africa. At the same time comes a substantial rumor from Vichy itself that a special convention has been negotiated between Vichy and Madrid by which the Republican Spaniards still in France may be turned over to Franco. This is indicated by the fact that forty-five young French men and women who tried to pass through Spain to join the Free French forces were held in Figueras for several months and then sent back to France. The existence of such a convention would also explain why male Spaniards between the ages of seventeen and forty-eight are not permitted to apply for passage to Mexico. It would take a Euripedes to do justice to the tragedy which appears to have been enacted at Vernet; but even a State Department official ought to be capable of understanding that the Pétain regime, in turning over anti-fascists to Hitler and Franco, has sacrificed every claim to being called French or independent or humane. Yet, so far as we know, Henry-Haye is still being recognized in Washington as the ambassador of a country rather than the representative of a prefecture of Berlin.

TUCKED AWAY IN THE APPROPRIATIONS BILL for the Department of Justice is a grant of $100,000 to the FBI, "exclusively to investigate the employees of every department, agency, and independent establishment of the federal government who are members of subversive organizations or advocate the overthrow of the federal government." This provision could hardly be matched for reckless policy, vague definition, and bad English. As the American Civil Liberties Union points out, the Dies committee's frantic and futile attempts to find "reds" in the government is proof that such a sweeping, and expensive, inquiry would have no results except the disruption of morale. The provision would give to the FBI, which has too much power already, virtually the prerogatives of a political police. The vagueness of the wording makes the provision extremely dangerous. The appropriations bill, including this provision, has already passed the House. Inform your Senator that $100,000 must not be wasted on such an inquisition.

THE "UNIVERSITY IN EXILE," WHICH WAS founded by Alvin Johnson in 1933, when the Third Reich was less than a year old, has just been granted a permanent charter by the University of the State of New York. Under the terms of the charter full academic powers are conferred on the New School of Social Research and the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science, which is largely staffed by scholars of foreign birth and training. The event serves to remind us of the quality as well as the numbers of the great immigration which has taken place in the last eight years, not only from Germany but from other countries overrun by fascism. It also points up the fact that the United States is one of the few remaining sections of the world where free minds can function. That is a matter for pride but it also involves a great responsibility. Many Americans have yet to discover that the charter of freedom is never permanent, and in this respect, particularly, the émigrés of European culture have much to teach us, for they know what freedom is worth and what it costs.

"Never in Paris did I have such beautiful-fitting corsets," said a distinguished European visitor* the other day in our corset salon.

*She bought Saks own pantie girdle of power net and rayon satin lastex. $12.50.

*She bought several Dorothy Bickum girdles of reinforced power net, white, tearose. $18.50 each.

*She bought five of our exclusive duplications of a fine French corset in silk chiffon elastic with satin panels. $59.50 each.

We have it on good authority that many of the distinguished Europeans still stranded in France for lack of money, influence, and visas are finding the German corset very trying; and there are said to be French refugees in New York who cannot even buy a meal, let alone a pantie girdle.

A Bill to Repeal the Wagner Act

THE Vinson bill, which has been approved by the House Naval Affairs Committee, is really a bill to repeal the Wagner Act. Under it, a fine of $5,000 and a prison sentence of one year could be imposed on "either labor or management" which tried to bargain collectively in plants now open shop. By freezing the status quo in industry it would take from unorganized workers and unions not yet granted recognition the rights conferred on them by the National Labor Relations Act. It would encourage other employers now dealing with unions to break off relations with them, and it would weaken the right to strike by establishing a twenty-five-day "cooling-off" period after a strike vote had been taken. Mediation would be compulsory, and arbitration awards by the Mediation Commission would be enforceable by contempt proceedings.

Voluntary mediation under the present Mediation Commission has been successful from the standpoint of both labor and defense; it has, indeed, been so successful in giving labor a square deal that there is a good deal of undercover grumbling against the commission in big-business circles. But experience with compulsory mediation in the last war, both here and abroad, indicates that attempts at coercion are more effective in causing strikes than in settling them. In Great Britain, during the last war, more than half a million munitions workers engaged in strikes after they had been declared illegal, and in this country the number of strikes rose by 20 per cent after mediation had been made compulsory.

The Vinson bill does not spring from a desire to settle labor disputes peacefully; it is an attempt to deprive labor of the added bargaining power given it in war time by the increased demand for workers. From the standpoint of elementary economic justice and industrial efficiency, the place where curbs should be imposed is on the bargaining power of capital, not of labor. Donald M. Nelson, Director of Purchases for the OPM and Sears, Roebuck executive, declared recently that some defense industries "had been a little greedy." The financial pages of the press offer much evidence to support this opinion. At the same time Labor's Non-Partisan League declares: "A WPA study in fifty-nine cities shows that a manual worker with a family of two small children needs at least $1,300 to $1,500 a year for a bare maintenance budget, which would not provide even some of the simplest comforts. Yet two-thirds of the industrial workers earn less than this amount, according to pay-roll reports of employers." The economic argument is buttressed by an even stronger political argument, put with great eloquence by Federal Security Administrator Paul McNutt in his Jefferson-dinner speech before the National Democratic Club in New York. Mr. McNutt replied to hysteria about strikes and demands for the restriction of labor's rights by declaring that we can only save democracy by extending and improving it.

"A coalition of business men, military officials, and Congressmen," the Wall Street Journal reported frankly from Washington on April 17, "stirred up anti-strike legislation, pigeonholed the New Deal's federal oil-control bill, waived NLRB compliance as a requirement for defense contracts, and toned down the anti-trust case against the oil industry." Chairman Vinson of the House Naval Affairs Committee has been one of their principal tools. As Hatton Sumners's Judiciary Committee usurped the power of the House Commerce Committee on the wire-tapping bill, so the Naval Affairs Committee has usurped the power of the House Labor Committee on Vinson's bill to repeal the Wagner Act. Though the bill makes crucial changes in labor's rights, it was rushed through the committee after only two days of hearings and after only two witnesses had testified—Secretary Knox and John Green of the shipbuilding workers' union. Knox and Stimson have helped the bill along by their statements, and Knudsen, as in his speech before the Academy of Political Science, has grown less and less restrained in his condemnation of labor, though he aided and abetted the three months' strike of capital last summer for special amortization privileges and repeal of profit limitations on defense contracts. It may be that Knudsen is speaking out more openly because he feels that the new powers given Harry Hopkins and Leon Henderson in the defense picture are limiting his authority. His function is to exercise his abilities as a production man on the blueprints of defense, not to act as a super-lobbyist for big business. In the former capacity, where his abilities are unquestioned, he could be most helpful. In the latter, he serves only to disaffect labor and undermine morale.

Will Japan Move South?

THE week that has passed since the signing of the Soviet-Japanese neutrality pact has brought only conflicting guesses as to its significance in terms of immediate Japanese policy. Some observers are certain that Japan will take advantage of the pact to launch its long-expected drive into the South Seas. Others seem equally confident that Japan has drawn a blank, and that it is in no better position than before to risk war with the United States. Still others look for an intensification of the campaign against China, while F. Tillman Durdin, probably the best-informed of the correspondents now in the Far East, predicts that Japan's first step will be an effort to conclude peace with Chiang Kai-shek.

In view of these conflicting interpretations, the interview with Toshio Shiratori, special adviser to the Japanese Foreign Office, published elsewhere in this issue is worth careful reading. Mr. Shiratori speaks for the extremists who have largely controlled Japanese foreign policy in recent years. He is obviously attempting to make the American people see the logic of Japanese expansionist dreams.

Except for their unusual candor, Mr. Shiratori's remarks follow the pattern of other recent Japanese statements. They represent an effort to appeal to isolationist sentiment by alternating threats with visions of a Greater America which is to coexist with a Greater East Asia and a New Order in Europe. Completely absent, of course, is any intimation of Japan's grave weakness after four years of indecisive war with China. Nor is there any indication of dissent within Japan regarding the course which the extremists have marked out for the island empire. Yet these factors must be weighed, along with the dreams of the militarists, in any effort to anticipate Japan's next step. From a military point of view, Japan's position has been little, if at all, improved by the pact, especially as Soviet assistance to China seems likely to continue. In view of the uncertainties of the European war, Japan will not dare to remove any considerable number of its troops from Manchuria. Nor has its shaky economic position been bettered. The United States still has it within its power to throttle Japan, militarily and economically, by imposing an iron-clad embargo on the export of oil, steel, and other essential war materials. Politically, the position of the Japanese extremists has been undermined by the free hand recently given to big business in dealing with the economic crisis. The business elements in Japan have always been inclined to be conciliatory toward the United States.

The special Cabinet meeting called to hear Mr. Matsuo's report suggests that despite the belligerent statements from Tokyo the basic decisions regarding Japanese action have not been made. Japan will probably confine its immediate efforts to strengthening its position in Thailand and Indo-China—a task which in any case would have to precede a drive on the main British and Dutch possessions in the South Seas.

The Price of Steel

THE steel industry has suffered two severe shocks in the past two weeks. The first was administered by one of its own leaders, E. T. Weir, chairman of the National Steel Corporation, who while negotiations for a wage increase were proceeding between United States Steel and the SWOC upped the rates of his own non-unionized workers by 10 cents an hour. This was exactly the extra amount which the SWOC was demanding, and after Weir's action any possibility of a compromise on a somewhat lower figure vanished. Not only United States Steel but all the other companies agreed fairly rapidly to pay the same increase. They did so with all the better grace because, with the demand for steel running away from supply, they imagined they would be able to compensate themselves through higher prices.

It was at this point that Leon Henderson, newly appointed Administrator of Prices and Civilian Supply, provided the second shock by issuing an order freezing steel quotations at their present level. The decision has evoked strong protests in the industry, and the Administration is being accused of encouraging wage advances while resisting price-raising, with the result that steel profits are being squeezed out of existence.

Before accepting this sad picture as a complete representation of the facts, it is well to consider the present financial position of the steel industry. Mr. Henderson's action, as he has explained, "should not be interpreted as fixing summarily a steel price ceiling for the duration of the emergency." It is intended, rather, to provide a "cooling-off period" during which a study can be made of steel prices and costs, "including wage increases, the significance of capacity operations, and the differences in costs among producers." Meanwhile, as Mr. Henderson has pointed out, the fact that basic prices have not been altered since the defense program was launched does not mean that receipts per ton have been the same. Various concessions have disappeared, charges for extras have been increased, and in some cases premiums have been obtained for early deliveries.

The most important fact with regard to steel, however, is that the huge increase in output, which stems directly from the government's defense spending, has drastically cut the costs of steel production, especially in the case of the big integrated companies which control some 80 per cent of the total output. According to the Wall Street Journal of February 5, 1941, nine leading concerns averaged $3.28 per ton profit in 1940 compared with $1.63 in 1939, in spite of a heavy increase in taxation. Again, United States Steel raised its output from 60.7 per cent of capacity in 1939 to 80.2 per cent in 1940, and its profits rose 150 per cent. The same company has estimated that the new increase in wages will cost it about $62 million per annum, and since its total profits for 1940 were about $102 million, it might appear that earnings would be cut sharply. However, U. S. Steel has been operating since the beginning of the current year at almost 100 per cent of capacity, and there is every reason to suppose that this rate will be maintained at least into 1942. As a result fixed charges will be spread over a much larger total tonnage and net earnings will very probably be maintained despite the larger wage bill.

Another point to be taken into consideration is that a part of the additional cost of labor will be offset by savings in taxes. As the invaluable Wall Street Journal pointed out on April 17: "Most if not all of the big steel producers are currently earning at a rate putting them well into the excess-profits tax brackets. Of every dollar of earnings in the top brackets 62 cents goes to the tax collector. Thus so long as the wage increases do not cut profits below the excess-profits tax credit, the cost of the advances, so far as the stockholders are concerned, is only about 38 per cent of the amount by which wages are boosted."

Taking such considerations into account, it seems probable that the big steel concerns, which control the whole process from raw material to the finished product, may be able to absorb the increase in wages and still retain handsome profits. But the position of the smaller producers must also be taken into account, since every ton of steel which can be delivered from the furnaces is now required. Such producers have to buy ore and scrap in the open market; they do not enjoy economies obtained from very large-scale operations—for instance, in pig-iron manufacture—and in many cases they are working with older and less efficient plant. It may be that some of these concerns will find their margins of profit wiped out by increased labor and other costs. But a rise in steel prices sufficient to bring them a reasonable return would mean pure gravy for the big fellows, and would raise the costs of every industry using steel to the detriment of the government and of civilian consumption.

Mr. Henderson must decide, therefore, the best method of keeping the small concerns in production. It would certainly be cheaper for the government to subsidize them than allow a rise in prices, or it might prove advisable for the government to lease their plants for a fixed charge for the duration of the emergency. But the first thing to be done is to ascertain the exact status of costs and profits in the steel industry, and the meaning of Mr. Henderson's freezing order is that the steel companies must open their books and prove their case before their plea for higher prices is given consideration.

The Balkan Scramble

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AS THE German forces push southward through the Greek mountain passes, plowing their dead into the earth as they move, the New Order begins to take shape behind them. Hitler spent his birthday discussing the disposition of the conquered lands, and solemn dispatches from Berlin reported progress in drawing up plans for Balkan "reconstruction." But we need not wait for the final blueprints; Hitler's basic purpose is already clear. The New Order in Eastern Europe is to be calculated chaos.

Pretty soon the map drawn at Versailles will begin to look like the work of disinterested and inspired statesmen rather than of conquerors concerned chiefly to safeguard their own position. The nations that were set up in 1919 on the ruins of old empires were at least roughly adjusted to national aspiration and ethnic realities. Under Hitler's plan each fragmentary group is evidently being prepared for a future of vendetta and guerrilla warfare against its neighbor, with Germany standing by as both agent provocateur and umpire. This system is hardly calculated to provide Hitler with the fruits of peace; but he is doubtless ready to sacrifice a certain percentage of production to the larger necessity of keeping his feudal estates weak and at odds with one another.

The Rumanian War Minister has called upon his helpless country to wipe out the "bitter traces" of its losses in 1940. Concretely this means that the present government is supporting agitation for the return of Rumanian territory turned over to Hungary by Hitler last winter. But Hungary, taking advantage of the general dissolution, plans to demand or take more of Transylvania from Rumania as well as a part of the Banat—claimed by Rumania—from Yugoslavia. The corpse of Yugoslavia obviously offers the best pickings to the Balkan vultures. Bulgaria, having surrendered to Hitler without a fight and even joined in the attack on northern Greece, has already put in its bid for a slice: Bulgarian troops are now occupying several areas in Macedonia and Thrace. The new state of Croatia, torn out of the side of Yugoslavia, is apparently destined for "independence" under Nazi control. What prizes the triumphant Italian Fascists will win, besides the Albanian lands reconquered by Hitler, no one can yet say. They are laying claim to Dalmatia, "which is Roman and Venetian," and to Montenegro, a tough little principality which can be counted upon to cause trouble to any nation that annexes it. But whatever Mussolini gets will be in the nature of a hand-out, and Hitler will certainly assure himself outlets to the Adriatic before he takes care of his diminished Axis partner. The final slicing-up of Yugoslavia will await the end of the war in Greece. But enough has happened to provide a picture of the New Order in process of organization. France, whose turn may come next, should watch the Balkan scramble with interest.

Meanwhile the Allied retreat in Greece continues. The whole effort of the defending forces is obviously concentrated on making the Nazis pay as high a price as possible—in men and material and time—for every mile gained. And this object is apparently being accomplished; Hitler is not getting his Balkan victory for nothing. But wars are not won by minor defensive successes. Already a possible withdrawal of the British forces is being discussed in the press here and in England. Some experts are convinced that the maximum military advantage of the Greek resistance in Greece will soon have been realized and that the strategic value of a timely evacuation would offset its political ill effects.

I have before me a memorandum prepared for The Nation by the eminent military expert, Herbert Rosinski, which arrived too late to be printed in full in this issue. Its timeliness is so apparent that I want to summarize it briefly here. In all his lectures and writings Dr. Rosinski has pointed out the danger of basing optimistic hopes on superficial minor successes. The present situation in Greece, he believes, should have been expected and discounted in advance. At no time was there reason to believe that the Yugoslavs could hold out against the vast superiority, in numbers and equipment, of Hitler's mechanized divisions. While the British and Greek forces, better prepared and supported by Britain's naval power, have a chance of at least maintaining a foothold on the peninsula, he doubts the wisdom of an attempt to do so.

Britain, Dr. Rosinski believes, moved its forces into Greece for compelling political reasons. Today, for equally compelling military reasons, Britain must consider the advisability of taking them out. "However painful it may be," he says, "the arguments for such a move from a purely strategic point of view are almost overwhelming. On the great strategic map of the war this core of Greece forms an isolated bastion which may indeed serve to hold up the Nazi advance for a while longer but in itself possesses no appreciable value either for defense or for a possible counter-offensive at a later stage. Its flanking position toward a German advance through Asia Minor is in its turn heavily discounted by Italian control of the Dodecanese; while the chances of successful bombing operations against the Rumanian oil wells from its air fields are conceded to be very small. In contrast, the British position in North Africa forms one of the main pillars of the whole Allied strategy, the fall of which would entail the most serious consequences, not only for the Near East, but for the whole conduct of the war. Now that the German drive across Libya has rapidly developed into a serious menace, the reconcentration in North Africa of all forces, including the bulk of the British armored forces at present in Greece, has become a vital military necessity.

"Thus the question of evacuation leads back to the dilemma before which the Allies found themselves placed from the beginning of this campaign: whether for moral reasons to expose themselves to the possibility of a military disaster which might engulf with the best part of their forces the whole of their power of resistance in the Near East, or, by refusing to let themselves be drawn into that trap, to furnish Hitler the opportunity of denouncing their failure to support their allies."

The Nazi drive in North Africa has during the past week bogged down; and when a Blitzkrieg loses its Blitz it may find difficulty in recovering momentum. If the British move sufficient forces from Greece to Egypt they may succeed in permanently checking the German advance toward the Suez Canal. But by the same act, as Dr. Rosinski points out, they will help Hitler wage the psychological war through which he unceasingly attempts to impose the fiction that all the troubles of the non-belligerent nations arise from their susceptibility to British instigations and their reliance on British promises. Today this idea is rammed home through German war communiqués which praise the heroic resistance of the Greeks while at the same time insinuating that British forces "are nowhere to be seen" or "are already looking around for the nearest port of embarkation."

These maneuvers, in Dr. Rosinski's opinion, are preparations for a new and heavy peace offensive to be launched at the end of the Balkan campaign. With Britain thrown—or frightened—off the Continent and the superiority of German arms finally demonstrated, Hitler will ask, "What possible hope of a come-back can the Allies entertain; what interest, above all, can the American people have in such a hopeless cause?" The fact that this argument is based on a series of military fallacies does not lessen its danger. But it is a danger that Britain must reckon with in making the crucial political and military decisions of the coming days.

Pipe Lines and Profits

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 20

THE hope that the Russo-Japanese pact does not mean Soviet abandonment of China is growing dimmer here, and this would be the psychological moment for the Administration to make Morgenthau and Jesse Jones stop piddling and fiddling over that $100,000,000 they promised the Chinese last fall. It would also be the psychological moment for an embargo on all oil shipments to Japan. The Chinese need a shot in the arm badly, and their continued resistance is as important to us in the East as Britain's is in the West. Pravda's belly-crawling assurances yesterday to Hitler and its scarcely veiled invitation to the Japanese to help themselves to "vulnerable spots" in the East signal serious trouble ahead. I am informed in the Department of Commerce that our oil exports to Japan are still averaging about 400,000 barrels a week, and have been as high as 600,000 barrels. This includes crude oil for Japan's refineries, fuel oil for its navy, low-grade aviation gas, motor fuel for mechanized vehicles, and lubricating oils of all kinds. Since the oil companies are always asking for our intervention in their behalf in Latin America, since we helped them muscle in on the Near East fields after the last war, and since we may have to defend the Dutch East Indies, an embargo ought to apply to shipments from American oil-company properties anywhere—in the Dutch West Indies as well as the Dutch East Indies, on the Persian Gulf as well as the Gulf of Mexico. A government too flabby to keep its oil companies from fueling our enemies is too flabby to fight a successful war.

Rancid is the word for the contrast between the unwillingness of the oil companies to make this contribution to the security of their country and the many favors they continue to ask and receive here in the name of national defense. The State Department is making a fatted calf of Camacho in preparation for the return of our prodigal oil companies to Mexico. We have placed a Rockefeller in charge of promoting our Good Neighbor policy, and he has the help of a Chase National Bank executive in passing on Export-Import Bank loans to Latin America. Chase National, based on Standard Oil millions, is well known for neighborliness in Latin America, particularly in Cuba, where it financed a man named Machado. It and the oil dollar-a-year men could easily prove criticism unjust by exerting their influence to stop oil shipments to Japan. Some of them have been using their influence to obtain some extraordinary letters in behalf of their companies from Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Stimson, and Mr. Knox. There is no good reason why this influence shouldn't work both ways.

So far the only embargo for which the oil trust's dollar-a-year men have been plugging is an embargo on Thurman Arnold. Thurman Arnold, like Senator O'Mahoney, derives ultimately from the oil state of Wyoming, and the oil companies aren't accustomed to back talk from that area. The Senator is so well house-broken that he didn't even mention the oil monopoly in the final report of his monopoly inquiry, a spectacle to make history gape. Arnold, though unpredictable, has backbone, and he started out last fall to use both the Sherman Act and the Elkins Act against the pipe lines. Control of transportation is as much the heart of the oil monopoly today as it was when Henry Demarest Lloyd wrote "Wealth Versus Commonwealth." The pipe lines are supposed to be common carriers; the oil monopoly has kept them private thoroughfares. The first move made by the oil companies was to obtain a report from the National Defense Commission, prepared by Leon Henderson, hinting that defense would be impaired if Arnold were permitted to demand divorcement of the pipe lines. The report said the companies would not build certain pipe lines badly needed for defense if he went ahead with this part of his anti-trust suit. When I asked where these pipe lines were to be built I was told that was a military secret. I then obtained possession of this military secret for 15 cents by buying a copy of the annual pipe-line number of the Oil and Gas Journal, which contained a map showing all existing pipe lines and the two proposed new ones referred to in the report.

One was to be built from Port St. Joe, Florida, to Chattanooga by Pure Oil (Dawes interests) and Gulf (Mellon). The other, from Baton Rouge to Portsmouth, was the competitive answer of Standard of New Jersey and Shell interests, which didn't propose to be put at a disadvantage in the Southeastern marketing area. The promoters of the first line ran into a snag and asked the legislature of Georgia for the right to acquire property by condemnation. The companies obtained a letter from the President saying this was needed for national defense, but on March 19 the legislature, though intensely pro-Roosevelt, refused the request, and the companies are now about to ask Congress for a law giving them the right of eminent domain in Georgia. The Cole committee, which since 1933 has spent about $500,000 investigating oil without ever doing much about it, was chosen as the oil-company forum. On January 24 Rear Admiral H. A. Stuart, director of naval petroleum reserves, had written Congressman John M. Coffee of Washington that the proposed pipe line was "a purely private enterprise" for the importation into the Southeast of "imported refined petroleum products, probably from Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, etc. . . . and so far as I am aware would not be of any service to the navy." Admiral Stuart was forced to eat his words. On the witness stand before the Cole committee he was confronted with a letter from Secretary of the Navy Knox declaring that this pipe line was required for defense. Major Clifford V. Morgan, oil expert in the office of the Under Secretary of War, who also failed to see any connection between this pipe line and defense, was similarly confronted with a letter to the contrary from Secretary of War Stimson. The railroads and the brotherhoods claim that with 9,000 tank cars a day idle and a shortage of steel the defense argument really runs the other way. Congressman Lea elicited the information at the Cole committee's hearing that the Baton Rouge-Portsmouth line alone would require enough steel to build three 35,000-ton battleships.

Curiously enough, this is the moment at which the liberals on the ICC have finally prevailed upon their colleagues to exercise, for the first time, the power given them by Congress thirty-seven years ago to regulate pipe lines. An order has been issued reducing crude-oil pipeline rates to an 8 per cent return (they have been averaging 25 per cent), and another order reduces the rates of two Midwestern gasoline pipe lines to a miserly 20 per cent (they have been averaging 30 per cent). No doubt the companies will use this as an additional argument for softening up the consent decree they are now negotiating behind the scenes with Thurman Arnold. Thus the ICC, like Providence, moves in mysterious ways. The joker is that very few independents can get to the pipe lines anyway. So long as we permit integrated companies to control the flow of oil from the well to the service-station pump, a reduction in the rates they charge themselves for the use of their own pipe lines merely forces them to put less in one pocket and more in another.

Tokyo—Moscow—Berlin

BY ROBERT W. BARNETT

ON March 15, two days after Foreign Minister Matsuoka's departure for Moscow, Berlin, and Rome, I asked and was granted an interview with Toshio Shiratori, special adviser to the Japanese Foreign Office and one of Mr. Matsuoka's principal aides. Mr. Shiratori, formerly Japan's ambassador to Italy, is a strong advocate of Japanese cooperation with the Rome-Berlin Axis and was an influential architect in the construction of Japan's present policies—domestically, the New Structure; internationally, the New Order in Greater East Asia. The orientation for which Mr. Shiratori speaks entails explicit opposition to the vested interests of Anglo-American capitalism, and in the course of an earlier interview, on September 26, 1940, he had made his position on this score clear to the point of bluntness. When I cited Japanese opinion in Shanghai to the effect that a Japanese-American war would be a supreme tragedy, Mr. Shiratori replied, "It may be a tragedy but it is a necessity—an inevitability."

Between my two interviews with Mr. Shiratori much had happened. General Tatekawa had found his efforts to conclude a Japanese-Soviet non-aggression agreement apparently fruitless. The Gaimusho, or Foreign Office, had watched with little satisfaction the reelection of President Roosevelt, acceleration of the American rearmament effort, and the passage of the Lend-Lease bill.

It had observed, too, the unbending resistance to German air attacks offered by the British people and the Royal Air Force, the Italian reverses in North Africa and in Albania, and Bulgaria's adherence to the Axis. Units of the American navy were cruising off the coast of New Zealand when Matsuoka embarked upon a mission of state that was to culminate in the treaty with the Soviet Union. It was clearly a strategic time to check on the gains and losses to date and to inquire about trends for the future.

What, I asked Mr. Shiratori, have been the concrete gains which Japan has already achieved through adherence to the Tripartite Alliance? "It has been stated frequently," Mr. Shiratori began, "that Japan has nothing, Germany everything, to gain from the alliance." This judgment, he conceded, has a large measure of truth if one looks at Europe alone. In Europe Germany's opponents are Great Britain and the United States. Germany has no navy; Japan has. Japan is therefore a potential aid to Germany's war plans. Furthermore, he went on, it is said that in the East Japan cannot be assisted by Germany, indeed, has no need of German support, and one is asked why Japan therefore has not remained alone? Japan has not remained alone because after Great Britain and the United States are shut out of Europe, as is bound to be the case apparently, these two powers will then be prompted to attack Japan. If Japan stayed aloof now, Germany and Italy would be entitled to let it take care of itself later. Their own hands would in all probability be full, and they would have no desire to assist Japan.

The essence of the Tripartite Alliance, Mr. Shiratori continued, is that the new orders, both in Europe and in Asia, must be bound together and made interdependent. Hence, as Japan fights for the New Order in Greater East Asia it is helped by the war being waged by Germany and Italy against Great Britain and the United States. At one time the war in Europe was merely a European affair, and the prospect was that Hitler would confine his interest and his energies to the Continent. After the downfall of France, indeed, Hitler offered peace to Great Britain on condition that it keep its hands off Europe and restrict itself to maintaining its empire overseas. Had the British Empire been ruled by its people, Mr. Shiratori suggested, and not by an oligarchy, such an arrangement would have been quite acceptable. But Great Britain rejected this offer, making it clear that Germany must continue the struggle against the entire Anglo-Saxon world. Germany is therefore compelled to wage war until it breaks Anglo-Saxon control not only in Europe but throughout the world. The Axis must defeat Great Britain in Asia as well as in Europe.

It was recognition of this prospect, Mr. Shiratori explained, that made Hitler realize the necessity of a pact with Japan. Japan accepted the offer of a pact, he continued, because it felt that if Germany and Italy were genuinely determined to defeat Great Britain, such an objective had a very clear and intimate relation to Japan's own mission in East Asia. The Japanese realize that the New Order in Greater East Asia is incompatible with a Pax Britannica. Japan regards the China war in essence as a war waged against British rule in China.

Mr. Shiratori next turned his attention to the charge that Germany has not afforded Japan much help. The answer, in his view, is simply that Japan has fought China for three and a half years without material help from any source. I interrupted him at this point to draw attention to the fact that the Chinese and many observers in the United States believed that American aid to Japan had helped to support its war effort. Mr. Shiratori insisted that Japan had fought alone "despite the tender mercies of the United States" and had reached the point where help from any quarter was welcome. He reiterated that Germany had actually contributed invaluable assistance by fighting for the New Order in Europe.

I suggested to Mr. Shiratori that were Germany, in the future, to find itself in the military position to which Italy has been reduced in recent months, Japan might, in turn, face a different situation.

"We cannot say which side will win," he replied, "but we know which ought to win—must win—and which to help. That should be enough." In any event, he continued, the pact made no difference; Japan would be in the same position without it if Germany were to suffer reverses. After the last World War Japan, an ally of the democracies, found that its designs were frustrated by obstacles created by the democratic powers. These powers, in recent years, he argued, had continued to pursue the same course, long before the pact was concluded. In the China campaign and elsewhere Japan had encountered American criticism and opposition. Indeed, British and American hostility to Japan during the China war, according to Mr. Shiratori, was solely responsible for Japan's adherence to the Axis.

Toshio Shiratori

"For many months," I remarked, "but especially since September, 1940, it has been a commonplace to declare that Japan and the United States belong to clearly opposed camps. Both Japanese and American observers are inclined to attribute to each other a large measure of bluff in the conduct of these increasingly strained relations. Who, in your opinion, is the real bluffer and wherein lies his pretense?"

Mr. Shiratori laughed at this manner of approaching the question, but began answering me by saying that Japan and the United States have been in different camps ever since the Treaty of Portsmouth. In 1914 it was mere accident that accounted for Japan's support of the Allies. The World War, he said, opened the eyes of both Italy and Japan. Both countries readily admit the gravity of the mistake they made. As to which country was the biggest bluffer, Mr. Shiratori solemnly asserted that so far as Japan was concerned there was no element of bluff in anything it undertook. This, he said, has been amply demonstrated in the China war. The rulers of the United States, he went on, are already deeply involved in Europe and in Asia. To them the issue of war in Europe and Asia is a matter of life or death. Wall Street and America's financial interests feel that the war is their war, and they cannot afford to let Germany and Japan win. As to whether or not Germany and Japan would be able to defeat the United States, Mr. Shiratori would not hazard a guess, but, he added, not every war is bound to produce decided victors. There can be wars in which all parties are winners or all parties losers. In the last World War all major parties were losers; he expected this one to produce only winners.

Mr. Shiratori said that it was only common sense to view the post-war world as one made up of several autarchies. The American autarchy would have at its disposal the vast natural resources of North and South America. What more, Mr. Shiratori inquired, could it desire? Americans could stay at home, and the masses would greatly benefit from a decision to let Asia alone. The Japanese autarchy would include Greater East Asia. Japan would set its house in order and leave the rest of the world alone. What territories, in exact terms, would be included in Greater East Asia Mr. Shiratori did not make clear, but he maintained that Japan's purpose was not so much economic as humanitarian. Wherever Asiatics were enslaved they must be released. So far as economic resources were concerned, the Asiatics in South-east Asia would be glad to share resources which other parts of the world do not possess, but they do not wish to be under the rule of imperialistic nations.

In addition to the American and Japanese autarchies, Mr. Shiratori informed me, there would be a Soviet autarchy, which would probably include a large part of British India. Turkey's future position he found difficult to foresee, except that the country could not of course remain independent. It might be included in the Soviet group or in the European group. The European autarchy, under German dominance, would include the European and African continents, but even so it would be the one most lacking in material resources.

When I asked Mr. Shiratori if Europe's deficiencies might not contain the seeds of conflict between Japan and Germany, he said such a conflict was now difficult to foresee. It has been a great mistake, he insisted, to attribute to Hitler designs to conquer the world. "I think that the American public has been led to believe in the existence of dangers which in fact are non-existent. That is, they are told to fear the danger of aggression from Europe or from Asia. Europe's concern is only to be left alone. If the United States has a real interest in the fate of England, then the United States should realize that it possesses enough territory to invite all Anglo-Saxon peoples to reside there."

As for Australia, Mr. Shiratori expressed the opinion that since its inhabitants were white Japan had no claim upon it and would be very glad to live at peace with it.

At this point I asked Mr. Shiratori what was the particular purpose at the bottom of Foreign Minister Matsuoka's trip to Europe. He expressed the belief that the mission had no definite object further than to make personal contact with Hitler and Mussolini and to compare notes with them. "Will Matsuoka attempt," I asked, "to conclude an agreement with the Soviet Union in the course of this journey?" Mr. Shiratori said that this was not impossible. Japan had always attempted to bring about better relations with the Soviet Union. Germany and Russia were at present on good terms. It is possible, he added, that Germany would use its good offices to assist Japan in this object. I asked if a Japanese-Soviet agreement was not, in fact, a prerequisite for a wholly satisfactory implementation of Japan's designs in the south. Mr. Shiratori said that he did not believe that it was. He saw no reason why Japan and the Soviet Union should clash in any event. The Soviet Union, he believed, wished to remain neutral to the end of the current world conflict. Of course, if it found Japan completely helpless it might not remain idle. Therefore Japan wished, in advance, to make agreements with all countries which do not stand in its way. If the United States would remain neutral and speed Japan in its southward march, Japan would be only too glad. I asked Mr. Shiratori bluntly if Japan would regard a Japanese-Soviet agreement as a go-ahead signal for the southward push. Mr. Shiratori said that he could not speak for the Russians, but he saw no reason why the Soviet Union should seek to check Japan in its program of southward expansion. Russia might even hope for the acceleration of that program, he suggested, since this might bring about Japanese-American hostilities. Should this occur, the whole world would be at war, with only the Soviet Union aloof and neutral.

I suggested that Japanese statesmen must surely have made plans for dealing with China in connection with their southward expansion and asked Mr. Shiratori what, at present, were the prospects of bringing to an end the "China incident." He replied quickly that the Japanese regarded the Chinese war as practically finished. The supreme object of Japan's China campaign was already or would soon be attained—that is, the establishment of China's independence from harmful exploitation by imperialistic peoples, especially Great Britain. Mr. Shiratori said that it was amply clear that Sir Victor Sassoon was at the bottom of the China war. So long as Britishers were guilty of sinister manipulations, Japan and China could find no lasting peace. China, he said, would swiftly confiscate foreign properties in Shanghai. His own government, he told me, had already promised the Chinese to abandon Japan's special rights there. This promise, however, would not be made good until other peoples had been forced to give up their privileges. Shanghai, in this regard, has a unique importance. All decent people, said Mr. Shiratori, consider Shanghai a hell on earth—a veritable city of vice. Who made it so? The British. This wicked element must be driven away—at the point of the bayonet if necessary. The operation would be very simple. I asked Mr. Shiratori if the operation would take place before or after the establishment of the New Order in Greater East Asia. He evaded my question but asserted that the existence of Shanghai would certainly be wholly incompatible with the New Order when it was established. What objectionable activities the Japanese themselves have carried on in China, he said, had been learned from teachers from the West, who had influenced liberal and capitalist elements within his country. Japan at present feels that it must cure that unfortunate aspect of the situation at home. If the rule of Tenno is really achieved within Japan, Mr. Shiratori concluded, Japan's problems elsewhere will be solved.

Hitler Eyes Portugal

BY W. E. LUCAS

WHATEVER may be happening in the Balkans or in the Libyan Desert, one thing is certain: the Atlantic is the main theater of this war.

Only there can a speedy collapse of Great Britain be forced. Without a quick victory in the Atlantic Germany will have to face a long war and the one peril which it really fears, the steadily growing pressure of sea power and of American material aid to the Allies.

It is in the light of the Battle of the Atlantic that the present campaign in the Balkans and the Axis drive to the Egyptian border must be viewed. The Balkan campaign, if the Germans are successful, will not only threaten British supremacy in the eastern Mediterranean but clear the way for a future advance into the granary of the Ukraine and the oil fields of the Caucasus. These will be necessary steps for Hitler if he is unable to obtain a victory in the Atlantic this summer. The attack on Egypt is directed not only against the Suez Canal but against the whole of the North African coast as far south as Dakar. The further the British can be pushed back from the Tunisian border, the greater the pressure that can be brought to bear on an isolated General Weygand to bend him to the will of Berlin. It can be said that the Nazi advance in Libya is made with a backward glance toward the Atlantic seaboard and that one of its main objects is to strengthen the Axis position on the Western Ocean.

These preliminary moves in the extension of the Battle of the Atlantic automatically bring the Iberian Peninsula into the strategic picture. In this major plan Portugal, jutting far out toward the west, holds obvious prizes for the Germans. It has two fine harbors in Lisbon and Oporto. Madeira and the Azores are stepping-stones to the American continent. The Cape Verde Islands and the Portuguese colonies in Africa pierce the Allied control of the African continent south of the Equator. From the airports of Cintra and Espinho long-range bombers could roam within hailing distance of the Western Hemisphere. From Lagos in the south the skies above the Straits of Gibraltar could be closely patrolled. Against these advantages the physical difficulties of an occupation of Portugal are few. Perhaps less than any other small European state could this country offer resistance to the advance of Nazi mechanized troops, coming through Spain.

Portugal's independence has been seriously threatened ever since the Nazi legions arrived in the Pyrenees. It was a matter for wonder then that Hitler did not order his armies to roll on into Spain and, fanning out, to occupy Gibraltar and Lisbon. There was nothing at that time to stop them. The neutrality policy adopted by Salazar in October, 1939, could not of itself have prevented his country from becoming the center of a tug-of-war by the contending forces. But it seemed that an independent Portugal had its uses for Hitler. Lisbon was the last remaining outlet from Europe to the world beyond. Through it passed Nazi agents and material for propaganda in South America and the United States. At the Cintra airport great four-engined Lufthansa passenger planes landed daily, together with smaller Italian and Spanish aircraft. They brought in not only men but goods of small bulk and high value. Some of this remained in Portugal; much was carried by Italian planes or ships to South America and gained for the Nazis needed foreign exchange. From Portugal itself raw materials could be acquired in limited quantities and shipped over the Spanish border. Lisbon was one of the few leaks in the British blockade through which, by devious methods, essential fats could be sent into Germany. At the same time the Nazis were making their dispositions for the possible taking over of the country. To these Axis activities the British replied with counter-measures and attempts to win the Portuguese government to a firmer belief in the possibilities of an Allied victory.

In the meantime Salazar was using every means at his disposal to keep the German threat at arm's length and to prevent the economic strangulation of his country by the British blockade. Obviously Portugal's last line of defense is the Pyrenees. Only so long as Nazi troops can be kept on the northern slopes of those mountains can the country maintain its independence. The key to the situation lies in Spain, and it has been to bolster General Franco's resistance to Hitler pressure that Salazar has worked ever since the early months of 1940.

So far this policy of close cooperation with Spain has brought results. Through an agreement with the British the majority of the food that is imported into Spain comes from Portugal and its colonies. The British let it through the blockade, and payment for it is made in sterling against the Anglo-Spanish clearing arrangement. Incidentally this is a profitable business for the Portuguese since it enables them to sell some of their colonial products and at the same time gives them valuable sterling credits. Another recent commercial treaty with Spain has stimulated trade between the two countries and, together with a pact of mutual assistance, has drawn them into a closer union. But these safeguards will be effective only while food remains the most important factor in the Spanish situation. It is the scarcity of food in Spain that enables Salazar to exert his decisive influence on the war policy of Franco—against participation.

On the other side of the Portuguese balance sheet are the economic difficulties of the Portuguese state. Salazar has worked for twelve years to build a solid financial and economic foundation for his New State. But the dislocation of world trade resulting from the war has interrupted most of the commerce of the Portuguese colonies, which before 1939 found their biggest market in Central Europe. The friendly agreement between Britain and Portugal has done something to mitigate the situation, but nothing can divert the inexorable forces that are crippling the country at the very beginning of its experiment in "national regeneration."

There is a sharp cleavage of opinion among the people. The great majority by tradition and sympathy are pro-Ally. At the same time, as is only natural in a dictator regime, there are many groups, both within and without the government, which derive their inspiration from the ideologies of the totalitarian states. Most Portuguese are undoubtedly behind Salazar, but there is less widespread support for the regime as a whole. This conflict of thought and feeling within the country has naturally produced strains that lessen the political strength of the state.

When all is said and done, the fate of Portugal must depend upon factors over which Salazar has no control. Its future stand in the war will depend upon the strategic demands of the Axis powers, that is, upon Hitler's calculation of the profit and loss that would follow an occupation of the Iberian Peninsula. From the example of the Balkan countries it might seem that he would find the swallowing of Spain and Portugal a simple and inexpensive matter. But there exist certain conditions in this part of Europe that must make the Nazis hesitate. In the first place there is the question of food. Already, without German occupation, 20,000,000 Spaniards are on the verge of starvation. Portugal, though almost self-supporting, offers nothing of real consequence in either food or raw materials. Moreover, occupation would immediately bring about the complete blockade of the Peninsula and thus reduce the people to actual starvation. Hitler would then face the alternative of allowing 25,000,000 people to starve or feeding them himself. The latter choice would put a heavy strain upon the German transport facilities and at the same time drain the limited food supplies which Germany has stored for itself and the rest of occupied Europe. Even if these difficulties could be overcome, it is doubtful that Hitler could spare so much fuel for a non-essential military object.

Great Britain's reaction to the occupation of Portugal would certainly be the seizure of the Azores and the Cape Verde Islands, and possibly Madeira as well. And British possession of these invaluable strategic positions for the Battle of the Atlantic would largely offset the advantages which the seizure of the French ports of Casablanca and Dakar would bring to the Germans.

Apart from these two major considerations the Nazis must question the advisability of increasing by another thousand miles the coast line which they will be forced to defend against British naval attack. The shape of things to come has been glimpsed in the recent raids on the Norwegian coast and the constant landings, small but persistent, on the shores of France. If the British can withstand both the siege and the invasion of their island fortress during this year, by 1942, with a growing parity in the air, the whole of Europe's eastern seaboard will be a battlefield immensely difficult to defend. And in the background looms the shadow of the United States, which is being compelled to push farther afield the frontiers it must defend for its own safety.

These, then, are the questions which Hitler must face before he can make any decision that will affect the independence of Portugal. If he is convinced that occupation is to his advantage he will move into the Iberian Peninsula in spite of the risks involved. His next step depends in large measure upon the success of the present campaigns in the Balkans and in Libya. If these two regions can be cleared up, then it will be possible for him to develop his strategy on the southern Atlantic seaboard by way of the North African coast, without having to disturb the hornets' nest of difficulties that lies along the path through Spain and Portugal.

Eviction by Machinery

BY DALE KRAMER

ALITTLE more than a month and a half ago, on March 1, the date when most leases expire, thousands of American farmers had to leave their homes because the technology of agriculture today made it impossible for them to compete with their neighbors. They had been squeezed out, evicted by the power machine, and many of them left the land for good.

The trend is manifest today in all agricultural areas. What happens is simple. A farmer—say, a small operator in Iowa—owned his property until the insurance company foreclosed on his mortgage in the early thirties. From then on he managed only fairly well, for his equipment was not especially good and his credit was impaired by the foreclosure. His neighbors meanwhile had succeeded in equipping themselves with the new power machinery, which cut their production time almost in half. It is true that one of them had to mortgage his farm in order to purchase the new implements, but at any rate he had them.

In the past few years the neighbors of the man who had to surrender his property to the insurance company have found their farms altogether too small. With little added time and expense each could cultivate another forty to eighty acres, perhaps more. The one who had to mortgage his property to buy the equipment feels that it is absolutely essential that he get additional land to enable him to meet principal and interest. The insurance company is naturally eager to secure the highest rent possible for the foreclosed farm. Having had little paint or repair, the buildings on it are not of great value. But the farmer next door has no use for the buildings, and he offers simply to rent the parcel of land at a price equal to or higher than that paid by the present lessee.

The farmer threatened by this squeeze resists for a year or two, accepting an additional rent load and putting in longer hours. But in the end he bows to the inevitable. He shops around for another farm, but there is none to be had. In the past the evicted farmer purchased a feed-grinder, hay-baler, or equipment of some kind with the proceeds of his closing-out sale, moved to a nearby village, and tried to pick up a living by custom jobs. But the field has long been overcrowded. Demand for farm labor is anything but heavy except for a few weeks in the busy seasons, and even if an opportunity came along the evicted man would hesitate to accept it because his social status would be hurt. Eventually he may be forced to endure the reduction in status, but he will want to hide his shame by migrating to another part of the country. Another possibility for him is to acquire a subsistence patch somewhere; or he may follow the road to the city and, in time, to the relief rolls.

This process, familiar in farm areas throughout the country, is relatively direct and simple. Perhaps in more cases the fences are merely uprooted after the death or retirement of a farm operator. Yet the result is the same: a section of the agricultural population is displaced. In the South the reduction from small owner or share-cropper to field hand, and from field hand to vagrancy, can happen very quickly.

For some time the sweep of technological advances has worried the men whose job it is to see into the future of agriculture, and, lately, the talk in farm homes has turned more and more to the subject. Now comes the United States Department of Agriculture's survey of the problem (a 224-page report titled "Technology on the Farm"). If it offers no solution, it at least gives a view of the problem as a whole, and makes it possible to measure in some degree the impact of the changes on the whole rural population.

Nowadays the farmer rides to the field on a speedy pneumatic-tired tractor. Where he used to follow afoot a single plow drawn by a team of horses or mules, several plows now follow him. Disking, harrowing, and planting are greatly facilitated not only by improvements in the implements themselves but also by the tractor's greater speed. It is therefore not surprising that the number of tractors in use doubled between 1930 and 1940, and that a further increase is predicted. About 60 per cent of all farms large enough to make practical use of tractors already have them—about 90 per cent of the farms in the wheat and corn belts and the specialized dairy, truck, and orchard areas of the East and Far West.

It is in harvesting machinery that the most recent and startling technological gains have been made. The big combine, cutting and threshing at the same time, which, in the 1920's began to eliminate the great crews that once followed the wheat harvest, was succeeded in 1935 by the "baby" combine, and in 1939 by the "midget." Now the great crews which used to follow the wheat harvest have all disappeared, and along with them that engaging feature of the old Midwestern harvest season—the neighborly threshing ring with its gargantuan dinners.

The invention a few years ago of a mechanical cotton picker, foreshadowing the displacement of hundreds of thousands of small owners, share-croppers, and field hands, perhaps more than anything else called attention to the farm technological problem. But the picker has not yet been perfected and consequently its impact on human lives has so far not been seriously felt. On the other hand, the mechanical corn-harvester works efficiently, and the rapidity of its adoption during the past year or two has been phenomenal. Corn-husking used to be something of an art, and probably will remain one as long as the annual contests held throughout the Middle West retain their popularity. But a relatively small percentage of next autumn's crop will ring against the tall sideboards of the wagons. Instead, machines which look like giant worms will rumble quickly down the rows behind tractors, sucking the yellow ears from their husks. A good hand picker does well to harvest an acre a day; in the same time the mechanical picker harvests seven or eight acres with ease.

Other factors facilitating production are improvement in plant and animal stocks and headway in the fight on the insects and diseases which beset them. The situation is pointed up ironically by Henry Wallace's role in the development of hybrid corn while, as Secretary of Agriculture, he had to deal with overproduction. Hybrid seed steps up production five to six bushels an acre, or from 15 to 20 per cent. It is now used on 24,000,000 acres, or one-fourth of the total acreage planted to corn, with an estimated increase in yield of 100,000,000 bushels and with probably another 120,000,000 bushels in sight.

Almost all other plants have been improved, though the result has been less dramatic than in the case of corn. The cotton staple has been lengthened, and new types of wheat, oats, sugar beets, and soy beans have been introduced. The average farmer has also become a scientist in animal breeding and care.

The effect of all this on the national farm community can be summarized roughly as follows: (1) The larger, better-equipped, better-financed farmers benefit by the advance of technology ("To him who hath shall it be given"). (2) Poorer farmers migrate to the cities, shift to subsistence patches, or live somehow by odd jobs or by government relief ("and from him who hath not it shall be taken away"). (3) Young men find it increasingly hard to become farm operators.

The first point has already been partially illustrated by the account of the farmer who acquires a few score additional acres but has no intention of expanding further. Conditions favor to an even greater degree what Midwesterners call "corporation farmers"—the plantation owners of the South and the large fruit and vegetable growers of the Far West. The possibilities for the big owner can be judged from the survey's conclusion that in the South about four families are displaced by each tractor. The rate is not so high in other crop areas, or where custom and stiffer resistance by the population make it more difficult to throw fields together. But the opportunity is plain.

Landless farmers may, as the second point indicates, accept odd jobs, but the fact is that on the farms today there are at least 1,500,000 men—more than half of them under thirty-five years of age—either totally unemployed or unable to get work except in the busy seasons. Naturally wages have been forced far down. (Agricultural workers are not covered by wage-and-hour legislation.) Even the medium farmer who heretofore kept a hired hand finds it possible, with power machinery, to handle his work alone except during harvest, and then he can get all the help he wants for a dollar a day, or less.

The surplus of farmers and the shrinking of tillage land are partly responsible for the increased difficulties of the young man who wants to become a farm operator. Technology adds another handicap, as does the increase in capital outlay necessary to begin. In 1900 a young man wishing to start on an average scale needed only $3,000—the figure does not include land—and most of that he could borrow. The sum required had risen to $8,000 by 1930, and today he could hardly expect to get along with less than $15,000 in cash and credit. Since no farm laborer can hope to save anything like this sum out of his wages, only those blessed by inheritance can hope to become operators.

It is true that other than technological factors have contributed to the situation. For one thing, country boys used to find work more readily in the cities than they do now. In 1929, for example, 2,081,000 farm persons migrated to the city and 1,604,000 returned, leaving a net loss to the farm of 477,000. The ratio in 1939 was 1,063,000 to 805,000, or a loss to the farm of only 258,000. This loss would be beneficial still, except that the farm birth rate is high. Each year 400,000 men reach maturity on the land, but only 110,000 die and perhaps an equal number retire. As a result, the farm population in 1940 was 32,245,000 as compared with 30,220,000 in 1929, and by 1950 it will probably have increased by another 2,000,000.

Mechanization itself, the agricultural economists believe, will force from 350,000 to 500,000 farm operators and workers from their occupations during the next decade. The figure seems extremely conservative. The development and widespread use of the mechanical cotton picker, or of some other machine not yet on the horizon, could double or triple the figure. It is therefore conceivable that ten years hence 3,000,000 men will be living on the land with no opportunity to till it, while hundreds of thousands of others will have migrated to city relief rolls, and many more to subsistence patches.

Five days after he took office in 1933, President Roosevelt called a conference of farmers to map agricultural legislation. Three weeks ago the President, Vice-President Wallace, and Secretary of Agriculture Wickard delivered radio addresses commemorating that occasion.

Most of the speakers pointed with pride to the New Deal's achievements. National farm income had been reduced by half during the Hoover Administration. Under the New Deal it was raised from $5,409,000,000 in 1933 to a probable $8,500,000,000 in 1940 (the exact figure has not yet been computed). There were other gains: the rehabilitation of thousands of farm families by the Farm Security Administration by means of loans and grants, the refinancing of mortgages by the Federal Land Bank, seed and feed loans to farmers in drought areas, loans to cooperatives, rural electrification, and the disposal of surplus products, to name the major services.

Some 2,000,000 farmers gathered at banquets throughout the land to hear the enthusiastic reports of the speakers, but for all that, dissatisfaction among the agricultural population seems to be increasing. The loss of the farm belt by the New Deal testifies in some degree to that fact. More recently farm organizations have made a strong fight for increased aid. The Senate Agricultural Committee shows an inclination to support them. Recently it unanimously approved the Bankhead bill to increase loans on the five basic crops—cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, and rice—in an effort to add an additional $1,000,000,000 to farm income. Advocates of increased aid point out that income is still about $2,000,000,000 below the 1929 level.

Exactly what steps, if any, the Administration will take is not clear. The writers of the Department of Agriculture's survey freely admit their inability to see a solution to the agricultural problem as long as the economic system is organized the way it is now, though they do suggest such alleviating measures as a conservation works program, the extension of the Farm Security Administration's activities, rural housing projects, and the like. But expenditure of new sums on agriculture, even if the President should desire it—and it appears that he does not—will meet with increasing opposition; only the other day the New York Times called for the end of even present benefit payments, and its chief columnist, Arthur Krock, is conducting a campaign against the relatively high corn loans which put a "floor" under the market.

Meanwhile, with surpluses piled up, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has asked farmers for larger acreage cuts, and is conducting elections among corn and wheat farmers for authority to inaugurate selling quotas. A quota would be allotted to each farmer, whether a cooperator with the AAA or not, should a two-thirds affirmative vote be secured. It is a step repugnant to agricultural officials, and it aims only at maintaining the present income levels, rather than at raising them.

The war may increase agricultural income if Mr. Roosevelt decides to send large supplies of food to England. But the present large stocks are in good part the result of the loss of foreign markets. Moreover, the desire for friendship with South American countries provides an argument for less competition with their farm products in the small foreign market which remains. Induction of young men into the armed forces may temporarily reduce the surplus of farm labor, but it has been shown that any real shortage only hastens the adoption of labor-saving machines. Thus a prolonged conflict might prevent immediate worsening of the situation, or even provide a slight shot in the arm, but afterward the problem would be accentuated.

The stock answer is, of course: provide the underprivileged of the nation with an adequate diet and the farm problem will solve itself. There is nothing wrong with the answer. The farm and city cooperatives are endeavoring to eliminate the barriers to exchange of farm and manufactured goods, but progress is necessarily slow. The authors of the Department of Agriculture's survey, the heads of its various divisions, lay the blame squarely on industry, declaring that the agricultural problem cannot be solved without drastic reorganization of the industrial system, a conclusion which appears judiciously arrived at from the facts.

Lord Halifax on a Horse

BY CARL SANDBURG

MAN, according to one philosopher, is a forked radish in bifurcated garments. To a child asking what this means we might answer, "Man is a vegetable who walks around, wears pants, and tries to look important." This of course would not cover the case of the British Ambassador, Lord Halifax, riding in a private car with his entourage from Washington to Philadelphia. Then, as though it might help win the war, Lord Halifax gets up on a horse and rides in a fox hunt, and is photographed for the press, and gives out the word that he is fox-hunting in the United States about the same as he fox-hunts in England.

All this is the right and prerogative of His Lordship. But I wish he wouldn't mix up fox-hunting with his talk about fighting the war for democracy and freedom. This Anglican scholar is lean, earnest, serious, even solemn, having an ascetic face. He means well now, just as he meant well when he lifted no finger to avert the four-power Munich Pact of 1938. He is in a class now that believes we can have democracy and fox hunts on horseback while fighting a desperate war with an incalculable adversary. Lord Halifax climbed aboard the hurricane deck of his fox-hunting horse and rode as blandly as though it were not happening over a wide region of Europe and Asia that horse meat has become precious and large populations on meatless days wish they could have horse steak, horse pot roast, or soup with rich horse stock as the basis. I am not sure at all that Lord Halifax has for a moment contemplated the possibility that before Britain's ordeal is over, the population, as at Vicksburg in 1863, may have slaughtered its last horse for food. I hope and pray this will not happen. Also I hope and pray that the fox-hunting class of Britain will have less and less to say about the future of England.

Some of us are trying to get a national-defense apparatus going in this country. Some of us are taking chances in the hope that national unity may be perfected and the word democracy given deeper and surer meanings in human opportunity and security. It will help a little if the British Ambassador will enjoy horses but keep away from fox hunts, a leisure-class sport that arose out of the need for what Veblen termed "conspicuous waste" and "conspicuous leisure." Lord Lothian, his predecessor, wouldn't have done it. Also Lothian would have ridden in a Pullman compartment, knowing that a private car would not frame him right.

We well understand, in degree, Lord Halifax's reasons for giving no statement as to British war aims. While doing so we wish His Lordship could in return understand that there are American workingmen who ask, "Are we going to war again for the sake of a lot of English fox-hunters?"

I stood the other night at the highlighted big gates of the United States Steel works in Gary. Long lines of men on the night shifts were coming to work. Each had a paper sack in one hand—the snack of food he would eat near daylight to carry him through till past sunrise, when he would go to a house or a furnished room to sleep and prepare for the next night, when again he would become one of the hundreds of silhouettes winding toward the steel-mill gates with a paper sack in his hand. I thought for a moment of how Lord Halifax would have considered it ridiculous for him to ride up to those mill gates and be seen by those steel hands as he sat astraddle the fox-hunting horse near midnight. Yet many of those men had seen the pictures and news stories about him. He is to them just another English lord. He does not know that with the national-defense effort now making, it is important for him to try to understand the night-shift Man with the Paper Sack. He will find that the Man with the Paper Sack likes horses, enjoys pitching horse-shoes, bets on horse races, loves Man o' War, adores the cowboy on a wild broncho, and slants a suspicious cocked eye at any English gentleman in a scarlet coat riding with other gentlemen on a Sunday morning, all on horseback, hell-bent after one little fox born and bred to be hunted. It's not un-American or subversive. It is merely indicative of the fraction of the British embassy which lives in the past and hopes the future will be the same.

In the Wind

A SENATE COMMITTEE recently learned that Standard Oil tankers were delivering oil to Tenerife Island for German and Italian use. Asked about this policy, E. B. Lyman, Standard Oil publicity director, replied: "First of all you must understand that we are an international company and we must keep an international viewpoint. . . . As a general rule we sell to anyone who wants to buy and can pay for it."

THE MAKERS of Absorbine, Jr., the liniment that made a fortune as a nostrum for "athlete's foot," will no longer advertise their product as a complete cure for that ailment. The Federal Trade Commission secured a stipulation to that effect from the company after pointing out that Absorbine, Jr., rarely reaches the infected tissues.

A JEW reading the Völkischer Beobachter on a park bench in Berlin had the paper torn from his hands by a Nazi policeman. The Jew was asked why he read a German paper and not a Jewish one. "My own paper," he replied, "tells such gloomy stories about the Jews—thousands penniless and hopeless everywhere—that I like to read Herr Hitler's paper, which tells of rich and powerful international Jewish bankers, great Jewish scientists whose books are burned, and famous Jewish politicians. Their names cannot be mentioned in my paper, and to get news of my people I must read the Nazi papers."

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE was invited by a group of liberals to join them in asking the President to intervene in behalf of the striking Ford workers. In his telegram of acceptance White suggested that the groups go after conservatives instead of appealing only to "left-wingers like myself."

CLEMENT ATTLEE recently proposed to the Executive Committee of the British Labor Party that no Labor M. P.'s be allowed to vote against or criticize government measures. The committee voted down the proposal but passed a resolution that Labor representatives, while allowed to criticize any government measure, may be called to account before party chiefs if they vote against the party's stand.

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Defense Problem No. 1

THOSE Southern Governors who went to the White House recently asking for defense contracts for the South somehow succeeded in making themselves seem like salesmen seeking their share. They should not have seemed so. What they put before the President when they came up from the land which he lovingly described as Economic Problem No. 1 was the same South. Now that South is becoming increasingly Defense Problem No. 1 in the democratic defense of a land which must be strong altogether if it is to be as strong as it should be anywhere.

The South is where the people are increasing—particularly the young people, whom the President called the keystone of the arch of defense. Indeed, in the same week in which he called them that in connection with draft-registration day, census figures were announced which showed that there were fewer young people in America than there had been ten years before. Only in the South was there more of the youth essential to defense. The democracy they defend will be behind them there.

Consider it. Their agriculture is declining. Three-fourths of the exports of the cotton from which 60 per cent of the Southern people derive their living has been cut off by the war. The big British buyers have neither the money nor the ships with which to take American tobacco. But there were, according to Milo Perkins, a million more people on the cotton farms of the South at the beginning of this war in Europe than there were when the first World War began. In addition, the decline in the number of tenants—due to more machines and bigger farms—means that in the Southern states at least 200,000 ex-tenant families now lack even that precarious relationship with the land. The greatest labor pool in America waits and hopes for work in the South. Much of it is good labor, strong labor, capable of acquiring any skills. It is ready for any kind of work; minimum wages sound silly in a country where 11,000,000 people are members of families with cash incomes of around $250 a year.

But defense spending has not stirred the creation of industrial jobs in the South, where so many jobs are needed by people pushed from the crowded land. Not many people outside the South paid much attention to Chester Davis when, as a member of the Defense Advisory Commission, he spoke about it. Davis said that of the total defense contracts let between June 1, 1940, and January 31, 1941, only 7 per cent went to eleven Southern states which in 1937 produced 11 per cent of the total value of the nation's manufactures. More important, perhaps, he said that of orders let between June 13, 1940, and February 15, 1941, 80 per cent had gone to sixty-two companies of interrelated groups of companies. Not many of them were in the South.

The country which produces the country's youth, as the census showed, is caught between the pressures of an agriculture declining in terms of the people it requires and can (or will) feed, and an industry which Mr. Davis declared was not receiving its share of the defense spending. Undoubtedly, the spending as placed may make possible the quickest deliveries. It may put the work into the hands of people who already possess the skills—though training schools are working all night long in the most crowded industrial cities. Generals and admirals and dollar-a-year men may question Mr. Davis's feeling that such concentrated spending creates a "serious bottleneck in the full use of our industrial and human resources." What cannot be doubted is that, between the two pressures in a defended democracy, what the President once called Economic Problem No. 1 is becoming an even more difficult regional problem as defense spending proceeds.

I am a Southerner and perhaps, therefore, prejudiced. I definitely am not trying to make any secret about the fact that as Southerner I am disturbed. But I am not sure that this Southern situation is Southern. It means at the very least the acceleration of the migrant story in the whole country. It means the continuation of poor nutrition, poor schools, poor housing now in the region from which the largest part of the youth of the nation will come later. It might mean now not only an industry concentrated in contracts to big companies but an industry concentrated under the possibility of bomb attack. It means an almost calculated halt to the decentralization of industry south and west. It certainly means the old crowded, stagnant starving which has so long lain at the root of evils which richer regions have so loudly lamented in the South. It is even more certain that pressures which attend the spending of billions for the defense of democracy in the world seem to make even more difficult the hope of decency in democracy in the South.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE YOUNG WRITERS OF AMERICA HISPANA*

BY EDUARDO MALLEA

Eduardo Mallea has succeeded in the difficult task of leading an active life in the journalism of his country without detriment to his growth as a profound proseman and novelist. In the complexity of his labors he resembles the first two contributors to this series—and many another important writer of a continent which, unlike ours, does not appear to sap the energies of its artists. Mallea was born in 1903 in Bahía Blanca, a town hundreds of miles south of Buenos Aires. He has been for years literary editor of the Sunday edition of La Nación; and, since its founding in 1931, the chief editorial lieutenant of Victoria Ocampo on Sur, the monthly literary journal which in the judgment of many is the finest published in the Western Hemisphere, if not—now that Europe has fallen—in the world.

Mallea's early stories ("La Ciudad Junto al Río Inmóvil") revealed an extraordinary temperament in despair before the vast inchoate world of Argentina; but already this mood creates an aesthetic form from the formlessness of the pampa. "Nocturno Europeo," "Historia de Una Pasión Argentina" indicate the artist's search for a forming principle in Argentinian life. The nationalism of these powerful essays must not be confused with that of the fascists—who did their best to win Mallea; or with the vague universalist nationalism of Walt Whitman. It is sharpened by social inquiry and by insistence upon a disciplined, differentiated vision of the individual. "Fiesta de Noviembre" (1938) is an extraordinary lyrical novel, revolutionary in its implications, in form a densely knit fugue.

Mallea's most recent book is a vast story of Buenos Aires, "La Bahía de Silencio" (1940). It is a sort of "Education sentimentale" that adapts technical innovations of Gide and Proust to the depiction of souls voided of even the refrains of European culture, souls at the dead end of the bourgeois process, desperately, passionately seeking to infuse the vast somnolent South American land with a new heroic spirit. Despite its magnificent prose and its superb character delineation, it is not in my judgment an aesthetic success—and could have been written only by a genius.—W. F.

THE most important and the gravest truth to emerge from a study of the panorama of Hispano-American literature is the lack of harmony within the literature itself. There is no unique Hispano-American mode, no unity of style or thought: diversity clutters the continental scene. A poet of Argentina appears as remote from a poet of Chile across the Andes as might a mind of Chinese inspiration from a mind formed in Norway. This is not surprising to us who daily experience the divergences, spiritual and sociological, within the nations of the Hispano-American complex; but it is good to begin by stressing this very sharply before a reading public that has got in the habit of throwing all the lands from the Mexican Gulf to the Horn into one confused, agglutinated, undifferentiated lump.

America Hispana, first of all, is rich in differences. It is a body, and the organs of a body differ. It is a continent and a half that has been richer until now in distinctions than in integrations; and the reason is the definite tendency of its peoples to neglect the mutual exchange of common traits. We have ignored one another coldly—deliberately. Our sparse intellectual intercommunication has, until the present, confined itself largely to vague and courteous salutes about the most crudely visible values. What lives beneath these values, the essential ferments, the germination of the cells, we have passed over—with drums beating. Which is to say that we lack in the intellectual elements of our life the abundance and the particularity of data that we must have in order to form, of our artistic voices and of the latent directives in our ethic and aesthetic, the vast symphonic consciousness of our world.

The idea of difference comes not only from diversity, but even more from ignorance and non-knowledge. Nothing is more potentially different from me than an unknown person; yet nothing may be potentially more like me than an unknown person. Our mutual ignorance in America Hispana has been a guilty ignorance: a privation of unity and of the will and destiny of unity; a sin against the possibility of greatness in those diverse living integers of our organism which, if they become conscious of the whole, are capable of functioning as a whole.

Therefore it will be clear that it is no simple adventure to classify and discuss the newest talents in countries lost to one another within our global America. Those very values of youth which are richest in potential may be the ones we do not know. Nevertheless, let us try to make some order, in speaking of the youngest writers of America Hispana.

Generally speaking, no art is chemically pure. All great art is a call. All authentic art has within it a message, be that message a historical movement, a confession, or a prophecy. The great artist is the great witness: the relator, the accuser. If art is disconformity, if the life of artists is the endless history of inadaptability, this seeming negative is fecund because it mothers the will toward perfection. Let us confine ourselves therefore to the routes of some of the most significant messengers of artistic thought in these regions of America; omitting the names of many creators whose work, although objectively excellent, is fortuitous in character. America Hispana has large numbers of isolated poems, novels, tales, whose texture is fine, but whose accidental nature makes them unimportant to the organic action within the panorama, and it is this we wish to reveal. Avoiding both the static and the ecstatic movements of the Hispano American soul, let us try to trace its dynamic movement.

* This is the third of a series of articles on A New World Literature. The fourth and last, by Waldo Frank, will appear in an early issue.

A great new expression of poetry and a vigorous will for self-definition are the fertile currents upon which, like the woman swimmer of Propertius, the young soul of America Hispana is embarked. This fresh humanity sings intensely, and intensely declares unto itself its traits and its high destiny. Moved by the two deep passions of lyricism and intelligence, it does not find itself, does not care to relate itself, in the novel. Its truth means more to it than its fiction. And the novel of America Hispana remains inferior to the poem and the essay.

The great pride of the new America Hispana is its young poets. Their youth is not prematurity. Two Chileans, Pablo Neruda and Vicente Huidobro; three Argentinians, Francisco Luis Bernárdez, Jorge Luis Borges, and Leopoldo Marechal; the Mexicans Xavier Villaurrutia and Bernardo Ortiz de Montellano, are voices as vigorous and as definitive as can be found at the head of any literature today. I name only the chiefs of a vast movement integrated by many excellent minor figures. The Spanish philologist, Amado Alonso, has just published a keen book on the poetry and style of Neruda, in which he extracts the deep and generous substance within the hermetic form of this great poet. Neruda of Chile is very distinct from Bernárdez or Marechal of Argentina; even as the inward life of the Chileans, imprisoned upon their narrow fringe of land between the Andes and the Pacific, is more poignant and desperately nostalgic than that of their neighbors. The Argentine is more solid and joyous by nature. Dweller on a soil which, with Brazil, constitutes the vastest and richest earth of all America Hispana, his song is more measured and more full. (I speak not of quality but of nature.) Yet the two voices—the one of Argentina serene and self-mastered, the one of Chile dolorous and tortured, compose a dense poetic concert which rises and floods the whole south continent from Magelanes to Uruguay and Peru, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Huidobro and Neruda are tragic, nostalgic songs. Bernárdez is all method, tradition, and geometry. His poem "El Buque" forms by itself a true province of Castilian poetry, a region of limpid airs, grave flora, godly soil, and severe, stripped horizons. In Jorge Luis Borges, the Creole strain achieves virile and poignant breadths. His song is noble, rich in the conquest of essences and forms, a new music of the most lordly colonial tradition and of the very substances of the Creoles. Utterly without emphasis or grandiloquence, it is the natural modern breath of seigniorial recollection. Leopoldo Marechal, like Bernárdez a Catholic and a religious poet, is more sensual, far more luxuriant in form; indeed, his first poems were daring odes inspired by Pan. As to the young Mexican poets, their afflatus appears to me to be more abstract, more poetically pure and less gravid of substance, as if they had been cultivated by culture itself; their anxieties are less Mexican than universal. They are superb translators: witness their fine renderings of T. S. Eliot and of other English poets; and they reach their most original heights perhaps in Villaurrutia and Ortiz de Montellano. An adolescent—scarcely more than a boy—heralds the dawn of a new, more humane poetry in Mexico: Octavio Paz. And among its leaders two Cuban poets must be named: Nicolas Guillén and Ballagas.

The joy and sorrow implicit in the real nature of the song of all these young men is not romantic. These are not mere lyric ecstasies, not the involved intonings of gratuitous and subjective states, as was so often the case—especially in Argentina and Chile—with these poets' immediate predecessors. The new song has the lyricism of an intensely serious preoccupation. It is not the first cry of a new world, not the free joyousness of birth and life; it is the discovery of the image of a mission and a fate. No, the new poetry is no intoxication timeless and unconditioned; it is the burdened, profound thinking of a vigil, the manly moderation of a dawn, the going forth to labor on a new day. It is the art of men who have already taken their destiny in their hands, to master it and to make it prevail.

Nor have we here, in consequence, a poetry after the manner of Walt Whitman. The new Hispano-American poetry is something far closer to its ideal; its future is no mere aspiration. Its future is already today—today pregnant. And therefore this song has a certain dominant severity. It is a poetry of the spirit, since it is a poetry of knowledge.

A similar preoccupation informs the new Hispano-American essay. To know and to define one's land and its men and women crowds out all other appetites. The language itself grows more pure, deprives itself, becomes almost white by force of will to be solely the instrument for a new intelligence of our own nature. There is a new man, a new natural creature, ethically and spiritually distinct: there is a new proportion between man and earth, capable of creating the style of an unknown culture.

America Hispana sets soberly to work to know what it is, and to say what it is.

One of the most revealing books of this modality, this new cognitive prose, is "Radiografía de la Pampa" by the Argentine Ezequiel Martínez Estrada. With Borges and Carlos Alberto Erro, Martínez Estrada heads in Argentina the new Hispano-American will of radical interpellation of the land. Four admirable young essayists of Cuba are, in a certain sense, despite their youth, the precursors of the entire movement: Juan Marinello, Jorge Mañach, Félix Lizaso, Jorge Ichaso. They are all continuators of José Martí, and have richly nourished with their discoveries and reflections the essential image of the Hispano-American peoples. (And the influence of the North American Waldo Frank upon all these consciences and intelligences will some day be extensively studied.)

What we have, then, in both the young essay and the young poem of America Hispana is an inventory of consciousness: the lucid and sometimes sullen act of a fresh generation which permits itself no rhetorical license, no literary adornments; which makes of its inspiration not a verbal parade but a deed. The essay, more and more, becomes testimony; more and more purifies itself of the romantic; grows less virtuosic and more virtuous, in the classic sense of this word, which includes also valor.

In his historical and spiritual vision, his command of events and lives, the mind of Martínez Estrada impresses me as the most mature among the essayists and critics of our America. (I exclude the more purely imaginative writers.) "Radiografía de la Pampa" is not an optimistic book. It is prolix, destructive, cold, and arid. Knowledge in it becomes a force leading to sterility, so pitilessly does it tear to shreds the body of the nation. It is an X-ray picture; and X-rays lend themselves to diagnosis rather than to love. But the pessimism of this remarkable book is really nothing but a gravity of conscience, a gravity neither ceremonial nor solemn, the gravity of a man who has been invaded by the life-breath of his people, sweeping away the gratuity, the cleverness, even the amenity, that belong only to individual souls with no work to do.

Thus, vastly swelling like a new-born river, a preoccupation that is neither morose nor inhibiting, a preoccupation fluid, swift, and fertile, sweeps in its course the soul of young America Hispana. Having already moved the essay and the poem, it begins, more tardily, to stir the novel. The novel is a culture form of maturity; therefore it has lingered in the subterranean sources of our world, requiring a germinal period far more prolonged than the essay and poem. But already here and there we see geysers of these underground currents; and in the past fifteen years a number of new, isolated, robust works of fiction have come up, all by young men.

Many of them reveal a deep social-revolutionary will.

There is, for instance, "Huasipungo," by Jorge Icaza, young and eminent novelist of Ecuador. The Chaco war has sown novelistic seed; novels of caliber have risen, like "El Infierno Verde" of the Central American, Marín Cañas, and "Sangre de Mestizos." The Venezuelan Uslar Pietri drinks at the epic source of his country's war of independence in "Las Lanzas Coloradas." The life of the boatmen of Peru inspired Ciro Alegría's "La Serpiente de Oro"; and the underworlds of Cuba are subjects of the vigorous short novels of Novas Calvo, and of "Contrabanda" by Enrique Sierpa, also a Cuban. The Mexican Mauricio Magdaleno, the Chilean Rubén Azócar are excellent new novelists; and María Luisa Bombal of Chile is mistress of a tragic and poetic vein which might be compared (there is no question of direct influence) with the brutal, delicious art of William Faulkner. In the young Argentine novel, I shall name only "El Juguete Rabioso" and "Los Siete Locos" of Roberto Arlt, the tales of Borges, and "La Invención de Morel," in which Adolfo Bioy Cesares has made a little fantastic masterpiece in the field of the Stevensonian mystery story.

But consider the storehouse of virgin themes which is America—particularly America Hispana. Europe has exhausted the novelistic matter of every one of its geographic regions; perhaps also of every inward region of its men and women. Our continental world, on the contrary, is an immense state of mind and soul that still awaits its voice. Nevertheless, in power and breed the few novelists we have in America Hispana are not excelled anywhere in the world. A combination of the elemental with technical maturity makes the young novel of the United States—the narrative prose of a Faulkner, a Caldwell, a Hemingway—superior to the work of contemporary Europe. By the same token, there is something unique in the complex of an untouched nature and of an original human tone in the young fiction of America Hispana. A Mariano Azuela (of Mexico), a Jorge Icaza (of Ecuador) are worthy of the best secular literature.

What is needed in this young potent orchestration, today so expertly tuning up its excellent instruments? It must declare itself to be one; it must strike at one time into its authentic, implicit symphony. The notes are indeed beautiful. All that is required is that each shall know its neighbors and attune its sonority with the others so as to render and uphold the totality of voices. What is today anarchic song must impose upon itself a choral order. Pushkin and Dostoevski are a collaborated music; Dryden and Pope are a collaborated music. The essay of Martínez Estrada, the novel of Jorge Icaza are voices which, if modulated to the poems of Neruda and Borges and Bernárdez, will configure into the amazing, already wise will of a new world. There must come to the young inspiration of America Hispana the purpose to forge its future into an unprecedented day, against already twilight worlds.

A New Theory of Revolution

THE MANAGERIAL REVOLUTION. By James Burnham.
The John Day Company. $2.50.

FOR some years now a theory has been growing, influenced by the increasing similarity of the communist and fascist states, of a new social order that is neither capitalism nor socialism, with a ruling class that is neither capitalist nor proletarian. A number of writers have helped to shape the theory. Among the radicals Max Nomad formulated it in a general way; he called the new rulers "intellectuals." Alfred Bingham made it more specific when he wrote that "the technical and managerial middle classes are slated to be next in the sequence of ruling classes." In my Nation articles on Marxism (February, 1940) I emphasized that the transformation of capitalism, so far, was bringing a new totalitarian order with a ruling class composed of "the technical, administrative, and managerial" groups in the new middle class who "perform the job of organizing and directing industry, which was the capitalist's job." Last fall a book appeared in England, "Marxism and Democracy," in which Lucien Laurat, a French Marxist, argued that all nations are moving beyond capitalism to a "controlled economy" with the new class of "bureau technicians" as rulers.

The first effort at a systematic elaboration of the theory, as far as I know, is James Burnham's book. It adds nothing new to the general theory, although he offers some interesting amplifications and confirmations. What Burnham has added, besides the name "managerial revolution," is two specific and related ideas: (1) Socialism is impossible; while capitalism is doomed, a "managerial society" will be its successor. (2) The "managers" who replace capitalists in the organization and direction of production must come to power in a totalitarian order that destroys democracy.

Burnham insists that "socialism is not possible of achievement or even of approximation." But "the results of the Russian experiment" he cites as proof simply prove misunderstanding and distortion of socialism. That "workers' committee control" of industry broke down does not mean, as Burnham contends, that socialism is impossible. It means that the Bolshevik idea was primitive and fantastic, for management is a functional job that must be performed by special functional groups; what is wrong in Russia is not that managers manage but that there is no economic or political democracy—including no free labor unions. Burnham, moreover, rules socialism impossible by defining its central feature as an absolute equality of income; any economic set-up, he argues, is not socialism but a system of exploitation "if one group receives a relatively larger share of the economy than another." But that definition fits only what Marx called "the higher stage of communism," of which Lenin wrote in 1917 that "it has never entered the head of any socialist 'to promise' that the higher stage of communism will actually arrive." If socialism means no economic inequality at all, in the sense of differences in functional powers and income, I agree it is impossible. But, millennial conceptions aside, socialism ("the lower stage of communism") never meant more than a new order in which there is an end of capitalist privilege, planning of production for balance and plenty, and greater democracy.

But Burnham argues, and this is his most original idea, that the "managers" can come to power only in a totalitarian society, that this may "change into a democratic phase," but that "it would be an error for those who like democracy to be over-optimistic about it." What he does is simple: he projects the final "managerial" result of communism and fascism into all nations and into the future. The totalitarian tendency is converted into an absolute; a possibility becomes inevitable. Burnham is a determinist who makes the "managerial" theory a schematic, logical abstraction. But in society, as in nature, the same elements may combine in different ways to produce different results. Three major institutional elements are transforming capitalism: management, labor unions, and the state. Totalitarianism consists in the state seizing control of management and unions in a new combination of all economic and political power in the state. It is possible, however, for the three elements to combine in a different way: a constitutional set-up in which management, labor unions, and the state get definite but limited rights and powers over production in a democratic balance.

It is clear that we are moving beyond capitalism to a new economy: call it managerial, controlled, socialist. What is decisive is whether it is democratic or not. But for Burnham democracy is simply an ideology that rationalizes capitalist interests and power; the democratic principles of the Declaration of Independence, he says, are as much an ideology as Nazi racial doctrines. That is economic determinism gone mad. It forgets that an ideology may be judged by its social works: compare the works of a bestial racial doctrine with those of the Declaration! Medieval Christianity rationalized the feudal order, but its ideas helped to shape the democratic humanist values of the civilization that came after feudalism; the democratic procedures and values of capitalism go beyond capitalism to any desirable new order.

So Burnham concludes that the British workers are fighting for "democracy, that is, capitalism," and that growing Labor Party influence is meaningless because the unions are "capitalist." The New Deal is a "primitive" communism and fascism; according to Burnham, it must go totalitarian. He is blind to at least the possibility of an alternative development in the encouragingly suggestive upsurge of democracy and labor unionism under the New Deal. Since democracy cannot wage efficient war, says Burnham, a German victory is inevitable, with the emergence of three totalitarian powers: Germany, the United States, Japan. But if Germany is beaten, forces will be set in motion that offer a democratic alternative to totalitarian social change.

For there is an alternative, which Burnham nowhere explores, that allows for democratic "managerial" functional dominance. While there are totalitarian elements in the new middle class, the functional characteristics of its technical, managerial, and professional groups do not equal totalitarianism. Those characteristics include an interest in production, not in ownership and profit; the urge for workmanship evident in our technical-economic marvels and in the new art of industrial design; the scientific rational approach. The dominance of functional groups with such constructive characteristics is compatible with democracy; the characteristics are distorted or frustrated under totalitarianism. Technical-managerial groups are not truly in power in the totalitarian order but are a subordinate, if privileged, caste under control of "political élites" who want Caesarian adventures; worse off are the professional, educational, and other functional groups who are deprived of freedom. Totalitarianism is not a direct result of managerial dominance, as Burnham argues, but of a misunderstanding of the relation of middle class and workers, including management and labor unions, to a new order that makes social change an expression of mechanical pressures. Understanding and cooperation may bring democratic change.

Burnham insists he offers no program, no moral judgments. But his analyses and conclusions are a program of submission to a totalitarian doom against which man can do nothing. Burnham, formerly a Trotskyite, retains the determinist absolutism that imprisons life in doctrinaire abstractions. The schematic Trotskyite revolution is replaced with an equally schematic "managerial revolution" that tells the totalitarian élites, with "scientific objectivity," that their triumph is inevitable. It is the Olympian defeatism of a doctrinaire radical gone sour.

LEWIS COREY

Essays by MacLeish

THE AMERICAN CAUSE. By Archibald MacLeish, Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $1.

A TIME TO SPEAK: THE SELECTED PROSE OF ARCHIBALD MACLEISH. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

THE smaller of these two collections of MacLeish's essays contains but two pieces. The first is a lyrical appreciation of America which seems slightly extravagant. "Americans . . . were the first self-constituted, self-declared, self-created people in the history of the world." They had the luck to be born "on this continent, where the heat was hotter and the cold was colder, and the sun was brighter and the nights were blacker, and the distances were farther and the faces were nearer, and the rain was more like rain than anywhere else on earth." The second essay, on American Mobilization, is a wholly admirable plea for an affirmative rather than defensive attitude toward the democratic cause, for a "mobilization of a people to defend themselves against attack not by interrupting their life as a people but by fulfilling their life as a people."

The second collection covers the whole range of MacLeish's interests. His preoccupations as poet and artist are represented by several essays in which he defines his conception of the relation of art to life. For him "poetry is not ornament, is not flowers, is not pumping up of language with metaphors . . . is not a paint, an enamel, a veneer. Poetry . . . is revelation, is discovery. Its essence is precision, but precision of the emotions not of the mind. Its quality is to illuminate from within, not from without." The first essay in the larger volume is an eloquent attack upon those "who tell us poetry is 'pure.'" He wants to "bury those with High Standards. (The impotent have High Standards; the beggetters beget.)" There seems to be a shift in emphasis, though not necessarily an inconsistency, between his position in 1934, when he draws a sharp distinction between the man "who serves an art and the man who serves a cause" and criticizes those who "escape into the security of a movement" from the "lonely and difficult" practice of an art, and the position he takes in the now famous essay on "the Irresponsibles." Here he inveighs against those who "emerged free, pure, and single into the antiseptic air of objectivity."

It is probably too late either to praise the general purpose of this much-debated essay or to criticize incidental details. He is certainly right in his general attack upon the cult of objectivity, impartiality, and neutrality in our liberal culture which helped to bring the democratic cause so close to disaster. But the cause to which he attributes this false idea of impartiality is hardly convincing. He ascribes it to "the division and therefore the destruction of intellectual responsibility. The men of intellectual duty, those who should have been responsible for action, have divided themselves into two castes, two cults, the scholars and the writers. Neither accepts responsibility for the common culture or its defense." The hope of achieving scientific and rational objectivity in the field of social thought has profounder roots than any real or fancied specialization of function among intellectuals. The fact is that the whole structure of modern culture is reared upon the false assumption that such dispassionate objectivity is either possible or desirable.

Perhaps MacLeish's most significant contribution to the thought of our time lies in his stout defense of the democratic cause. To this task he brings not only his gifts as a poet but the not inconsiderable equipment of a social philosopher. He understands the spiritual weapons of fascism and the spiritual weaknesses of our culture which these weapons penetrate. He knows that the defense of democracy cannot be a defense of the status quo if the fight is to be successful. He pays his respect to "the diplomat who tells us that democracy is dead in England, meaning by democracy . . . a chance to make ten millions in the market." He scorns a united front against fascism which includes "the Chicago Tribune and Mr. Ickes . . . the people who pay income taxes and the people who don't pay income taxes." All this is sound doctrine, derived from a genuine passion for democracy and understanding of its essence.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Mountain Farm

I BOUGHT A MOUNTAIN. By Thomas Firbank. Guilford, Vermont: The Countryman Press. $2.75.

WE HAVE recently had plenty of professional writers who have become amateur farmers and succeeded in reaping at least a literary harvest. But here we have a young man who, after a brief experience of urban industry, decided to make a career on the land. He put all his capital into a sheep farm on a Welsh mountain and sweated for seven years until he had learned his job and had every right to call himself a professional farmer. Then, somehow, in the intervals of lambing, dipping, shearing, hay-making, and gathering the flocks he managed to distill his experiences into a book about which there is nothing amateurish. Mr. Firbank's pictures of his grim yet glorious Welsh hills will arouse the nostalgia of any mountain addict. But still better are his accounts of the lives, characters, and conversations of his Welsh neighbors. They are grand, genuine folk, though more than a little suspicious of "foreigners," and it speaks volumes for the author as a man that despite his totally different background he has been so fully accepted into their community. Mr. Firbank at times grows eloquent about his bucolic life, but he does not gloss over its risks and hardships. Always he writes with gusto and humor, and there is about his book an earthy smell that any reader with a rural upbringing will recognize as the real thing.

KEITH HUTCHISON

From Allah to Ataturk

TURKEY. By Emil Lengyel. Random House. $3.75.

PERHAPS never since the walls of Vienna resisted Suleiman the Magnificent has general interest been so intensely focused on Turkey as now. The general public is interested in knowing what resistance Turkey may offer to the onslaught of the ruthless heathens, this time coming from the West; the sociologist seeks the causes underlying what seems the miraculously sudden transformation of a religious community into a modern national state.

In spite of its manifold merits Emil Lengyel's work does not give a clear-cut answer to these questions. It is, however, extremely comprehensive, offering an ethnographic survey of the Turks, an analysis of Mohammedanism, and a history of the Ottoman Empire and of the birth throes of the Turkish Republic.

Attempts to modernize Turkey preceded the post-war metamorphosis of an ultra-conservative, religious despotism into a "streamlined" modern country. Midhat Pasha, the originator of the short-lived constitution, bitterly complained: "Nous envoyons nos jeunes gens à Paris pour être civilisé et ils retournent syphilités." Some forty years ago an Osmanli, or citizen of the Ottoman Empire, considered it an insult to be called Turk, and even when the so-called revolution of the Young Turks in 1908 provoked, as Lengyel calls it, "the Turculuc movement of delirious nationalism," its utopian expectations did not materialize. During World War I a Turkish friend with whom I was walking in Stamboul pointed to two buildings, one of which was the tomb of Sultan Ahmed, the other the Ministry of Public Instruction, and remarked: "These are both tombs: in one a Sultan, in the other education, is buried."

All the more astonishing is the almost unanimous recognition of the value of the reforms with which Ataturk Kemal must be credited. Lengyel gives a vivid description of the energy with which "the Father of the Turks" discarded the fez and the veil, changed the alphabet, organized education, started the breaking up of large estates, set up basic production industries, and substituted a modern judicial system for religious jurisdiction. "Few revolutions," says Mr. Lengyel, "have done away with as many old taboos or have created as many new values." However, Lengyel succeeds no better in explaining this "great miracle of the East" than did Donald Webster or Jarman Leckie or John Parker. Not even Hans Kohn's answer, that Kemal knew "how to give constructive direction to progressive forces," is entirely satisfactory.

No matter how and why the new Turkey was born, there is a more alarming question: How is it going to stand the test of the new world conflagration? In the maze of this problem Lengyel's work will prove a most useful guide-book. It offers not merely bountiful factual information but an illuminating insight into the Oriental mind. We may disagree with some of the author's statements, for instance, his description of the Turk as an "eternal nomad"—the land-owning Anatolian peasant is no more nomad than his Bulgarian and Hungarian racial brother; we may object to inaccuracies, as for example, the statement that the Turk built nothing, no churches, no public baths, though the author himself has probably used the Budapest Rudasfueroe built by the Turks four hundred years ago; but his book reflects assiduous research and his colorful language matches the subject matter.

IN BRIEF

A CITIZEN'S GUIDE TO PUBLIC HOUSING. By Catherine Bauer. Vassar College. 60 cents.

This is a first-rate presentation of the housing picture, both generally accepted facts and pertinent questions, as it looks to an experienced worker in the field. The illustrations, too, are excellent.

MY COUNTRY 'TIS OF THEE. By Lucy Sprague Mitchell, Eleanor Bowman, and Mary Phelps. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

It is hard to see how these three women could have done a better job. In telling the story of the use and abuse of our natural resources they combine broad knowledge and clear thinking with vivid presentation. They aren't afraid to take any bull by the horns, even though he is very much alive and an honorable member of the board of the Metropolitan Opera. Some readers might find this book rather on the primer side. But most people can learn a great deal from it and will have fun doing so.

MEN OF THE MOUNTAINS. By Jesse Stuart. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

A collection of twenty-one corking good stories about the reckless mountain boys and girls and their old folks: working, loving, feuding, electioneering, "shouting" at camp meeting. Fresh and breezy, chockful of Kentucky hill-folk's lore and good humor, they are among Mr. Stuart's best creations, and he is at his best in the short story.

FILMS

Iconoclast in Hollywood

Hollywood, April 18

"CITIZEN KANE" has probably had more advance publicity of one kind or another than any other picture yet produced. Practically everybody connected with the production has been reported on the verge of a lawsuit. Some have said that all this uproar was nothing but exceptionally well-handled publicity, while others have sworn that William Randolph Hearst was determined to prevent the picture's release. Finally it was announced that the picture would definitely be released in the near future, and the press assembled at last week's preview in a state of great expectancy.

Many would probably have rejoiced to find producer, director, actor, and part-author Orson Welles's ambitious first effort in Hollywood not an unqualified success: after all, the man had had no previous cinema experience, and if reports were true he had walked into the studio and produced on a very low budget a film which was a masterpiece.

It must be stated here that no amount of advance publicity or ballyhoo could possibly ruin the effect of this remarkable picture. It is probably the most original, exciting, and entertaining picture that has yet been produced in this country, and although it may lack their subtlety it can certainly be placed in the same bracket as the very best pre-war French productions.

The film may not have been inspired by the life of William Randolph Hearst, but the story of Charles Foster Kane, as unfolded in the picture, certainly bears a remarkable resemblance to Hearst's career. The incident concerning the Spanish-American War, the vast collection of useless antiques acquired by Kane, and certain details such as the picnic, with the guests compelled to spend the night under canvas, are familiar parts of the Hearst legend; and the castle of Xanadu, Kane's retreat from the world, with its endless acres and private zoo, is more than reminiscent of San Simeon. If Mr. Hearst decides, as many others undoubtedly will, that the film is only the most thinly disguised version of his life story, he will perhaps be favorably impressed with the sympathy and understanding with which the subject has been treated, and may even be delighted to have provided material for a drama of almost classical proportions.

The film opens with the death of Kane, a very old man, alone in the colossal, ugly monument to his wealth and power—Xanadu. A sort of March of Time dealing with Kane's life is then presented. The producers of this short are dissatisfied, finding it too superficial and impersonal, and are determined to obtain more intimate details of the man's personal history. The remainder of the picture deals with the information on Kane's life and character obtained respectively from his guardian, his chief assistant, a dramatic critic who was once his best friend, his second wife, and his butler. This technique of unfolding the story necessitates five separate flashbacks and creates a certain amount of confusion which is more than compensated for by the powerful effect obtained by the gradual illumination of character, until with the click of the final switch he is fully revealed—empty, lonely, and unhappy, a victim of his own personal power.

This excellent cinematic material Welles has embellished with brilliant directorial, pictorial, and dramatic touches. He breaks, with the greatest effect, practically every photographic rule in the business, employing very few close-ups, playing whole scenes with the faces of the performers in shadow, using lighting to enhance the dramatic value of the scene rather than the personal appearance of the actor. He is, in fact, one of the first Hollywood directors really to exploit the screen as a medium, and it is interesting to note that in doing this he has used an entire cast with no previous screen experience.

The acting both of Welles and of the rest of the Mercury Theater cast is excellent. Dorothy Comingore as Kane's second wife, whom he forces to sing in opera to gratify his ego, is particularly effective; so is Joseph Cotten as the dramatic critic. Welles himself gives an amazing performance as Kane, equally convincing in youth, middle age, and senility. The photographer, Gregg Toland, has achieved some wonderful effects, particularly the scene in the projection room of the newsreel company.

The picture has made a tremendous impression in Hollywood. Charlie Chaplin is reported to be prepared to back any venture that Welles may have in mind. Perhaps when the uproar has died down it will be discovered that the film is not quite so good as it is considered now, but nevertheless Hollywood will for a long time be in debt to Mr. Welles.

OTHER FILMS

"The Great Lie" is one of those exasperating pictures which a few moments of sensible conversation between the chief characters would bring to a hasty stop, almost before it started. Even Bette Davis is unable to carry off with conviction the part of Maggie, a Southern belle of the modern era. Mary Astor walks away with the histrionic honors as a pianist with style and a sharp tongue, and the picture is really quite lively when she is around.

To criticize "Men of Boys' Town" seems almost churlish when it is a picture of such excellent intentions. A sequel to "Boys' Town," it gives further publicity to Father Flanagan, whose work with juvenile delinquents is well known, and throws in an exposure of the brutal conditions in a reform school highly reminiscent of the unsavory exposures at the recent Whittier School investigations. Nevertheless, it must be said that the creators of this picture have gone a little too far in their employment of sentimental devices. Nothing is spared—the death and burial of a little dog, at least three agonized partings, gobs of human kindness, and a minor miracle. Spencer Tracy as Father Flanagan wears his halo with some skill, and Mickey Rooney makes another contribution to Americana with his performance as the mayor of Boys' Town.

The screen play of "Ziegfeld Girl" appears somewhat dusty with age. Nearly everything that has ever been said before about life behind the footlights and the dangers of the dressing-room is said again with the monotony born of repetition. The impressive array of stars featured in this picture are helpless against the odds, and Lana Turner, Hedy Lamarr, and Judy Garland wander around like lost souls on the gigantic Ziegfeld staircases. James Stewart makes a half-hearted appearance as a truck driver, a number of pretty girls parade in hideous costumes, and the only spark of life is kindled by two brilliant Spanish dancers called Rosario and Antonio. The film should make Ziegfeld turn in his grave.

RECORDS

A GERMAN musician I know who in true German fashion cannot discuss a mere performance without tying it up with vast historico-philosophical notions, sometimes with interesting results, sometimes with preposterous ones, made one of his less pretentious and more penetrating—that is to say, less speculative and more factual—observations recently when I spoke of the excellence of Bruno Walter's performances of "Fidelio" and "Don Giovanni." "That," he explained, "is because Walter is a rhetorical nature." And it is true that the difference between Toscanini's performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" with the N. B. C. Symphony (Victor Set 765, $7) and Walter's with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Columbia Set 449, $6.50) is the difference between fierce, concentrated intensity and expansive rhetoric. For a while I followed and accepted appreciatively the different shapes in sound, the different effects, which the different personal and musical natures of the two conductors were giving to the work; but at the beginning of the third side Walter's treatment of the passage for solo horn and then for solo flute caused me to think of a remark ascribed to Toscanini himself a few years ago: "At something beautiful Walter melts. I suffer." Walter's melting over that passage for solo horn and solo flute was the first of the details that I found too expansively rhetorical for my own nature and my own feeling about this work.

After the thin, dry, hard Studio 8H sound of the Toscanini recording the sonority and depth and voluminousness of the Walter recording were even more impressive than they would have been merely after some of Columbia's previous recordings of orchestra. Noting this vast improvement I was aware, after a minute or two, that the sound did not have the beautiful warmth and clean transparency and clarity of definition of Columbia's imported Beecham recordings; and after a while the cleanness and sharpness of the Victor Studio 8H recording were as much a relief after the amorphous voluminousness of the Columbia recording as the cleanness and sharpness of Toscanini's performance itself were after the amorphous voluminousness of Walter's. All this, moreover, was when I played the Walter recording with only a little less than the widest frequency-range of my Scott; and when I reduced the range to what I used for the Toscanini recording—which is what I use for the Columbia Beechams, the Victor Stokowskis, and what one is likely to have on a good machine—the recording lost brilliance on top and became muffled and hollow in the middle; whereas the Toscanini recording retained its balance and clarity even on an eight-tube Lafayette of limited frequency-range, on which the Walter recording sounded muffled throughout.

As for Victor's other orchestral releases, the unfamiliar Mozart Sinfonia Concertante K. App. No. 9 recorded by Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 760, $4.50) turns out to be—for my ears, at any rate—one of the duller exercises of Mozart's willing craftsmanship. The beautiful playing of the soloists is recorded with marvelous fidelity; but Stokowski's delicately perfumed phrasing of Mozart is—to my ears, again—as unacceptable as his more violently luxuriant treatment of Bach and Mussorgsky; and from a man who has consistently given us astoundingly beautiful orchestral recording it is a surprise to get the piercingly harsh sound of the violins, the occasional wooden sound of the entire orchestra on these records. A single disc (17731, $1) offers harsh recording of harsh performances of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Dubnushka" and Glinka's Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" by Sevitzyky and the Indianapolis Symphony; and on another single (13590, $1) Sevitzyky conducts the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta in more sensitive and more agreeably recorded performances of some not too interesting music by Grétry—a Pantomime, and two pieces from the opera "Denys le tyran."

The New Friends of Music concert at which Striedry conducted his own orchestral version of Bach's "Art of Fugue" offered the deeply satisfying experience of magnificent music well performed—so satisfying as to cause the audience to cheer at the end. There were satisfying experiences at some of the other concerts—the old music sung by Tinayre, the performance of the delightful Haydn Symphony No. 67; and on the other hand there was Serkin's mediocre playing in Mozart's Concerto K. 453. This rarely heard work is a masterpiece; the three unfamiliar pieces that Milstein played were a bore—instead of which he might have played the neglected Concerto K. 216, which is delightful; and this was only one of several instances of the tendency I have pointed out occasionally in New Friends program-making. As for the performances, Striedry is evidently a musically and technically accomplished conductor, but also a somewhat tense one who at times—to judge from the wiry sound—imparts his tenseness to the orchestra, instead of creating the relaxed ease that shows itself, in things like silken, luminous string tone. The wiry sound is noticeable also when he pulls the orchestra up short in the way a rider does with a horse, and with a similar result—a breaking of the easy flow in the music and in the playing, which it is the conductor's job to create and maintain.

This flow is something that Beecham—whom some of the thoroughly trained Germans are inclined to dismiss as a mere dilettante—achieves; it is the thing which caused the New York City Symphony to play with fine sonority at his first concert and with almost perfect precision at his second; it is one of the things that make him one of the world's great conductors. And the man who phrased Mozart's Symphony K. 297 so powerfully, who lifted the long opening melody of the slow movement of Haydn's Symphony No. 102 from point to point of increasing tension so excitingly, is one of the world's great musicians.

Letters to the Editors

Blackmail by Business

Dear Sirs: We can't keep our democracy by creating an anti-labor attitude. An anti-labor attitude is anti-democracy and the surest way to destroy the democracy everyone seems so bent on saving today.

Many harsh words are being spoken about labor in defense industries. Why is so little said about the reasons for these strikes? The press often gives the impression that the whole fault lies with the workmen, and I am sure this is not true. We need honest and full reporting today more than ever, and we don't get it when facts on labor's side of the story are omitted.

A recent Town Hall radio program in New York brought out the fact that in the Allis-Chalmers strike workers were ready to accept the terms of the government board but the management of Allis-Chalmers refused. Because of this refusal on the part of management the strike was continued. Yet nothing of this was told in the news reports on the strike. Is the press carrying on a campaign to influence the public against labor?

The April, 1941, issue of Economic Notes quotes from "Economic Power and Political Pressures" released by the Temporary National Economic Committee on March 15, as follows:

Speaking bluntly, the government and the public are "over the barrel" when it comes to dealing with business in time of war or other crisis. Business refuses to work except on terms which it dictates. It controls the natural resources, the liquid assets, the strategic position in the country's economic structure, and its technical equipment and knowledge of processes. The experience of the World War, now apparently being repeated, indicates that business will use this control only if it is "paid properly." In effect, this is blackmail, not too fully disguised.

This shows us plainly enough that industry rather than labor deserves public censure.

Tom Wintringham Writes

Dear Sirs: The following is an excerpt from a letter from Tom Wintringham, who, as many Nation readers know, fought with the Loyalists in Spain and, more recently, helped train the British Home Guard. It gives, I feel, a glimpse of what is going on in the minds of some Englishmen:

... The main line we are taking is this: that this war is not yet an anti-fascist war but can be made so if anti-fascists will show that they are better at all necessary jobs than the imperialists. Also because the imperialists are losing the war and plenty of people want to win it. Let us know whether there are any signs of a similar line in the United States. Over here we only hear of the Wall Street imperialist line and some plain pacifist isolationism—nothing that sounds like the real democracy we fought for in Spain with the possible exception of this man Reuther and the C. I. O. plan for airplanes. We should be grateful for any stuff on these lines which you could send us.

Workers' Democracy

Dear Sirs: You and your writers seem to have an uneasy conviction that all is not well with the sentiments of the worker, with the feeling for "democracy" of the vast, inarticulate, producing mass of the population. You seem to be trying to convince them that your interests are also their interests, that it would be well for them to fight and die for the concepts that you and your kind hold most dear.

I should think that the very fact that you feel it necessary to convince people that they should defend your concept of democracy is sufficient proof that all is by no means well with the state of that democracy. I will agree that your fears are well founded. The sentiments that I hear expressed among the men I work with would give you much more cause for fear.

The bitter struggle for existence over the past ten years has not convinced us that a future of the same essential difficulty and even despair is at all worth the terrific battle that you seem to feel is needful to maintain it. Those of us who have lost our homes, who have been forced to fight for poor relief, who have been and still are forced to fight for the recognition of our unions, and for the few pennies that keep us alive, do not feel that we can be much worse under any particular system of society. When houses are needed, we shall still have to build them, and we shall have to be fed and clothed while we produce them. Even fascism must feed us, for after all is said and done, we are indispensable under capitalism, fascism, or communism. We get no more than a living now; no one can give us less, and under our present system no one wants to give us more.

I think therefore that it behooves us to fight for what we know to be our own interest, and to take every opportunity to advance that interest, no matter what the international situation may be. That interest would seem to dictate that we should be prepared to fight to keep fascism, both native and foreign, from dominating our country; it does not mean that we must fight to defend the British Empire. That interest seems to demand that we must beware of all who have a vested interest in maintaining the status quo in these United States and in the world in general.

Harold Laski is probably the only man among you who sees fairly clearly the imperatives of the new order from the workers' point of view. History will be written in blood and fire by those who are able to understand that the common people of every country today demand more than promises. They demand security, decent living, a voice in their own affairs, and at least a prospect of a more generous future, and they don't particularly care whether you would call it democracy or not.

Puzzled by America

Dear Sirs: Old World professors whom Hitler & Co. dislodged sometimes want to teach Kultur to the backward natives of this country. Although I am a teacher, I, like all unprejudiced professors, would rather learn myself. Before all, I would attempt to understand the American background. Yet I confess I am often puzzled at things I read or hear.

I suppose most citizens of the United States are good Americans. This implies respect for valuable traditions which are part of the national inheritance. Not long ago I saw a full-page advertisement reproducing the Gettysburg Address captioned, "What can a man believe in?" Next to it was the picture of a commercial product "you can believe in." Does it not hurt American taste to see one of the finest speeches of mankind so desecrated?

Comments on current recitals and discussions of new recordings and phonograph problems by the author of "A Book of the Symphony" and "Music on Records" provide a rich fund of information for thousands of music lovers. Gratefully they write:

From Dartmouth College

STRATEGY IN TWO WARS

Is the Blitzkrieg of today a new and revolutionary kind of war, or is it just a projection of the military dreams of the Junker strategists of 1914? How do Hitler's political objectives differ from the Kaiser's? Were not his military aims—Drang nach Osten and the ruin of Britain—an integral part of the schemes of von Schlieffen, Ludendorff, and Wilhelm II? Alfred Vagts, historian and military analyst, discusses 1941 in the perspective of German military history.

OF COCA COLA AND THE LAW

Sixty years ago a pharmacist in Atlanta, Georgia, discovered that by blending the extracts of several herbs he could produce a soft drink with a mild punch. Since then Coca Cola has become the poor man's cocktail and a huge business. Today it is struggling hard to maintain its preeminence at the nation's soda fountains. Jerome Spingarn has gone deeply into the legal, philosophical, and humorous aspects of the case and written an article that is at once a picture of big-business methods and an entertaining piece of Americana.

HOMES FOR AMERICANS

The defense program has caused tens of thousands of American workers to leave home and move to the boom towns of defense. That many of them are living in huts, tents, and trailers everyone knows. But just how bad the housing problem is, and what can and what will be done about it, is still a matter of speculation. Jonathan Daniels, The Nation's "native at large" has made a first-hand investigation of living conditions among defense workers. He will present a vivid description of them and discuss the economic and social aspects of the problem.

WURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

Apparently even less reverence is due to live Presidents than to the dead ones. Almost two years ago I saw a cartoon in one of the leading dailies picturing dead American soldiers on a European battlefield. It was captioned "The Price of a Third Term."

I read and hear every day that in order to attain his aims Mr. Roosevelt wants to establish a dictatorship. Do these accusers pretend to say that Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler were elected by overwhelming majorities? Were the March on Rome and the Reichstag fire equivalents of the free discussion by which the Congress decides questions of foreign policy? Or is this charge perhaps a hint that neither the Congress nor the electorate is competent?

Democracy means, among other things, that all men are born free and equal. There are no dukes and counts, no barons and lords in this country. Why then this fuss in the newspapers about princes and other aristocrats? Some time ago I read a newspaper report of the views of a young American student on foreign policy. Young men may be extremely gifted, but they are often lacking in the knowledge and experience which would make their opinion on foreign policy worth quoting. This particular young man happened to be the son of an American ex-ambassador. But if the sons of ambassadors inherit the abilities of their progenitors, why should this country not have dukes and counts?

Recently people were insisting in the press and in public addresses on being told how many guns, planes, tanks, etc., the United States has. You cannot catch a sparrow with a drum, as the Hungarian proverb has it. Democracy or dictatorship, there is no country which does not keep its armaments as secret as possible. These indiscreet inquirers may be bona fide Americans who dislike the ways and means of the "totalitarian" countries. But if so, why do they use their idiom? Why do journalists and radio commentators call a lightning war a Blitzkrieg and the air force, if it happens to be German, Luftwaffe? Foreign terms are acceptable only if they cannot be translated. And it is absurd to refer to Virginio Gayda as the "mouthpiece" of Il Duce or to the Völkischer Beobachter as the semi-official paper of the Führer—as if any paper in Germany or Italy could be anything but a mouthpiece.

Summer School in Chile

Dear Sirs: On June 28 a group of students and teachers under the auspices of the Institute of International Education will sail for Chile to attend a four weeks' summer school in Santiago. This trip will offer not only fine courses, opportunities to make friends with Chileans, and skiing excursions in the Andes, but also a chance to observe special festivals celebrating the 400th anniversary of the founding of Santiago.

The Institute of International Education is developing a program to permit groups of North Americans and Latin Americans to visit each other's countries and take special brief courses. Last year fifty-four North Americans attended summer school at the University of San Marcos, in Lima, Peru; the school will be repeated this year. From January to March, 1941, a group of 110 Latin Americans from seven different countries took special courses at the University of North Carolina, and twenty-five Chileans were enrolled in brief courses at Columbia University. It is hoped that next year still more groups will be organized for study in the States and Latin America.

The all-expense tour, including passage on the Chilean Line and the four weeks' stay in Santiago, will amount to only $400. For those who would like to make a circle tour of South America, sailing from New York on June 6 or from New Orleans on June 13 and visiting the east coast of South America before commencing courses in Santiago, the price will be about $200 additional. For further information, write to the Institute of International Education, 2 West 45th Street, New York City.

The Shape of Things

WITH THE CONQUEST OF GREECE HITLER has achieved three objectives. He has ousted Britain from its last toehold on the mainland of Europe, excluding Gibraltar; he has rescued his Italian partner from an extremely embarrassing situation; and he has considerably improved the strategic position of the Axis in relation to the vital British base in Egypt. There are, of course, several major obstacles to be overcome before the Germans can strike at Suez with any assurance of success. Between Greece and Alexandria there is a wide stretch of water where the British navy remains dominant, even though its advanced base in Crete is now exposed to bombing attacks. With only the weakened and dispirited Italian navy available for operations, a frontal assault on Egypt is out of the question. The same weakness militates against the successful invasion of Egypt from Libya. While the British fleet patrols the North African coast, the long line of Axis communications from Tripoli to Sollum remains dangerously exposed. The impetus imparted by the German mechanized reinforcements carried the Axis forces through Libya with amazing speed, but their momentum was lost at the Egyptian frontier. The British forces opposing them are still in a somewhat dangerous position, but General Wavell is now receiving reinforcements from Greece and Ethiopia. He has a strong base at Marsa Matruh, his own lines of communication are short and well secured, and he may find an ally in the fierce heat of the African summer.

IN PROSECUTING ITS CAMPAIGN AGAINST Egypt, therefore, the German High Command must either find a safer means than now exists of reinforcing and supplying the Libyan army or it must find another route. The second alternative implies the capture of the Dardanelles and a march through Turkey and Syria. Obviously conquest of the Balkans has put Germany in a strong position to exert pressure against Ankara. Its armies now press closely on the narrow strip of European Turkey, and its seizure of Lemnos, Samothrace, and other islands gives it bases in threatening proximity to the Straits. More important still, the devastating rush of the Nazi armies through the Balkans has demonstrated again that even the bravest and best-trained troops stand little chance against an opponent enjoying marked aerial and mechanical superiority. Turkish officials are doing very little talking at present, but the closely controlled press still maintains a bold front, declaring that Turkey will fight rather than make concessions. Perhaps it will, but even so its prospects of standing off the Nazi war machine cannot be regarded very optimistically unless it receives strong support from the only state in a position to offer it—Russia.

THE MOSCOW PRESS, JEERING AT ANGLO-American reactions to the Soviet-Japanese pact, recently asserted that London and Washington had conspired unsuccessfully to draw Russia into war with Germany or Japan. It is no British conspiracy, however, that has brought the Nazis to the threshold of the Straits but German aggressive moves which the Soviet government has unmistakably, if feebly, condemned. Under czar and commissar alike it has always been an axiom of Russian policy to prevent the Straits from falling under the domination of any major power. A German effort to wrest control of that vital link between Europe and Asia, and Russia and the West, would be a direct challenge to the Soviet government. Will that challenge be accepted? Will Russia offer Turkey something stronger than moral support when von Papen lays Hitler's demands before the Ankara government? As to that, no one can prophesy. It may well turn out that Stalin still feels too weak to risk a trial of strength with Germany and will abandon even this position in return for compensation in the Balkans or on the shores of the Persian Gulf. Or Hitler may prefer to postpone a showdown on this question for the time being and attempt to open the way to Suez by gaining control of the western Mediterranean.

TO OBTAIN THE PARTICIPATION OF SPAIN in an attack on Gibraltar, Berlin has but to give the signal, as Mr. del Vayo points out on another page. But the assistance of Vichy is also required, and it is to secure this that the screws are now being tightened on Marshal Pétain's government. Serious negotiations on the question of "collaboration" are about to be opened between Admiral Darlan and Herr Abetz, and the Nazis no longer pretend that their demands cover only economic relations. Les Nouveaux Temps, the chief Nazi-controlled newspaper in Paris, has declared bluntly that France must accept Hitler's proposals since it has no force to resist them. Vichy's only weapon, this paper declares, is the French fleet, use of which against Britain would "hasten the British defeat in the Mediterranean," while against the Axis, French warships "could do nothing decisive." This argument leads to the flat statement that "collaboration must be expanded from the economic to the political plane to be really productive. It can be accomplished only by Laval." This revealing editorial, coupled with other German diplomatic moves, suggests that Hitler's purpose may be to close the western end of the Mediterranean by an attack on Gibraltar as soon as he obtains the use of the French fleet. That, together with the remains of the Italian navy, might enable him to control the narrow waters between Italy and Libya and thus provide effective reinforcements for the army attacking Egypt. If, at the same time, he could force Vichy to allow him the use of Syria as an air base, he would be able to threaten the Mosul oil field as well as the British flank in Palestine. By this means Turkey could be by-passed, and the risks of a clash with Russia over the Dardanelles avoided.

JAPAN'S SPRING OFFENSIVE HAS BEEN directed at the "forgotten" coast line of China. The important city of Foochow has been captured, and substantial gains have been made in the province of Chekiang, just south of Shanghai, where the Japanese had been held at bay since the latter part of 1937. These victories, however, have little military significance since this coastal area has long been under Japanese blockade. While large quantities of supplies have passed through the blockade after the payment of "squeeze" to the Japanese naval commanders, it is not to be supposed that this remunerative practice will be discontinued as a result of the recent conquests. The offensive is more likely to represent an effort on the part of the army to gain a share in the graft. It will, however, aggravate the supply situation in free China, and it might have further undermined the Chinese dollar had not the United States Treasury finally released the $50,000,000 promised last year for the stabilization of Chinese currency. Militarily the Chinese remain strong, but they are in desperate need of supplies. There have been rumors that the United States was soon to aid China in a big way. But the time for words has passed. China must have food, medical supplies, guns, airplanes, and transport equipment, and have them soon, if it is to hold out against the invader.

A ROSY PICTURE OF THE EFFECT A NAZI victory would have on American trade and world prosperity is painted by John Cudahy in an article released last week by the North American Newspaper Alliance. The dispatch obviously reported what the Nazis want Americans to believe. Mr. Cudahy's informants adopt the orthodox economic doctrine of triangular trade to allay American fears of a German victory. It is admitted that the Nazis will conduct a vigorous drive to expand their trade in South America after the war, but their purchases of South American copper, hides, cotton, meat, and wool will, it is argued, greatly increase the purchasing power of that section of the world and thus enable it to buy more manufactured goods from the United States. Abandoning, for tactical purposes, the theory of rigid bilateral arrangements which has formed the basis of Nazi trade from the start, the officials with whom Mr. Cudahy talked insisted that "trade will be free, but not with unbridled freedom." In reply to Cudahy's article, Professor O. M. W. Sprague, of Harvard, has pointed out very aptly that trade apart from politics simply does not exist for the Nazis, and that their trade arrangements with foreign countries would be for the exclusive advantage of the German war machine. He might also have pointed to the record of European countries recently conquered by Germany. In each case the pattern of conquest has been as follows: (1) inspired statements regarding the benefits of cooperation with the "new Germany"; (2) a trade agreement; (3) invasion.

THE COAL STRIKE HAS BEEN SETTLED, BUT not before industrial stocks had run dangerously low and operations of many steel mills had been curtailed at a time when every ton of steel counts. Responsibility for the way the dispute has dragged on rests squarely on the shoulders of the Southern operators, who broke away from the Appalachian conference in order to fight for the maintenance of a 40-cent-a-day differential between Northern and Southern wage rates. Now they have accepted President Roosevelt's proposal to reopen the mines while negotiations go forward, with the terms finally agreed upon applying retroactively. This is exactly the offer made by the union again and again and indorsed by the Mediation Commission. Indeed, it parallels the first proposal put forward by the union and rejected by the operators when negotiations for a new contract began in March. In view of these facts there can be no doubt which side precipitated and prolonged this dangerous dispute.

BARELY TWO MONTHS AGO GANO DUNN, engineering consultant to the Office of Production Management, turned in a report to the President estimating steel consumption in 1942 at 89,000,000 tons. The industry, he declared, would be in a position to deliver this quantity from existing plants and extensions due to be completed this year. Other forecasts placing next year's consumption at a much higher figure had been frowned on by the industry, which was reluctant to undertake a really large-scale expansion program. However, it seems likely that both the steel magnates and Mr. Dunn are about to eat crow, for Washington reports that the latter is now revising his estimate for 1942 consumption and is expected to raise it to 100,000,000 tons or more. As this figure far exceeds Mr. Dunn's own estimate of rated steel capacity next year, severe restrictions in non-defense uses of steel seem probable. Nevertheless, a proposal by Henry J. Kaiser, one of the most energetic industrialists in the country, to build on the West Coast a completely integrated steel plant with an annual output of 1,250,000 tons of steel ingots has been received unenthusiastically in the industry. Mr. Kaiser is the contractor who built Boulder Dam and is building Grand Coulee. He won the Shasta Dam cement contract with a low bid and erected a huge plant which has served to bring down cement prices on the Coast. More recently he has entered the magnesium and shipbuilding industries. On his record there is good reason to suppose that his plans for a steel plant in a growing industrial area are sound. However, we learn from the Wall Street Journal that although pressure is being put on Mr. Knudsen to clear this project, "OPM business men are trying to stall action for a month awaiting return of a steel expert they sent to the West Coast."

WE HOPE THAT JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., will not be content merely to announce his opposition to Hitlerism. We welcome his vigorous letter to Arthur Hays Sulzberger advocating the use of convoys, but we have a right to expect more than an expression of opinion from a figure so powerful in American industry and finance. If Rockefeller wants to help the fight against the "brutal, barbarous, inhuman force represented by Hitlerism," he can use his great influence in the oil business to shut off any further shipments of oil to Hitler's ally and our enemy in the Pacific, Japan. He can investigate the extent of recently reported transshipments of oil from this hemisphere to the Axis via Teneriffe in the Canary Islands. He can help win for us the friendship of the Latin American peoples by making it clear that the oil companies in which he is a dominant influence and the Chase National Bank, which is a Rockefeller bank, will give up the practices and privileges that have associated the good name of the American people with Yankee imperialism. And if he really believes, as he says, that the number of strikes should be cut down in the interest of defense, he can induce his own companies to obey the Wagner Act and deal with organized labor. Rockefeller says he would "die fighting" rather than submit to Hitlerism. We offer him some less dramatic but more effective sacrifices. Is he prepared to make them?

THE NATION BELIEVES THAT THE FACTS disclosed by its Washington editor in his letter this week, "Why Knudsen Should Go," call for investigation by the Truman committee. Sloan, Ford, Knudsen, and other leading figures in the automobile industry and the OPM ought to be required to take the witness stand and explain why they have not mobilized Detroit's resources in an "all-out" effort for defense, why they have subordinated national needs to profit opportunities. We believe that those conservatives who stress the need for all-out aid to Britain and the defense program should join us in asking for an inquiry. "It Must Be All or Nothing" was the caption of a recent New York Herald Tribune editorial on defense. Alsop and Kintner write, "The result may be tragedy if the all-out American effort is put off much longer." Mark Sullivan says that the maintenance of British resistance depends on our ability to speed plane production. We do not doubt their sincerity, but we wonder whether their desire for full mobilization of our industrial resources is sturdy enough to permit them to step on the toes of the automobile industry and Knudsen. We are putting the question to them directly, along with copies of I. F. Stone's article, and we await their answer.

Croaking Chorus

LET the men and women of London and Plymouth Land and Canterbury bow down and admit defeat; Colonel Lindbergh has had enough. Let the British soldiers who endured the agony of Thermopylae go home and raise the white flag over Westminster; Captain Patterson has raised it over the New York Daily News. Let the good citizens of Prague, Warsaw, and Paris; of Oslo, Copenhagen, and Brussels; of Madrid, Vienna, and Amsterdam; of Budapest, Belgrade, and Peiping—let them all resign themselves to slavery and degradation; Dr. Morley and Senator Wheeler are weary and have abandoned hope. Let all Americans who think they can resist the Wave of the Future come to their senses; let them allow hell to break loose if it chooses. One can always make deals with the devil.

So fades the morale of the American people, if we are to judge by those who in the week of Greece's tragedy presumed to speak in their name. "It is now obvious," said Colonel Lindbergh, "that England is losing the war . . . and I have been forced to the conclusion that we cannot win this war for England, regardless of how much assistance we send." Four-fifths of the people, the Colonel announced, share his belief, but they have been cried down by a minority that controls the press, the newsreels, and the radio (over which the Colonel spoke). The New York Daily News, which Colonel Lindbergh forgot about, though it has the largest circulation of any paper in the country, published a "Last Call" to Britons and Americans—to make peace with Adolf Hitler now, when they conceivably could get terms that would "leave Hitler first power in Europe, Stalin and Japan sharing control of most of Asia, the United States supreme in the Western Hemisphere, and Great Britain holding most or all of its present empire." And the Wall Street Journal, likewise taking up the cudgels for Colonel Lindbergh's underprivileged majority, threw open its columns to a "realistic" plea by Dr. Felix Morley, president of Haverford College, that we accept "the fact of German supremacy on the Continent of Europe" and work for a negotiated peace.

It is only natural that every setback for the English should bring the defeatists out in full cry, but anti-interventionists who are not at the same time pro-Nazi have cause to be dismayed; because every reverse that England suffers brings this country nearer to the brink of war. Lindbergh is completely wrong in assuming that the loss of the Balkan campaign has bred a mood of surrender in this country—and he was patently dishonest when he said that "if we are forced into a war, against the wishes of an overwhelming majority of our people, we will have proved democracy such a failure at home that there will be little use fighting for it abroad." His statistics are as accurate as the Gallup poll, which did in fact show that 83 per cent of the country would at this moment vote against a declaration of war. But what he failed to state and what gives the lie to his stuffy pretension of wanting only to "clarify the issues" is the result of another survey by the same Dr. Gallup. The question was: "Which of these two things do you think is the more important for the United States to do—to keep out of war ourselves, or to help England win, even at the risk of getting into the war?" The results were 67 per cent in favor of taking the risks which Lindbergh considers certain to involve us, 33 per cent in favor of keeping out at all costs. These figures may reveal confusion in the public mind, but they show also that a great and growing majority are willing to risk war. If the consequence of that risk is our participation, it will still have been their decision and not the maneuvering of a conspirative minority, as the Lindberghs and Wheelers ominously pretend.

Confirming the Gallup figures, the response of the country to the barnstorming of key isolationists has not been impressive. The crowd of 10,000 which Lindbergh drew in New York is insignificant in a city of seven million. Even Communist Party mass-meetings draw 20,000 as a rule. When due allowance is made for the Bundists, the McWilliams gang, and other organized fascist bodies that were instructed to attend the affair en masse, the Lindbergh rally is reduced to extremely unimpressive proportions. According to Time, the same thing has been true in the Middle West. In Chicago, capital of the isolation belt, the Colonel recently drew a crowd of 10,000, while 75,000 flocked to Soldier Field to hear General Sikorsky, premier of the Polish government in exile, plead for aid to Britain. And Senator Wheeler's largest audience in his swing through the West was the 4,000 that turned out to hear him at Denver.

The attitude of the people of this country toward the regime of Adolf Hitler and toward the war has been slow in maturing. It is compounded of the horror with which they watched the successive defeats of all those countries that hoped to let another nation fight their battles while they remained "neutral"; of appreciation for Hitler's surpassing ability to divide his enemies and handle them in turn, each in his own good time; of the sure knowledge that if England goes down, not only will its Quislings and Laval be our enemies but also the plain people of Britain, who will rightly feel themselves betrayed by an America that was ready to fight to the last Englishman; and of the even surer knowledge that unless we help Britain now our turn will come to face alone a world-dominating Germany. These are the ingredients of American "interventionism," and they make a compound too powerful to be dissolved by the sound-waves of a croaking chorus.

The Tax Proposals

AFTER many weeks of delay the House Ways and Means Committee has got down to the all-important job of determining how defense and aid to Britain are to be financed. The lines of battle in what may prove the bitterest conflict in this session of Congress are being drawn. But in contrast to the struggle over the Lease-Lend bill and the coming struggle over convoys, the chances are that the fight will not take place primarily on the floor of Congress. The issues are technical and complex, and if we are to judge by past experience, the most important decisions will be made in committee and in the final Senate-House conference.

The basic issue is who is to pay the major share of the cost of the defense program. Republicans and conservative Democrats are determined to place as much of the burden as possible on the low-income groups. To this end they are working for a manufacturers' sales tax, a tax on wages, and a substantial reduction in the income-tax exemption. It is encouraging to note that neither the Treasury proposals nor those advanced by the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue incorporate any of these suggestions. But this does not mean that an effort, and probably a very determined effort, will not be made to incorporate one or more of them in the final tax bill. The barrage of opposition to the Treasury plan from the press and from supposedly impartial radio commentators suggests a campaign comparable to that carried on for restrictive legislation against strikes.

Although the Treasury plan does not go as far in the direction of a pay-as-you-go policy as we should like, the proposal to collect $3,600,000,000 in additional taxes is audacious enough to awaken the public to the gravity of the situation. From the standpoint of practical politics, this may be all that can be hoped for this year. We should be on guard against efforts to whittle it down. The opponents to the Treasury plan center their fire on the proposed 11 per cent surtax on all taxable income above the personal exemptions and deductions. Admittedly the new rates are pretty stiff, although they would seem an easy load to Britons in the equivalent tax brackets. The increases would particularly affect families with incomes between $2,500—or $3,000, depending on the size of the family—and $25,000. Above this level the increase is not so great as that proposed by the Joint Congressional Committee.

At first sight it may seem unfair to make one section of the population bear such a heavy share of the burden. But it must be remembered that it is not the poor or even the lower middle class that would make the sacrifice. Only the upper 15 per cent of the population would be affected, and most of them to a relatively slight extent. No family of five is going to face malnutrition or suffer a serious decrease in its standard of living for taxes paid on that proportion of its income above $3,200. The same could not be said of levies which fall—as sales taxes or wage taxes would—on families with incomes of less than $1,500. For years the American tax system, as compared with that of any other country in the world, has undertaxed the middle brackets. The shock that the Treasury proposals have administered to these groups is a measure of their past good fortune.

There is no good reason why the higher surtax rates on incomes between $25,000 and $100,000 proposed by the Joint Congressional Committee should not also be adopted. But the program as a whole is not as satisfactory as that drafted by the Treasury. Its chief weakness is that it falls $400,000,000 short of the Treasury's plan in its levy on incomes. While part of this would be made up by increased excess-profits levies—to which no exception can be taken—the remainder would be obtained by new or increased luxury and consumption taxes. Some increase in these taxes may be justified as a means of curtailing consumer expenditures that divert materials from the defense effort. But if the taxes are high enough to curtail consumer purchases, they cannot be expected to yield much additional revenue. The levies proposed by the Treasury on such items as candy, chewing gum, tobacco, matches, passenger transportation, telephones, ten-cent admissions, and soft drinks are essentially regressive taxes. They would fall much more heavily, proportionately, upon the lower-income groups than upon the well-to-do. The Treasury would depend on these taxes for more than a quarter of the new revenue. To this the Joint Congressional Committee would add levies on such necessities as tea, coffee, cocoa, sugar, electric-light bulbs, and natural gas. The Nation is glad that Secretary Morgenthau has entered a strong protest against these proposals to tax "the poor man's table." We shall only weaken our defense effort if we attempt to finance it by undermining standards of living already too low for safety.

War Is Not the Issue

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

TODAY we know how the majority of the American people feel about the war. We need no polls to tell us, though the polls have clearly registered the facts to which we all can testify. Even Lindbergh must know it, however unscrupulously he may juggle the returns to support his counsel of defeat. As a people we are committed, irrevocably and without qualification, to the struggle against Nazi-Fascist domination of the world. To this struggle we have pledged our full support, even at the risk of war. Our stupendous program of arming ourselves and the nations directly engaged in the war has been fully indorsed by the Congress and the people. There will be no turning back. In the face of this determination the noisy protests of the isolationists are essentially insignificant. Perhaps their chief importance is as testimonials to the strength and integrity of American democratic principles.

But they do have a secondary importance, a nuisance value which cannot be ignored in an hour when swift decision and action must control our national policy. Not only Lindbergh, who has already accommodated himself to defeat, but the isolationist press and the entire high command of the America First committee have centered their fire on the one vulnerable point in the Administration's political defenses. They proclaim unceasingly that every new step taken in support of our avowed policy is certain to involve us in war and should therefore be repudiated by the people. The time has come when we can no longer allow this tactic to hamper our efforts and confuse our counsels. Today we must insist that war is not the primary issue; the defeat of Hitler is the issue. If we can encompass his defeat without fighting, we shall be fortunate. No nation, not even Germany, fights for the fun of it. War is a costly and inefficient way to win victories; a way to be avoided as long as other methods work. But whether we should fight or not is now a question of strategy. It would be a question of major policy only if we were willing, assuming war to be the alternative, to see Hitler win. Since we have said that we are not willing to see Hitler win, let us equally plainly refuse to measure every proposed policy by the single criterion set up by the opposition—whether or not it may involve us in military or naval action.

The pressing issue of convoys and naval patrols must be rescued from the isolationists, who will, if they are allowed, reduce it to a choice between committing acts of war or avoiding them. The central problem is to get sufficient supplies to Britain fast enough to prevent its defeat in the Battle of the Atlantic, which, by Winston Churchill's own eloquent testimony last Sunday, is likely to be the crucial battle of the war. I needn't repeat the figures which prove how rapidly Britain's losses at sea have overtaken and outstripped its capacity to replace them, or argue the futility of producing vast supplies of arms and planes to be sunk on their way to the nations that need them. Those points are made and analyzed on another page of this issue by the naval expert, Donald W. Mitchell. And the facts are not in dispute. Only Senator Nye, so far as I know, has attempted to bolster his argument against the convoys by asserting that Britain's losses have been exaggerated.

The President wants to postpone, and avoid altogether if possible, the use of convoys and the transport of war goods in American ships. Convoys would almost certainly lead to open fighting at sea, since Hitler cannot afford to lose the Battle of the Atlantic even to avoid war with the United States. On the other hand, the United States will not permit cargoes of American supplies to be sunk. Faced with this dilemma the President has adopted the expedient of extending the so-called "neutrality patrol" to cover the waters of the Western Hemisphere. American warships will warn units of the British navy of the presence on the traffic lanes of German raiders and submarines. This is an act so slightly short of war in its realistic implications that it gives Hitler little more than a legalistic excuse not to fight. For the present he may decide to avail himself of that excuse. He may believe that he can sink a sufficient amount of tonnage in the Continental zone to make raiding in the western Atlantic unnecessary; and he may be right. If he is right, then the patrol system will have failed and we shall have to resort to convoys. If he is wrong, if ships get through in sufficient numbers to supply Britain's needs, then he will undoubtedly decide that the patrol is an intolerable infringement of international law and will attack as he pleases—west and east.

It is difficult to believe that the patrol system can be more than a very temporary stop-gap. It looks as though the United States would soon be forced to use convoys in order to get the goods we produce to England. Otherwise, as Mr. Churchill remarked on Sunday, our "high purposes" will be "frustrated" and our products "sunk to the bottom of the sea." If this means war, the American people will accept war as a more bearable choice than Nazi victory. That is certain. But the Administration would gain added support for any measures that may become necessary if the President and his advisers would adopt a policy of complete frankness in describing the alternatives before us. We are not being led, step by step, unwittingly into war, as the isolationists claim. We know what we want. And we deserve the confidence of our leaders. They could learn a useful lesson in the propaganda value of courage and candor by studying the public speeches of Winston Churchill.

Why Knudsen Should Go

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 28

WALTER LIPPMANN suggests that we ought to take over the Azores. I think we ought to take over Detroit. Our confidence in our ability to wage a successful war stems in large part from the knowledge that we possess the world's greatest mass-production industries. The automotive industry is the outstanding example. But it is not enough to have these industries. It is necessary to use them. We cannot fight a war with convertible coupes or overawe a Panzer division with a brigade of statistics on automobile sales. The problem is to turn existing mass-production facilities as rapidly as possible to the production of armament. We are fumbling that problem, and we have no time to fumble. Let us look at the record of the automobile industry, the industry with which the director of the OPM, William S. Knudsen, is most familiar, the industry he should find it easiest to mobilize for defense.

On April 17 Mr. Knudsen called in the press and announced, with great satisfaction, that his industry had "willingly accepted an initial 20 per cent reduction" in the production of automobiles "to make available more man-power, materials, facilities, and management" for defense. The next day the newspapers carried the story of another sacrifice by the industry. This came in the form of a letter from Knudsen's former employer, Alfred P. Sloan, chairman of the board of General Motors. Mr. Sloan wrote that in the interest of national defense General Motors would give up its 1943 models—not its 1942 models but its 1943 models. "In this crisis," said a full-page advertisement placed by General Motors in our leading newspapers that day, "every hour counts. Every hour moves us closer to the day when defense materials will flow to our embattled friends in Europe in volume enough to swing the scale." So passionate is our devotion to their cause that we will do without new car models—year after next.

It is hard for a newspaper to look a full-page ad in the mouth, and these statements of sacrifice were not examined too closely. One notes first that the 20 per cent reduction in the output of cars applies not to the current production season but to next year's. One notes next that this year's production, which will probably end in June, will be one of the greatest in the history of the industry. Only two previous years, 1929 and 1937, topped the 5,000,000-car output which will be achieved this year. While we are promised a 20 per cent reduction next year in the interest of defense, this year's production will be 20 per cent above last year's. In the midst of the greatest defense emergency in our history, the automobile industry increased the production of cars by 20 per cent. Its facilities were mobilized, not for the production of armament, but to take advantage of the market created for automobiles by defense spending. Now, as a "sacrifice" for defense, it is reducing its production schedule for 1942 from the 1941 boom level to the more normal 1940 level. C'est la guerre.

These announcements of sacrifice are confessions of shortsightedness and greed. We are told, to impress us with the magnitude of the contribution the automobile industry will be making by its 20 per cent cut in next year's production, that this will save many metals in which shortages are developing: 5,000 tons of aluminum, 54,700 tons of lead, 18,200 tons of zinc, 4,796,000 pounds of nickel, 26,400 tons of copper, 1,437,000 tons of steel, much of it the high-grade alloys so important to defense. Aluminum represents our most serious shortage, and airplane production lines are already slowing down for lack of it. If a 20 per cent cut under this year's automobile production will save 5,000 tons of aluminum next year, the automobile industry this year must be using five times 5,000 tons of this precious metal. Multiply each of the other figures by five and you get some idea of the extent to which this year's boom production of cars is hobbling defense.

Informed circles in both the steel and automobile industries were surprised only that the 20 per cent reduction announced was so small and had been so long delayed. I quote two sources not conspicuously critical of either industry. "It has been known for some time," said a dispatch to the New York Times from Pittsburgh on April 21, "that automotive centers were producing at as good as full capacity in order to build up a backlog of finished cars against the day when production actually is curtailed because of the press of national-defense activity. It has been this accelerated tempo of production by the automotive industry that taxed to the utmost the steel industry's facilities for the production of bars and sheets and strips." The italics are mine. The same day David J. Wilkie, automotive editor of the Associated Press, reported from Detroit, "Some of the producers admit they have been thinking in terms of a curtailment of 33⅓ per cent or more." Knudsen had actually asked his old associates of the automobile business for a smaller "sacrifice" than some of them were prepared to make.

Mr. Sloan's first-quarter report this morning reveals the leisurely tempo of General Motors' work for defense. I can find no figures on total sales last year in this or in the last annual report, but some elementary arithmetic shows that the total defense sales of General Motors last year was less than $60,000,000. Its net earnings before deduction of income and excess-profits taxes last year—the greatest in its history—were over $320,000,000. In the first quarter of this year defense sales were almost $50,000,000—out of total sales of $65,000,000. Not until "well into the third quarter" would General Motors begin to produce in quantity for defense. Mr. Sloan explained that this was because "by far the greatest number of projects" on which the company is engaged for defense involve the erection and equipment of new plants. Had the automobile industry been required to turn existing equipment to defense purposes it would have been unable to turn out 5,000,000 cars in the space of about seven months, as it is now doing. The automobile industry has been careful to keep defense from interfering not only with business as usual but with better-than-usual business. "The bulk of defense work assigned to the motor-car industry," the Associated Press explained from Detroit on April 12, "has so far been done in its engineering laboratories and in new plant construction. . . . This explains to some extent how the industry has been able to roll out so great a volume of new cars and trucks during the last six months" (my italics). It may also explain why the industry has never been willing to give the Reuther plan a fair hearing.

The industry has ignored not only the Reuther plan but its modified version, the Knudsen plan, because the latter would also have interfered with capacity production of automobiles. It was announced in October that after a plea from Knudsen—who had heard of the Reuther plan the month before—all the major automobile manufacturers had formed an Automotive Committee for Air Defense to pool their machine-tool and stamping equipment for the production of the wing and body parts of 12,000 bombers. This program has since been quietly abandoned. Instead, the government is financing the construction of new plants for Ford, General Motors, Chrysler, and Hudson-Goodyear. The bomber parts are to be built in these new plants instead of with existing automotive equipment. Under the bomber program General Motors was to supply parts for the new North American Aviation assembly plant at Kansas City. It was to, and eventually will, supply from 50 to 60 per cent of the parts needed. I notice that North American's annual report says, "Actually, however, North American will have to do much of the manufacturing itself, until the automotive industry can carry its share." If Knudsen had forced the automobile companies to carry out the program to which they were pledged, General Motors would have begun the task of making these parts seven months ago. "In this crisis," said the General Motors advertisement, "every hour counts." It is a good thing that advertisements can't blush.

Knudsen can look a blueprint in the eye without flinching, but he gets bashful when he talks to Alfred P. Sloan. New models require machine tools. "Machine tools," as Secretary of the Navy Knox said last week, "are the critical item in nearly all cases of plant expansion, and the speed with which quantity production can be started is governed very largely by their availability." Machine tools require design and manufacture. Sloan's letter giving up any new models for year after next says this will release "a very considerable amount of managerial and technical talent that could be diverted to production and engineering problems in national defense." He also said, "We spend on an average model change from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000. This involves tooling, almost entirely. Probably 90 per cent of this capacity could be diverted to defense purposes. In terms of production, there would be involved approximately 15,000,000 man-hours." He was talking here not of the entire industry but of General Motors alone. This means that the entire industry would probably have saved about three times that much labor—the most highly skilled kind of labor—had it decided last year to abandon 1942 models. It is interesting to compare this figure with the 52,000,000 man-hours—most of it unskilled—which were lost in all industry last year through strikes. The automobile industry's insistence on 1942 models cost the defense program almost as much in man-hours and more in terms of skill than all last year's strikes put together.

One of the points made by Reuther when he outlined his plan to Hillman last August was that the machine-tool bottleneck could be eased if the automobile industry were forced to make its private machine-tool facilities available for defense. Half the machine-tool capacity of Detroit is in the captive automotive tool-and-die shops. It was Knudsen's duty last fall to force his colleagues to abandon new models and turn these facilities over for armament production. The newspapers thought that was what he meant when he said to the automobile manufacturers last October, "If you gentlemen figure you are going to need a lot of machine tools in order to carry out your American way of life, you had better take another look." I think we had all better take another look at Knudsen. I expect to go farther into this problem of machine tools next week, but I want to suggest now that on the basis of this record Knudsen ought either to turn in his resignation and go back to Detroit or take a subordinate job where his real abilities as a production man could be utilized without requiring him to exercise the policy-making decision of which he has shown himself incapable. He is a very nice man, but this is no time for sentiment; as the General Motors ad says, "every hour counts." The clock of the defense program is ticking off not only minutes but lives.

The Road to Gibraltar

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

AGAIN the question of a Nazi march through Spain is à l'ordre du jour. Since the beginning of the European war Spain has been one of the most slippery stepping-stones for columnists and radio commentators. Most of the time they have not known what to say. They failed in their analysis of the Spanish situation because of their reluctance to take the only safe position. There could not have been a simpler one. If they had understood that the decision whether or not Spain would "enter the war" on the side of the Axis was a decision Berlin would make, not Madrid, we should have been spared many faltering commentaries. But perhaps it is not surprising that newspapers and the radio have been so inept in dealing with the Spanish problem when a man who till now has seemed to see so clearly into the European situation suddenly offers the same superficial interpretation. The defense of British aid to Franco made by Winston Churchill in the House of Commons on April 22 will some day—when an impartial record is established of his splendid work at the head of the British government in the struggle against Nazi barbarism—be set down as a bad mistake. If his words had not been uttered in one of England's gravest hours, one would have suspected an outburst of his proverbial humor when he attributed to the diplomatic genius of Sir Samuel Hoare—eternally consecrated in the days of Munich—his new success in detaching Franco from Berlin and Rome.

The curious thing is that the position of Spain conceals nothing enigmatic. The British Intelligence Service did not have to display any superhuman insight to discover Franco's stand. Ministers as well as editorial writers have announced incessantly their desire for a final Axis victory and their readiness to contribute to it to the limit of Spain's capacity. On the occasion of the opening of the Exhibition of the German Press in Madrid this March, Señor Serrano Suñer, the Foreign Minister, delivered a declaration of passionate faith in Nazi victory which ought to have put an end to any lurking thoughts of appeasement in London. British help to Santander, matching the speed of German "technicians and engineers" hurried from France to the devastated northern Spanish town, was ridiculed in the Phalangist press as a new evidence of "traditional English hypocrisy." On the very day that Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons paid such glowing tribute to the talent of his ambassador in Madrid, Señor Suñer's organ, Arriba, threatened Portugal, telling that nation it "must choose between Britain and Spain," while the rest of the Madrid press exulted in the prospect of a more tragic Dunkirk in Greece.

In fact, the Nazi march through Spain needs only to be completed. Current newspaper reports estimate that 80,000 Germans have already slipped into Spain. But I have just seen a letter written by an American who knows very exactly the situation in Spain and who sets the number at 100,000. Those Germans have not been sent there to study Franco's attempt to build the New Order by the original method of eliminating eating as a normal human function. There is sufficient work for them to do in organizing the police and keeping the Spanish people, who would otherwise have revolted long ago, under the heel of the Gestapo. But at the same time the Germans in Spain have had another task of a military character. They have repaired the roads which lead to Gibraltar and to Morocco and undertaken all the preliminary steps for a large-scale Nazi military move. During the Spanish War the Germans fortified Sierra Carbonera and Ceuta. Realizing the difficulty and the cost of a direct assault on the Rock, they decided to prepare things in such a way that the entire sea traffic in that part of the western Mediterranean could be controlled by the German artillery. They installed new airdromes from which the German aviation could hold Gibraltar under incessant fire while every ship passing through the Straits could be attacked from shore by guns set up on both sides, as well as from the air. From the beginning of 1940 till now German technicians in Spain have been working unceasingly to perfect the plans for encircling Gibraltar begun during the days of "non-intervention."

The difficulty of taking Gibraltar itself, derived from the fact of its narrow entrance which makes a frontal land attack very costly, would not discourage the Nazis from their drive through Spain. Whether or not Gibraltar holds out as a fortress, its value as a naval base will be rendered useless as soon as the coastal batteries on Point Carnero around Algeciras and the modernized batteries of El Hacho in Ceuta go into action, reinforced by the mobile batteries that the invading Nazi armies would bring with them. The best British military critics agree on that. "The anchorage of Gibraltar is narrow," points out Liddell Hart in "The Defense of Britain," "as the sea floor shelves sharply, and could not be used for our ships if it was under fire from hostile guns on the Spanish shore."

The loss of Gibraltar, the most important point of support for British supremacy in the Mediterranean, would leave England with no secure naval base between the British Isles and Alexandria, more than 3,000 miles distant. But it would not be the only way in which a Nazi drive into Spain could prove effective. Under the work of German engineers a base for hydroplanes has been prepared in the stretch of water north of Cartagena known as Mar Menor, from which very efficient blows could be delivered to British shipping. Years ago, visiting Los Alcazares and La Rivera situated on Mar Menor, the late Italo Balbo declared that "if they were properly equipped they would make the best hydroplane base in the world." The Germans have taken care of that. And there are also El Ferrol, the best naval port of Spain; the whole northwestern coast, from which the Atlantic trade routes can be subjected to heavy submarine attacks; and the Canary Islands, which could complete the famous "Vigo-Canaries-Azores triangle" unless prompt British action in the Canaries and American action in the Azores forestalled Nazi plans. The present commander-in-chief of the German fleet, Admiral Räder, has said that the power which could master this triangle would have the greatest chance of winning the war. And beyond these prizes in Spain lies the possibility of extending Hitler's domination to Portugal. A drive through Spain would certainly pay!

Like Italy's entrance into the war, Spain's active co-operation with the Nazis will be decided at Hitler's exclusive convenience. It may happen in two weeks, in three months, or while these lines go to press. But the single sure thing is that Adolf Hitler will be the one to set the date. When his decision is made he will not meet any opposition whatever from the Franco government. Franco and the Spanish Phalanx are pro-Nazi in their hearts and in their bones. They are irremediably bound to the Axis cause by the Spanish War, by their inclination and feelings, and by the knowledge that they could not survive a Hitler defeat twenty-four hours.

It is a sad contradiction that we Spaniards in exile should be the ones to oppose granting the Franco government food loans or supplies. It is terribly hard for us, knowing how hungry the people are, starving as no other people in Europe starve, with the possible exception of the Poles, to oppose sending wheat to Spain. Only if food could be distributed under the strictest supervision—if, for instance, the Quakers had assumed the responsibility for seeing that food really reached the hungry Spanish people—could such shipments be justified. But when all serious reports agree that even in the worst months of stress Spanish food has been going to Germany, when everybody knows that the food so far sent to Spain has been distributed under the direct supervision of the Phalangists, and when it is recognized that the chief reason Hitler hesitated to march through Spain was the scarcity of supplies for his own troops, to send food indiscriminately to Spain seems an open invitation for the drive to Gibraltar.

The conduct of the war would have been enormously strengthened if at the very beginning full use had been made of the democratic forces of the world in this fight against Hitler. But for this to have been done the men discredited by the terrible blunder of Munich would have had to disappear at once from the political scene. They didn't. Persons responsible for that disaster are still in administrative posts and in the chancelleries of nations engaged in the tremendous job of crushing Nazi Germany. In spite of the presence in the British government of men with courage and imagination like the Labor ministers and Mr. Churchill himself—who in spite of his regrettable statement about Spain has abundantly proved that he possesses both qualities to the highest degree—national policy is too often influenced or directed by people who, though they may have waked up to the failure of appeasement, nevertheless lack the larger vision to see that this gigantic struggle requires, in the words of Danton, "de l'audace, de l'audace, toujours de l'audace." In the minds of these milksops the problem of winning has always been reduced to a simple matter of war material. Possessed by a frantic fear that one day they may see the "people" taking up the work of building a just and progressive social order, these gentlemen endlessly vacillate, caught in the conflict between their conservative inclinations and their inadequate attempts to deal with an enemy who would not hesitate to take the devil himself as an ally if the victory had to come from hell. Recent experience in the Balkans once more confirms the theory that the war against Hitler cannot be won merely by a belated effort to match him in planes, tanks, and guns.

On the other hand, democracy has on its side forces that the whole Nazi industrial machine can never produce—the passionate love and need of freedom of the majority of the people of the world. In the long run this passion will touch off revolt in all the countries that have fallen under fascist control. Democracy has the opportunity to fight Hitler not only on the battlefields, where his superiority will be maintained for a long time to come, but everywhere else; to combine military coups with national uprisings, with constant unrest and sabotage, and with the mobilization of those democratic elements that till now have been discouraged and disregarded but are eager to see the fight against Hitler carried on by daring methods and with an iron determination to win.

To take advantage of these possibilities, strong democratic leadership is the final requisite of the hour. While a Sir Samuel Hoare is allowed to influence the course of his government's policy, we shall continue to move from disaster to disaster. The time has already come when the men who are responsible for the lives of the thousands who die every day on land, on the sea, and in the air, thinking that they fought for liberty, must decide whether they really want to defeat Hitler, even if the world that results from that defeat is not to be a world for which the House of Lords will unanimously vote, or whether they prefer a Nazi order to the uncertainties of a tumultuous awakening of the people. If they choose the second, their policy is clear. They will await the day when every German plane can be met by three Allied planes and every tank by three Allied tanks, while in the meantime they cling to the delusion that they can win over all the little Hitlers who are working in his behalf. No one has proposed that the British, faced with the menace of a German drive on Gibraltar, should months ago have sent an army into Spain. But would it be too demagogic to suggest that they might have been making some plans to oppose Hitler in the political field with the weapons of democratic resistance which he cannot command? In any case it would seem reasonable to expect the British government to decline the task of solving Hitler's food problem in Spain, since that problem has certainly been the primary obstacle so far in the way of his drive on Gibraltar. It is easy to imagine the popular reaction the government will face if, on the heels of the £12,000,000 British loan, Franco throws open the doors of Spain to the Nazi armies.

In spite of the military reverses of the past two weeks nothing is finally lost. Everything can still be won back. But only if the fight against Hitler is carried on by persons who are ready to risk anything except a Hitler victory. Viewed from that angle the outcome of isolated military events cannot affect the essential issue. Even if England is invaded and Hitler is victorious throughout Europe, the struggle against him will go on—through guerrilla fighting, through political action, through sabotage, by every means. Each new victory of Hitler's armies, instead of shortening the war, merely prolongs it. There will be no peace before Hitler is crushed.

The Case for Convoys

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

WITH nearly a third of the pre-war British merchant marine at the bottom of the Atlantic and with the sinking toll well above the combined capacity of all the shipyards in the world, it is clear that unless sinkings are reduced or the production of merchant ships vastly increased the British Empire is doomed. American aid in the solution of this problem has so far been mainly concentrated on increased shipbuilding. Contrary to a fairly widespread opinion, we were not caught flat-footed by the recent demand for ships. The Maritime Commission's program of fifty ships a year, adopted in 1938, had necessitated the immediate expansion of American shipbuilding. Moreover, foreseeing the navy's need of additional fleet auxiliaries, the commission laid down ships well in advance of the schedule originally planned. As a result nearly two hundred fine vessels of a few standard types are now in various stages of completion. The 1938 program was later supplemented by two other similar programs, and the building of 260 new vessels has recently been undertaken by American yards, 60 of them ordered by the British government. In addition, after a conversation with Sir Arthur Salter of the British shipping mission, President Roosevelt announced that 212 other merchantmen would be ordered, to be paid for with half a billion dollars available under the Lease-Lend Act.

This program, ambitious as it is, is still insufficient in the emergency. Existing schedules call for only slightly more than a million tons of deliveries before the end of 1941, and the work of repairing and overhauling injured British vessels may reduce even this modest total. British replacements are not expected to surpass a million tons. The expected losses of from three and a half to six million tons during 1941 will therefore make defeat almost inevitable. It has been estimated that in February British imports fell 20 per cent short of meeting needs. Nor will relief be definitely in sight in 1942—if the war lasts that long. Only the completion of all of the 472 new hulls recently authorized, which would be an industrial miracle, would afford a chance of bringing replacements up to losses, and that only if losses can be somewhat reduced. Not till 1943, with an estimated production of five million tons, can American shipyards offer much promise of relief.

What has prevented American yards from making a better record, from equaling the spectacular building spree of 1919, in short, from making the type of effort which alone will be adequate? In the first place, the building of a two-ocean navy, an undertaking fully three times as large as our World War naval program, stands squarely in the way. Since the United States would be foolish to let its future security depend on the uncertain issue of final British victory, the Administration was probably justified in giving the right of way to naval building. At any rate, that cannot now be altered, for the navy, acting with a promptitude it has not always shown, awarded contracts and actually had construction under way before the army, the Maritime Commission, and other defense agencies had even decided what they needed.

With nearly every way filled with a ship for the navy, merchant shipbuilding has had to await the opening of new yards, the expansion of old ones, and the introduction of expedients to save time and material. When these difficulties are taken into account, the results can be considered fairly good. The expansion which has occurred has been perfectly sound and under other circumstances would be called rapid. Employment in commercial shipyards has increased more than 250 per cent in four years; actual accomplishments in terms of work have been even greater. Forty-three shipyards on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts are working double and triple shifts while new ways are being built. Admiral Land is making a determined effort to protect the taxpayers by refusing to deal with fly-by-night companies like those which defrauded the government of millions of dollars in the last World War. Shipyard labor has, on the whole, been more cooperative than labor in certain other industries, but shipping companies have not always given full support. Recently, the Washington Merry-Go-Round reported an attempt by Bethlehem, the largest single contractor for ships, to make more money by refusing to accept the penalty clause for late delivery. The attempt failed, but two months of valuable time were wasted.

The Maritime Commission has apparently lacked the vision to recommend a sufficiently big program. Fully half the Great Lakes shipyards have not been put to use. There are, to be sure, difficulties in the way of getting ships from the Lakes to the sea—difficulties which will exist until the completion of a deep-sea route through the St. Lawrence—but the navy has not been prevented from building ten submarines on the shores of Lake Michigan. Certainly by concentrating the building of small craft on the Lakes the commission could free the coast yards for large naval and merchant ships. No new large shipyards have yet been built or seem likely to be soon. Finally, the very honesty and caution with which Admiral Land and his associates have acted have meant slower deliveries and increased the danger that the war will be over before American aid can be furnished in any large volume.

One factor in the failure to move more decisively and more rapidly has been the fear of bottlenecks. The basic requirements, steel and man-power, have not been lacking, but there have been shortages in certain types of each. In labor there has been a scarcity of highly skilled supervisory leadership, a small section of the total force but an indispensable one. Lack of skilled draftsmen delayed the completion of some of the cruisers of the Brooklyn class a few years ago and may, it is feared, have the same effect on merchant shipping. Equally important material lacks have threatened. Certain types of steel forgings, such as propeller shafts, must be made individually and take nearly as long to complete as the ship itself. Engineering parts, such as boilers, cannot be made overnight.

Ships themselves, moreover, take a long time to produce. Even with the current speed-up, battleships require from four to five years, cruisers nearly three, submarines and destroyers one to two years, though they have been completed in less time. Construction of shipbuilding facilities can be completed in scarcely less than a year to a year and a half under the best conditions. Hence it is becoming increasingly apparent that unless the shipbuilding industry becomes overnight infinitely more efficient it cannot be depended upon to keep Great Britain going.

Since the chances of preventing defeat through shipbuilding are so slight, it is essential to consider possible means of decreasing shipping losses and making more efficient use of existing tonnage. For war purposes the present American system of shipping control is inadequate. Larger and larger amounts of rubber, asbestos, bauxite, and other strategic raw materials are needed by the defense program; by the end of 1941 at least 19,000,000 tons of these materials, or over 2,000 shiploads, will have been required. The transportation of such materials usually does not mean high profits, and American shipping firms, though they have in nearly all cases acceded to requests, have been reluctant to load these less profitable cargoes. Government operation of the minimum necessary tonnage or commandeering of ships is therefore clearly in sight. The pooling or joint operation of British and American tonnage, with American bottoms taking over African and Pacific shipping routes, and British boats more and more concentrated in the Atlantic, is also inevitable. Finally, the British government, under the leadership of Lord Bevin, is adopting a system of night unloadings at forced speed, designed to cut down the round-trip time and get more service from a given amount of tonnage.

However, these are mere economies of operation which will not solve the problem. What is needed is a better method of dealing with submarines. One of the most promising suggestions is that small ships converted into plane carriers, with destroyer escorts, cruise along the trade lanes of the Atlantic. The planes would greatly increase the destroyers' radius of protection by more quickly detecting both submarines and surface raiders and should also be capable of dealing with the Focke-Wulf bombers which now serve as the eyes of the U-boats. A modification of this scheme is the proposal to use huge wooden barges as plane bases in the Atlantic. It is argued that such craft would be relatively cheap to produce, not necessarily easy to destroy if they carried light artillery, and fairly stable during the summer months when the toll of merchant ships is greatest.

Most other solutions amount to the use of American warships for convoy purposes. A timid version of this plan would have American warships accompany the convoys only as far as Newfoundland or Greenland. But such aid would be comparatively slight since most of the German submarines and surface raiders and all planes prefer to do their hunting on the eastern side of the Atlantic, where targets are more plentiful. Of course, the great need of the British is for more ships to serve as escorts. Now ordered in the United States are several hundred submarine chasers, coastal motor boats, and other anti-submarine craft. They can be produced in huge numbers and relatively quickly, and are effective around the British Isles, but have a limited cruising radius. Destroyers are essential, but no large number can be completed until the middle of 1942.

What to do in the meantime is the burning question. The release of destroyers to the British has been urged from certain non-service sources, but there are serious objections to this step. In the first place, several weeks or months are required to gather crews and familiarize them with the operation of vessels of a different type. In the second, naval officers point out with perfect truth that the United States no longer has a surplus of destroyers or of any other war craft, save possibly easily built patrol vessels, which are already being given to the British nearly as fast as they are completed. With considerable uncertainty about Japan's intentions in the Pacific and no surety of British victory in the Atlantic they strongly disapprove the stripping of our own defenses.

Logic, then, leads to the conclusion that any further aid to Britain involves the use of American ships to serve as convoy escorts or to transport goods to Britain, or both. Because our present merchant tonnage is hardly adequate for our own needs, American warships rather than American merchantmen are most apt to be used. Since this is bound to mean "shooting" and "shooting" is war, the Administration, as well as the American people, has dreaded the decision. Yet economically we have long been a part of the transatlantic conflict. Our aid to Britain already parallels that extended by Great Britain to the South in the Civil War, aid which we regarded as an act of war. The decision cannot be long delayed, for unless relief is provided soon, the matter will be out of our hands. Even conveying will offer no certainty of British victory, though the seventy-odd destroyers which we have available for this duty should bring a considerable decline in shipping losses. If the American belief that the defense of Britain is the defense of the United States is correct, then we can hardly hesitate to use American ships and risk American lives in protecting convoys.

"HULLO! GOING MY WAY?"

The Murray Plan

BY ROSE M. STEIN

THE United States has undertaken to demonstrate to a world torn by war, bitterness, and oppression that democracy, which has failed to prevent the present world crisis, can rise to the occasion with sufficient vigor to correct past mistakes, defeat aggression, and establish decency as the basis of human relations. To achieve these ends it is not enough to convert America into an arsenal for the warring nations. America must also be converted into a laboratory for total democracy, industrial as well as political. The Industry Councils Plan, brought forward in recent months by Philip Murray, president of the C. I. O., is a proposal of modest design which leads in that direction and which therefore merits more public scrutiny than it has yet received.

It is well known that most industries today are nation wide and closely integrated. Therefore a policy of dealing with individual firms in a given industry, whether in the matter of production or of labor relations, is usually ineffective. The outstanding difficulty in the current defense effort is lack of coordination. Various governmental agencies have been created to deal with separate problems connected with the procurement of material. These problems are different in each industry. It is next to impossible to evolve a single formula for coping with them. Each agency, through some scheme of remote control, since most of them are located in Washington, has to contend with a thousand and one variations in every phase of the defense effort—in production, priorities, prices, labor relations. The structure of the defense agencies resembles the craft or horizontal form of labor organization and is lamentably unsuited to obtain results from a closely integrated industrial machine which defies jurisdictional demarkations.

The Industry Councils Plan aims to improve and expedite the machinery created by the President for carrying out the defense program. It will create a structure that approaches the vertical or industrial form of organization. As at present formulated, the plan proposes to deal with all the questions connected with industrial production except prices. These would include output, allocation of orders, determination of where and when to build additional capacity, labor relations, and priorities. It is doubtful, however, whether the councils will be able to deal with priorities, since priorities are chiefly an inter- rather than intra-industry problem; proponents of the plan hold that they are "interlocked with the question of expansion and with the question of full utilization of available capacity."

The plan proposes further that management, labor, and the government should share the responsibility for production as equal partners. It provides that each broadly defined industry engaged in defense production shall be directed by a council to be composed of an equal number of representatives from labor and management, with a government representative as chairman. Over these councils is to be a Coordinating Board, also composed of representatives from management, labor, and the government, with the President or his designated representative as chairman. The councils are to be administrative rather than advisory agencies, and their decisions should be marked by a "voluntary agreement upon the means by which the essential productive aims can be attained."

The possible benefits of such a plan to the immediate defense program and to long-range economic planning are enormous. It would once and for all establish collective bargaining and would thus remove a major cause of present and future industrial strife. At the same time it would eliminate, or at least drastically reduce, opportunities for racketeering and other nefarious practices. With labor, management, and government represented on the council, employers who offered bribes and union men who accepted them would be quickly exposed. Moreover, through the full utilization of labor's wide familiarity with production techniques, efficiency would be vastly increased. And, finally, the plan would serve as a check on monopoly.

By assuming responsibility for the allocation of orders and the building of additional capacity the industry councils and the coordinating board could prevent the present unfair distribution of government orders and the consequent tightening of monopolistic control. It is no secret that the larger companies, especially those that have emissaries in the nation's capital, are getting much more than their proportionate share of defense orders. A number of these concerns have orders far beyond their ability to fill them, while smaller firms are operating below their available capacity. This means that the favored corporations will either have to add to their plant or delay delivery. If they increase their capacity, they will expedite the "squeeze" process in an economy which theoretically at least seeks to hold on to its competitive character; if they delay delivery, they will hinder the defense program.

The question of labor representation in industries where both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. claim membership presents a problem. But at the same time it may open the way to labor unity. Certainly the plan ought to be a potent force for unity in those areas where both groups face the alternative of cooperation or defeat. Some progress in this direction has been made by the council which has been set up on a limited scale in the shipbuilding industry. And in the Bethlehem Steel Company at Lackawanna, New York, the A. F. of L. withdrew as a contestant in the Labor Board hearings after reaching an agreement with the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee of the C. I. O. In any event, councils could be set up in those industries where the two branches of labor are willing to cooperate.

There is reason to believe that a number of Administration leaders, from the President down, look upon the plan with considerable favor. This is also true of a number of industrialists, especially those who have failed to receive contracts. Indeed, there has been no positive assertion from any source that the plan is impracticable. Nevertheless, behind-the-scenes comment has made it abundantly clear that the vast majority of industrial leaders, and conservative elements generally, are inflexibly opposed to it for more reasons than one. They know, of course, that the plan in no way interferes with the system of private ownership or the claim of ownership to a fair profit. But the participation of labor in the solution of problems heretofore the sole concern of management looms as a major revolution. Not that union-management collaboration is an entirely new phenomenon. On many occasions, extending over more than two decades, trade unions and management have collaborated on production problems, but in most instances this policy has been dictated by an immediate urgency to rescue enterprises from collapse. The councils plan seeks to embrace those giant corporations which up to a few years ago would not bargain with unions even on minor issues, and some of which are still battling against the idea. Industrial leaders fear that the plan may be a sinister attempt on labor's part to obtain a greater share of industrial earnings, to gain a voice in industry on a par with management's, and eventually to use the new setup as a stepping-stone to some form of socialism.

Labor has never made a secret of its desire to share increasingly in industrial profits. And if the councils work out satisfactorily in the emergency, labor will be gratified to have them serve as a framework for cooperative post-war planning. They might even supply the machinery for some such scheme as the Ezekiel plan for economic budgeting, although this possibility is not now an important consideration. If in the course of events the councils should introduce shifts in the status quo, labor would probably not be too disturbed. This does not alter the fact that most responsible labor leaders, as well as the vast majority of the rank and file, subscribe to no special economic theory. In the main American labor has always accepted the capitalist system and has itself built up a stake in it. Protracted unemployment, war and the preparation for war, and the present unnatural upswing in production, with its threat of severe depression at the end of the emergency, have led labor to grope for some adjustments. These gropings, so far, have produced nothing more drastic than the Industry Councils Plan, which, by the way, is being quietly but firmly fought by Communist elements in labor's ranks. What Mr. Murray and his aides have in mind in promoting the plan is simply to apply the collective-bargaining techniques they have found successful in the settlement of grievances to the solution of industrial problems on a national scale.

It is true that the plan represents a significant departure from old habits of thought. It is precisely this fact which makes it a crucial test of the sincerity of those who clamor most loudly for the defense of democracy. Are they willing to make the necessary sacrifices? There is no sacrifice on the part of industry in speeding up production and earning a profit. The sacrifice called for is of a more telling sort. In the last analysis victory will not be won by military action alone. Before lasting peace can be established, the winning side will have to gain the good-will and support of the many millions of little people all over the world who have been the disinherited and dispossessed. It is Hitler's greatest weakness that he cannot win such support among the peoples he has conquered. But neither can the democracies count on it being given them automatically or dismiss the effort to gain it as a task which can be done or evaded after the war is won. The effort must be made now, and the place where it can be done with immediate effect is the United States.

Vichy's Slave Battalions

BY HEINZ POL

THE Vichy government recently surprised the world with the announcement that it had made all the necessary arrangements for building a trans-Sahara railroad. Such a railroad has long been planned as a connecting link between the French possessions in North Africa—Tunisia, Morocco, and Algeria—and the colonies on the West Coast and in Equatorial Africa. But during the era of the Third Republic the plans miscarried time and again; though the Bank of France had relatively large gold reserves at its disposal, the problem of financing so gigantic a venture could not be successfully solved. In addition the difficulty of finding enough competent workers to build a railroad in the forbidding desert climate seemed insuperable.

Since these obstacles were sufficient to prevent realization of the project while France was still a rich and powerful country, people have asked themselves whether the Vichy announcement might not be mere propaganda designed to prove to the world that, despite defeat and the critical economic and social situation, the new leaders of France are resourceful enough to carry out schemes which the country was unable to complete under a democratic regime. The suspicion has also been voiced that the announcement merely cloaks a German plan for reorganizing the French African empire. The proponents of this theory argue that since no final peace between Hitler and Pétain has been concluded, and it is still uncertain whether France will retain possession of its colonies, any statement from Vichy about the government's plans for developing the colonies is worthless. Even if the Nazis do not actually intend to seize and carve up France's colonial possessions, they may well be planning to exploit African territory in the interests of the New Order in Europe. It is very possible that the growing number of German "experts" now swarming over the French colonies from Algeria down to Dakar can be traced directly to Germany's interest in a reorganization of the French empire. The trans-Sahara railroad would be an important part of this far-reaching plan.

Whatever is behind the project, one thing is certain: preliminary work on the construction of the railroad actually started several weeks ago, and already thousands of men are employed on it in Tunisia and Morocco. They have been herded into camps and crowded barracks, and they work from ten to twelve hours a day.

Where did the Vichy government find this army of men willing and able to work under the burning desert sun? And where does the money come from for their wages? The answer is that thousands of German, Austrian, Czech, Polish, and Spanish refugees who chose to enlist in the Foreign Legion rather than remain in a French concentration camp are today kept by the Vichy government as slaves in the Sahara Desert. This is proved beyond the shadow of a doubt by letters smuggled out of the camps of the legionnaires. The Vichy government's action in keeping them there in virtual servitude represents perhaps the most flagrant breach of international law of which it has been guilty in its treatment of refugees. Here, in brief, are the facts:

Shortly before the outbreak of the war the Daladier government issued a decree promising refugees, especially those from Germany and Austria, that they would not only enjoy the protection of the French government in the event of war but would be called upon to do their share in the defense of the nation. This promise was broken immediately after the war started. The German and Austrian refugees were herded into concentration camps and declared to be enemies of the state. A propaganda campaign made up of promises and threats was soon under way in the camps with the object of enticing the inmates into the Foreign Legion. The prospect was anything but tempting, for the Foreign Legion enjoyed a dubious reputation despite its high military standing.

The government stated, however, that special formations, attached to the Foreign Legion in name only, would be established for the refugees then in concentration camps, as well as for the Czechs, Poles, and members of other nations living in France at that time. In addition, it gave the refugees a special pledge stating explicitly and unequivocally that their enlistment was to be only for the duration of the war.

Of the Czechs, Poles, and citizens of other non-Axis European nations who signed the agreement, not all were dispatched to North Africa. Some were trained in France and allowed to join special Czech and Polish formations. The German and Austrian refugees, however, were all sent to North Africa. Far from being enrolled in special formations, they were immediately made regular members of the Foreign Legion, and over them were placed sergeants and corporals of German birth who had enlisted in the Foreign Legion for good reasons long before the outbreak of the war. These men made no bones about their pro-Hitler and anti-Semitic attitude.

When the armistice was signed and the French army demobilized, the refugees should have been discharged. They wanted only to shed the uniform of the Foreign Legion and to leave Africa. But at this point the Vichy government intervened, sharply declaring that under the terms of the armistice no man under forty-eight years, that is, no one able to bear arms, might leave French soil without a special permit. This prohibition, it was stated, applied particularly to refugees, since the Germans were afraid that they would continue to fight against Germany once they reached other countries. In point of fact, several units of the Foreign Legion stationed in Syria, with large contingents of German and Austrian refugees, did go over to the British after the armistice. Today they are fighting in Libya.

The embargo against their leaving French soil should not have kept the refugees from being demobilized. When they enlisted, they had been promised that at the end of the war they could settle freely in France and become French citizens. But the Vichy government now announced that only those refugees would be demobilized from the Foreign Legion who could submit 5,000 francs as proof of their ability to support themselves after being discharged. The amount has since been raised to 10,000 francs. Very few were able to raise this sum. All money and property owned by German and Austrian refugees had been confiscated when they were interned, and in many cases these confiscations were not rescinded at the close of the war. In consequence most of the refugees remain in the Foreign Legion, in so-called "labor detachments" organized to create the impression that they have been demobilized and to make the situation more palatable to the outside world. Their pay consists of the legionnaires' three francs a day—hardly enough to buy a few cigarettes.

Meanwhile large numbers of former Czech and Polish legionnaires have also been dispatched to Africa and forced into the labor detachments. And since this procedure works so well, the Vichy government has taken to combing the remaining refugee camps in France for more prospective deserters. A group of American correspondents who finally received permission a few weeks ago to visit one of these hell-holes in France were told that the camps would gradually be closed. They were not informed that the authorities would accomplish this in part by sending inmates who were not too old or too much weakened by hunger and privation to North Africa, where they would again be put behind barbed wire. Some 150 men from Camp Vernet, where conditions are so terrible that care was taken not to show it to the American correspondents, have already arrived in Morocco, and the several thousand Germans, Spaniards, and Austrians remaining are shortly to be transferred. These men will not even receive the three francs granted the refugee legionnaires. They must be thankful for a crust of bread in exchange for their work.

That is the inside picture of the Vichy government's vast construction project. Undoubtedly Berlin is giving its blessings to the plan.

The New Defense Loans

FEDERAL expenditure, including the cost of defense, for the fiscal year beginning July 1 is estimated at around $19 billion. Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau hopes to raise about two-thirds of this sum by taxation, and Congress has just begun a search for the least painful method of adding $3½ billion to the national revenue. But even after the taxpayers have shouldered this load, it will still be necessary to borrow some $6 billion in the course of the year.

Don't let us fool ourselves into thinking that by going into debt in order to finance some part of the defense program we are transferring so much of the burden to posterity. Posterity cannot provide the weapons we require now, and the infinite variety of goods which comprise a modern arsenal must be supplied from current output whether the bills are paid by means of taxes or from the proceeds of loans. We have not, of course, yet arrived at the point where national production can be expanded no farther. Idle men and resources still remain; so that we can still have some butter as well as guns. But production of certain materials, particularly metals, has already reached the limits of present capacity, and with the defense industries receiving priority in supplies civilian industries must find substitutes or reduce their output. Thus in the near future we shall have to get along with a smaller number of new automobiles than we should normally purchase at the present level of national income. And it is safe to prophesy that during the coming year supplies of a number of other consumers' goods will become restricted.

At the same time we must remember that with more men working more hours and with more businesses paying out more profits, the total volume of spending money in the nation's collective pocket is rising. In this situation the demand for goods is liable to outrun supply, and prices tend to rise. The government's policy is to keep prices stable, but it cannot hope to meet with success over any length of time unless some kind of balance is maintained between spendable income and available goods. Hence, as we begin to approach capacity production in all lines, the fiscal program of the nation must be designed not merely to raise the necessary cash but to raise it in such a way as to restrict total purchasing power.

Obviously, one method of achieving this end is heavier taxation on incomes above the level needed to maintain a minimum of decent existence. But inasmuch as even a greatly expanded revenue is still below the cost of defense, the Treasury must attempt to persuade citizens to forgo some part of their potential consumption and lend the resulting savings to the nation. For although thrift can be an over-emphasized virtue when the economy is ambling along at half-throttle, at such times as these it again comes into its own.

For years past the government has been borrowing heavily, but it has been relying more on bank funds than on the savings of the public. According to a recent bulletin issued by the bond house of C. F. Childs and Company, 46 per cent of the increase in public debt during the last seven years has been absorbed by the banks, 18 per cent by insurance companies, 25 per cent by government agencies and trust funds, and only 11 per cent by individuals and non-financial corporations. A large part of this financing has been keyed to bank requirements; that is to say, it has been in the form of comparatively short-term securities. And since the banks have been hard put to find outlets for their investable funds, it has been possible to issue loans at low interest rates. But bank lending does not involve a draft on the real savings of the public at a time when the banking system as a whole commands large excess reserves. On the contrary, it results in an increase in deposits and thus adds to the national reservoir of potential purchasing power. When production is lagging, this can be a useful stimulant, but now that the energizing effects of the defense program are moving the whole economy into high gear, such stimulants become not only unnecessary but dangerous since they tend to encourage inflationary price movements.

The Treasury, therefore, is rightly recasting its borrowing program with a view to attracting subscriptions from the public rather than the banks. On May 1 it opens a campaign to sell three new series of savings bonds designed to appeal to different types of private investors. Series E will be practically identical with the Savings Bonds which have long been popular. These bonds will be issued in denominations of $25 and upward at a price equivalent to 75 per cent of their maturity value. They will be redeemable at any time after sixty days from the issue date at prices representing a progressively higher yield the longer they are held. Retained for a full ten years, they will return 2.9 per cent compounded semi-annually, making them a better bargain than any other government security. These savings bonds are intended primarily for the small investor. They cannot be purchased by corporations, and no owner may buy more than $5,000 (maturity value) in any one calendar year.

Series F will also be discount bonds. Maturing in twelve years, they will be issued at 74 per cent of their face value, and if held for the full term will yield 2.53 per cent. Corporations as well as individuals may purchase these bonds, but any one owner is limited to \$50,000 (cost price) in a calendar year. A similar restriction applies to Series G bonds, which also have a twelve-year maturity. These, however, are income bonds paying $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent a year paid semi-annually, and should thus appeal to investors looking for regular income.

All these issues, it should be noticed, are subject to federal taxes in accordance with the recent act of Congress abolishing tax exemption on all new federal loans. And in this connection there is a point which I should like to ask the Treasury to elucidate. Its offering circulars for the two series of discount bonds state: "For the purpose of determining taxes and tax exemptions, the increment in value represented by the price paid for United States savings bonds and the redemption value received therefor shall be considered as interest, and such interest . . . is not exempt from income or profits taxes." It would appear from this statement that an investor holding these bonds to maturity would be subject in the year when that occurred to tax on the whole difference between the issue price and the face value. In other words, he would have to add to his taxable income in that year what would be, in effect, ten years' income on his investment. If my interpretation is correct, there seems to be a possible cause of hardship in this provision which might be alleviated in the forthcoming revenue act.

In the Wind

A CAMPAIGN TO REVIVE state and federal prohibition laws is making headway in many parts of the country. Dry forces are seeking support from the families of conscripts, stressing the relation between liquor and prostitution in bistros near army camps. Another factor is the liquor industry itself, which is held to be as corrupt as it was before the last war and which will soon be subject to a Congressional investigation.

A SHORT TIME before he died Heywood Broun told some friends that he believed two of the most important forces in the world were communism and Catholicism and that a choice between the two had sooner or later to be made. Broun was asked why he had made his choice in favor of Catholicism. "The church," he replied, "is much easier on sinners."

THE REFERENCE TO SHANGHAI as a "city of vice"—made so by the British—by Toshio Shiratori, as quoted by Robert W. Barnett in last week's Nation, provides an interesting commentary on Axis propaganda methods. Shanghai's reputation is far from spotless, but the fact is that the centers of vice in Shanghai today are almost exclusively in areas under Japanese control. A recent report from International Settlement authorities complains of increased difficulty in coping with the organized lawlessness directed from Japanese areas.

GERMAN AUTHORITIES in Belgium recently ordered the arrest of Peter Pan, listed as editor of the illegal democratic newspaper La Libre Belgique. The police had to report back that the only Peter Pan found was a statue in a Brussels park.

THE TOWN OF BASTOS, in the state of Sao Paulo, Brazil, is 90 per cent Japanese. Recalling a law to the effect that no foreign group might comprise more than 25 per cent of a community, Brazilian officials recently investigated Bastos. They were able to find two Portuguese books—both dictionaries—in the town, and they learned that the Japanese consul had been performing all Bastos marriages.

SENATOR WHEELER, when he was criticized for having mentioned only Jews in his attack on "international bankers," told friends that he did not know that Sir Victor Sassoon was a Jew. According to the Senator's story, he had been entertained by Sassoon in China some years ago and had assumed that the financier, who lives in Oriental fashion, was a Chinese.

PRESS NOTES: Bernarr MacFadden will become a syndicated daily columnist sometime in May. . . . Publishers attending the ANPA convention in New York last week were urged by Editor and Publisher to see "Native Son" to observe "how far the theater goes toward Communist propaganda."

A SPANISH CATALOGUE of books, published last January, carries this ad on its back cover: "Best Seller! Henry Ford, the well-known automobile manufacturer, presents in 'The International Jew' the multiple, ever-changing facets of one of the most hotly debated questions of today and of all time. Fifth Spanish edition. . . . This profound book of Ford's is more timely at this moment than ever."

CORRECTION: In this column in The Nation for April 12 it was reported that Representative Vito Marcantonio, according to the New York Gaelic-American, had signed a petition in behalf of Judge Herbert O'Brien of Queens. Our information was incorrect; Mr. Marcantonio did not sign the petition. What the Gaelic-American said was that Mr. Marcantonio sent a letter advocating absolute Irish neutrality to a meeting at which a resolution in support of Judge O'Brien was passed. Mr. Marcantonio writes us that he considers the O'Brien appointment "a big mistake" and that he is "strongly opposed to anyone on the bench . . . whose views are biased against people because of their race, color, or creed." We regret our error and regret also that Mr. Marcantonio could not wait for our correction before releasing his letter of protest, which, to the best of our knowledge, appeared only in the Daily Worker.

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

He Who Gets Slapped

FRANK ROBERTS is home from defense. He never was quite sure he wanted to go. He was young. He had a job. He had a girl—maybe more than one. But his draft call came and Frank Roberts went, to his duty in selective service, maybe to the wars. It was funny to watch him saying goodbye around the office. The older men joked him about it, and he joked back. But before he went they clapped him on the back, though they indulged in no patriotic orations. The dramatics were kept funny and so kept kind. He went off with jovially presented portable radio, went grinning to war if there was going to be one.

Three days later he was back, grinning again but in no understatement of his sacrifice. He was just grinning. And the older men laughed. It was a joke. Frank had been passed by the doctors of his local selective-service board. He had given up his job. He had said goodbye to his girl—or girls. Then the army doctors at the induction center had looked at him again and turned him down for some minor defect. His return was an anti-climax. But the joke did not seem funny to me.

This one young fellow in one little town who was made a little ludicrous would hardly be worth attention if he were the only one to have this experience. But at the end of six months of the draft it appears that 12 per cent of the young men who have gone off to the camps have been like Frank Roberts, victims of the disagreements of the draft-board doctors and the camp doctors. That means that more than fifty thousand young men all over America have been accepted by their draft boards and sent away from their homes and their jobs, with the disruption attendant upon such departure, and then sent back again—to try to put the pieces of their lives together without any assistance from either the draft boards or the army.

These statistics are not as disturbing to the country as the figures which show that a third of the registrants are rejected at home for physical defects by doctors representing the local draft boards. But that figure is getting sufficient attention. Recently Surgeon General Thomas Parran of the United States Health Service declared that such a percentage of defectiveness was "a national disgrace." Dr. Roger I. Lee of Boston, president-elect of the American College of Physicians, insists that the large number of deferments for physical defects is no cause for alarm over the health of the nation's man-power. Such debate may be a creative disagreement between the doctors. But the number of disagreements between the doctors of the local boards who accept the draftees and the army doctors who reject them makes the doctors in and out of the army look silly, though the result is no joke to the thousands of young men who are victims of the disagreements.

"Your fellow got his job back," a big-city man said after I had told him about Frank. "But poor guys in cities can't count on any such luck." He shook his head. "Sometimes when they're drafted and passed by the local docs they even give away their clothes. Coming back from the induction centers is the hard way of coming back after going nowhere."

The army undoubtedly has explanations for the fact that about 12 per cent of the young men who are physically satisfactory to the local examiners are rejected by the army doctors. There has been no bottleneck on the production of explanations anywhere. But it is difficult for me to see why so high a percentage of disagreement needed to persist through six months of draft experience.

Perhaps, as one civilian physician has heard, the high percentage reflects the fact that Negroes have been rejected by army doctors for flat feet because of the beautiful coincidence of the facts that the army wants few Negroes and Negroes in large numbers do have a foot which is anatomically flat though not necessarily less efficient. Perhaps the figures for six months do not reflect a possible improvement which belatedly has been made. I don't know what the high percentage of disagreement shows except an amazing rate of error in handling the lives of the young men who leave home to serve their country.

The question is not whether the army is too strict or too lenient, though doctors may disagree about that also. The army sets the same standards, strict or lenient, for both sets of doctors—those in the home towns and those in the nation's camps. Between the two sets thousands of young men have been pulled up and flung down. There is the comedy of anti-climax in the process, but it is the great American medical profession which looks ludicrous to me, not the boys who come home from camp carrying their bags, alone and at least a little lost, with all their morale of high enterprise damaged and deflated.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

A SPEECH by Van Wyck Brooks, On Literature Today, has been issued in book form (E. P. Dutton, $1). In twenty-nine pages Mr. Brooks discusses three large subjects: the function and influence of ideas and of writers in the social complex; the reasons for the pessimism and what he calls the obsession with the ugly which have characterized our literature between wars; and the present reaction in the direction of affirmation, and the tendency of writers, as he sees it, to settle in the remoter regions of the country rather than in Greenwich Village, to cultivate rather than deny their roots. Needless to say, Mr. Brooks believes that the influence of ideas and of writers is very powerful and will continue to be; but he is clearly in agreement with Chekhov, whom he quotes, that "the writers who, we say, are for all time, or are simply good, and who intoxicate us, have one common and very important characteristic. They are going toward something and are summoning you toward it, too, and you feel, not with your mind, but with your whole being, that they have some object. . . . The best of them are realists and paint life as it is, but, through every line being soaked in the consciousness of an object, you feel, besides life as it is, the life which ought to be, and that captivates you."

Chekhov went on to say that "we [the Russians] have neither immediate nor remote aims, and in our soul there is a great empty space." And this sentence suggests to Brooks the dominant note of the past twenty years: ". . . the genius that has molded the mind of the present is almost wholly destructive; and even where, as in many cases, these writers are fighting for social justice, they still picture life as hardly worth the trouble of fighting for it. . . . What did Joyce's 'Ulysses' say if not that life is a bad joke? . . . [Our writers] seem to delight in kicking their world to pieces." A little later on he says: "A few years ago, as a publisher's reader, I ran through a novel every day by some young man or woman who had grown up in the West or South. They could not seem to forgive the towns they were born in."

Certainly the genre of fiction Mr. Brooks has in mind was exploited and abused by inferior writers. But in his wholesale criticism he comes dangerously close to the fallacy of condemning and consigning to oblivion the powerful as well as the inferior writers of our generation for not being "constructive." His knowledge of the writer's processes and of his relation to society comes to the rescue, however. He recognizes that writers have expressed the state of mind of a world between wars and that they could hardly have done otherwise. That was the reality they lived in, and part of it was a widespread disillusionment with Utopia and a fierce reaction against the prudery of the preceding generation—which, as Brooks says, produced an inverted prudery in our own.

"We are getting in this generation the reports of writers who have seen nothing else but this rawness and hardness. And we are getting also the reports of the excluded, of the children of our newly arrived foreign population . . . of the disinherited and the hypersensitive types who have grown up in our less developed regions." His attitude toward the "destructive" novelists remains a little ambivalent throughout, combining an emotional rejection of their pessimism with a realization that writers worthy of the name must write what they feel (and he is consistently hostile to the expatriates from Henry James to Eliot); but he ends by concluding that the cynicism of our best writers is not cynicism at all but an inverted idealism. "The depth of despair of the present is the measure of its defeated expectation."

Mr. Brooks says that most current American literature is written by adolescent minds—"I think the mind of the country, as a whole, has had its adolescence in our time. . . . It has gone through terrible growing pains, but the nation will be, in consequence, more mature." He sees a reaction against defeatism as one phase of this maturity; another is the growing interest of scholars and artists in our own cultural resources, which has been intensified by the collapse of Europe. It will be a sign of genuine maturity if the reaction against defeatism and the growing interest in things American are not exploited to the ends of chauvinism.

Despite his rejection of most of our literature between wars, Mr. Brooks thinks it is a good thing that young people now are so exacting, so wary of hypocrisy and humbug—an attitude which, in part at least, is certainly the fruit of those "destructive" novels.

So perhaps after all some of our writers may even pass Chekhov's test. "The best of them are realists and paint life as it is, but, through every line's being soaked in the consciousness of an object, you feel, besides life as it is, the life which ought to be, and that captivates you." Though it seems to me that this is not to say much more than that the creative power is an affirmative tide which, if it is strong enough, remains affirmative whatever its surface burden of disruption and despair.

LEON DENNEN, who reads the Soviet press, writes me that the newest volume in a series by Mikhail Sholokhov, "The Don Flows Home to the Sea," soon to be published here, has given the Soviet critics a bad headache. The reason is that the hero, introduced in the first volume as an honest Cossack who will eventually become a Communist, turns bandit instead.

The Soviet discussions of the book [writes Mr. Dennen] have been long-winded, muddled, and tortuous. The poor critics don't know what to make of it. M. Charny expresses his "love" and "reverence" for the greatest living Soviet writer and suggests cautiously that the hero should have at last become an organic part of the "happy Soviet life." The critics Hoffenshefer and I. Greenberg insist that George Melekhov should have become a Communist. They are glad, however, that Sholokhov did not succumb to the "happy ending" school, thus avoiding the errors of "vulgar sociology" [whatever that may mean]. P. Gromov absolves the author but blames another character in the novel, the Bolshevik Mikhail Koshevoi. "Why," asks Gromov, "did Gregory join the White Guards the last time?" "Because," he answers promptly, "Koshevoi's political views were schematic. He did not understand the complicated dialectics of the revolution in the village. He created around Gregory an atmosphere of distrust, of petty quarrels, and thus drove him to commit a new crime."

Meanwhile, the outstanding critical review, the Literary Critic, has been banned by the government because, as the Literary Gazette explains, "Soviet criticism is muddled and is badly in need of a reorientation." Sholokhov, who because of his Cossack contacts happens to be at the moment in Stalin's favor, remains silent.

BOOKS BEHIND THE LINES: "Aristotle's Art of Poetry" is introduced and explained by W. Hamilton Fyfe in a little volume of that title issued by Oxford University Press ($1). And you can get "The Basic Works of Aristotle," "the master of those that know," edited and introduced by Richard McKeon in a volume published by Random House ($4). . . . The Facsimile Text Society has published "Tamerlane and Other Poems" by Edgar Allan Poe from the edition of 1827, with an introduction by Thomas Ollive Mabbott (Columbia University Press, $1.80).

W. H. AUDEN has written the book for an operetta, "Paul Bunyan," for which Benjamin Britten has composed the music. It is to be presented during the week of May 5 by Columbia Associates at Brander Matthews Hall at Columbia University.

A Man on the Isle of Palms

BY ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Looks at his watch, or turns to watch the sea,

Or see his little son

In a blue sweater, tossing a blue ball,

Bright in the southern sun,

Unconscious of the dubious presences

That haunt his father, come unseen, and go

Along a strand that Dali might have drawn,

A beach described by Poe:

Gray sisters, fatal modern goddesses,

Neurosis and Nostalgia, at his side,

Lean fondly over his shoulder, make him love

The slack and ebbing tide:

Whom he can learn, with patience, to dismiss;

Hush the long argument between the cells

And nervous mind; and rise, and walk the beach,

Looking for lovely shells;

Or sit, content, and smoke; and feel the sun,

Watch the blue ocean; or shade the page and read,

Or study Time and Silence, that great pair

Of which all art has need.

The Dispossessed

FLOTSAM. By Erich Maria Remarque. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

"FLLOTSAM" is a story of Germans whom the Third Reich dispossessed, of wanderers without passports or nationality who have no legal right to live anywhere on the earth. It is a story of people being thrown out of one country into the next—being led to frontiers at night to sneak across them as best they can. And each time they are caught in Austria or Czechoslovakia or France (the period is 1936-37) they are liable to harsher treatment, to stiffer prison sentences. Every step they take, every street corner they turn, every restaurant they enter, fills them with fear of being apprehended; while all the while they are battling against starvation. It is a story as horrifying as it is pathetic: a grisly twentieth-century example of the once light-hearted picaresque novel.

In a story of this kind it is perhaps not easy to decide what is, and what is not, sentimentality or melodrama. The life of these people is charged with emotions and cluttered with events that we cannot judge in the light of normal experience, that indeed represent the breakdown of normal experience. Yet, granting all that, "Flotsam" still seems fictional and unconvincing. It makes very good reading, and the plight of its characters comes through vividly enough. But the characters themselves seem conventionally conceived and sentimentally handled. For another thing, the reader is somehow kept more interested in what is happening than in whom it is happening to—a pretty dead giveaway that Remarque has let his story count for more than his theme. Indeed, you feel that you understand the life of these people in spite of the author rather than because of him. He has his incidental virtues in "Flotsam"; but he has simply not found the artistic level, or even the human level, at which such a story should operate. And at its worst, as in the suicide of a beaten Jewish actress or the death of an old man, it employs a manner that one would scarcely have thought possible to the author of "All Quiet on the Western Front." But then one recalls that "Flotsam" was a movie before it was a book.

Leaders in Two Wars

WOODROW WILSON: THE FIFTEENTH POINT. By David Loth. J. B. Lippincott and Company. $3.

BLOOD, SWEAT, AND TEARS. By Winston Churchill. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

IN CRITICAL times the survival of a civilization may depend upon the timely emergence of a leader who would integrate and actualize its hopes and aspirations. Wilson was such a leader. For a few months he was a mouthpiece of untold millions. His leadership failed, and with devastating clarity he predicted the consequences of that failure. In his last message to a Congress which was jubilant at the return to "normalcy," determined to repudiate international responsibilities and to build world peace upon the strange assumption that he serves mankind best who serves himself, Wilson declared, "I think we all realize that the day has come when democracy is being put upon its final test." And in the address which he broadcast on Armistice Day, 1923, the dying invalid repeated, "The faith of the world can be set straight only by the firmest and most determined exhibition of the will to lead and make the right prevail." This will was lacking everywhere, and especially in the United States. It was not Wilson who failed his people or mankind; it was the people and mankind who failed Wilson. A close study of Wilson's messages in the decisive years is most important for understanding the present. The several good biographies of Wilson which appeared in the early twenties lack the perspective in which recent events have placed the work of twenty-five years ago. David Loth's new book is not a definitive biography or a mine of new information, but it is an extremely readable, understanding, and intelligent piece of work, and should be warmly recommended to those who have to meet the challenge of today.

The events of the last decade have been the consequence—predicted by Wilson—of Wilson's failure to lead. Wilson's leadership has now been followed by Churchill's. That would have seemed improbable twenty-five years ago. In their background and mental make-up the two men are fundamentally different. But in the last decade Churchill has grown in stature. Intelligence and courage were always his; he has added wisdom and vision. In a world infinitely harder than that of twenty-five years ago, deeply disillusioned, fraught with immeasurable consequences, he has become the symbol of democracy's resistance in "its final test." Wilson was allowed to lead with the great and hopeful vision before him; Churchill rose to leadership under the shadow of catastrophe. He had foreseen the catastrophe and understood its nature; by his understanding he could have met its challenge. But he was called to leadership only at the last moment, to avert the worst consequences of facile optimism, utopian pacifism, and fantastically unrealistic class ideology, of both right and left. If it should turn out that he was not called on too late, it will be largely because of the high resolve with which he faced a situation not of his making.

The new volume of Churchill's speeches, which covers the period from May, 1938, to February, 1941, is a historical and human document of the first order and will be read as one of the great classics of statesmanship wherever and whenever the standards of reading are not prescribed by Chancellor Hitler. As far back as May 9, 1938, Churchill warned: "Never before has the choice of blessings or curses been so plainly, vividly, even brutally offered to mankind. The choice is open. The dreadful balance trembles." In the same speech Churchill defined the fundamental war aims of Great Britain, and he found himself in complete agreement with Wilson. In the face of the "failure" of the League of Nations, he could say: "And yet we stand here today to proclaim that this was the sovereign plan: that it remains at once the wisest, the most noble, the most sane, and the most practical path upon which the men and women of every land should set their feet tonight: on which they should march forward and for which they should strive with might and main." He never wavered in the conviction that "national unity can only be preserved upon a cause which is larger than the nation itself." There is nowhere in the book an expression of narrow nationalism, of a Britain First attitude; though it is steeped in the living continuity of English tradition, the book is animated by the deep conviction of the interdependence of all human life, of its common destiny and common responsibility. Churchill was the first statesman to propose a common citizenship for the French and for the British; he envisages today a common citizenship for British and Americans and for all men of good-will.

It is useless to quote from these speeches. Many passages have become already classic; many more will if democracy survives. Here is a leader who was not afraid to tell his people the whole unpleasant truth and to teach them to face stern reality. He never underestimated the immense risks and dangers involved in the actions which he proposed; his propositions drew their strength from a clear realization of what would be the alternative. His view of the future as revealed here may be narrow: these speeches are words leading and spoken "into battle"; they are by necessity or by personal limitation entirely single-minded, battle-centered. Nevertheless, they contain vision and rare generosity; they avoid any recrimination concerning the past and discuss the many missed opportunities and the many ignoble surrenders without any bitterness. "Of this I am quite sure, that if you open a quarrel between the past and the present, we shall find that we have lost the future." In this generosity, which is part of Churchill's intense realism, lies much of his strength, but his main strength springs from the clear recognition of the almost unbelievable stakes involved. "If we can stand up to Hitler, the life of the world may move forward into broad, sunlit uplands. But if we fail, then the whole world, including the United States, including all that we have known and cared for, will sink into the abyss of a new Dark Age made more sinister, and perhaps more protracted, by the lights of perverted signs."

HANS KOHN

A Cool Hand

UP AT THE VILLA. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.75.

THIS novel, as unmitigated a specimen of fictional drivel as has appeared under respectable authorship within living memory, might be fitly dismissed as the latest triumph of servant-girl's literature were it not for the phenomenal value that still attaches to Maugham's name among modern authors. The standard argument on his case is familiar. He is the complete Cool Hand and Technical Expert among writers; he has never been taken in by literary gangdom, aesthetic pretensions, or anything else in the life around him; he is a walking model of his own no-nonsense, fact-facing, smooth-tooled heroes; he is always perfectly aware of what he is doing and is as fully in control of his faculties when turning out a piece of trash as when producing a masterpiece. This reputation has been as carefully fostered by himself as by his admirers. "The Summing Up" was a deftly calculated exercise in his favorite virtue—professional sincerity; so superbly calculated, indeed, that even its author seemed unaware that his elaborately cold-blooded realism gave his show away more readily than the bewildered ardors and protestations we usually get in literary memoirs. Popular critics are always pushovers for the cool kind of aesthetic amorality

Maugham professes. "His cynicism has advanced so far as to become candor," exclaims Mr. Fadiman: "It's a positive pleasure to be sold so smooth and shiny a gold brick." We are also used to hearing Maugham called "the greatest living English novelist," the implication always being conveyed that were he so disposed he could, at any time he feels like it, produce another "Cakes and Ale" or "Of Human Bondage."

One is moved to ask: then why doesn't he do so? For ten years now, since "Cakes and Ale" in 1930, he has turned out a succession of luxurious pot-boilers, Cosmopolitan thrillers, and Hollywood slick-jobs equaled only by the similar procession of banalities that followed "Of Human Bondage" in 1915. His plays, expertly carpentered actor-pieces and drawing-room comedies in the fagged line of Pinero, are hard to discuss seriously even among the arid wastes of modern drama; one has only to see them in revival a few years after their glamorous first nights and shorn of their original stars to realize the prodigies of mechanical contrivance, mawkish dialogue, and trumped-up moral pretension they encompass. Modern fiction, especially in England, has mostly represented a triumph of higher journalism, but Bennett, Wells, and Galsworthy at least respected the more serious social sympathies, class conflicts, and psychological interests of their time. Maugham has never let these worries run away with him. He has brought high gifts—in storytelling, in humane observation, in suspense, in humor, and even in more serious matters of passion or decadence—to the most trivial of uses. His two notable books have issued from the only two experiences in which he has allowed himself to be deeply or personally implicated: his youthful sufferings in love, thought, and physical disability and his ordeal of moral exoneration as a professional writer. The first struggle he sublimated by a patient, disillusioned, laborious, unoriginal, but convincing realism; the second by a brilliant feat of satire. Yet one has only to look at the conclusions at which those books arrive to understand why he lapsed into a perfect model of the literary journeyman, hostile to artistic risk or innovation, invulnerable to the serious claims of his profession, and apparently without conscience when it comes to lending his remarkable equipment to the highest sales values that tawdry smartness and banality command.

If any doubt remains on this score, "Up at the Villa" should dismiss it. The screaming falseness of its dialogue (on pages 39-43 or 87-99, for instance) should alone be enough to turn the stomachs of even moderately sensitive readers; it would put to shame the humblest employee of the Hollywood script-mills. Perhaps one exaggerates the importance of all this. But Maugham is influential; his claim to importance is highly respected in schools, rental libraries, and newspaper columns; he figures as a guide for ambitious talents. His career in the fashionable drawing-rooms and international cocktail sets of Europe, in Riviera villas, in theatrical circles, on P. & O. liners, or among the glamorous places of the Orient is a model of envy to innumerable aspirants who take this kind of success as a symptom of serious literary distinction. And it is quite in line with his elaborately groomed, no-nonsense attitude toward art that he should in recent months have used his current pulpit in the Saturday Evening Post to disseminate a large skepticism about modern literature, to expound his man-to-man common sense on the aesthetics of the mystery thriller, and to reduce the labors of Henry James to an ultimate refinement of futility. The motive behind these Literary Lessons for Rotarians is not difficult to glimpse: no man likes to be shown up by his betters quite as ruthlessly as the slightest comparison between the work of James and Maugham shows up Maugham. At the age of sixty-seven James had not only written an almost unbroken succession of subtle and profoundly original novels (in which, contrary to the opinion of Maugham and Van Wyck Brooks, he was taken in by nothing in the world of sham and ambition in which he mixed) but was writing, in the fulness of his age and wisdom, one of the most searchingly pathetic and beautifully wrought stories ever set on paper, "The Bench of Desolation." At the age of sixty-seven Maugham turns out "Up at the Villa" for the delectation of drugstore readers, movie audiences, and the boudoirs. One of its features that provides Mr. Fadiman with special pleasure is that it does not contain "a wasted word." The fact has seldom been more deftly reversed. All the words are wasted!

And incidentally, if the title of "greatest living English novelist" is to be thrown around any further, it is time it landed in the right quarter. The greatest living English novelist is E. M. Forster. MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Test-Tube Drama

SCIENCE IN PROGRESS, SECOND SERIES. By L. F. Stadler, F. W. Went, J. F. Fulton, Douglas Johnson, Alfred C. Lane, H. P. Robertson, Carl D. Anderson, Duncan A. MacInnes, J. W. Beams, and J. C. Hunsaker. Edited by George A. Baitsell. Yale University Press. $4.

ONE would never expect to discover behind such a title as "Science in Progress" the most exciting collection of detectives stories of the year. Yet these ten lectures, delivered by leaders in various scientific fields during 1939 and 1940, are just that. The riddles they set out to solve are not mysteries of death but of life, but that does not make them less engrossing. All the ingredients of good detective fiction are here—suspense, excitement of discovery, the thrill of following a "master-mind" through induction, hypothesis, deduction, and analysis of confirmatory and contradictory evidence to a conclusion or a postulate.

There is no effort to mislead the reader with false scents, however, but rather an admirable attempt to show him the drama that goes on in the test tube, under the microscope, in the cloud chamber or the telescope. To write of imponderables and to make them as immediate and as significant as the events of the European war, to demonstrate that science is not a hollow mechanistic preoccupation with abstractions or particles but one of the greatest forces available in the fight against self-destruction is a contribution that deserves far wider recognition than this book may receive.

This is the second volume of a series based upon the National Sigma Xi Lectures—the first appeared in 1939. One wishes that, like crime books, one of these could appear every month instead of every year, to remind us of the great battle for life that goes on quietly, yet ceaselessly, beside the noisy, death-dealing struggles of our time.

JEANETTA LYLE

IN BRIEF

TO SING WITH THE ANGELS. By Maurice Hindus. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

This novel, far better than Mr. Hindus's "Sons and Fathers," relates a grueling story of Czechoslovakia under the Nazi "Protectorate." A small Moravian village provides the setting for a tragedy of oppression, betrayed idealism, extortion, brutality, and a rift between Nazi husband and Czech wife that echoes the burden of countless plots based on our Civil War. Though the picture is heavily overlaid with tones of black and gray, the heroine's closing cry voices the hope of a proud and long-suffering people: "They thought they'd make us howl with the wolves to the end of time, but some day we'll sing with angels again—with the angels!"

NOT BY STRANGE GODS. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

A half-dozen quiet, mellow stories about country people, told with a mixture of realistic detail and mystical exaltation decidedly Celtic in flavor. Even the dialogue has an Irish tang that might stem as well from Connemara as from Kentucky, and the people move in a suffused emotional twilight that satisfies the poetic sense but may disturb readers who like their earth earthy.

DRAMA

God Is Love, or Why Worry?

SOMEWHERE in the second act of "The Beautiful People" (Lyceum theater) it is revealed that the hero has just fallen into the organ at St. Ann's Catholic church. He was looking for a beloved mouse believed to have wandered away from his own home, and when asked by the scandalized priests that he was doing he replied, in all sincerity, "Worshiping." This will give you some vague idea of the sort of thing which goes on in William Saroyan's new play; and when I add that the organ, far from being injured by the recipitation of a saint into its bowels, as observed to sound better than ever before, you will understand further that they go on in Mr. Saroyan's enchanted universe, where everything done in tenderness and good faith turns out for the best.

It is easy enough to analyze the author's recurrent motifs and on that basis to pigeonhole him in a discredited category. Few men ever displayed a completer or more clearly defined set of the stigmata of romanticism. He accepts the universe, believes in the goodness of the human heart, and holds that God is love. He distrusts the respectable, rejoices in the variety of the world, believes in the unique individual, and assumes as self-evident that Beauty is Truth. Above all, he is convinced that the secret of success in both life and art is to let oneself go—as completely and as unthinkingly as possible. But to stop with such an analysis or to proceed from it to a dismissal of Mr. Saroyan's plays is to remain blind to the primary fact that they have a freshness of fancy, a gaiety of humor, and a sincerity of sentiment which make them, in my opinion, unique. Perhaps this has been made possible by the author's genuine naivete, by the fact that he does not know how his various convictions fit into a recognized pattern and cherishes each as a fresh revelation which, in delightful astonishment, he gives to the world. In any event, it is as such that they tend to appear.

In certain respects the new piece resembles "My Heart's in the Highlands" more closely than either of Mr. Saroyan's two subsequent plays. Like the first it is completely fluid instead of attempting, like "The Time of Your Life," to achieve at least the loose consecutiveness of a series of fortuitously linked sketches; and like the first also it deals with a fantastically irresponsible family exclusively composed, it must be admitted, of Saroyans—William Saroyan as two different young men, William Saroyan as a budding girl, and William Saroyan as a bibulous old father always hoping for the best and always getting it. But though the motives are so clearly the same, the details are richly inventive, and there is little that suggests mere repetition. This is not to say that there are not moments when the whimsy becomes a bit thin, or, if you prefer, when it becomes a bit thick. Neither is it to deny that in one passage at least the sentimental grows earnestly explicit and for that moment embarrassing. But I, at least, found these moments easy to forget in the presence of so much that is completely charming.

Take, for example, the speech in which the young girl tries to describe the wonder of her first conversation with the young man she has just met at the public library, and can remember only that he had said, "Look, pigeons!" Or take, instead, the whole series of incidents concerning the youngest of the family, the writer whose many books, we soon discover, consist of one word each—the word being written down in ecstasy at the moment when the author has discovered for himself what some noun like "tree" or "brother" really means. It can hardly be the result of conscious intention, but Mr. Saroyan plays an exquisitely skilful game of now you see it and now you don't with the merely absurd and the mystical implications of this author unable to escape the conviction that "a rose is a rose is a rose"; and he builds the whole thing up to a surprisingly effective conclusion to the play.

The only shadow upon the happiness of the family (living, by the way, on a twenty-four-dollar-a-month pension check really intended for a deceased former inhabitant of the house they occupy) is the absence of an elder son gone away to New York to play the cornet. Many times his brother is convinced that he can hear the tune being played three thousand miles away, but it is only near the very end that the others can hear it too—for the wandering musician is this time really coming up the hill. He enters tooting on the horn his only greeting to the family, and as he sits down on a chair someone tenderly mutes his cornet with a battered top hat placed over the end. After a moment the sister lifts the hat from the horn and places it at a cocky angle on the head of the musician, whose sentimental tune then soars to triumph. And at that moment the writer, still afraid of verbs but conquering now his lesser fear of the adjective, writes his first two-word book. He seizes paper and in ecstasy writes, "My brother." I doubt if any more completely sentimental recognition scene has been written. But on its own level it is vastly effective.

One might instructively compare "The Beautiful People" with "You Can't Take It with You." In a sense the themes are the same, and each is quite good in its way. But there is between them all the difference between sophistication playing a trick and sincerity genuinely delighted with the sentiment it is feeling, between gags deliberately concocted and humor which springs from real gaiety. I hope Mr. Saroyan will not be imitated by anyone less talented than himself or with less faith in his own romantic and sentimental ideas. But for Mr. Saroyan himself I am profoundly grateful. RECORDS

IN Beethoven's Missa Solemnis one hears the inner illumination and exaltation that are embodied in the works of his last years—carried to ever higher points of jubilant ecstasy in portions of the Gloria and Credo, and even more affecting in the wonderful quiet passages of the Sanctus, the Benedictus, the Agnus Dei. And the character of the work provides the basis for judgment of the performance. The ever higher points of jubilant ecstasy, for one thing, are achieved in the form in sound which Toscanini's breath-taking tempos and soaring, radiant choral sonorities give to the "Gloria in excelsis Deo" and "in gloria Dei patris" of the Gloria, but not in the form given them by the ponderous, stodgy tempos and thick masses of choral sound of the Koussevitzky performance which Victor recorded at concerts in Boston (Sets 758 and 759, $13). On the other hand the orchestral prelude to the Benedictus, moving as slowly as it does in Toscanini's performance, has a meaning that it does not have moving at Koussevitzky's faster pace. And there are other instances of differences in performance—in pace, in sonority—that represent perception by Toscanini of things in the music which Koussevitzky does not perceive. But there are also passages to which Koussevitzky gives beautiful effect.

Mention of the fact that the soloists range from poor (John Priebe, tenor) to fair (Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Anna Kaskas, contralto) and good (Norman Cordon, bass)—which is not enough for a performance that is to be given permanence on records—completes my discussion of Koussevitzky's contribution and leads me to Victor's. Its technicians, who have produced such superb examples of orchestral recording with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy of Music, do not seem to have done anything to counteract the excessive brilliance of Symphony Hall that has made most of the recent Boston Symphony recordings so sharp and harsh. One must suppose that they made some preliminary tests for the more difficult job of securing a balanced recording of orchestra, chorus, and soloists in the Missa; and it may be that they achieved the best that could be achieved; but listening to the records I have found both of these things hard to believe. Whereas the Koussevitzky recording of the St. Matthew Passion was excessively sharp, the sound of the Missa is dull, cloudy, lacking in brightness and clarity and sharpness of definition (one almost never hears the bright sound of the trumpets); the balance of orchestra, chorus, and soloists is not good and not constant; and there are changes in volume-level (the sharp drop in the middle of side 10 is one example).

The set of the Parsifal-Kundry duet of "Parsifal" (755, $4)—from Parsifal's "Dies alles hab' ich nun geträumt" to the end of the second act—offers superb recording of marvelously beautiful singing by Flagstad, some of Melchior's best of today, and a fine-sounding, fairly distinctly heard orchestral accompaniment by the Victor Symphony under McArthur; and music which I dislike as much as I like the Good Friday Spell and the wonderful things in "Tristan" and "Meistersinger." Kipnis, in his second volume of Brahms songs (Set 751, $6.50), sings a few that are well known, but also a number that are unfamiliar to me. Most of them are fine examples of the genre in which Brahms is at his best; a few—"Auf dem Kirchhofe," "Der Überläufer," "Ein Wanderer" (17749)—I don't care for. In some of the phrases of "Auf dem Kirchhofe" and "Der Überläufer" Kipnis is melodramatic; but for the rest his singing is very fine. Not very interesting are the selection from Grétry's "Zémire et Azor" (2149), Bishop's Echo Song (2150), and the excerpt from Bach's "Phoebus and Pan" (2151) in the set Lily Pons in Classic Airs (756, $3.50); but Handel's "Alma Mia" and his aria from "Alessandro" (2150) and Pergolesi's "Se tu m'ami" (2151) are quite lovely; and Pons sings them all with crystalline voice and charm. The "Ingemisco tanquam reus" from Verdi's Requiem that Gigli bellows in the complete recording is to be had on a single disc (13588, $1) sung by Bjoerling with his superb voice and fine musical taste. On the reverse side is the "Cujus animam" from Rossini's Stabat Mater. And the opulent mezzo-soprano of Thorborg is heard in Schubert's "Allmacht" on two sides of a ten-inch single (2148, $.75)—which means a disturbing break.

A hearing of the Primrose Quartet's recording of Haydn's quartet version of his "Seven Last Words of Christ" (Set 757, $9) confirms my impression of the work when I heard the performance in Town Hall—that it is not one of Haydn's important or interesting achievements; and I don't hear on these records the tonal beauty of the Town Hall performance. Also uninteresting to me is the Bach Sonata for flute, violin, and piano that is beautifully played by the Moyse Trio (13591, $1).

Ormandy's performance of "The Swan of Tuonela" (17702) in his Sibelius Anniversary Album (Set 750, $3.50) is more gorgeously colored than the recent Stock version. The other works in the set are "Finlandia" (17701) and "Lemminkäinen's Homeward Journey" (17703), one of the least consequential Sibelius products, which was included in the Victor set (446) of Beecham's performance of the Fourth Symphony. And from past experience I think you can safely neglect Harl McDonald's Symphony No. 1, "The Santa Fé Trail" (Set 754, $3.50) and Roy Harris's Quintet for piano and strings 1939 (Set 752, $4), as I have done.

Nazi Echoes from Japan

Dear Sirs: Mr. Barnett's interview with Toshio Shiratori in The Nation of April 26 reveals the deep influence of Nazi propaganda on Japan. The Japanese spokesman asserted that Britain is "ruled by an oligarchy, not by its people"—the same Nazi phraseology is being used by some Americans—and implied that the "oligarchy" was responsible for Britain's entry into the war and its continuation of the struggle. As Hitler fights to liberate the Serbs, Poles, Belgians, and others from British oppression, so Japan wishes to do the same for the Chinese. German and Japanese benevolence, unfortunately, is not always appreciated by the liberated peoples.

Hitler, Mussolini, and Shiratori complain about British hostility to their plans and forget that the government of Great Britain did everything possible to come to terms with the aggressor nations and to avoid war. In America it is—and again we hear many Americans echo this Nazi-Japanese propaganda—"Wall Street and financial interests" which oppose a German or Japanese victory. Japan wishes to liberate Asiatics "enslaved" by Britain; the Koreans and Chinese are deeply grateful; and it is Sir Victor Sassoon who caused the China incident. Did we not hear in this country the same Nazi-Japanese propaganda about Sassoon?

The attention of those Americans who today repeat so gladly these and similar slogans of Nazi propaganda—two years ago only Father Coughlin did it—should be drawn to the following assertions by the Japanese spokesman: "Germany must continue the struggle against the entire Anglo-Saxon world"; "Germany is therefore compelled to wage war until it breaks Anglo-Saxon control not only in Europe but throughout the world"; "We cannot say which side will win, but we know which ought to win—must win—and which to help."

Mr. Hoover's Food Plan

Dear Sirs: Herbert Agar's brief reference to Herbert Hoover in The Nation of March 22 seems to me to contain one palpable misstatement of fact and an unwarrantable misrepresentation of motive. Mr. Agar interprets Mr. Hoover's plan for feeding the occupied countries of Europe as "a one-man revolt against the foreign policy of the United States."

If it were true that Mr. Hoover were the only person in America interested in combating malnutrition and starvation among peoples whose only crime was that they were not strong enough to resist the German invasion, the fact would be deeply discreditable to our civilization. Fortunately, it is demonstrably not true.

Anyone who reads the newspapers knows that many hundreds of prominent men and women of all professions and occupations have indorsed Mr. Hoover's plan for feeding the occupied countries, with proper and stringent precautions against the diversion of food to German use. Are these numerous supporters of the plan, including such military and naval authorities as General John J. Pershing and Admiral William V. Pratt, to be proscribed as "stubborn helpers of Hitler," to cite Mr. Agar's charitable and temperate characterization of Mr. Hoover?

If it is absurd, in the light of the ascertainable facts, to represent the movement for relieving hunger in the occupied countries as a one-man enterprise, it is little short of contemptible to dismiss Mr. Hoover's motivations with the phrase: "He is merely an egotist who dislikes the Administration, dislikes the British, and loves to be world-important."

Now, as it happens, the organization for food relief which in the last war began under Mr. Hoover's direction in Belgium and occupied France and subsequently extended its operations, after the war, to Germany and Central Europe, finally bringing food to millions of Russian famine sufferers in 1921 and 1922, saved more lives than any other agency in recorded history. Is it not probable, in the light of this fact, that Mr. Hoover's present interest in European relief is motivated by the simple humane impulse to save life rather than by the petty considerations which Mr. Agar quite gratuitously attributes to him? Such a simple impulse is perhaps incomprehensible to armchair strategists who have worked themselves up to the point of believing that the issue of the war depends on withholding from hungry French children shipments of oatmeal and bananas. Fortunately, the majority of the American people are not yet living in an atmosphere so divorced both from reality and from humanity.

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Cambridge, Mass., March 22

Dear Sirs: "The Biblical figure is altered: men cry for freedom and are proffered bread." These words by Professor Van Dusen of the Union Theological Seminary sum up the danger, and the possible dishonor, of the Hoover cause. The words are taken from an article by Professor Van Dusen printed in the April 7 issue of Christianity and Crisis.

The opponents of the Hoover food plan are not "armchair strategists." They are upholding the policy of the British government, which has repeatedly rejected the Hoover plan as in effect a plan to lose the war. And they are upholding the policy of the American government, which has refused to join with Mr. Hoover in seeking to coerce the British government into breaking the blockade. I quote once more from Professor Van Dusen:

Careful reflection must lead to the realization that the British government would not have given their reply to the plan without weighing all ascertainable facts, and that they would not repeatedly have rejected it nor would fully informed American church leaders have opposed it unless it were certain that its adoption would strengthen Germany's military designs. The fact is, no food of any kind can be shipped from outside into occupied territory, no matter under what conditions or with what guarantees, without material assistance to the Axis war effort.

It is an interesting fact that none of the statesmen of the little democracies who have escaped from Hitler's slavery are in favor of the Hoover plan.

I admit that I flattered Mr. Hoover in describing his revolt against the foreign policy of the United States as a "one-man revolt." He has helpers, to be sure. But I doubt whether any of the helpers would have the stubbornness and the lack of humility to continue their private propaganda in the face of the rebuffs which Mr. Hoover has received from the British and the American governments. As for Mr. Hoover's motives, I still think his actions speak for themselves. He has advocated American collaboration, in the economic

Paine's Immortal Words

Dear Sirs: Thomas Paine's stirring words written at Valley Forge to instill hope and confidence in Washington's despairing soldiers are just as true today as when he first penned them. Liberty is now being hunted around the world as it was when Paine first wrote his "Common Sense." The United States should not only "prepare an asylum for her," but also an arsenal for her deliverance from the brutality of a fanatical tyrant.

I quote Paine's immortal words:

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.

They should be the clarion call for all liberty-loving people today as they were during the crisis of American independence.

No Concentration Camps

Dear Sirs: We are writing to call the attention of Nation readers to the establishment of a Washington office of the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born. The Washington office will be responsible for keeping all interested individuals and organizations informed of legislative developments as they affect the foreign-born and their democratic rights in this country.

Our first request is to ask readers of The Nation to communicate with their Congressmen voicing opposition to the Hobbs concentration-camp bill. This bill was reported favorably by the House Judiciary Committee six weeks ago without the holding of any public hearings —a decidedly undemocratic procedure in itself. It provides for detention and imprisonment—for life in some cases—of certain non-citizens ordered deported whose deportation, through no fault of their own, cannot be effected. The bill is expected to be before Congress shortly. We urge that Nation readers take immediate action on the measure.

The Shape of Things

LATE REPORTS INDICATE THAT THE IRAQ situation is becoming increasingly serious. The government of Rashid Ali Al-Gailani, which achieved power in a coup d'état a month ago, appears to control most of the country except the region around Basra, Iraq's only seaport. The British government insists it is within its treaty rights in sending troops to the country to protect its communications, and it will no doubt attempt to re-establish its grip on Bagdad and place in power a more amenable government. However, the clash comes at a time when it can ill afford to spare troops and equipment for the fairly extensive operations which may prove necessary to accomplish this end. Axis funds and encouragement are clearly behind Rashid Ali and his group of military and political supporters, and the Nazis are doing all they can to spur a general Arab revolt. However, this may not prove so easy despite unrest in Syria and Palestine. Ibn Saud, the most powerful Arab ruler, has given no sign that he is willing to support such a movement, while the Emir Abdullah of Transjordan will almost certainly remain faithful to his British alliance. Nor are the Indian Moslems likely to give any countenance to such attempts to cash in on present British difficulties. The great danger is that the Nazis might be able to send planes and air-borne troops to Iraq in sufficient numbers to provide a real stiffening for the Iraq army. That would be a difficult undertaking so long as the armistice conditions in regard to French-held Syria are observed, but this is a question on which Vichy may be persuaded to adopt an accommodating attitude. Altogether Britain is faced with an exceedingly awkward problem. It has been far too ready to take the fidelity of Iraq for granted and far too casual about combating activities of Axis agents.

THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER TO THE MARITIME Commission to assemble 2,000,000 tons of shipping to aid Britain in the Battle of the Atlantic raises hope that the shipping problem is at last being tackled with the energy it demands. Of course the Maritime Commission cannot create ships, but it can divert vessels used in coastwise or Great Lakes service to overseas service and, if necessary, transfer them to foreign registry. The Lake shipping available is unfortunately limited to ships that can travel through the present St. Lawrence canals. In the case of coastwise vessels the only problem is that of organizing rail traffic to care for the extra burden. The sixty-nine Danish, Italian, and German ships recently seized in our ports will be available as soon as Congress responds to the President's request for enabling legislation. The general practicability of the President's plan for a shipping pool to aid Britain is shown by the speed with which the Maritime Commission obtained the release of twenty-five tankers for British use, with promise of twenty-five more within a brief period. Although there has been no confirmation so far of the reported arrival of American ships at Suez, American supplies are known to be getting through to Egypt. This is, at least, a good start in the most crucial phase of defense and aid to Britain.

THE MAIN MILITARY LESSON TAUGHT BY THE Balkan débâcle is that local air superiority is absolutely essential for victory in any land campaign. Overwhelming German strength in the air shattered Yugoslavia's communications on the first day and prevented its armies from rallying at any point. Every account of the British retreat through Greece tells the same story. The Panzer divisions might have been stalled in the mountains, but incessant attacks from the air both on the troops themselves and on their bases and supply lines crippled the defense. Under the circumstances the extrication of a large part of the British expeditionary force was something of a miracle, as well as a demonstration of the continued effectiveness of sea power. This achievement merely tempers an undisguised defeat. Nevertheless, the outcome of the war in Greece does give reason for optimism, for it suggests that once Britain is enabled to turn the tables on Hitler in the air, it can turn them on land also.

THIS WEEK WASHINGTON WILL WELCOME the new Argentine Foreign Minister, Señor Ruiz Guinazau, who is on his way home from a visit in Spain. We may be sure politeness will mark his reception; the government knows how to honor distinguished official guests from the southern Americas. But it is to be hoped that ceremony will not overflow into exuberance. Señor Guinazau is a fascist. He is also an open admirer of the Axis. His stay in Spain was a series of tributes to the glories of the present dictatorship and the heroism of the Phalanx. If this attitude went unnoticed in the United States it echoed loudly in the press of Latin America. El País of Montevideo commented critically on the fact that "at the moment when Nazis and Fascists are directing their efforts toward Spain in order to involve it in the war, the Foreign Minister of a South American republic" should publicly pay the highest tribute to those elements in Spain which most vigorously support the Axis. The paper referred particularly to a speech of Señor Guinazau in which he praised Serrano Suñer, expressing admiration "for his political concepts and his clear vision." The press of Madrid, on the other hand, was unreserved in its praise of Señor Guinazau and of the Argentine as the "great Hispanic American nation, pride of the Hispanidad, which resists all kinds of foreign influence [a clear reference to inter-American cooperation] and demonstrates in itself the splendid work of the new Spain in the world [an equally clear reference to the fifth-column activities of the Phalanx in Latin America]." We should not be misled by this exchange of fascist felicitations; the majority of the Argentine people are pro-British and anti-Hitler. But in view of his recent activities in Spain, we think the visit of the Foreign Minister should be celebrated with becoming restraint.

HITLER'S ACCOUNT OF THE WAR TO DATE, delivered before the Reichstag last week, proves that the Nazis have introduced a new order in words if not in deeds. It was as perfect a study in reverse meanings as we have had from the inventor of the concept of "provocative defense." Hitler's portrait of Winston Churchill as an incendiary, a fanatic, a warmonger, a criminal, and a drunkard might be entitled Adolf Through the Looking Glass, with the reservation that Hitler drinks nothing weaker than power. "For over five years," said the Führer, "this man has been chasing around Europe like a madman in search of something that he could set on fire. Unfortunately, he again and again finds hirelings who open the gates of their country to this international incendiary." As for Hitler's story of how he waged peace on the Balkans and of his efforts to thwart the "bribed conspirators" who caused Yugoslavia to resist an arrangement which offered that nation the "greatest future conceivable," it must have brought tears of envy to the eyes of Goebbels. His speech seemed to be designed primarily for foreign consumption: he promised 100 bombs for every one the British drop in the war on civilians, for which Churchill is, of course, responsible; he denied threatening the United States and boasted that Germany could never be beaten. He made one promise, however, to the German people—another year of war and better guns with which to defend Utopia in reverse.

THE SUPREME COURT, IN PASSING ON THE case of Arthur W. Mitchell, Negro Congressman from Illinois, who was forced to move from a Pullman car into a Jim Crow coach as he neared the Arkansas border in 1937, performed the neat legerdemain of approving segregation by attacking discrimination against Negroes in the matter of accommodations provided. Justice Hughes, who delivered the decision, insisted that the issue was "not a question of segregation but one of equality of treatment." "Colored persons," he said, "who buy first-class tickets must be furnished with accommodations equal in comforts and conveniences to those afforded to first-class white passengers." The court thus gives indirect aid and comfort to those Southerners who rationalize their racial prejudice by asserting that the Jim Crow statutes "were enacted for the purpose of promoting the welfare, comfort, peace, and safety of the people of both races"—we quote the words of a group of Southern attorneys general who petitioned the court not to rule on Mitchell's appeal. In spite of the fact that the court in effect sanctioned segregation, Mr. Mitchell himself hailed the ruling as the first decisive step toward equal rights for Negroes "in my lifetime." The jubilation of Mr. Mitchell seems to us misplaced, though the practical effect of the decision may be to break down, if only a little, the existing structure of discrimination. The maintenance of equal Pullman accommodations for Negroes would mean a constant financial loss for the railroads, since so few Southern Negroes have the means to travel that way; and it is therefore quite possible that Mr. Mitchell may now ride in Pullmans undisturbed. If the railroads are required to provide equal accommodations in day coaches, where most people must travel, race discrimination may bow to economic considerations. But that is a long way round to the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Supreme Court has not helped matters by evading the issue.

FIRST-QUARTER EARNINGS PRESENT A MOST eloquent answer to the cries of anguish in financial circles over the "ruinous" increase in taxes, wages, and other costs of production. Figures from 176 companies show total profits for the quarter of $269,500,000 as against $218,000,000 in the corresponding quarter of 1940. This represents a gain of more than 23 per cent over last year's profitable operations. The largest of the industrial companies, the United States Steel Corporation, had a profit of $36,559,995, which was its largest since 1929 and more than double the figure for the same period last year. Bethlehem, General Motors, and some of the other large corporations did less well, but in each instance the profits were impressive as compared with pre-war earnings. These reports, it is true, do not take account of the new taxes to be levied this year or the recent wage increases that have been granted. But it should be noted that several of the larger corporations, including United States Steel, have set aside a general reserve to meet mounting taxes which is not included in the profit figures. Company officials estimated that the United States Steel wage increase will cost the corporation some $62,000,000 a year. This is $13,000,000 less than the corporation's "profit from operations" in the last quarter alone, before deductions. Despite Wall Street hysteria, business does not seem to be suffering from the defense emergency.

THE SALE OF DEFENSE BONDS HAS STARTED impressively without any of the objectionable features that characterized the Liberty Loan drives of 1917-18. There have been plenty of publicity stunts, radio programs, and other advertising devices, but no quotas have been set and no direct pressure has been brought on any individual to force him to buy a bond. The emphasis has been on general participation by the public rather than on the amount of bonds sold. Sales of the "baby bonds" are limited to $5,000 per person during a calendar year. Although the total volume of sales in these amounts can hardly make much of a dent in our national-defense costs, the Treasury is on sound ground in emphasizing sales to small holders rather than to wealthy individuals or to banks. It should help to hold down luxury expenditures and provide a much-needed cushion against post-defense deflation. And the restriction on sales to the wealthy should minimize the financial advantage that this group might otherwise obtain because of the urgent need for funds. As much as possible of the national-defense program should be financed by increased taxation, but since some borrowing is necessary the Treasury is to be commended for putting it on a thoroughly democratic basis.

JAN VALTIN, THE MAN WHO CAME OUT OF the night, seems to us entitled to stay out. As we go to press, his case is about to come up once more before the Ellis Island immigration officials, who will in turn pass their findings along to Washington for a decision. There is, in fact, no chance that the government will order Valtin back to Germany, where the authorship of his book would alone assure him a rendezvous with the headsman's block. But there are other unpleasant eventualities that may befall a man whom the government officially finds undesirable. He might be jailed until such time as the government could execute a deportation order without endangering his life. Even if he is permitted temporarily to remain at liberty, the threat of deportation, forever hanging over him, would leave him neither peace nor any possibility of planning for the future. Technically Valtin has no case. He was a member of a "subversive" group, and he reentered this country illegally after having been deported on the basis of a felony conviction. He makes no denial of these charges and appeals to the tradition of political asylum. We believe his position is sound. All his offenses stemmed directly from his membership in the Communist Party, and it is crystal clear that he no longer has any connection with this or any other "subversive" organization. He has, in fact, done a valuable service in exposing the methods of such groups, and it would be compounding cruelty with folly to penalize him again for political views that have already subjected him to the medieval tortures of Hitler's Germany.

✱

AT FIRST BLUSH IT MIGHT SEEM THAT WHAT this country needs least of all is a new committee. We have had committees to save democracy abroad, to promote democracy at home, to suppress democracy both at home and abroad. But until now there has been no promising national organization pledged to fight for freedom on both sides of the ocean. The Union for Democratic Action has been formed for just this purpose, and the enthusiasm with which its emergence has been greeted is a fair proof of the need. There can no longer be any question about the will of the majority of Americans to give England every aid, even at the risk of involving this country in the war. At the same time millions of Americans are fearful that our participation in the fight to check fascism in Europe will encourage reaction in the United States. In part this fear is well founded—the Dieses, the Coxes, the Hoffmans want nothing more than a chance to beat labor into submission in the name of patriotism; in part it is the carefully nurtured boggy of those who would frighten us with fascism here the more easily to establish it elsewhere. England, under the watchful eye of the British Labor Party, is fighting fascism abroad without succumbing to tyranny at home. We believe that the Roosevelt Administration similarly would fight a two-front war for democracy, but it cannot do so without organized mass support. The Union for Democratic Action is designed to strengthen its hand in just this way.

Control of the Air

THE heart of the majority report of the Federal Communications Commission on chain broadcasting lies in the statement, "The United States has rejected government ownership of broadcasting stations, believing that the power inherent in control over broadcasting is too great and too dangerous to the maintenance of free institutions to permit its exercise by one body, even though elected by or responsible to the whole people. But in avoiding the concentration of power over radio broadcasting in the hands of government, we must not fall into an even more dangerous pitfall: the concentration of that power in self-perpetuating management groups." The report shows that this is the very situation in which we find ourselves.

Stations affiliated with either NBC or CBS represent over 85 per cent of the total night-time power of unlimited-time radio stations in this country. In 1938 the 310 smaller stations not affiliated with any one of the four national networks had a consolidated net loss of $149,000, while the 350 stations belonging to one or another of the networks earned more than $19,000,000. Nearly half this income went to NBC, CBS, and the twenty-three large stations which they own or operate. NBC controls two of the national networks, the Red and the Blue. CBS has the other large network. The fourth, Mutual, is not only small but finds its possibilities of growth blocked by the long-term exclusive contracts which bind most of the important stations to NBC or CBS. The profits of NBC and CBS are enormous. In 1938, according to the findings of the Federal Communications Commission, NBC earned 80 per cent on its investment in tangible property, CBS 71 per cent. NBC earned more than $22,000,000 from 1926, when it was formed, until 1938, when its investment in tangible property amounted to $4,284,000. CBS earned $22,500,000 during the twelve years of its existence before 1928, in which year its tangible property was a shade less than $5,000,000. By investment in tangible property the commission means actual investment in property as distinct from such intangible items as good-will,

NBC, as a subsidiary of the Radio Corporation of America, is itself part of a vast combine which plays a dominating part in entertainment and communications. "RCA's control of thousands of patents, and its experience with and ownership of pre-broadcasting wireless transmitters, as well as its support from General Electric and Westinghouse, gave it a running start in the infant radio-broadcasting industry," the report says. Through its acquisition of the Victor Talking Machine Company, RCA became the leading phonograph and phonograph-record manufacturer. Through its own management bureau in NBC it controls many leading artists, "bargaining" with itself for their services. It occupies a powerful position in international radio communications and in the manufacture of all kinds of radio equipment. It has "a tremendous competitive advantage," the commission finds, "in occupying such newly opened fields as frequency-modulation (FM) broadcasting and television—an advantage which may, indeed, discourage newcomers in fields where RCA seeks to become dominant." Its subsidiary, the National Broadcasting Company, has among its affiliates one-fourth of the broadcasting companies of the country, using nearly half of the total night-time power. RCA itself has nearly 250,000 stockholders, none with as much as one-half of one per cent of the stock. Thus a self-perpetuating management runs this vast enterprise in manufacturing, entertainment, and communications, embracing films as well as the radio. And any attempt to curb its control over the ideas fed to the people of this country is deplored as an attempt to "destroy the American system of network broadcasting."

Many strange and undemocratic phenomena have been paraded before us in recent years as part of the "American system," but none more dangerous than this one. The spectacle is not made the more palatable by the fact that these great companies took over the nation's air waves without payment and pay no tax for their use other than the normal income and property taxes imposed on other enterprises.

The commission has promulgated a series of regulations designed to enable it to use its licensing power to put an end to these monopolistic practices. Radio-station licenses must be renewed yearly, and this is the rod which the commission holds in reserve to enforce its new rules. These rules are designed to end long-term exclusive contracts, to restore competition in the sale of programs to stations, and to prevent the great chains from controlling all the outlets in areas where no independent stations now exist. No doubt NBC and CBS will fight these rules in the courts. But it is clearly in the public interest that they be upheld and enforced. Control of news and opinion and entertainment over the air by two great chains is just as bad as a similar control of the nation's newspapers would be.

The Lag in Defense

DEFEENSE output is still lagging behind defense needs, and a great acceleration in tempo is required if production is to match the various appropriations made by Congress. An even greater effort will be essential, as the charts illustrating Fritz Sternberg's article on page 552 show, before the flow of arms for the democracies equals the production of the Nazis.

In the past week the President has moved to enlarge one industrial bottleneck—the manufacture and utilization of machine tools. His letter to Messrs. Knudsen and Hillman, directors of the Office of Production Management, points to "the urgent necessity of expanding and speeding up the manufacture of critical machine tools." Admittedly, output in this field has grown impressively during the past year, but, as the President says, "it is not enough." He urges, therefore, that machines should be put to work twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, subject only to the necessary time out for repairs. There are, he suggests, reservoirs of both skilled operators and machines outside the defense industries which await mobilization.

The facts revealed by I. F. Stone in last week's Nation and again on page 550 of this issue show that there is good reason for dissatisfaction with the present rate of defense production. The machine-tool industry itself is a long way from a twenty-four-hour schedule. The usual explanation by the employers is labor shortage, but Mr. Stone shows that there are still plenty of unemployed machinists. The industry suffers from a high labor turnover, which indicates poor working conditions and lends weight to his suggestion that one obstacle to an improved rate of operations is the disinclination of machine-tool manufacturers to recruit union-conscious workers.

We need not only more machine tools; we also need to see that existing ones are not kept idle or used for relatively unimportant purposes. A very large fraction of the nation's tool capacity is to be found in the automobile industry, which has received enormous contracts for armaments. But these contracts are mainly to be filled in new plants equipped with new machine tools. Meanwhile the automobile companies have been enjoying not merely business as usual but business better than usual, working almost to capacity on the manufacture of private cars. Only now have we an agreement for freezing design, applying not to 1942 but to 1943 models, and a restriction of output to the extent of a 20 per cent cut in this year's banner production.

We agree with Mr. Stone that Mr. Knudsen has been carried out of his depth in attempting to do the job assigned to him. No one denies that he is a production genius, but organizing the production of even so huge a corporation as General Motors is a very different thing from organizing the productive facilities of the nation as a whole. That calls for a very wide range of qualities: for a firm grasp of national economics, for imaginative insight into the actions and reactions of many industries, for a sympathetic understanding of labor problems. But above all it requires the ability and character to sweep the mind clear of preconceived notions.

Judged on such necessarily severe terms not only Mr. Knudsen but many of the other dollar-a-year men brought in to run the defense program have proved unequal to the ordeal. It is much to ask of a business executive, assigned the management of a section of OPM dealing with his own industry, to think nationally all the time and not to be influenced by some consideration—perhaps unconscious—of the welfare of his own industry and his own plant. Most business men have been thinking for years in terms of limited production, of achieving the most profitable balance between supply and demand. It is not easy for them to adjust themselves mentally to the idea of output stretched to the uttermost. Again and again able corporation executives working in Washington have failed to visualize the magnitude of the program on which they are engaged. The steel men protested against independent surveys calling for a great expansion in steel capacity; now they have to admit that the estimates of Gano Dunn, which they approved, are inadequate. It has been the same story with railroad cars and with aluminum and other vital materials. All too often the blinders of private interest have impeded the vision essential to the planning of any undertaking as vast as the defense program.

If Lindbergh Is Right

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IF CHARLES A. LINDBERGH is right and Hitler is indeed invincible, if the powers resisting Nazi aggression even backed by the full industrial and fighting strength of the United States are doomed to defeat, then the American future may as well be written off. For Lindbergh's happy faith that a victorious Germany will prove no threat to the United States is too silly to consider as an alternative. Indeed, the Japanese have gone out of their way to demolish it by publishing "peace terms" which show exactly what role the United States is cast for in the Axis order of tomorrow. It is possible, of course, that Mr. Lindbergh has reconciled himself to the modest niche allotted his country in the new cosmology of fascism. But it is more likely that he chooses to discount the terms published by the Japan Times Advertiser as merely the imaginative notions of an irresponsible editor. Unfortunately this is not true. The Times Advertiser is an organ of the Japanese Foreign Office, and it obviously reflects the views which the Foreign Minister, Mr. Matsuoka, brought home from his recent tour of Europe. And if there is any doubt in Mr. Lindbergh's mind concerning Mr. Matsuoka's attitude toward the Axis and the United States he might recall that three days before the terms were published the Foreign Minister, at a Tokyo mass-meeting in his honor, proclaimed his absolute confidence in an Axis victory and his conviction that Germany and Italy were working closely together "for the great common ideal of creating a millennium." So the proposed peace terms must be viewed as an official exposition of the sort of future the United States, as well as Britain, may expect if Lindbergh is right about Nazi invincibility.

According to those terms, the strongest powers, acting in conformity with "the law of nature," will have the greatest opportunities to develop the world and to determine spheres of influence, resources, and "type of government." The British Empire would be one of the powers permitted to "settle world peace," and so would the United States. But both Britain and the empire, in advance of the settlement, seem to have been conclusively disposed of. For South Africa and India would be made "independent," British possessions in the Pacific would "obtain increasing self-government" within the generous boundaries of Japan's "co-prosperity sphere," Africa would go to the Axis, and the United Kingdom, while remaining "the heart of the British Empire," would witness "a gradual transfer of authority to Canada," which would fall under the hegemony of the United States. Australia would be allowed to remain "within the British Empire" but would open its doors to Japanese settlement, and the naval bases of the empire, west and east, would be demilitarized. So much for old England.

The United States is not left out; we get our share of the swag whether we want it or not. Not only Canada. Our sphere of influence would include Central and South America, Newfoundland and Greenland, "with islands and regional waters." Perhaps Mr. Lindbergh only read that far. If so his complacency is easy to understand; those provisions might have been cribbed from one of his speeches. But there is a catch, whether he saw it or not. Let's read on: ". . . but the United States would undertake not to form hegemony over South America inimical to the Axis and would accord the fullest freedom and equality of opportunity to Germany and her allies in that continental brotherhood. No American naval bases would be west of Hawaii, and that stronghold would be reduced in importance." And after the Axis had attained parity with the United States and Britain, we would declare a naval holiday. That seems to mean that we would grant Hitler full hunting rights in Latin America—political as well as economic—having in advance divested ourselves of the military and naval strength to resist actual threats to the hemisphere. The earth, in short, and all that dwells therein would belong to Germany and Japan; they would be its masters, and other nations would lead an independent existence only by sufferance and within the limits laid down by the Axis. Our own effective limits would be the boundaries of North America, an area we would presumably share with Britain.

So with a few strokes the Japanese paint out Mr. Lindbergh's pretty picture of his country's future in a Nazi-controlled world. But did he ever really believe in his own creation? The fact is, Lindbergh tacitly recognizes the absurdity of his own hope of peace by insisting that the United States must build up an impregnable defense, in the air, on land, on the sea. Against whom? Against powers which have no designs upon us? No, quite evidently against powers which may want to attack us but will be afraid to do so after we are fully armed. Is that the idea? Perhaps, but if it is it leaks as badly as idea number one. For if the United States, in its present state of preparedness, plus the British Empire with its unconquered fleet, its fighting armies, and its vast resources, cannot defeat Hitler, surely it is difficult to believe that a year from now, or two, or five, the United States alone, however well equipped, will be able to defeat Hitler then in full control of the Continent and Africa and the resources of the British Empire—and in active alliance with Japan. If Lindbergh is right and Hitler is now invincible, our remaining hope lies in a future of civil war and revolution fought against desperate odds in every land around the globe.

But happily only a few Americans believe Lindbergh is right. A majority of the people and their elected officials and most political and military commentators believe, first, that a Nazi victory would create a monstrous threat to the security and independence of the United States and, second, that it can probably be prevented by the united and growing strength of the British Empire and the United States. The outcome is not sure in any case. Time works for Hitler. Hesitation and delay in this country can bring Britain to defeat, and it is a fact that our nation is not yet geared to Hitler's tempo. But we are moving faster every day. And we are determined to support Britain with whatever weapons prove most effective, with goods and ships—and with arms if need be. We reject, as dangerous nonsense, the alternatives offered by Mr. Lindbergh. And we reject our assigned role in Mr. Matsuoko's new order.

Ghost Towns and Defense

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

THE house suited the young mechanic fine. He was one of the lucky ones of the defense workers. He had hardly been born when the Emergency Fleet Corporation built the house late in 1918; destroyers were being as swiftly built in Bath then as they are now. The house and all the other houses like it cost too much, Congressmen said later. After the war nobody wanted them. The shipyards rusted and died. Maine boys coming home from school amused themselves throwing stones through the windows of the empty houses. Then a Maine man, paying pennies for the dollars they had cost, bought them from the government, and the Yankees round about thought he was cheated even so. He spent his time after that complaining about the schoolboys and his taxes. Now his houses are filled with shipbuilders like the young mechanic I visited. Other shipbuilders lacked houses—and not only in Maine, and not only shipbuilders. Defense workers slept on pool tables in Vallejo, in drafty, jerry-built resort cabins near Quincy, in tin huts and tarpaper shacks almost everywhere.

But in this arming there has been realization from the beginning that housing may be the measure of morale. And as long ago as last July a man was brought to Washington to make sense in shelter in the defense effort. He and the job are still there. The house of housing is at 1700 I Street. It is not one of the vast classic buildings which shelter the hordes busy with reform, recovery, and defense. It is one of the pleasanter old, red-brick mansions of Washington. I think it belonged to a Congressman of another day who would be amazed by the dimensions of the housing contemplated within it now. You walk up three oak flights to the office of Charles Forrest Palmer, Coordinator of Defense Housing. The room, just as it looks now with its blue leather furniture, its green baize table, its decorations of American flag and golden eagle, its dark-blue walls and cream-white ceiling, used to be in Atlanta, Georgia, where Mr. Palmer was both successful real-estate operator and builder of the first slum-clearance project in the United States financed with federal funds.

A few years ago, when most realtors in the Atlanta region were expressing themselves with regard to public housing entirely in terms of the profane and obscene, Mr. Palmer went with his Ford and movie camera to see what Europe and England were doing about public housing. He was impressed and brought back his films to impress others. In his office his blond secretary closed the Venetian blinds; an office associate set up the projection machine. We sat in the blue leather chairs and watched his pictures: the President looking at public housing in Georgia; old English couples in public-housing projects which nobody ever thought would be knocked down by bombs; housing in Mexico and also close at hand in the dark alleys of Washington. After the movies Mr. Palmer's secretary brought us mid-morning Coca-Colas after the fashion of the Georgians.

In the light I looked at him. He is a blond man of forty-nine, well-dressed, a pipe-smoker. He was born in Illinois, went to Dartmouth long enough to join the Deks there, sold real estate in San Diego, Santa Barbara, and Chicago, rode to the last war as a cavalry lieutenant, settled in Atlanta, and made money in office buildings. He seemed the proper product of the whole migration.

He began to be interested in slum clearance as an approach to business property, but his interest helped rid Atlanta, he says, of 25 per cent of its slums. He still believes that good housing is good business. And he thinks that in defense housing everybody should be happy on the job, the private builder and the public planner. There is plenty of room for all, and glory and profit for all, in the drive to put a roof over the head of the sergeant's wife and the steamfitter's children, to house the masses of men pulled from miles around to the places where the needs of modern defense have clotted the population.

Unfortunately everybody has not been happy. Mr. Palmer, however, looks serene still, even though it has sometimes seemed that he was made Coordinator of Defense Housing to be cussed at. He may deserve his share of the cussing. I think he does. But he seems to thrive on the alternating charges that too much housing construction is being allotted to private enterprise, and that the real-estate market is being ruined by public construction of homes for defense workers. Neither of these charges seems serious to me. The one important thing is to get the workers off pool tables and out of the back seats of jalopies and into beds. And in a hurry.

Mr. Palmer says that is being done. Private-residence building during a recent seven months' period, he said, was up 29 per cent over the same period last year in the whole country and up 150 to 200 per cent in some defense centers. At the same time the federal government has under construction, or in the final stages of land buying or contract negotiations, 75,000 dwelling units in 259 projects in 136 localities. That sounds excellent. I wish it seemed to me, after examination, as excellent as it sounds.

THE FEAR OF GHOST TOWNS

We Americans may not have prepared for war, but we had prepared for housing—presumably. At least there were in Washington, when the President delivered his defense message on May 16, 1940, the day the Germans advanced past Sedan on the way south, eleven different federal agencies concerned with housing in the United States. There had been more thinking about housing by experts on the public pay roll during the eight years before the President spoke than in the whole history of the country before the United States went to war in 1917.

Perhaps I expect too much in the way of quick results from a staff mobilized in peace before even the threat of war. I recognize that planning for cheap housing to last over a long debt-paying period is a very different task from planning for housing to be erected quickly to meet the needs of suddenly congregated men. There is no doubt about the need. I have seen it in twenty towns or more. But the fact is that on the anniversary of the day the Germans tried to drop a bomb on King Haakon of Norway (and darn near did it) the official tabulation of the Coordinator's office showed that for defense workers in essential private industry the government had provided only 1,691 dwelling units.

Funds, that April day, had been allocated for 23,980 more; 12,823 were under construction. In addition, around government posts and plants quarters had been provided for enlisted men and civilian employees of the army and navy to the extent of 5,070 living places. In process are ten times as many places for such low-income army and navy employees. But in process is not in being. To me as a newspaperman it seemed poor newspapering when Defense, the official weekly bulletin of the Office for Emergency Management, which alone stands between Mr. Palmer and the President, ran the headline "New Defense Housing Units Total 2,580 in One Week" over a story which actually said only that contracts to produce that number had been let in one week.

I think—and the figures show—that the situation is improving. Soon contracts let last fall will begin to mean completions, which are the only thing that means anything to homeless men. Also, Washington is beginning to learn from the ingenuity of the shelterless. Months ago the defense towns were crowded with trailers, and now trailers are being provided in new crowded towns by the Farm Security Administration. The officials have learned something about demountable housing, too, from seeing that a hen house on a farm today can be a cabin by a rising camp tomorrow.

A large part of the new private housing of which Mr. Palmer spoke—and a good deal of that is public housing so far as the source of capital for its construction is concerned—is built for sale, not for rent—though efforts are being made to encourage private housing for rent. What workmen need in the crowded defense towns is not a house to own but a chance to be a renter. In spite of all talk about high wages in defense industries, what they want and need is decent and livable housing for between $20 and $30 a month. That, "believe it or not," Mr. Palmer says, is all they can afford to pay in the towns and cities where they have swelled the population.

"We have no intention," he said, "of creating ghost towns or ghost sections by our defense construction." Other realtors, chambers of commerce, bankers rejoice in that declaration. The important thing, however, is that no houses in such possible future ghost towns be unloaded on defense workers; workers must not be required to buy in order to have a place to sleep. Mr. Palmer may have no intention of creating any ghost towns. He has the duty of seeing that housing is provided in towns where the hope of continuance of present industrial or naval or military activity will be slight if any peace like the old peace ever returns. In such cities manufacturers have refused to expand their plants without some government assurances about depreciation. Workmen in the same places certainly should not be left with houses which may become quite as obsolete in terms of proximity to future jobs. Defense housing should not be a doubtful speculation in home-ownership by the defense workmen themselves. That would certainly mean unloading the ghost towns on men out of jobs in them and unable to move away.

Mr. Palmer does not like rent-control legislation. It proved impracticable, he says, in this country during the last war and is giving Canada trouble today. Obviously, however, when so large a part of the defense of a whole country and the money that goes with it are concentrated in a hundred-odd towns, the law of supply and demand in housing may cease to be economically just and become both ravenous and ridiculous. Ghost towns are no more to be feared than grab towns.

HOUSING NEEDED. NOT NOW BUT YESTERDAY

One thing indicated by this fear of future ghost towns is that in spite of Mr. Palmer's title of coordinator there has been slow growth in real coordination. Not until late in March did the National Defense Advisory Commission seem to see that the selection of defense centers was a part of planning for shelter. Before that sometimes both the army and navy seemed to act as if they wanted to see how hard they could make the housing problem. Little towns were overwhelmed by their decisions, and the capacities of bigger towns were stretched to amazing proportions. Chester Davis, before he left the National Defense Commission, made public protest against a concentration of contracts which seemed to him a dangerous neglect of the country's human and other resources. But if defense work is started, as it often must be, in places where few workers live, its wages are bound to bring in the people. Housing for them comes afterward.

Possibly the pressures could not have been avoided. But at a time when the country has been aware of defense strikes and the President himself has spoken sharply about jurisdictional disputes, some of the most serious jurisdictional disputes have taken place in Washington itself and in his own government. Some people there refer to housing as the classic example. The Coordinator builds no houses. His very title—one which is becoming increasingly popular in Washington—expresses his duty to bring together diversity, to harmonize the various existing housing agencies. But that means harmonizing not only housing but housers, ambitions, people. Few agencies in government are ever abolished. When their conflicts get entirely out of hand they are coordinated. And from within, the process of being coordinated looks like a fight for life.

There have been no picket lines deployed by one housing agency against another. But almost everybody in Washington interested in housing is aware of the terrific struggle—involving the United States Housing Authority, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Defense Homes Corporation of the RFC, the Public Buildings Administration, the Farm Security Administration, the Navy Department, the Federal Housing Administration, and the Defense Commission—over who should build what housing. Palmer came into that situation and, some say, participated in the struggle for the power and the glory. Some say John M. Carmody, the Federal Works Administrator, was in the fight up to his armpits. Admirals were angry, and coordinators and administrators were jealous. There has been attempted sabotage of personalities if not of housing. And none of it has done housing any good.

The quarreling has not been limited to the officials. In some strange way housing has seemed the almost perfect vehicle for carrying old quarrels into the new crisis.

A good many realtors still do not like public housing, and a good many public-housing advocates do not like a fairly common type of realtor. Outside the housing field itself the quarrel spread. The fight over public housing in Quincy, Massachusetts, for instance, where the contending parties were led by the C. I. O.'s Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers, saying housing was needed, and the Chamber of Commerce, saying it was not, was not simply a quarrel between the house owners and the house needers. It was connected with a new contest for strategic advantage in this automotive age.

The number of automobiles in America has multiplied more than ten times since industrial expansion began with Allied orders before the first World War. This has relieved the pressure in towns. It means that men can go a long way from Bethlehem Steel's Fore River shipyards to sleep. And that suits Bethlehem Steel splendidly since it disperses them not only far from the gates of the yard but also far from the little house near the yard gates where the C. I. O. has its organizers. Once employers wanted their villages for domination; now unions find organizing easier when workers' houses are congregated close to big plants. Both sides discuss housing as housing and not as an item in the strategy of industrial conflict, but they seek to turn it to their purposes all the same.

Mr. Palmer says: "Our only prejudice is in favor of whatever will give us enough adequate housing in the quickest time." That is, I think, a proper prejudice for a man in his job. But he keeps on talking, in all his speeches—and certainly not he alone—about the future after this unpleasantness. About what Holland did after the last war (where are those houses now?). About plans for a better-housed, better land here. About people under an "enlightened capitalism," snug against all storms. About communities planned against community blight. About realtors grown wise and good, landlords we can love, builders who will bless us. After reading him, I am never sure whether Mr. Palmer is a realtor or a reformer, or a little of both. But I think as a realist with only one prejudice he has got to shake equal hell out of realtors and reformers if he wants to get on with this immediate job before he comes to that next and perhaps pleasanter one.

Men are still sleeping in shacks beside important jobs. They need houses quickly, houses they can rent—not buy—and rent at levels low enough to prevent the siphoning off of war wages in war profiteering. That is essential to any productive push in war industry. It is essential now to America. We shall not make a lovelier, sweeter land unless we can protect the one we have. I take Mr. Palmer at his word in defense housing: "More housing is needed. Not now, but yesterday."

Afterward we can begin to plan about tomorrow.

Mr. Knudsen's State of Mind

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 1

MR. KNUDSEN symbolizes business as usual, and he has placed men like himself in the key subordinate positions of defense. This is true in machine tools. The National Industrial Conference Board's Economic Review for April 24 reports that the defense plant-expansion program already calls for the construction of more than 1,300 new plants to cost $2,750,000,000. All these plants have to be equipped with new machinery, and the machinery must be made with machine tools. This program looks toward the supply of a 2,000,000-man army, and, huge as that seems, plans for a 4,000,000-man army are already being discussed in Administration circles. German industry is geared to provide arms for an 8,000,000-man army. These figures give one some idea of the tremendous expansion in prospect for our comparatively small machine-tool industry.

Machine tools, as Secretary Knox said the other day, are the "critical item" in the expansion of defense production. It is well known that there are many machine tools outside the machine-tool industry. Yet Mr. Knudsen, though Secretary Morgenthau assigned him to coordinate machine-tool production eleven months ago, has never taken the obvious step of ordering a survey of machine-tool capacity. The dollar-a-year men he has drawn from the machine-tool industry to run our machine-tool program are hostile to the idea of letting the business out of their hands. I told last week how Mr. Knudsen had permitted the wishes of the automobile manufacturers to prevail over the needs of defense. He has allowed the wishes of the machine-tool industry to dominate production of machine tools. When the research division of the defense setup suggested a survey of machine-tool capacity last year, it was ordered to keep hands off, because "this was being taken care of" by the machine-tool division. The other day I asked A. B. Einig, assistant chief of the Machine Tools Section of the OPM—he comes from the Motch and Merryweather Machinery Company—whether his section was making such a survey. "We're making them all the time," was Mr. Einig's answer. But when I asked whether he had any figures on the machine-tool capacity in the automobile industry and the extent to which it might be diverted to defense production, he said I'd have to "ask the automobile people." Mr. Knudsen is one of the "automobile people." I asked about the machine-tool capacity in the radio-manufacturing industry. Philco, in Philadelphia, for example, has a first-rate machine-tool shop of its own which has been making machines to manufacture violet-ray toilet seats, not the most pressing of defense items. "We're taking care of that sort of thing," said Mr. Einig, "by shutting off their supply of materials." It did not seem to occur to him that he might take care of it by giving Philco defense work to do. With a few exceptions, machine-tool builders, whether dollar-a-yearing in Washington or working in their plants, are humanly uninterested in sharing their orders with other business men. They have expanded their plants and want to keep them busy as long as possible.

I have been trying for two weeks to make a survey of my own, and I think I have uncovered enough to show that the men in charge of the OPM are still very far from an "all-out" effort in this field. I found first of all that even our machine-tool builders are not working at capacity. According to a study of Week-End Shutdowns in Defense Industries in the March issue of the Monthly Labor Review, a publication of the Department of Labor, "plant capacity" in eleven major defense industries "was not being utilized to any great extent beyond a single shift per day." This includes machine tools. The record of machine tools in this respect seems a little better than the average, but not much. Of forty-five machine-tool plants covered by the survey, two were on one shift, twenty-nine on two shifts, fourteen on three shifts. But in the plants operating two shifts, less than 20 per cent of the workers were employed on the second shift. In the plants working three shifts, less than 25 per cent were on the second shift and less than 8 per cent on the third shift. I found government officials familiar with the problem afraid to talk of it for fear of getting into trouble with the machine-tool dollar-a-year men. One said that he thought production of machine tools could be stepped up 40 per cent in a few months by going on a twenty-four-hour shift, with a five-three-one ratio, which he felt was the most efficient. That is, the second shift would have three-fifths as many workers as the first and the third one-third as many as the second. This seems moderate and reasonable enough.

Officials with whom I talked at the A. F. of L.'s Machinists' Union advanced several explanations for this failure of the industry to work at full capacity despite the enormous demand for machine tools. One is that the builders hate to pay any more overtime than necessary. Another is that it takes a more attractive wage rate to make men work "the graveyard shift." These union officials felt that the shortage of skilled labor for twenty-four-hour operation could be taken care of by releasing skilled men now employed in the tool-and-die shops of private industry. These industries don't like to give up their skilled men and keep many of them working in ordinary production jobs. Wages aren't high enough to attract the thousands of skilled journeymen whom insecurity of employment drove into other occupations during the past decade. The A. F. of L. men seemed to think that one of the major obstacles was connected with the problem of unionism. The machine-tool manufacturers, the main support of the notorious Metal Trades Association, have generally been strongly anti-union, and most of the industry is open shop. "They have built up a docile non-union labor force over past years," one A. F. of L. official said, "and are afraid that new men may bring in new ideas, particularly the idea of organizing a union." They prefer when necessary to work a certain amount of overtime rather than to hire new men for additional shifts.

A Bureau of Labor Statistics study recently released dealt with estimated labor requirements for the machine-tool industry under the defense program. It covered plants which employed 22,206 wage-earners in January, and though it disclosed a comparatively small percentage of discharges, it showed a high percentage of turnover because so many men quit their jobs. In the last half of 1940 about 6,000 men had quit their jobs in these plants. This indicates poor labor conditions. The survey also disclosed that while there would soon be shortages of labor in some lines, there was still a large reservoir of jobless skilled machinists. The survey examined figures of the United States Employment Service records as of last December 28 and compared the number of skilled men in various lines seeking jobs with the estimated additional number of men which would be required by the industry this year. Of eleven categories of skilled machinists, there were prospective shortages in four but surpluses of jobless in the other seven over the estimated additional men required. Thus there were 5,217 drill-press operators out of work as compared with an estimated additional requirement this year of 875.

This labor survey also reveals the failure of the machine-tool industry to ease pressure by subcontracting. The Bureau of Labor Statistics found that in the last quarter of 1940 subcontracting ("in the sense that a given plant, finding its productive capacity overtaxed, seeks outside assistance in the fabricating of parts or whole units that normally could be processed in its own shop") amounted to only about 22 per cent of machine-tool production. Yet our economy has huge areas of unused machine-shop capacity which could be tapped immediately by subcontracting. I spoke with one minor OPM official who has just returned from a tour of the machine shops in the Southwest which formerly serviced the oil industry and now have little work because of government curtailment of oil production. There are many other industries which can make parts of machine tools or machine tools as a whole. "Interesting examples of such adaptations," the report says, "are firms ordinarily engaged in the manufacture of rugs, printing presses, and shoe machinery that are now, under license, building complete machine tools on a subcontract basis. Many other manufacturing industries are known to be making parts which are finished and assembled in the plants of the primary machine-tool companies." I was told by tool-and-die workers in Detroit that Mr. Knudsen's own industry is one of the best-equipped to make tools for defense and that it could do so if it gave up new models and turned its present tool-and-die equipment to this task.

Machine tools are made with machine tools. It is true that the modern machine-tool industry, highly specialized, uses some very complicated special-purpose machines. But in a fire, if one cannot find a hose, one uses a bucket. It may be less efficient, but the house may burn down while one writes to a mail-order firm for a brand-new hose. Industry in this country has an enormous reservoir of machine tools that could be used for the manufacture of machine tools. The 1940 survey of machine tools by the American Machinist showed more than 1,323,000 machine tools in industry. Almost 200,000 of these were in the automobile and automobile-parts industries. I was told by a government official engaged in studying the problem that the machine-tool industry at the beginning of this year had about 25,000 machines. The productivity of these machines is, of course, very high, and a mere quantitative comparison may be misleading. What these figures do show is that our machine-tool bottleneck is, as it were, above the ears. It is not like the aluminum bottleneck, which must wait on plant expansion. The machine-tool bottleneck can be eased at any time by a willingness to subordinate business as usual, by emergency methods of production and procurement, by an expansion of subcontracting. Those industries, like automobiles, which crowd their production into part of the year could make many machines available for machine-tool and other work if their present production were spread evenly over the year.

In this respect the problem of speeding production of machine tools is little different from the problem of speeding production of ordnance or planes or tanks. The obstacles are in large part psychological. They spring from the unwillingness or inability of men of the Knudsen type to break away from the habitual and the more profitable way of doing business. It is this state of mind which has stifled what I believe to be the most promising movement in American life toward a true unity and a full mobilization of our resources for defense production. I will tell about that next week.

Our Lost Time

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

Drawings by Harry Roth

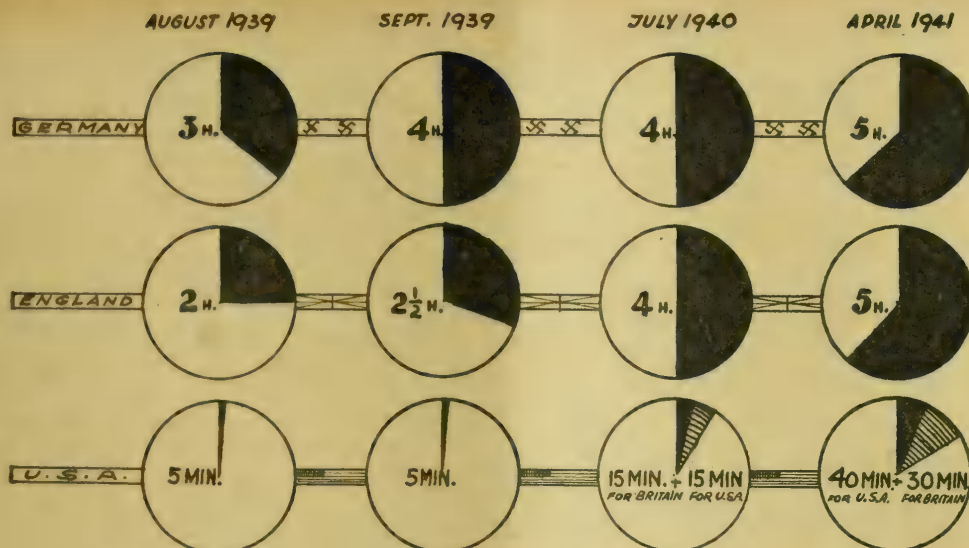

AT THE start of the Second World War Germany had a twofold advantage over its adversaries: it had been turning out great quantities of war materials long before hostilities broke out, and it had ready carefully worked-out plans which enabled it to adapt its peace-time industries to full war production almost overnight. Practically all German automobile plants produced tanks, planes, and military trucks even before the outbreak of war. At the same time they were making a large number of motor cars, measured by German standards. When the war started, all output of automobiles for private consumption was immediately halted. But the automobile factories did not remain idle. All of them were in a position to shift to the production of planes, tanks, and army trucks at a moment's notice. It was the carefully planned reorganization schemes of the German Economic General Staff, worked out before the outbreak of the war, that enabled German tank and plane production to be increased with such startling speed.

In Great Britain, on the other hand, such plans and preparations were virtually non-existent. Chamberlain actually boasted that British armaments production, which was gradually geared up after Munich, hardly interfered with the British economy at all. Automobile production for private consumption continued in Britain after the outbreak of the war; indeed, it continued even under Churchill and after the retreat from Dunkirk. Not until October, 1940, more than thirteen months after the war began, was the production of automobiles for private use prohibited in Great Britain. British automobile plants took that long to complete the necessary adjustments for airplane and tank production. In Canada production of private vehicles was halted on February 15, 1941. During the months after the belligerent countries ceased to produce cars the American output boomed. And no reduction of the American manufacture of automobiles for private consumption is contemplated until August 1, 1941.

It is not surprising, therefore, that American war-plane production was so slow getting in motion and that, although it is now increasing every month, it is still small as compared with what this country could do, and still inadequate to cope with the peril threatening us.

Just as American automobile production could be adjusted to war production, so industry as a whole could be adjusted to the manufacture of war material. The first picture on the next page assumes that the total population of each country works eight hours a day; thus labor

Portion of eight-hour working day devoted to the production of war materials requiring one hour is the equivalent of one-eighth of the daily national production. As early as August, 1939, Germany was working about three hours a day for defense, while Britain was working only two, and shortly after the outbreak of the war Germany was devoting half of its labor, that is, four hours a day, to armaments. During the same period, August and September, 1939, the American people were devoting only about five minutes a day to defense. At the present time German war production takes up about five hours a day, as does the British. Also in the United States there has been a considerable increase. After Dunkirk America devoted about thirty minutes a day to war production, of which about fifteen minutes were devoted to United States defense and fifteen minutes to supplies for Britain. The Lend-Lease Act, it is hoped, will double our effort in behalf of Britain in the next few months. At present we are working one hour and ten minutes for defense purposes, of which thirty minutes are devoted to aid for Britain. Yet in order to meet even half the industrial requirements of this war, we must give at least two hours' work for defense—one hour for the United States and one hour for Britain.

Estimating the number of working hours spent on war production is merely another way of estimating the cost of war and defense. The picture below illustrates the fact that German military expenditures, which amounted to about $1 billion a month at the beginning of the war, have today risen to $2 billion (taking the tribute paid by the occupied regions at about $400 million), and that British expenditures, which at first were about half the German, have risen to about $1.6 billion.

American military expenditures, which were less than $100 million a month when the Second World War broke out, rose to about $200 million in July-August, 1940, and to about $500 to $600 million in December-January, 1940-41. According to President Roosevelt they will run a little under a billion in the coming fiscal year. But they are likely to exceed this amount by far and, with aid to Britain included, to run about $2 billion a month.

Underground in France

BY LOUIS DOLIVET

NEVER did a border seem more unnatural to me than the unique artificial frontier, the ligne de démarcation, which divides France. It was as if a body had been cut in two. I traveled by bicycle from Agen, capital of Lot and Garonne—one of the few rich departments in unoccupied France—to this frontier. After crossing the bridge over the Garonne, guarded on both sides by gendarmes, I pedaled fifty miles on a splendid but completely deserted road. Only once did I meet an automobile—an open car filled with German officers attached to the German Armistice Commission which controls all France. I met it near a small farm. As the Boches passed, the farmer, who was working near the road, looked the other way. Then he turned toward me and moved his head slowly up and down, a bitter smile on his lips. In the afternoon I reached the demarcation line.

On one side were a few French gendarmes, on the other a much larger number of German sentries. On both, men and women were standing and looking over to the other side. They had all belonged to the same village until the armistice separated France into "occupied" and "unoccupied" territory. After standing with them, looking and waiting, for some time, I went to find the man who was to get me across the line. It wasn't easy to locate him. First I went to a farm that I had been told about and there found a man who took me to another farm. At nightfall I was led to a third farm where I waited till early dawn. In six months of occupation these peaceful farmers had developed a surprisingly effective technique of underground work. They seemed to enjoy helping someone do something without German authorization.

After dinner the head of the family looked impatiently at his watch. At eight o'clock he locked the door and turned the dials on his radio to find the French broadcast of the B. B. C. When a French voice came on the air, the whole family, even the children, listened in tense silence. From time to time someone whispered a question but was immediately silenced by the others. About half the broadcast was inaudible because the Germans were jamming the air waves.

At three o'clock the farmer woke me up and we went out, zigzagging through the woods and keeping under cover. At one point we had to cross a road which was patrolled by Germans. My companion heard them in the distance and pushed me behind a tree. We waited breathlessly till they had gone by; then like rabbits we ran across the road, and I found I had arrived in occupied France.

Later I returned from occupied to unoccupied France by the same route. On both sides of the line I found political activity becoming a part of most men's daily life. Before the defeat of France the bistro, or cafe, was the center of political discussion, and it was there that the agents of the political parties did most of their work. Now the men who gather there are silent, for many arrests have been made among both proprietors and patrons. In the bistros that I visited, old friends concealed any surprise at seeing me again, and the only sign I had of their interest was the firmness of their hand-clasp. But when we were safe in some farmer's kitchen they spoke with great bitterness about the crimes of fascism and the fatal stupidity of our foreign policy before the war, and uttered a thousand recriminations against their daily misery. There was also a new decisiveness in them, and the old fire blazed in their eyes when they spoke about the revolt which one day would sweep the Nazis out of France.

I made inquiries of various persons, former party secretaries and presidents of local groups, to find the remnants of the political parties. In the old sense of the word, political parties have disappeared. In their stead I found a multitude of new movements, working in secret but extremely active. There were, for example, the Jacobins, the Union for Free France, the Workers' Democratic Revolutionary Union, and the Free Masons. The main purpose of all these groups is to carry on the fight against fascism; never was France more anti-fascist than it is now. They are also vitally interested in the connected problems of social reorganization, economic democracy, Continental union, and world organization. "If we risk our lives to sabotage the German war machine," they asked me, "will England and America make a really better world or shall we have the same old world again?" Every sign of planning for a new world order and for sound peace aims arouses immense interest. A young engineer working in a railroad repair shop said to me, "We're all against Hitler in every way. But if it is for the old order that we fight, we will oppose him half-asleep. If it is for a really democratic world, then we will fight wide-awake and smash him to bits."

In September, 1940, the French people began to come out of the terrible stupor of resignation with which they had accepted the armistice terms, and a political awakening spread through the country. This started in the workers' movements, which had all along offered the chief resistance to the German and French fascist leaders. The only way they could have been won over was to give them freedom of action and good living conditions, but the New Order could hardly be expected to grant either of these. To understand the strength of the workers' resistance, it is necessary to recall the structure of French trade unionism. The most powerful organization in France before the war was undoubtedly the General Federation of Labor, with a membership of five million made up of from 60 to 70 per cent of all wage-earners in the vital industries—metallurgy, mines, and textiles; in the public service—postal, railroad, dock and state employees; and in the educational field. Aside from their defense of the professional and wage interests of the workers, the trade unions considered the defense of democratic principles one of their chief functions. On February 11, 1934, six days after the fascist attempt to seize power, they launched a general strike throughout the country to stop fascism, and after the war started they fought every attempt to set up a dictatorship in France.

After the armistice both the Germans and the Pétain government, using different methods of approach, tried to win the support of the trade unions, or at least to neutralize their activities. The Germans organized immediately a special trade-union department under the leadership of Abetz, assisted by a few members of the German Workers' Front. With typical German system but without any understanding of the underlying political problems, they divided the leading elements in the French trade-union movement into three categories. The first was made up of venal elements, deserters from Socialist and Communist ranks, who could be bribed, and the group writing for the Paris paper La France au Travail. The second category was made up of pacifists, those who had opposed collective security and supported the appeasement policy of Georges Bonnet. This group publishes a paper called l'Atelier. At its head is Georges Dumoulin, former secretary general of the Northern Trade Union Federation, with headquarters at Lille; another of its leaders is André Vigne, secretary general of the important Coal Miners' Union. The third category included the Christian Trade Unions and the Fascist Trade Union of Doriot and De La Roque. Different arguments designed to appeal to each of these groups were methodically worked out.

For the first, money was the most powerful argument, and the Germans were not sparing in their use of it; but they won over few persons of any authority. The French workers have always required absolute financial integrity of their leaders. Before the war labor leaders who received funds from the Foreign Office had very little influence, and today those known to have the financial support of the Germans have even less. The argument advanced to the second group was that the German authorities would be willing to grant almost complete freedom to those trade-union leaders who had opposed the war. Abetz told them that they were the natural representatives of the policy of French-German cooperation, that Germany would not interfere with the principles of trade-union organization if they would advocate political cooperation. Moreover, the German authorities would aid them in the systematic destruction of Communist influence among the workers.

Just the opposite argument was used with the Communist elements. They were told that the German Reich, bound to Soviet Russia by the famous pact, was not hostile in principle to the work of Communists—in countries other than Germany. French Communists had, therefore, a unique chance to denounce the French and British bourgeoisies, to put the responsibility for the war and the defeat on them, and to fight the moderate elements which advocated cooperation with the democracies.

The Catholic trade unions of the third group were told that the Marxist influence in the workers' movement would be abolished, and that this was sufficient reason for them to support "collaboration." The small fascist unions did not need to be convinced; they accepted German orders without discussion.

Nevertheless, the German penetration in the ranks of the French workers is negligible. Every attempt to create a so-called "atmosphere of understanding" has been defeated by the very strong political traditions of the French workers, and even more by the compelling facts of daily life under German domination—the deterioration of the living conditions of the workers.

The approach of the Vichy government was different. Marshal Pétain thought it would be a masterly stroke to nominate a trade-union representative as a member of his Cabinet. This would satisfy the workers, he thought, but could scarcely strengthen their position in a government of military leaders, great industrialists, and bankers. Accordingly he nominated René Belin, former assistant secretary of the General Federation, to be Minister of National Production and Work. But Pétain failed to realize that Belin had always represented a minority, and that the workers were too wise to accept a policy opposed to their interests just because it was suggested to them by a man belonging to their ranks. Belin moved directly against the workers' movement by dissolving the General Federation and confiscating nearly all the property the organization had acquired over a period of fifty years through the efforts of all the workers. To prevent the workers from organizing a fight against this measure, he also dissolved the Confédération Générale du Patronat Français and the Federation of Christian Trade Unions. The opposition of the workers was so strong, however, that the Vichy government did not have the courage to dissolve the local trade unions, which still exist, though without the right to form a national organization. These local trade unions remain important factors in France. The attempt of the Pétain government to win the support of the labor movement has failed, just as the German attempts have failed in occupied France. The workers are keeping strictly to themselves, however, and are doing everything in their power not to compromise themselves with the German or French authorities.

Their resistance has two aspects—passive and active. The workers do not participate in demonstrations of any kind in favor of Pétain or the other leaders of the new government, and they refuse to join any political or social organization of the new government. Thus they are making it impossible for the Vichy government or fascist leaders in occupied France to build up mass support. At the same time they are organizing a very effective information service, spreading the news from English and American radios and other sources by word of mouth and sometimes distributing pamphlets. After October, 1940, when it became evident that the Germans did not dare to invade Great Britain, hundreds of "resistance groups" sprang up all over the country. These are made up of four or five men working with great caution, in contact with other groups through one man only; so that no treachery can cause mass arrests. These groups have planned and put through an increasing number of acts of sabotage. No French or other correspondent has reported the following incidents:

In Lille a hundred truckloads of ammunition and machines ready to be sent to Germany were blown up. Unable to discover the saboteurs, the German authorities decided to punish the workers by imposing a large cut in wages. A delegation of twenty workers was sent to inform the civil and military German authorities that the workers refused to accept this decree and that they threatened a general strike in Lille. The German in command ordered the delegation to obey the orders of the occupation government; when they refused and the agitation increased, he gave orders that all members of the delegation should be executed. This kind of "discipline," however, failed to stop daily acts of sabotage in that region.

At Chartres the telephone lines to the German-controlled airdrome were cut. For this a fifteen-year-old boy, who refused to give the names of his coworkers, was sentenced to death, but a strong demonstration, principally by women, before the headquarters of the German general obtained a promise from him that the boy would not be executed. It is not known whether the general kept his promise.

The town of Nantes was fined five times, nearly nine million francs in all, to pay for sabotage on railroad and telephone lines and in factories, but the solidarity of the saboteurs was so great that not a single one was discovered.

In unoccupied France, not far from Marseilles, 200 railroad cars filled with ammunition for Germany were blown up. Traces of this explosion can still be seen in the many demolished buildings near the railroad station. The French, German, and Italian authorities who were guarding the station were unable to prevent this very systematically prepared act of sabotage.

The French workers will not fight for a return of the old order. They desire the defeat of Hitlerism but if they are to fight for it, they must know something more about peace aims. Violent discussions of this subject have been carried on by the Communists and Socialists in the French workers' movement. After the armistice Communist propaganda was directed, in the main, toward a social revolution and against "world plutocracy," with no reference to fighting the invader. However, after four months of Nazi occupation public feeling had mounted so high that the Communists began to attack the Germans. But at the same time they attacked British capitalism, suggesting that for the workers there was little choice between the two evils. This attitude found scant sympathy among the workers. Since the end of November, and especially since the beginning of this year, the Communists have been supporting, to some extent, General de Gaulle's movement—it is difficult to say whether this was a spontaneous move on the part of the rank and file or suggested by national or international leaders. It was after they took this position that a number of prominent Communists were arrested in occupied and unoccupied France.

The majority of the workers are convinced that a better social order will result from a victory of the democracies, that they will then be able to make fundamental changes in the social structure and move toward an economic democracy. The influence of the British trade unions has immensely increased in France, and men like Bevin have great popularity among the workers. In their discussions they frequently stress the point that a man coming from the workers' ranks has been able to play a great rôle in the war and that he has been more competent than many representatives of the ruling classes. They believe that the British trade-union movement will be able to keep, and even to increase, its power after the war, and that this fact will greatly help the workers in other countries. Many believe that sooner or later Soviet Russia will come in on the side of the democracies. It is a weakness of British propaganda that very few trade unionists speak in the French broadcasts of the B.B.C. or even from the American short-wave station in Boston. Also, the words "democracy" and "independence" have too general a meaning to rouse the workers in occupied countries, and the use of such vague terms does not help to clarify the aims or strengthen the cause of the democracies.

The Odds on Maverick

BY CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

San Antonio, May 21

THE mayoralty term to which Maury Maverick was elected two years ago is coming to an end. His administration has been mildly liberal, not at all radical; mainly honest and enlightened. This is so marked a departure from San Antonio's usual corruption that one would think his reelection would be practically unanimous. It will not be. Maverick bears the liberal taint, and many of the powers that be in San Antonio frankly prefer conservatism and corruption. For the two years of his term as mayor Maverick's foes have harassed him every step of the way. But Maverick is both resourceful and courageous, and he is fighting a strong campaign for reelection on May 13.

A year ago his reelection looked quite impossible. The newspapers of the city groaned when Maverick re-acquitted, but his prosecutors had partially succeeded in their main object, which was simply to harass him and hamper his administration as much as possible.

Next Maverick made what turned out to be a serious political error. He already had some friends in the courthouse, notably the sheriff and the tax assessor, and in the primary campaign last summer he set out to capture all the county offices. But the Mayor was in bad political odor, and his campaign was poorly organized. His forces not only failed to gain any new county office but lost those they already held. Every one of the Maverick candidates was overwhelmingly beaten. The whole campaign was an ignominious failure.

His enemies were happily sure that Maverick's career was at an end, and a good many of his friends thought so, too. But Maverick had in fact struck bottom. He started rebuilding his organization. At the same time the good work of his administration, which he had managed somehow to get done between court trials and political fights, began to show results. Though the newspapers had howled at the alien police chief, the evidence was too plain to deny that he was doing a good job. The potbellied officers on the streets were replaced by younger, upstanding men; and the statistics bore out the story of a revitalized police department. The health department was thoroughly overhauled; the tax department made a long overdue survey of real-estate values. The prostitutes that had thronged the streets during the Quin regime were persuaded to move to less conspicuous quarters. All this was merely good government, not especially liberal and certainly not spectacular. The only thing about the whole record that even the most bitter could call radical was the Communist meeting, and that was receding into the background.

Maverick's stock picked up a little. The rising movement, once started, was helped along by a chain of four important developments. The first was the restoration of a section of the city called La Villita, which contains some interesting old houses. Maverick obtained financial help from the Carnegie Foundation and the National Youth Administration, and set out to make La Villita a pan-American center and a workshop for teaching trades and crafts to the Mexican youth of San Antonio. This restoration project has attracted international attention. Brazil, for example, is furnishing Caxias House, named for one of its heroes, and Mexico has presented a heroic statue of Hidalgo. The Bolivar Building will be a pan-American library and museum. The army chiefs of Latin modeled the mayor's office. They cried out when he had the city buy an official car—and they chortled when the car caught fire and was damaged. They howled when he hired a professionally trained police chief from Illinois, an alien and a damyankee to boot. But all this was nothing to the sport the boys had when they drove Emma Tenayucca and her Communist cohorts out of the Municipal Auditorium. When Emma Tenayucca asked for the permit, Maverick courageously gave it to her—on the obvious ground that the Constitution of the United States grants civil liberties even to those who abuse them. But not many people in San Antonio appreciated either his courage or his zeal for the Constitution.

That commotion had scarcely subsided when Maverick was attacked from another direction: foes of his in the county political ring charged him with paying the poll tax of another person, which is a felony in Texas. Although the prosecutors never had any real hope of convicting him on the flimsy evidence, there was always a chance that a hostile jury would convict him on prejudice. This effort came to nothing when Maverick was America, during their recent visit to the United States, saw La Villita and were much impressed with this visible evidence of friendship. In the workshops several hundred young Mexican men and women are learning various trades and crafts. Maverick regards La Villita as the New Deal in action in San Antonio. As a pan-American center it symbolizes the good-neighbor policy, and as a workshop it is helping to provide the Mexican youths with a basis for future security.

The next thing that helped Maverick was the bountiful subsidy he secured from the federal government for a new city airport costing $3,000,000. Part of the money would have been obtained anyway, but Maverick's Washington connections were worth at least an extra million. This was a deed for which some of the members of the Chamber of Commerce are willing to forgive Maverick his sins. Third in this chain of developments was the appointment of Robert E. Lucey to be the new archbishop of San Antonio. The late archbishop, A. J. Drossaerts, was a bitter conservative. The new archbishop is a friend of Roosevelt's, and is said to be about the most liberal member of the Catholic hierarchy in America. This sharp change in the political climate of the archdiocese is extremely important in a city where much more than half the population is Catholic.

Finally, by a great stroke of luck for Maverick, former Mayor C. K. Quin emerged as the principal opposition candidate. Maverick defeated him two years ago. A stronger candidate had been sought, but Quin put himself in the race while the other hopefuls were still talking, and the Maverick opposition was forced to accept him. He brings back unhappy memories of the old machine, however, and some opponents of Maverick are going to find it difficult to vote for Quin. They will probably go fishing on Election Day. As one rabid hater of Maverick put it, "Well, if it's between Maverick and Quin, Maverick will win easily."

But the outcome is really not that certain. The plurality that won for Maverick in 1939 will not suffice now, for a new law makes a majority necessary. Maverick's organization has been strengthened, and his campaign has been pretty well financed. Quin seems to be short of money, for his workers are reported to be out scratching for $2 contributions. But despite the progress Maverick has made, the hatred for him in certain circles is unrelenting. The taint of liberalism clings to him. So the election is likely to be close, perhaps as close as the Congressional election of 1938, when Maverick lost by about 500 votes. If so, three or four vanity candidates, who otherwise amount to nothing, may get enough votes between them to force a run-off. But a run-off would not be likely to alter the final result. On the whole, it seems probable that Maverick has a slight edge. As one observer put it, "I'd bet even money, either way, but I'd sleep a little easier with my money on Maverick."

SOCIETY NOTE: Colonel McCormick's Chicago Tribune recently published in its society column this excerpt from a letter by a London correspondent: "One leads a curious life. Everyone seems to have gone away from London, and one meets few one knows, and no going out at all evenings. It's really very dull with so much war talk and so many in jail—you'd be surprised to hear of those 'in society' who have been arrested!"

WHEN PLANS for this year's May Day parade in New York were being made, the Socialist Workers' Party (Trotskyites) asked the United May Day Committee for permission to participate. They were refused—on the ground that the parade was "non-political." The Communist Party marched as a unit.

A STRIKE at the Erie plant of the Continental Rubber Company was listed in the press as a stoppage of defense industry. Actually, the plant makes rubber mountings for wastebaskets, ash trays, and the like. Its chief order at the time of the strike was for wastebasket mountings for the OPM offices in Washington.

WHEN SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS first arrived in Moscow as British ambassador, he tried, according to a recent arrival from the Russian capital, to get into the spirit of the Soviets and live as far as possible like an ordinary citizen. Lawrence Steinhardt, the American envoy, noticed Cripps's attempts to be a good proletarian and felt that this was bad strategy for a British ambassador trying to win cooperation from the Russians. Steinhardt called Cripps aside and advised him to act his part, that of a British peer and diplomat. Cripps, who realized that his mission had not been altogether successful, took Steinhardt's advice and put on his old school tie. A few days later he reported back to Steinhardt and said that his proposals were getting a much better hearing.

OPPOSITION to the present administration of the American Newspaper Guild has developed in many places. In six large cities—Philadelphia, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Milwaukee—anti-administration delegates have already been chosen to represent their locals at the Guild convention in Detroit this summer.

AMERICAN ROCK, the new political party organized by William Goodwin, Father Coughlin's Eastern representative, and Joe McWilliams, will enter the New York elections this fall. It will support either Attorney General Bennett or John Cashmore, borough president of Brooklyn, as Democratic candidate for mayor.

Rats, Lice, and History

An Image of the United States Senate

BY R. P. BLACKMUR

"There is no precedence between a louse and a flea."—
Dr. Johnson.

That man who keeps the diary is there, his eyes like running mice;
ambassador plenipotentiary,
he says, to bargain fleas for lice.

Who sent him? whom he bargains for?
or what he'd sound like if he spoke?
or look like if he closed that door?
all's doubtless written in his book.

But we don't know. We only know he's here, his hand upon the knob of the big door. The rest we grow aware of, like an engine throb.

He's not a senator, that's sure;
none of the page boys even see him;
there's nothing about him to endure;
you don't want to delouse or flea him.

—Is it the odor of almonds creeps down the aisles, between the rows, heavier than air? than sleep?
that each man smells, but never knows?

Or is it the belling sound of words,
The vision of mankind that you see,
that can be only overheard, is my vision's greatest enemy?

That's why the senators can't keep still but each one, conscious of his face, unconscious of his driving will,
scurries and squeaks from desk to dais, and he who has been recognized (anyone can be, somebody must) looks on all fours, and undersized, gnawing darkness like a crust.

That man who keeps the diary,
suppose he opened up that door, would he be live, be you, be me?

be recognized upon the floor?

Or would the bitter almond rise,
the rising gorge of full ill ease, and all the lice, as each one dies,
take precedence with all the fleas?

Most like that door's a solid wall that cannot open save it fall.
Most like that diarist's the ghost that speaks the actual we have lost.

Louis Fischer's Autobiography

MEN AND POLITICS: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By
Louis Fischer. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

IN The Nation for January 9, 1924, appeared a quarter-column announcement: Louis Fischer, whose "information for Mr. Hughes" appeared on page 30, it said, would sail again for Russia in a short time. He was in close touch with various Soviet officials, but maintained a critical detachment which made his articles historically valuable. He would be The Nation's Russian correspondent "for the next few months."

He was The Nation's Russian correspondent for more than twelve years. Then he was The Nation's Spanish correspondent, and then its correspondent-at-large. He has been a part of The Nation, month after month, for close to twenty years.

Nation readers may think they know this Louis Fischer; and, indeed, some chapters of this 657-page "autobiography" are rewritten from its pages. The Nation is a part of Louis Fischer, as he is a part of it. But he has coyly kept his self out of his articles; and he is almost as coy in this "autobiography." It is easier to learn the facts of Lenin's, Stalin's, Chicherin's, Hitler's, Dr. Negrin's, Constancia de la Mora's, or Winston Churchill's life from this book than of Louis Fischer's. Nevertheless, by careful rereading, annotation, and tabulation, I have been able to fit a few biographical facts together. Louis Fischer, in writing this book, was as ingenious as a jigsaw-puzzle carver to shuffle and conceal them.

Louis Fischer was born above a delicatessen store in the fish and chicken market at Fourth and Monroe Streets, Philadelphia, in 1896 (page 299). His father was an orthodox Jew, a factory worker, then a fish-and-fruit peddler. Until Louis was sixteen he never lived in a house with electricity, running water, an inside lavatory, or central heating; so he never dreaded poverty. He was used to living cheap.

What schools he attended he does not say. He read Kropotkin's "Memoirs of a Revolutionist" avidly in 1916; he had already devoured the great Russian novels. But he has no memory of reading of either of the Russian revolutions of 1917; the news made no impression on him (page 46)! His family background led him into the Zionist movement ("it was not conviction but just glide"); sometime in the summer of 1917 he volunteered to serve in the Jewish Legion recruited to help reconquer the Holy Land (page 240). He trained in Canada and reached Palestine about the time of the Armistice. Perforce, he remained in the British army until 1920. That experience dimmed his Zionism and left him dubious about upper-class Englishmen.

"With the exception of teaching school in Philadelphia for half a year and work in a New York news agency in 1920," says Louis Fischer, "I have never held a job and I have always tried hard not to get one." (That, on page 160, is the only mention in the book of either job.) But he forgot. In 1925 for four months he worked in the "Tass" office in London (page 208); in 1928 he substituted for Frederick Kuh in the United Press bureau in Berlin for two months (page 599); in 1934, 1935, and 1936 he led summer parties through Russia for the Open Road (page 217). He had gone to Russia in the summer of 1922 as a free-lance correspondent for the New York Evening Post, paying his own way (page 13); after 1924 he had papers as correspondent for The Nation, but no salary (page 70); as the years passed and his reputation grew, he built up his own private international syndicate, often selling the same article to the London New Statesman, the Paris Europe Nouvelle, the German refugee Weltbühne, and to dailies in Oslo, Stockholm, Prague, and elsewhere (page 323). He wrote when he liked, and as he liked; and until 1929 Markoosha, whom he married in 1922, supported herself and the two boys, born in 1923 and 1924, entirely.

Markoosha was "a slim native of Libau, Latvia; she was Russian in her unconventional spirit, German in her education, a pianist by profession, a psychologist by natural endowment." Louis Fischer met her in New York in 1920; she returned to Europe in the spring of 1921; and she was one of the main reasons why Louis followed in December. Of course, she had much to do with his going to Russia, and with his falling in love with Russia; and, in the later years, with his disillusionment. I wish there were more about Markoosha in "Men and Politics." The subtitle, at least, would have permitted it.

"I never thought of Soviet Russia as a Utopia," says Louis Fischer. "I knew when I first went there in September, 1922, that I was going to a land of starvation. . . . In Lenin's Russia of 1922 I looked not for a better present but for a brighter future. I also expected clean politics and a foreign policy that rejected conquest, colonies, imperialism, and the lying that is often synonymous with diplomacy."

At first he found what he was looking for. He saw Lenin (already sick) and Trotsky ("fiery, flamboyant, penetrating . . . the tenor . . . the peacock, performer, charmer") preaching Puritan morals. (Louis Fischer, himself a kind of Puritan, liked that; the Puritanism of early Russian communism obviously was one of its chief appeals to him.) He revisited Russia regularly; it became his home. He played poker, apparently his only vice, with the correspondents; he watched the dramatic Savinkov trial in 1924; he had six and a half hours with Stalin in 1927; more important, he became uniquely intimate with Chicherin, the Soviets' aristocratic Foreign Minister, with Litvinov, his successor, with Joffe, Rakovsky, and dozens of lesser Soviet leaders, most of whom have now disappeared. Every year he went out to Germany. And he wrote, copiously and illuminatingly, for The Nation. At first he wrote almost as much about Germany as about Russia; and in 1925 a young German wrote a letter to The Nation correcting Fischer's facts. The German said he had been in prison thirteen, not six months. The Nation printed the letter. The German's name was Adolf Hitler!

Fischer also wrote two books, one a study of "Oil Imperialism," the other his two-volume "The Soviets in World Affairs." Litvinov once said that he kept this latter book on his desk for reference. It was in compiling material for his books that Louis Fischer made his extraordinary friendships. Most foreign correspondents are themselves performers; they like to talk, particularly about themselves. Louis Fischer was a good listener; and when he talked, he talked politics, never about himself. The Russians liked that. They also respected his sympathetic independence. He neither fooled nor flattered them; he argued with them on their own terms, in their own language.

Chicherin read proofs of Fischer's books—this "autobiography" includes poignant and revealing letters from him; Litvinov sent Fischer to Rakovsky in exile—with a disguised letter of introduction that is a story in itself; Rakovsky dug into his voluminous files; Joffe, five days before committing suicide, showed Fischer papers on the Russian share in the German revolution of 1918; Karakhan permitted him to print a photograph of the Soviet diplomat playing tennis with King Amanullah of Afghanistan as his partner (that is another good story). No foreigner ever had a more intimate contact with Soviet diplomacy. His two-volume book was translated into Russian; Radek wrote an introduction for it; but it was never printed. Radek asked Stalin, and Stalin said no.

After 1936 Louis Fischer wrote no more articles about Russia—until the Soviet-German pact released his inhibitions. In 1936 the great purges began; "literally a massacre of Soviet talent occurred in 1937"; it became a "bloody pogrom" in 1937-38. Fischer returned to Moscow and, sick at heart, pondered the meaning of the trials. It was not easy to throw away the vision to which he had been attached for fifteen years; and Russia was still, somewhat, and alone among the great powers, aiding Spain. After 1936 Louis Fischer wrote about Spain instead of about Russia. There again he became the confidant of the leaders (sometimes he writes as if he had personally conducted the Spanish Republic); and in this book he tells stories he could not tell at the time in The Nation, about both Spain and Russia. No one else has achieved the objectivity and discernment of his analysis of the change in Russia.

So Louis Fischer has come home to the America he never knew and has written his story of the Europe he knew too well. Correspondents are becoming as important as diplomats, and both write books. But Louis Fischer's "Men and Politics" is unique, both in its insights and its intimacies. It is unique also in Louis Fischer's own writing, for its flashes of wit, its abundance of personal anecdote—about almost everybody except Louis Fischer himself. The old Puritan!

Divided We Are Falling

UNITED WE STAND! DEFENSE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE. By Hanson W. Baldwin. Whittlesey House. $3.

"DIVIDED WE ARE FALLING" might well be the title of this book. "Germany," says Hanson Baldwin, "prepared for this war; France prepared for the last war; Britain prepared for no war. Today we stand somewhere between France and Britain. Too many of our preparations have been for the last war; too many for no war of reality." He documents this verdict with a wealth of somber detail. "Stand" we can if we put our best minds and full strength to the task, but as yet, in his judgment, we have used neither. Two major problems are as yet unsolved.

The first confronts every democratic state; the second, in an acute form at least, only ours. The country is not united. It is not yet alarmed by the emergency it is facing. As yet our democratic processes have not declared what is "the overwhelming wish of the overwhelming majority" of the people. Mr. Baldwin thinks that the American democracy is not having effective leadership in making up its mind. It is not being asked what we are prepared to defend by force, and if offense is the best defense where and to what extent it should be directed.

But after this initial problem is resolved, an efficient directing organization is necessary. Mr. Baldwin outlines again the sad situation in Washington, of which he and many others have long complained. There is no organization for "sound coordinated planning." There is no realization of the fact that defense plans must include political and economic weapons. The President attempts to do too much himself. Military and naval and air policy are under the Joint Board—on which the army and navy have equal representation—and its history "has often been one of stultification and stalemate." It gets civilian direction and drive only in the moments that the President can devote to the Chief of Staff or the Chief of Naval Operations, and these are inadequate to prevent conflicts of authority and duplications of effort.

For example, we have "such absurdities as the recent order that prohibited army land planes from flying farther than 100 miles off our coast, for that was the navy's domain." The country—despite huge appropriations and the optimistic professions of those in high places—still has "no unified air service, no unified procurement, no unified training, and no well-developed, unified concept of the use of air power." Instead, the new base sites in Bermuda "show an undesirable duplication of effort between the army and navy air forces." There are to be two plane bases when one would have been enough. Within each of the services there are silly jealousies.

Mr. Baldwin has extremely detailed and informing chapters on the navy, the army, and the air force. He recounts some advances and records a good many disappointments. The absence of any machinery which can view our policy as a whole and can decide which things should come first has had serious consequences, which, happily, as yet have not been catastrophic. He is more optimistic in respect of the navy and the air force than he is in respect of the army. He thinks the army less efficient than it was a year ago, before abilities and skills had to be scattered to participate in the training of hordes of raw recruits. He thinks that the conscription bill had little thought behind it and that the creation of a larger professional army, heavily armored, would have been far more sensible than the building of a mass army. Conscription could have been applied to give a year or two of training to men as they reached twenty or twenty-one. Now, however, he thinks it too late to retrace many steps. The army we have is the kind of army that the General Staff did not want and one which it had never urged on Congress. To be sure it accepted this army without protest, and its acquiescence was probably not unconnected with the acceleration of promotion which results from greater and greater numbers.

It is vain to hope, in the trite phrase, that "United We Stand" will be read by "every intelligent citizen." It is too serious, too closely reasoned, and too replete with facts, figures, and tables to be an outstanding popular success. But those who are making or who are neglecting to make decisions that will prepare or fail to prepare this country should ponder Mr. Baldwin's 300-odd pages. These have permitted him a scope impossible in newspaper or magazine articles. He surveys the crisis with extended view—literally from China to Peru. He does not conceal his own opinions on matters outside his specialty of military science. Some readers may object to sweeping judgments. Thus he says that the State Department, "pitifully clinging to the fine outmoded aspirations of the past, stymies the people's will and the national effort by the tedious process of kidgloved diplomacy in an era in which speed of achievement is imperative and the mailed fist is the only understandable language," but his description of the nature of the "era" cannot be challenged. His book will add further to the high reputation he has made for himself in the field of military and naval analysis—a department of American journalism in which he and a few other practitioners of his art are doing excellent service. Would that they were more frequently read by those in the seats of the mighty!

LINDSAY ROGERS

A Lively Sermon

SPEAKING to her fellow-countrymen in the last days of 1939, Miss Sayers exhorted them to take thought about the incipient war and not to be futurists about the better world to follow it. For their guidance she reviewed with a masterly brevity and simplicity the main currents of European history feeding the whirlpool of the present. She now addresses the same words, with a new preface, to the American public, and on a second reading eighteen months later the little work remains both moving and apposite. Not that Miss Sayers appeals to any conventional feelings we may be supposed to have about Great Britain or the world. On the contrary she flies very efficiently in the face of all the glib talk about new world orders and the complacent explanations of the way things came to be as they are. She is, as attentive readers of her fiction and drama will have noted, a competent historian, a philosopher, and an artist. The result is that she brings to bear on the contemporary chaos the calmness born of historical perspective, the clarity of a logician, and the concreteness that belongs to art.

When she says, "Begin here," she means simply that there is no reason to suppose this war will be the last, the worst, or the best in history. It will not work miracles, and consequently any better world we may desire must be built piece by piece by ourselves through the choices and acts we are making and doing now. She repudiates in fact any theory of linear and fated evolution, any automatism moving us toward good or ill, and she vindicates human purpose operating on the small scale where its effects are undoubted and familiar. She knows, moreover, that the decisions affecting the fate of nations depend upon the ideas of life, conduct, government, and faith which are abroad among the people, whether democratic or totalitarian. She must therefore remind her listeners—British and American—of their own shortcomings as judged by the very standards which they would enshrine in the "new order." The passion for absolutes, the yearning for an impossible static security, the dread of original thought, the repudiation of Christian morality, the naive faith in machinery—both industrial and administrative—the actual neglect of vaunted cultural values—these are so many failures of brain and heart which Miss Sayers berates in words no less justified than eloquent. Two pages on the gaping indifference of the English public to art—the art which that same public fitfully pretends to cherish and defend against totalitarian attack—are worthy of inclusion in the great collection of anti-philistine documents. But the author's wit and invective imply no loss of proportion. She orders her argument in such a way that its many parts, from an economic fact to a piece of introspective psychology, fall into place without strain and without surplusage.

Enough has been said to show that Miss Sayers is no doctrinaire. Though she clearly believes in a transcendent reality which is Christian, she is not proselytizing for any church and she does not hope more from organizations than from single "conversions." But she believes that without intelligence and will somewhere no social or cultural salvation is possible. One can quarrel with some of her historical judgments, notably that on the doctrine of natural rights; and one can regret that she has chosen for some of her short and lucid chapters mottoes from long-winded and thorny writers, but no one can deny that her fresh and forthright sermon is worth the closest study, simply as a piece of pointed reflection and quite aside from the clear-eyed statement of faith that it makes.

JACQUES BARZUN

Nationless Men

WE ESCAPED. Edited by William Allen Neilson. The Macmillan Company. $2.

NINE months ago, while abroad, I had occasion to spend several hours daily for about a week in the courtyard of the consulate general of a great power. Of all the experiences that I have had in recent years that was certainly the most nerve-racking. The strain did not originate in any predicament of mine, for my request was simple and I was treated with courtesy. At the end of each period, however, I was depressed beyond bearing, anxious only to get away and talk—talk about anything and with anyone provided he had, not merely things so prime to man as a home and a job, but a nationality.

A room with a view, a room of one's own, health, money, work—they have been written and written about as if they were important. They did not seem so important then. If you have spent a few hours in a consulate of a neutral or defeated European power, you will know that no symbol is so packed with implicit drama as an invalid passport.

Those who have not seen the faces of nationless men may obtain some idea of what Nazism has done from "We Escaped," a collection of narratives of quite exceptional merit. The simplicity and vigor of these accounts and the entire absence of abnormality in the persons who tell them set the book apart. The Artist from Prague and The Mayor of Ferrol are, I think, two of the best pieces of direct narrative I have read in a long time. It is testimony to the reality of the people in "We Escaped" to say that one or two of them have quirks and traits that I don't like. In general they are fine people, none the less, worth any nation's saving.

The reserve officer from Holland is your quiet gentleman naive in his political outlook, methodically courageous in necessity; very correct and very Dutch. The anti-Nazi professor from Heidelberg is a brilliant mathematician, confident he can calculate the incidence of floods from some higher theorem of calculus, I believe. I like such a man, and his story is well told. Then the Mayor of Ferrol! Here is a story which I heard from his lips—after he became a waiter in a two-bit beanery. A Spanish Socialist under Alfonso, he became accustomed to arbitrary police and slovenly jailers. Hunted by fascists, he at last found a refuge in the attic of a family of former political opponents. In the most magnificent piece of reticence I know, he says, "I stayed with that family three years." And from that attic, with other men in other attics, he planned his escape. Those Spaniards faltered comic-opera uniforms of the Civil Guard, of cloth and cardboard dyed with shoe polish. One night they marched through the town as a patrol and stole a steam-driven fishing boat. Their fuel ran out in the Bay of Biscay. They lit a flare of gasoline. A French fishing boat approached and towed them to France, to begin the long pull of getting a visa to America. Well, he's here, and thinking of the day of return to Spain.

The Rebuttal . . .

—to the logic of dictatorship and exploitation: That because man is an animal—he can be no more than an animal.

HUMANITY ON TRIAL

By HORACE J. BRIDGES

Leader, Chicago Ethical Society

The rise of dictators who created the present world-tragedy can be traced to certain beliefs about the nature and powers of man which are false, but generally accepted because they appear to possess authority of science. This book offers an answer, based on unquestionable facts as to what man is and does, here and now on earth. Presented in the form of a series of illustrations rather than cumulative abstract argument.

The Case of Harold Rugg

THAT MEN MAY UNDERSTAND. By Harold Rugg.
Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

HAROLD RUGG here submits himself to the court of public opinion and serves as his own advocate. He asks 130,000,000 fellow-citizens—or as many of them as his publishers can persuade to attend court—to judge the righteousness of his cause. For the benefit of those unaware of who he is, or that he is on trial at all, he reviews the charges before proceeding with the defense.

Dr. Rugg, professor of education at Teachers College, Columbia University, is the author of a series of social-science textbooks widely used in our schools. They are based upon the author's two dominant beliefs: first, that social and political problems of the greatest significance have been too little discussed or have actually been suppressed in the classroom—and, as a consequence, young people have gone out unprepared to live effectively in the world of today; second, that each branch of knowledge taught in our schools, from the three R's to the social sciences, has been so departmentalized and compartmentalized as to make it inapplicable to a society where all vital problems are interrelated.

Fired by these convictions he proceeded to build a series of school texts. He launched them first as mimeographed pamphlets which were tried out by cooperating teachers in many towns and cities. Then they were revised and collected into book form. These books and the experimental pamphlets have been used widely for twenty years, and sales have been phenomenal. Of the pamphlets alone, three-quarters of a million were sold. Since the beginning of the enterprise attacks upon the author and his writings have been periodic and increasingly bitter.

"That Men May Understand" opens with the author's confession of faith in our form of government and a declaration of pride in our nation's past achievements, with some reference to the part played by his own ancestors. Then follows a painfully detailed record of his Herculean labors, with tribute to each of the many other "pioneer thinkers" who collaborated with him; with fact piled upon fact as to total number of words written, pamphlets and books published, and all attendant circumstances.

The pages that follow make livelier reading as he describes the developing attacks upon him—the long campaign, for instance, of his detractors to get his books out of the Englewood schools; the entry of Verne Marshall and M. K. Hart, of Hearst and the "patrioteers" into the struggle; the spread of the war to distant parts. The author finds space to philosophize upon the phenomenon of witch-hunting, and the relation of such periodic outbursts of intolerance to times of national prosperity or depression.

The last few chapters of the book present his theories of education in and for a democracy, and most deserve the permanence of book form. "Alone among the schoolbook authors of America," he writes, "I have refused to dodge the problem of public and private ownership"; and this hints his attitude toward himself and the nature of his pioneering.

As the years passed I became more and more convinced that democracy could not survive the attacks upon it unless young Americans came to a thorough understanding of the

Alvin Johnson, in the New York Herald Tribune, says: "Mr. Jones in this book has set up a machinery for ascertaining what people think. That makes him rank with the important intellectual pioneers of our time."

Rose M. Stein, in The Nation, says: "A highly provocative book . . . a most heartening testimonial to the vitality of our democracy."

R. L. Duffus, in the New York Times, says: "The results are thought provoking. America, looking at itself and studying its own thinking and feeling, is quite a spectacle."

Winston Phelps, in the Providence Journal, says: "It is entertaining and it is important. It may well be rated one of the most important serious books of the year."

The Christian Science Monitor says: "This book will take a place among the path-breakers. It shows that there is an American way, and that the present social situation is full of hope."

world in which they were living. The democratic process in America, I was sure, could not be guaranteed unless our youth were introduced to the full story—the deficiencies as well as the achievements of our society, the problems and issues as well as the narrative of adventure.

But the narrative of adventure may be told with a certain degree of objectivity, while the classification of problems and issues, of deficiencies and achievements, is a matter of opinion. Dr. Rugg's interpretations, which color his books, seem sanely liberal and far from revolutionary. It is likely, as he asserts, that most of his detractors never read them.

As I pass from chapter to chapter of this meticulously detailed record of the author's vision on the road to Damascus, of his acceptance of his mission, and of the fashion in which he has carried the gospel, as well as a full outline of the gospel itself, I find myself a victim of shifting moods. At times I am impatient, as when Dr. Rugg finds it necessary to tell of the exact place and moment when the vision occurred, or would persuade me to look upon Teachers College as a sort of Early Church. There are moments of boredom when I find myself murmuring, "Thou sayest an undisputed thing in such a solemn way"; and there are many other moments when I wish that the author might have flavored his dish with a soupçon of humility and a sprinkling of humor. But after-thought assures me that few great crusaders have found time to cultivate either ingredient.

Surely, the conviction of many conservatives, seldom expressed but always felt, that "any change is dangerous" has done more harm to our schools than to any other institution. Dr. Rugg has fought for progress with great skill and an unrewarded persistence. He has thrived on punishment and one suspects, might welcome even martyrdom if he could be given a chance afterward to write about it.

Snow White and the
1,200 Dwarfs*Hollywood, April 30*

TO VISIT the Walt Disney Studios for the first time is quite an experience. An ordinary studio for flesh-and-blood actors, once one is inside its impressive entrance, has a slightly lost and bewildered air, as if it had outgrown its strength and as if everything were happening a little too fast—the employees seem just a trifle depressed, the buildings untidy and temporary. Not so the Disney unit: the approach to the studios is down a quiet countrified stretch of road, hills and trees screen the buildings, and one is suddenly confronted with a vista which resembles something between a factory and a college campus. As I walked on to the lot the collegiate atmosphere became almost oppressive. It was the lunch hour, and nearly all the twelve hundred-odd employees had left their work and were strolling about; everyone seemed to know everyone else; they smiled and waved and shouted greetings.

The studio dining-room, which is at the far end of the lot, is the most luxurious I have seen in any studio. The décor is modern and very attractive, the food is excellent, the service expert, and one can survey through glass doors the studio store, where models of the more famous Disney characters coyly offer themselves for sale. Large plate-glass windows give on to a field where employees play ping-pong, croquet, basketball, baseball. A tour of the office and production buildings reveals them to be far better designed and equipped than those of any other studio. Of course the comparison is hardly fair—celluloid performers being less bulky and messy than flesh-and-blood performers—but this studio compares to any other as a model dairy to an old-fashioned cow shed. How incongruous it must seem to Walt, as the employees are privileged to call Mr. Disney, when he contemplates these delightful surroundings and savors the atmosphere of camaraderie, that that wicked old fairy Organized Labor should be making trouble among his merry little Dwarfs. He must find it very exasperating that the vexatious question of the low wages he pays is continually cropping up, and that some of his employees have a nasty way of demanding things.

The Disney business went along satisfactorily on a paternalistic basis for quite a time. Before the production of "Snow White," when Disney employed only about three hundred people, his particular method of dealing with labor was, from his point of view, highly successful. But with the rapid expansion of his plant, which coincides with the production of full-length feature pictures, he began to lose personal contact. During the production of "Snow White" the artists and other studio workers were informed that they were engaged on a great and daring experiment, that their cooperation in the form of hard work and overtime without pay was urgently required, and that they would be amply rewarded by bonuses if "Snow White" proved a financial success. After the picture had succeeded beyond the wildest dreams, a few employees were given ample bonuses, but the majority received barely enough to compensate them for the overtime they had put in. The same experiment was repeated with "Pinocchio"; this time no bonuses at all were paid, on the ground that the film did not make enough money, and the spirit of cooperation was pretty thoroughly damped.

Attempts at organizing the Disney employees were first made about three years ago under the auspices of the I. A. T. S. E. These were successfully scotched by the formation of a company guild, which in the course of time died of inertia, having achieved exactly nothing. Meanwhile the cartoon artists in other studios as well as Disney's had formed the Screen Cartoonists' Guild, an affiliate of the A. F. of L., and achieved startling results at every studio but Disney's. The minimum wage at Disney's is still about $17 a week, while at other studios, such as Schlesinger's, where the guild has been recognized, the minimum wage is about $23.

Some six months ago the Disney Studios imposed a wage cut, using the loss of European markets as an excuse, and Disney himself made a speech about everyone pulling together in a time of national emergency for the sake of the studio; this speech recruited more members for the Screen Cartoonists' Guild than a year of campaigning. When it became obvious that the guild would try to move into the studio, the company union miraculously revived, and Disney has been consistently refusing to deal with the S. C. G. on the ground that it is not representative of the majority of his employees. This argument is entirely specious, for the guild only claims to represent the actual artists—some five hundred of the twelve hundred employees—and of these it represents a very substantial majority.

Yesterday the argument between Disney and the S. C. G. reached a climax. At an NLRB hearing negotiations between them broke down completely, and the head of the regional labor board has forwarded to Washington a complaint against the Disney Studio charging it with domination of its company union. Disney has expressed his willingness to abide by the decision of the NLRB, and it seems likely that he will be forced to recognize the S. C. G. in the near future. This will just about spell the defeat of Disney's experiment in paternalism.

The local women's clubs are on the warpath. The Daughters of the American Revolution and the Women's Motion Picture Council (whatever that may be) are anxious to obtain a list of the film actors who signed a petition protesting against the deportation proceedings against Harry Bridges; club members intend to boycott theaters which show pictures featuring anyone who signed the petition.

"Major Barbara," England's most important screen offering since the outbreak of war, will probably not appeal widely to the American public. As screen material the Shaw play is by no means as satisfactory as "Pygmalion": it is a little too argumentative, too subtle, too verbose. To present a fable such as this on the screen successfully, it is necessary to paint the blacks very black and the whites very white, a method that does not appeal at all to Mr. Shaw, who blends his arguments to provoke his audience. Then, too, it would seem that "Major Barbara" has dated just a little; religion is certainly no longer worth talking about as an opiate for the English or American people, and as a result Barbara herself emerges no longer as a symbol of defeated and muddled virtue, but as a harmless and charming crank, whose behavior would appear to an average movie audience as "plain nutty." Nevertheless, the production is beautifully contrived, and it is a pleasure to hear the brilliant dialogue delivered by the magnificent cast. Robert Morley's performance as Andrew Undershaft is nothing short of superb, while Wendy Hiller, Robert Newton, Rex Harrison, and the rest of the cast are nearly as good.

ANTHONY BOWER.

MUSIC

TO GO on with the subject of "Fantasia"—and Deems Taylor in particular—offering images as the proper effect of music (The Nation of January 11): In a review of "Men of Music" about a year ago I referred to Aldous Huxley's essay "Music at Night," in which he writes of what a painting, by "the forms and their arrangement . . . the disposition of the lines and planes and masses," will say "to anyone in the least sensitive to the eloquence of pure form." For a person with sensitiveness to the eloquence of form in sound a Mozart symphony has exciting meaning; for a person without this sensitiveness it has no meaning at all: neither the meaning of its formal eloquence, which he cannot perceive; nor the meaning he looks for—expressible in words, and concerned with actions and ideas—which the music does not convey. In this situation he may be led to misconceptions: if he fails to realize that any special sensitiveness is involved, if instead he lives on the democratic assumption of the adequacy of his normal equipment to any subject, any experience, if he thinks of the meaning as one that can be translated into verbal statements about ideas or actions, then he may feel that if there is really anything in the music to be understood he can understand it, and that all he needs is to have it explained to him in the right terms, or that there is something to know about the work, which, if he were told it, would give him the perception he lacks. And from these misconceptions he may be led to resentments and suspicions—resentment of the person who claims the understanding, the special equipment that makes understanding possible; suspicion that this person is withholding a meaning which he could reveal if he chose, or is pretending to understand a meaning that really isn't there to be understood.

In this situation the difficult thing to do is to correct the misconceptions and remove the resentments and suspicions: to get the person for whom the symphony means nothing to realize that understanding in this case involves a special sensitiveness to the "eloquence of pure form" which one person may have and another not, and which more persons have not than have; to get him to believe that those who claim to be excited by the music but cannot tell him what they are excited by are not all snobs or frauds; to get him to accept the notion that though in all other respects an adequately equipped human being he is without the specific equipment that would enable him to perceive and be excited by what these others perceive and are excited by. And all this is made even more difficult by the writers and speakers who do the easy and profitable thing, which is to defer to the misconceptions and nourish the resentments and suspicions. That is, they give their reader or listener the verbal interpretations and entertain him with the biographical details he asks for—which would in itself confirm his suspicion even if these commentators did not directly encourage him to suspect anyone who insists that music is not to be understood by means of verbal interpretations and biographical details, that its eloquence of pure form is to be understood only through the special sensitiveness for this eloquence.

This encouragement of the normally equipped person's resentment and distrust of the specially equipped person who understands music in a way the unequipped person does not—a form of cultural rabble-rousing—is something one encounters constantly; and it is a frequent practice of Deems Taylor. There is no jazzing of the classics, no gaudy orchestral metamorphosis of Bach, no "synthesis" of Mussorgsky, no tabloid version of a symphony movement—in short no vulgarity or indignity perpetrated on music—that is not accompanied by its defiant recommendation to the public to pay no attention to the "purists" who will disapprove of what real, healthy, normal music-lovers will enjoy. Such statements have been issued with "Fantasia"; and the prize must go as usual to Taylor who, in his introduction spoken from the screen in which he offers the pictures as the meaning of the music, points out that "these are not going to be the interpretations of trained musicians—which I think is all to the good." In other words, take what a Disney artist makes of music, and by implication anything that anyone makes, in preference to what a musician makes of it.

Note that in this instance it is a trained musician himself who makes such a statement—one of the trained musicians who are largely responsible for the things that are done to music in "Fantasia." For the fact is that Disney did not trust himself to work alone—that coming to the music of Bach and Beethoven and Schubert he seems to have felt that he could do only what would be sanctioned by people who understood Bach and Beethoven and Schubert in a way he did not, people whose sanction would be a guarantee of artistic rectitude—people like Stokowski and Taylor. It is, then, Stokowski and Taylor who are responsible for the conversion of Schubert's "Ave Maria" into a Hollywood Gothic apotheosis for Mussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain." True, it was Stravinsky himself who assented to what is done with his "Sacre du printemps"; but Stravinsky—a mere composer who does not earn by writing music the sums that a Stokowski and a Taylor get for doing the jobs they do—may be forgiven for picking up a little extra money in this way.

And one consequence of Disney's step may be noted in conclusion: Fifteen years ago the public on which Stokowski and Taylor practised their corruption of taste and understanding was a few thousand readers of a newspaper; later, radio offered them a medium of communication with millions all over the country; and now Disney has given them still another medium with which to reach additional millions.

Letters to the Editors

On Harold Rugg

Dear Sirs: Harold Rugg stands accused of subverting the minds of the young by breeding skepticism and mistrust of the institutions to which they have fallen heir. Let one of his students testify for him, one who studied with him for two and one-half years.

Until I heard Harold Rugg paint in sure, penetrating strokes the history of America, until I read widely and deeply as he guided me, my country as a nation had no voice. Through him I began to hear it sing and to feel the life that throbs beneath the everyday scene. He articulated his love for America in such wise as to personalize its history in a drama of men and women striving for better ways of living together. He demonstrated the dictum of Spinoza that the more we learn of men the less we seek to praise or blame them, and strive merely to understand them.

He taught me that we do not need to be afraid to teach the truth about America. Hammering out a civilization from a vast wilderness cannot be a pretty task. It is rough and raw and breeds lawlessness. Yet conquering this wilderness also took courage and fortitude and indomitable will. Harold Rugg draws the picture that the song creates when it measures out the story of "pilgrims whose stern, impassioned tread a thoroughfare for freedom beat across the wilderness." He affirms that we need not be afraid to see the bones there as well as the victories, to understand the role of the renegades as well as the vigilantes, to see the crudeness and ugliness of the false-fronted frontier towns as well as the little centers of culture that early began to rise. Even as we see the brutality and ruthlessness of exploitation, he marks, we need not lose sight of the spirit that fostered cooperation in all this welter of individualism and bred humor and a lovable expansiveness and generosity.

It is not by glossing over the "bad" in our history—which is not only immoral but conducive to a complacency for which there is no justification—that we make progress. It is by using all the resources at our command to understand the "bad" in the light of social and physical environment, to know why men did as they did on the lawless border and in the decades of exploitation. It is all America, good and bad. Some is to be regretted and to be ashamed of. Some is to be gloried in. Ours is a history more romantic than that of kings and princes. That is what Harold Rugg taught me: that this grand and thrilling story that is America's can awaken not only devotion and pride but courage to see her faults and name them, so that we may preserve what is rich and valid and change what is shameful and degrading.

To call Harold Rugg a materialist is to misunderstand a man who has explored the frontiers of American culture and more than any other educator has developed the potentialities for creative energy in our people. His father was a handicraftsman. As a boy he watched him carve with loving care cabinets, staircases, and doorways. Always that work was subjected to rigid scrutiny. No imperfection was tolerated. Only the best could go forth.

Harold Rugg noted this, and years later, pondering this creative act, he wondered about the qualities of the artist. Are they peculiar to the artist? Aren't they potential in all? Suppose, he imagined, we could create a nation of people characterized by integrity, a courage to be themselves in all they say and do, and with a cognizance of their obligation to society. Suppose, he thought further, we could develop a quality of thoroughness, that quality which makes the artist critical of his work. America is our work. To build this creative America requires understanding of her heterogeneous heritage, a knowledge which precludes the deadliness of a patriotism that will not criticize itself. Truly loving and knowing America, her people will demand that she realize her potentialities. Demanding this, her people will give only of their best, and be satisfied only with the best.

Harold Rugg's teaching is all positive. Hate is eliminated, and a passionate desire to preserve and improve the processes of a dynamic democracy is conveyed. My greatest hope as a teacher would be that I could give to my pupils the love and understanding of America that Harold Rugg has given to me.

County Reorganization

Dear Sirs: In the article Can Tammany Come Back? in The Nation of April 19 you warn New York City voters that the Democratic political machine is still with us and scarcely weakened by Mayor LaGuardia's triumph in the last two elections. It is all too true that Tammany still has great power in the City Council and in the cumbersome and wholly unnecessary county governments which we are still supporting. To be sure we voted county reform as long ago as 1935; that is, the voters authorized the Board of Aldermen to abolish the many useless and expensive separate county offices of sheriff and register. But the Board of Aldermen, and later the City Council as formed under the new city charter in 1936, has disregarded the wishes of the people.

The sheriff's salary is $15,000 annually in New York, Bronx, and King's County, $8,000 in Queens County, and $6,000 in Richmond. Combined, these amounts would pay the salaries of the Commissioners of Health, Hospitals, Police, and Welfare, and still leave more than $1,000 over. The register's salary is $12,000 in each county except Queens, where it is $8,000. The combined salaries amount to $500 more than the combined salaries of the Commissioners of the Departments of Fire, Correction, Purchase, Housing, and Building.

In the sheriffs' offices there are only 14 civil-service jobs at the present time, but there are 364 political jobs which are costing the taxpayers of the city thousands of dollars every year. In the registers' offices 59 political jobs are exempt from civil-service regulations. Public investigations—by Herlands and Blanchard—have shown that most of these jobs are created to take care of political henchmen at public expense.

Since Tammany still has such a strangle-hold on the City Council, the only way for the taxpayers of New York City to rid themselves of this politically corrupt and expensive system is by initiative and referendum. A petition is now being circulated by the Non-Partisan Committee and supported by the League of Women Voters. We need 50,000 signatures of qualified voters to bring this vital issue of county reorganization before the voters of New York City on next Election Day.

Briefly, county reorganization is a plan (1) to abolish the high-paid, useless, and overlapping offices of county sheriff and register; (2) to establish one city-wide office of sheriff and register; (3) to make these offices and every job in them open only to civil-service workers. This plan deserves the support of every citizen who wants democracy to succeed. It is a plan to make ability and not politics the test for our civil employees. If successful, county reorganization will remove a source of corruption in our city government and at the same time save the city up to a half-million dollars annually.

We need the help of every interested voter in Greater New York to put over this campaign for better government. The most immediate way to help is to circulate a petition and get signatures. Petitions, directions, and further information about county reorganization can be obtained at the New York City League of Women Voters, 151 East Fiftieth Street, Eldorado 5-6860.

Agrees with Sandburg

Dear Sirs: It was an immense pleasure to hear from Carl Sandburg through your pages (issue of April 26), especially since your propaganda for entering the war had made many of your readers wonder whether you were really going to remain a "liberal" publication.

It is perfectly true that the American people are not anxious to enter another European war to save England's fox-hunting set. Moreover, the much-vaunted plans for a "new order" of the Stracheys and the Bevins and the Anglican church seem like very feeble gasps when the British government does not take the least step in that direction.

This, to my mind, relieves us of any obligation to fight a second futile war for democracy, even at Vice-President Wallace's suggestion.

The Shape of Things

THE ARRIVAL OF RUDOLF HESS IN SCOTLAND by parachute provides the perfect opening for the most fascinating mystery story of the war. How it will unfold is still a secret. But already the radio commentators and editorial writers are busy searching for clues. Raymond Gram Swing has offered four possible theories to explain Britain's fantastic visitor: first, that he is indeed demented, as Berlin insists; second, that he flew to Scotland on a secret peace mission for Hitler, a mission that was revealed only through his accidental injury; third, that he went as representative of an anti-Hitler cabal, to offer peace against Hitler's wishes; fourth, that his flight was an escape. Mr. Swing seems to incline, very tentatively, to explanation number two, which is perhaps the most sensational of the lot. If it is the correct one, we may never know it, for Hitler will as a matter of course continue to repudiate his unsuccessful emissary, and Hess may never tell the facts. Perhaps this will be a mystery story without a last chapter. But the most generally accepted theory is the most obvious—that Hess is a deserter and traitor who fled to save his skin and is presumably prepared to "tell all." If this plot is the real one, his visit may be of untold value to Britain. But in many ways it is harder to believe than the more fantastic explanations. Hess's chief characteristic has been his unquestioning party and personal loyalty. He was the Nazi sans reproche, if such a term can be applied to murderers and terrorists. He never questioned why or sought personal power. He is the last man on earth who might have been expected to betray Hitler—but that, after all, is in the best mystery-story tradition.

IN THE BRIGHT MAY MOONLIGHT BRITAIN and the Nazis have been trading heavy blows. For several weeks the German bombers have been concentrating on British ports, where there have been heavy casualties and a massive destruction of homes. How much damage has also been done to port facilities and shipbuilding yards is naturally a military secret. Inevitably these raids must cause economic dislocation, but there is no evidence that they have seriously interrupted the rhythm of industrial production or that they have shaken morale. The great attack on London on the night of May 10, in the course of which some of the capital's most beautiful ancient buildings were battered, has been advertised by the Nazis themselves as "a revenge raid." This is a new and open avowal of terror tactics. Britain's war effort will not be reduced by the razing of Westminster Abbey, nor will Parliament cease to be effective even though its historic chamber is gutted. But such vandalism may well increase the British demand for reprisals. British raids on Germany during the past week have been directed mainly at the industries and shipyards of Hamburg and Bremen and at the railroad centers and steel and chemical plants of the Rhineland. Attacks on Berlin have been only on a minor scale, perhaps designed chiefly to appease British opinion. In the other raids, however, large forces have been employed, and the fury of German reactions suggests that the new high-explosive bombs hit many important targets. The offensive power of the R. A. F. seems definitely on the upgrade.

THE NEAR EAST STILL SEEMS LIKELY TO BE the theater of the next German offensive, but Balkan conquests have first to be consolidated and various diplomatic and military preparations completed. Greece, apparently, is being wooed with kind words, but the Serbs are being subjected to the same kind of ruthless ferocity that the Poles have experienced. In the western desert temporary stalemate continues under the blazing fury of the African sun. The British still hold Tobruk strongly and by so doing discourage any further advance by the Axis forces at Sollum. In Iraq, Rashid Ali's small air force has been broken and his troops forced to retreat at several key points. Reports indicate that he has failed to gain the support either of his own countrymen or of other Arab nations. He has yet to receive any military backing from the Axis, and it now seems that his hand was forced by the arrival of British troops at Basra before the Germans and Italians were ready to send aid. There have been reports of demands made on General Dentz, Vichy's commander in Syria, to allow German forces to occupy certain strategic bases and airfields. Probably these are premature, for it seems likely that Syria is one of the chief matters under discussion in the negotiations between Admiral Darlan and the Nazis. A preliminary agreement has been reached easing slightly the barriers between unoccupied and occupied France, and discussions are going forward with a view to reducing payments for the army of occupation by 25 per cent—which will still leave Germany a handsome profit to devote to the buying up of French industry. What the quid pro quo is to be has yet to be disclosed. Since Syria is a mandated territory and not a colony, its control might be relinquished without breaking the letter of Pétain's pledges.

ISOLATIONISTS, RETREATING UNDER FIRE of a public opinion awakening to realities, are wavering between two contradictory arguments. On the one hand they rely on the Lindbergh thesis that since Britain is done for anyhow, help will be wasted; on the other they claim that the urgency of the Atlantic shipping situation is being exaggerated. Raising the question of convoys again, Senator Vandenberg quoted a letter from Admiral Land, chairman of the Maritime Commission, which said: "Between January 1 and April 30, 1941, 158 vessels of 781,914 gross tons were reported sunk in all parts of the world (according to our composite records, which we believe to be complete). Of these 158 vessels only 12, of 66,782 gross tons, cleared from United States ports." Following challenges from London, Admiral Land explained that his letter had been misconstrued. The figures given, he said were those of "sinkings reported by the press and other public sources of information. There is reason to believe that actual losses run substantially greater than reported losses." Statistics since released by the British Admiralty show that the difference between losses chronicled by Land's office and actual sinkings is indeed substantial. The April total was 488,124 tons, which, added to the revised figures of losses for the first quarter of the year, produces an aggregate for the past four months of over 1,600,000 tons. Another point to be noticed is that sinkings of ships actually carrying American goods are not the whole problem. The heaviest losses, it is said, occur on the east-west passage, and thus any attempt to measure the extent of the shipping crisis must take into account the accumulation of goods waiting in American ports for ships which fail to arrive.

GENERAL FRANCO'S LITTLE PURGE IN THE Spanish army and police and in the Ministry of the Interior has aroused widespread speculation. The friction which always existed between the old army officers and the Phalangists has undoubtedly been intensified by the misery of the country and the imminent possibility of invasion. The showdown has resulted in a shift in the balance of power in favor of the army, and Franco has been able to shove into key positions several men in whom he has personal confidence. But it would be reckless to conclude from these changes that Spain is preparing to free itself from Axis control and resist the threatened Nazi thrust toward Gibraltar. The newly installed officials are men whose opposition to the Phalanx implies no corresponding love for the democracies. General Carlos Asensio, the new Chief of Staff, is an able officer and an old friend of Franco's. He is also an extreme reactionary. Lieutenant General Alfredo Kindelas, who has been put in charge of Catalonia, was transferred from a similar post in the Balearics, which have never emerged from under the military control of Mussolini.

The changes in Spain probably have much the same significance as had the ousting of Laval and the appointment of Darlan in France. Hopeful commentators who looked then for a "firm" attitude toward Hitler forgot that the controlling factor in the situation was the military dominance of Germany. In the case of Franco, it is well to remember that there are 100,000 Nazi soldiers, officials, technicians, and Gestapo agents in Spain today.

INSPIRED STORIES ARE BEGINNING TO APPEAR in the Japanese press regarding the desirability of liquidating the "China incident." It is admitted for the first time that China's vast size makes its conquest prohibitively expensive if not altogether impossible. The all-important matter of "face" is taken care of by the insistence that the Japanese troops could easily defeat the Chinese if they could catch them and by renewed denunciations of American interference. Just how seriously this surprising maneuver should be taken, it is difficult to say. With American aid increasing and Soviet supplies still being delivered, there seems little likelihood that Chiang Kai-shek can be tricked into accepting anything short of complete restitution of Chinese sovereignty. And there is no indication that Japan's desire for peace has reached such an advanced stage. Articles in Japanese newspapers hint at the possibility of a withdrawal from some of the occupied sections of China in the hope that the remainder may be more easily pacified. Such a move would only dramatize the confusion of Japanese policy. It is apparent that the Japanese militarists are caught in a web of their own making. An embargo on oil would be the most effective way of making certain that they remain enmeshed.

WE BELIEVE THAT THE ADMINISTRATION has acted wisely in rounding up Germans and Italians charged with overstaying their leaves in this country. No doubt some of these men are not convinced Nazis and Fascists, but the control exercised by the totalitarian powers over their nationals makes it necessary to regard all Germans who are not outspokenly opposed to Hitler and Mussolini as potentially subversive. We hope that if these men cannot be returned to Europe some method will be found to keep them out of harm's way. Manfred Zapp and Günther Tonn, of the Trans-Ocean News Agency, who have been rearrested and held for deportation, are in a different category. They have openly been carrying on Nazi propaganda but, it is charged, have not registered with the State Department as foreign agents. Their activities have frequently been exposed in The Nation and elsewhere, and it is high time their wings were permanently clipped. But even these men, though far more important than the sailors, are comparatively small fry. It is well known that the real centers of Nazi propaganda and espionage in this country are the embassy and the consulates. And their most dangerous underlings are more likely to be found on Park Avenue than in the back streets of Yorkville.

TAX PROPOSALS PRESENTED TO CONGRESS last week by Leon Henderson and Marriner S. Eccles are better in most respects than the Treasury proposals on which we commented two weeks ago. They would eliminate the proposed excise levies on telephone bills, matches, candy, and chewing gum, but would impose much higher taxes on automobiles and other durable consumers' goods, the production of which competes with the defense program. This seems to us eminently sound in principle. The production of automobiles should be cut down far more than the 20 per cent now contemplated. In order to achieve this a tax of 50 or even 100 per cent on new cars would be justified. The Henderson-Eccles proposals also call for much higher excess-profits taxes and substantially higher gift and inheritance levies than are included in the Treasury plan. They would provide for a more moderate increase in the income and surtax rates on personal incomes in the lower brackets but would offset this, in part, by reducing the exemption for dependents. The tax on moderate incomes would be slightly higher than that proposed by the Congressional Committee, and the tax on large incomes would be substantially higher than under either of the previous plans.

Is Inflation Here?

DESPITE the Administration's efforts at price control, the commodity markets during the past few weeks have exhibited all the earmarks of the early stages of inflation. Moody's sensitive index of commodity prices rose more than 2 per cent in the week ending May 10, making a total increase since the outbreak of war of 37 per cent, half of which has been recorded since mid-February. To some extent prices of imported raw materials, which are not so easily subjected to control are responsible for this movement. But the greatest price increases in recent weeks have not been in imported commodities but in domestic farm products. Cotton rose from $11.81 a bale on May 3 to $12.42 on May 10. Wheat jumped from 94 to 96 cents a bushel, and corn rose nearly 4 cents a bushel in the same period.

This rapid increase in farm prices cannot be explained by rising demand or fear of short crops. Estimates of the 1941 winter wheat crop just released by the Department of Agriculture give it as 653,000,000 bushels, compared with last year's crop of 589,000,000 bushels.

This indicates a carry-over to next year of 515,000,000 bushels as compared with this year's record 390,000,000.

Crop prospects in general are excellent. The sole cause of the increased prices, therefore, seems to be speculation stimulated by the probable passage of the Fulmer bill, which would require that crop loans be made at 85 per cent of parity. An 85 per cent loan rate would guarantee farmers approximately $1.15 a bushel for wheat, 87 cents a bushel for corn, and 16 cents a pound for cotton, as compared with 83 cents a bushel for wheat, 75 cents a bushel for corn, and 12 cents a pound for cotton under existing legislation. It is estimated that enactment of the proposal would raise consumer prices for meat, dairy products, eggs, and poultry from 10 to 20 per cent above the present high levels.

Such an increase, it need hardly be pointed out, would raise havoc with the entire price-stabilization effort. It would certainly justify renewed demands for higher wages, and increased wages mean higher industrial costs, which in turn would lead to higher prices. No price administrator, regardless of his ability, can be expected to be successful if an important price sector is taken out of his hands and left at the mercies of Congress.

The situation provides a first-rate challenge to the President. If he is wholly sincere in his determination to prevent an inflationary price rise such as occurred in the last war, he will have to act quickly and decisively. This will not be easy. Nothing contains more political dynamite than a farm-subsidy bill. The difference between the House, which proposed a 75 per cent loan rate, and the Senate, which raised the ante to 85 per cent, have just been "compromised" by agreement on the higher figure. As an important matter of principle, either the bill should be defeated or the loan rate should be struck from it altogether; the loan rate should be left, as in the past, in the hands of the Department of Agriculture. It is an important matter of principle because it is evident that if price stabilization is to succeed, the fixing of prices must be taken wholly out of politics and intrusted to an administrative agency which has full power to act.

But why, it may be asked, should the farmer be singled out to bear the brunt of price stabilization? Workers have already received substantial wage increases; business profits are running far ahead of normal; why should not the farmer enjoy some of the benefits of prosperity? The answer is that the farmer is already obtaining the benefits of the war boom quite as much as the industrial worker and is likely to continue to profit from increased consumer buying. On April 15 the Department of Agriculture estimated that purchasing power of farm products had increased more than 10 per cent in the last year. This makes no allowance for the exceptionally sharp increase in farm prices which has occurred since that date. Reflecting the rise in farm purchasing power, sales of mail-order houses and farm-equipment manufacturers are from 20 to 50 per cent above their sales of a year ago.

Solicitude for the farmer, then, hardly justifies the wrecking of our price-stabilization machinery. The last war demonstrated that in the long run the farmer was the chief sufferer from a runaway inflation.

No Henbane for Japan?

THE President announced on May 10 that he had approved the recommendation of Brigadier General Russell L. Maxwell, administrator of export control, and had issued a proclamation placing eight additional articles under the export-licensing system. The articles are hyoscyamus (henbane), stramonium, columbium, tantalum, cryolite, fluorspar, chemical wood pulps, and digitalis seeds. Perhaps these materials are not less important for being little known. But this meticulous addition of obscure items to the list of articles for which an export license is required seems a little ludicrous beside the continued export to Japan of huge quantities of so important a war material as oil. The latest report of the Department of Commerce shows that our shipments of petroleum to Japan in March were 1,500,000 barrels, as compared with 1,280,000 barrels in February and 1,491,000 in January. These huge exports were in no way hindered by the necessity of obtaining licenses for them from General Maxwell, although when oil was put on the export license list last summer it was assumed this would be a virtual embargo. It has turned out instead to be a meaningless sop to sentiment for an oil embargo, and we continue to provide fuel for the Japanese navy and air force. And there is good reason to believe that Japan is not the only beneficiary of our willingness to let the oil companies, like our copper and steel magnates, make a profit on the sale of the materials of war to our enemies.

Few newspapers printed anything about the resolution introduced by Senator Gillette of Iowa and Congressman Coffee of Washington for a joint investigation into trade with the Axis powers in basic war materials. Too much money is involved here, and more courage is required than the average politician possesses. There are three possible channels through which the Axis may obtain supplies from this country. One is through Soviet purchases which would be later transferred to Germany. The trickle to which our trade with Russia has been reduced is sufficient evidence that this is not a major source of supply. The second, of course, requires no investigation. Our huge exports to Japan have been largely in war materials and machine tools. That some of this may be transhipped to Europe is indicated by the State Department's announcement that it has revoked all licenses for the shipment of scrap rubber to Japan and occupied parts of China, a belated move, like all the State Department's actions of this kind. For a rubber shortage here is already in sight. Washington correspondents were given to understand "off the record" that this move was designed to check one German source of supply—which would indicate that in some materials at least transshipments have been made from the Far East to Europe. There was a similar hint in the statement of Hugh Dalton, Minister of Economic Warfare, in London on April 25. Dalton said a shortage of ferrous alloys was developing in Germany and that negotiations were on in Washington to curb "supplies to enemy countries." Has Germany been obtaining American ferrous alloys, through Japan or Spain? For Spain is the third intermediary through which war materials may be reaching the Axis.

Senator Gillette, in introducing the joint resolution for an inquiry, referred to the testimony of Joseph Curran, head of the National Maritime Union, that Standard Oil was delivering oil to Spain's Canary Islands for transshipment to Germany and Italy. E. B. Lyman, publicity director of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, explained afterward to a representative of the Federated Press that "first of all, you must understand we are an international company—that is, Standard Oil of New Jersey is a holding company with subsidiaries in many countries. We must keep an international viewpoint. As a private company we cannot declare our own boycott. As a general principle we sell to anyone that wants to buy and can pay for it until the State Department places an embargo on any country."

We believe that the Senate and House should not only pass the Gillette-Coffee resolution but should instruct the joint committee to inquire what oil, copper, steel, and other materials made by American companies or their subsidiaries in Latin America, the Near East, and the Dutch East Indies are reaching the Axis. British-American oil companies in the Dutch East Indies have just renewed their sales agreement boosting oil exports to Japan from 494,000 to 1,800,000 tons a year. We should like to know how much oil Japan has been getting from American oil companies in the Near East. J. H. Carmical, the oil expert of the New York Times, reported last July 28 that earlier in the year Japanese oil interests had purchased 1,000,000 barrels of oil from the Anglo-Iranian Company, a majority of whose stock is owned by the British government. These British sales have been one of the principal arguments used by our oil companies against an embargo on sales of American oil to Japan. Both ought to be shut off.

Stalin Gets a New Job

BY LOUIS FISCHER

MOLOTOV has been purged. Stalin is Prime Minister in Molotov's place. Of late, too, Molotov has taken a back seat as Foreign Commissar—witness Stalin's direct conduct of the negotiations that led to the Soviet-Japanese pact in April. The trouble started soon after Molotov returned from Berlin late last year. In February V. G. Dekanozov, Soviet ambassador to Germany, became a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. That made him second to Molotov in the Soviet foreign service and thus a menace to Molotov. Simultaneously Paulina Zhemchuzhina, Molotov's wife, was demoted. Writing in The Nation of March 1, 1941, I said: "Either she is no longer Madame Molotov or this is a faint hint to Molotov that the purge may get him too." Apparently she is Madame Molotov.

Nobody in Russia has security. The next-to-the-highest and the lowest can always be purged. No Soviet citizen may enjoy personal authority or popularity, and Molotov has lately been too prominent. Stalin has no fear of Molotov. But Stalin is the kind of man who does not like to have around him even vaguely potential rivals.

The reasons for Stalin's self-appointment as Premier are psychological as well as political. Stalin has always aspired to be Premier. Before the removal of Rykov from that post in December, 1930, foreign correspondents in Moscow had definite information that Stalin would succeed him. Important Bolshevik leaders told me this, and I believe a tentative decision had been reached. But it was later revoked because of opposition. Stalin, it was argued, was not a Russian. Moreover, he was not yet omnipotent. Though he was crushing the right-wing Rykov-Bukharin-Tomsky opposition, it still lived, and Stalin did not wish to give it a weapon with which to beat him: it might have tried to rouse Russian nationalist sentiment against him if he had taken the premiership. (When Lenin died, his natural successor would have been Leo Kamenev, then in league with Stalin, a member of the dominant triumvirate and vice-premier under Lenin. He was not selected because he was a Jew. Instead, Rykov, the Great Russian, got the job.)

Stalin's highest personal goal has been to destroy the Lenin-Trotsky couplet created by history and to substitute a Lenin-Stalin or Stalin-Lenin couplet. This desire runs through all his acts. It would require him to have not merely Lenin's supreme power but also Lenin's supreme titles. Titles count to an "Asiatic." He was thwarted in 1930. But since then Stalin has demonstrated his Great Russianism better than most Russians. He has recently restored nearly all of czarist Russia's boundaries, and he has fostered Russian nationalism. The elevation of this Georgian to the post of Premier, therefore, will not shock the peasants and the Russian patriots today as it might have eleven years ago. At that time, moreover, some citizens might have said, "Who is this man?" or, "Stalin is usurping power." Now they can only comment that he has been the boss anyway; why shouldn't he have the title as well?

Stalin is sixty-two. If his life's ambition has been to wear Lenin's official mantle, this is the time to achieve it. Another circumstance intensified the urge. The Communist Party has become a rubber stamp. It has been merged with and submerged by the Soviet government. Stalin is leader of the party. That is now an empty distinction. So Stalin wanted to head the government. A Soviet crisis may intervene any day. Hitler may attack Russia, or he may subject Moscow to humiliating pressure which would prove the bankruptcy of Soviet diplomacy since Litvinov's dismissal. In such an event, Stalin would like to have in his hands not only all the reins of power but also the reins of office. Stalin is a supremely jealous man; anybody who has been near men in high positions knows how jealous they can be.

Moscow is jittery. Stalin anticipates decisions and developments of critical importance. For the entire strategy of the war has been changing. The New York Times of April 10 reported this statement by the Moscow Red Star, daily newspaper of the Red Army: "There can be no question of an invasion of Britain. The central burden of the war has been transferred from the west to the east." The Soviet-Nazi pact of August 23, 1939, and the subsequent "friendship" were made possible by Hitler's concentration on the war in the west. Stalin could rob in the east because Hitler was busy in the west. But if the plan for the invasion of England has been abandoned, the basis of the "good-neighbor" relationship between Russia and Germany is gone. I do not know whether the invasion of England is off. But the Red Star would not say so unless the most exalted residents of the Kremlin thought it; and if Stalin believes that "the burden of the war has been transferred from the west to the east"—and the heavy German troop concentrations on the Soviet frontier in March and April support the view—then Moscow has good reason to be worried.

Germany has an army of four million men, four million men all dressed up with few places to go; and they could go into Russia. The German army is stronger than the Soviet army. These circumstances will in future govern Stalin's policy. I never thought Soviet foreign policy "enigmatic" or opaque. But today certainly the situation is very clear. It is no longer a question of what Stalin will do. The question is: What will Hitler do to Stalin? Will he strike? Will he exact more economic aid and military collaboration?

These are the fruits of Soviet appeasement. When Chamberlain and Daladier appeased the fascists, Moscow railed, and preached that appeasement led to war and subjugation. Moscow was right. French appeasement led to the fall of France. British appeasement brought bombs on London, Liverpool, and Plymouth. Then Moscow took the path of appeasement. Its Munich was dated August 23, 1939. Appeasement always results first in peace and later in war or in ignominious defeat without war. Hitler is about to feed Stalin all the bitter apples of appeasement. Indeed, the feeding has already started: (1) the Soviet-Japanese treaty dictated by Hitler in the hope that it would encourage Japan to move south toward the Dutch East Indies and Singapore; (2) the withdrawal of diplomatic privileges from the envoys in Moscow of Nazi-occupied Belgium, Norway, and Yugoslavia (Why did Moscow not do this to the Norwegian envoy in May, 1940, and to the Belgian envoy in June, 1940); (3) Moscow's prompt recognition of the anti-British rebel of Bagdad.

Moscow is in a German vise. From the Arctic Ocean and Finland down to the delta of the Danube, the Black Sea, and now the islands commanding the vital Dardanelles, Nazi armed forces have encircled Soviet territory and Soviet waters. There is but one possible relief—to divert the German army away from Russia. For a moment, in a frantic attempt to engineer such a diversion, Stalin encouraged the Yugoslavs to fight and reprimanded Hungary for being anti-Yugoslav. But that effort failed; indeed, it helped precipitate the present acute state of German-Russian relations. If Hitler were to push into Africa through Spain or concentrate on Asia Minor, Moscow would breathe more easily, and if Hitler needed a road through Turkey for any such enterprise, Stalin would bless the move—if Hitler should ask him.

But I believe that no matter what campaigns the Reichswehr launches—unless it crosses the Channel to seize the British Isles—it will have sufficient reserve strength to command Stalin's obedience. Did Molotov point with dissatisfaction to the unfortunate results of Soviet-Nazi "friendship"? Did he evince coldness for the further Soviet sacrifices which this "friendship" may yet—and soon—demand? Perhaps he had a few doubts. Stalin has no doubts. Having weakened the regime and the army by the purges, which went much farther than most people realize, and having thus created many silent enemies, his personal position depends on peace, even at the cost of surrender to Hitler. To remain dictator he must remain an appeaser. By an iron logic Stalin attains the apex of individual power at the very moment when the Soviet regime is called upon to pay the highest price of appeasement.

The Cost of Knudsenism

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 11

A GOVERNMENT that cannot organize its own country for production cannot organize the world for freedom. So long as the Knudsens remain at the controls of defense we risk our own humiliation and the contempt of the nations we have encouraged to resist Hitler. Business-as-usual cannot produce arms fast enough.

"How can Britain and America hope to win the war this way?" a Greek asked an American correspondent as the Panzer divisions poured in on his country. "On October 28 Roosevelt pledged America's complete aid to Greece, but not a single cartridge has yet arrived from America." In a year's time the defense program has grown from four billions to forty, but headlines are not armament. When the backlogs of aircraft companies are eight times as large as their total production last year, ordinary methods will not deliver. One high army officer told the American Society of Tool Engineers on March 24 that the greatest service it could render defense was to teach manufacturers "to find ways and means of securing production with the tools at hand or the tools now in existence." Our success depends on our ability (1) to divert present productive facilities to arms manufacture, (2) to keep the big companies from monopolizing defense work, and (3) to bring every idle machine into use by subcontracting and "farming out" as much work as possible.

A confidential bulletin of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce says that the automobile industry is our greatest reservoir of machinery for defense production. Knudsen seems to have devoted a large part of his energies to keeping that a secret. Only 31⅓ per cent of last year's sales by his own company, General Motors, were for defense. In the first quarter of this year the proportion of defense sales rose to—almost 8 per cent. The President says he wants a new super-bomber program to turn out 500 bombers a month, but everyone seems to have forgotten that last October Knudsen and the automobile manufacturers promised us 1,000 bombers a month. They formed an Automotive Committee for Air Defense and announced that the work of manufacturing these bombers would be done "very largely with existing machinery and with little new equipment. Both time and facilities are lacking for development of new machine tools. The job is one of adaptation. . . ." Mr. Roosevelt might ask Knudsen to explain why the Automotive Committee was disbanded, the 1,000-bomber program whittled down to 300 a month, the decision to use existing automotive machinery abandoned. Six months have passed, and Ford and General Motors haven't finished haggling over the terms of the contracts under which new factories will be built to turn out parts for these bombers.

I am reliably informed that in its German factories General Motors is producing aircraft for Hitler. Why can't General Motors produce aircraft in its American factories? The answer, as I showed in a previous article, is that this would interfere with the current boom in automobile production. The proposal for a small-scale test of the Reuther plan was rejected by Knudsen. Knudsen promised weeks ago to supply Reuther with blueprints so he could work out the details of his proposal to manufacture planes in automobile factories, but the promise has yet to be kept. The American Machinist, organ of the machine-tool industry, said in its issue of April 2 that the Reuther plan had been "rejected squarely on its essential features—treatment of the automobile industry as one firm with the work parceled out in semi-compulsory fashion and labor participation in management—rather than on the rather irrelevant arguments as to whether the plan could actually produce 500 planes a day." The "irrelevant" is appalling.

Mr. Roosevelt says he wants every machine tool in the country put to work, but his wishes will remain ineffective as long as he depends on the OPM to carry them out. Our smaller factories and idle machines can be brought into production only by widespread "farming out" of orders, but when you farm out an order, you farm out the profit too. The Defense Commission has been issuing publicity on "farming out" since the first of the year—and quietly sabotaging the program all the while. The President's statement itself seems to have been the brain child of Knudsen's publicity office, and was apparently designed to provide a backfire against increasing criticism. The men who want to farm out orders were not consulted before the statement was issued, and it can be taken about as seriously as the State Department's moral lectures to Japan. The lectures do not interfere with shipments of American oil and copper to Japan, and the well-staged warnings of the OPM will not interfere with the backlogs of the big arms makers. By the middle of February the Bethlehem-du Pont group of companies, whence Knudsen himself comes, had 23 per cent of defense orders. Their huge backlogs in part explain why—according to OPM estimates—half the machine tools in this country are in use less than eight hours a day and many are idle. They also help to explain why the National Association of Manufacturers in its recent survey found that only 28 per cent of the country's manufacturing plants had received defense orders.

This contrast between idle machines and swollen backlogs may also provide a clue to the failure of the commission to do the obvious a year ago and order an inventory, industry by industry, of productive capacity. The findings would have raised too many uncomfortable questions, and the answers would have interfered both with business-as-usual and with the defense profits of big business. Such an inventory would have disclosed how many machines in the automobile industry could turn out parts of plants, tanks, and guns and have shown the vast reservoir of machine capacity in our smaller factories and our small towns. It would have led to plans like Reuther's for the automobile industry and Murray's for steel, and it would have demonstrated the need for community pools, a form of democratic organization for defense from which the Knudsens and most of the army and navy bureaucrats recoil. These pools of productive capacity, utilized by Beaverbrook in England, serve to parcel out work and orders to machine shops and firms too small to handle a whole contract by themselves.

Pools of this kind sprang up last fall in some fifty communities which took seriously the talk of bottlenecks and shortages. They found advice and encouragement in Morris Llewellyn Cooke, the famous Philadelphia consulting engineer, long an advocate of scientific management, who managed to find a cranny for himself in Sidney Hillman's division last October—Mr. Knudsen wasn't interested in his ideas. The community pools he helped to organize were given the run around, and he himself was shunted to one side in January just as the movement seemed to be making headway. The big-business crowd under Knudsen and John D. Biggers then took over, with a Kansas City furniture manufacturer as front man. The Navy Department had issued an "order" in January appealing, as the President now does, for wider subcontracting. But the order, like Mr. Roosevelt's statement, was hortatory. It was not implemented by any concrete changes in procurement methods. We need an executive order or a law directing procurement officers to force subcontracting, to take orders away from companies which refuse to subcontract, and to deny certificates of five-year amortization for plant expansion to manufacturers who are not utilizing all subcontract possibilities. The ease with which these certificates are now obtained encourages the manufacturer not to subcontract. Why should he share work and profits with smaller firms when he can get the government to finance a new plant for him?

Most of all we need a bureau under someone like

Cook to compile the information supplied by community pools and provide orders for them. They offer the best way to mobilize the American people for defense. A good example of these pools and their possibilities was provided in Beaver County, Pennsylvania. There local manufacturers, civic agencies, the New Deal housing authority, the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and the railroad brotherhoods joined in a model survey of its kind. They counted every idle machine and noted every idle square foot of floor space. They made a study of the products these idle facilities might turn out for defense. Though Beaver County already had several big concerns working at capacity and firms employing 77 per cent of the county's workers had defense orders, the survey uncovered an extraordinary variety of idle productive capacity for armament. Five modern machine-tool plants, with the skilled men to operate them, were working only two days a week. Of the seven plants in the county capable of producing alloy steels and aluminum castings, one was completely idle. One large plant equipped to make shells had been closed down for some years. The Beaver County committee came down here full of enthusiasm, with a handsomely bound brochure itemizing the facilities they had available for defense, ready to take orders through one or two of their larger manufacturers or to incorporate as a community committee and parcel out the work that way. They got nowhere.

I believe the President could find no better method to tap our unused reserves of machines and man-power than by encouraging these community committees. Through them he can reach down to the grass roots and set free the unused capacities in thousands of small business men, labor leaders, local "sparkplugs." They will organize themselves. The secret of the unsuspected energy put forth in great emergencies and in the great upheavals of history, such as the French Revolution, is that the hidden abilities of thousands of unknown men and women break through the crust of bureaucracy, monopoly, and habit. Must we wait for graver danger to shake the Knudsens loose and call forth this wide participation of the American people in the defense effort? Or can the President by wise leadership evoke it now? Much is to be gained by it—new ideas in defense production, the morale that comes from tasks to be performed, the habit of cooperation among ordinarily hostile elements. A democratic mobilization on a basis like Beaver County's would do more than speed defense; the attitudes developed would ease post-war reconstruction. But the big industrialists understand that a mobilization of this kind is a menace to monopoly. It can never come about as long as they are in charge of defense. They will try to keep "farming out" in their own hands, and as undemocratic as they can. Their background and training make it impossible for them to understand the meaning of a democratic defense or its necessity.

The St. Lawrence Bottleneck

BY BRYANT PUTNEY

FOR the second time since he came to office President Roosevelt has asked Congress to approve the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway and power project. The original St. Lawrence treaty between Canada and the United States, drawn up during the Hoover Administration, lacked twelve votes of winning the necessary two-thirds' majority when it came before the United States Senate in 1934. The course of events at home and abroad during the last seven years has made it clear, Mr. Roosevelt believes, that "the opposition which defeated the St. Lawrence treaty in 1934 was a mistaken opposition based on failure to appraise the full needs of the country and the world situation which was even then developing." Nevertheless, the same coalition of sectional and industrial interests which killed the project during the early days of the New Deal is seeking to block it again. The railroads, the power companies, and the coal-mining interests have launched a campaign to convince the American people that the proposal is a grandiose leaf-taking project which ought to be speedily squashed so that the country can turn its attention to more urgent matters.

Actually, completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence development would give enormous impetus to our own and Canada's defense projects by helping to overcome bottlenecks in transportation, electric-power production, and shipbuilding. It would strengthen our whole national economy and make possible the expansion of production and consumption upon which the survival of democracy depends.

If through rail traffic from Salt Lake City, say, and New York were obstructed by a hundred miles of narrow-gauge track just west of Chicago, only a lunatic could object to a plan to link the eastern and western sections by a standard-gauge track. What is proposed in the St. Lawrence agreement is not very different. To open the Great Lakes to deep-draft ocean shipping we need only build a new lock at Sault Ste. Marie, dredge a few feet of earth out of the channels and canals linking Lakes Huron, Erie, and Ontario, and improve the international section of the St. Lawrence between Lake Ontario and Montreal. The succession of short fourteen-foot canals which Canada has already built to circumvent the rapids in this part of the river must be deepened, and longer locks must be built. The waterway so constructed would have a minimum depth of twenty-seven feet—sufficient to accommodate 71 per cent of the world's merchant fleet. It would provide a 2,400-mile passage from Duluth, Minnesota, to the Atlantic, and 95 per cent of this distance would be open water.

Included in the agreement is a plan to develop hydroelectric power by harnessing the flow of the St. Lawrence River. A main navigation and power dam would be built across the St. Lawrence at Massena, New York, and a small control dam farther up the river. One power house would be built at Massena, on the American side, and another at Cornwall, Ontario, on the Canadian side. The 2,200,000 horse-power developed at the dam would be divided equally between the two countries. At Niagara Falls, 200 miles farther south, existing hydroelectric facilities would be improved to yield an additional 787,000 horse-power, and erosion-control works would be installed to preserve the scenic beauty of the falls. Plans of the New York State Power Authority call for the integration of the St. Lawrence and the Niagara developments in a transmission network capable of carrying about 670,000 horse-power as far as New York City.

The cost of the project to the federal government would be about $166,000,000. Under a federal-state agreement expected to be announced shortly at Washington, New York State would be given control of the generation and distribution of electric power and would pay $90,000,000 for the necessary construction in the Massena area. This cost would eventually be liquidated through the sale of power. Canada would pay for the construction of the canals on the St. Lawrence between Massena and Montreal.

The proposed seaway, to be completed in four years, would add about 10,000,000 tons to the annual freight-carrying capacity of the United States and about 6,000,000 tons to that of Canada. Even under normal conditions this new transport capacity would be absorbed by the needs of a growing population. With the United States embarking on the largest production program the world has ever known, and with the railroads almost wholly unprepared for any substantial increase in traffic, the new capacity will be urgently needed in 1945 to relieve the worst transportation shortage in our history. If the railroads tried to haul 10,000,000 additional tons of freight, they would have to order a large number of new locomotives and freight cars from companies which are now converting their plants to the production of tanks, gun carriages, and other armament.

Construction of the deep waterway can be expected to reduce transportation costs throughout the Great Lakes tributary area. The railroads now charge 95 cents to carry 100 pounds of oranges from Lake Wales, Florida, to Chicago. The haul from Lake Wales to Boston is 160 miles longer, but because the roads must compete with coastal shipping lines they charge only 80 cents for the same load. Extension of coastal, intercoastal, and trans-ocean shipping services to Great Lakes ports like Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, and Milwaukee would give the Middle West equal transportation advantages with the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaboard.

The 120-mile stretch of shallow water in the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Ogdensburg, New York, is one of the major bottlenecks in our naval and merchant shipbuilding program. If the canals which bypass the rapids in this section were twenty-seven instead of fourteen feet deep, and if the locks were 600 instead of 260 feet long, the extensive shipbuilding facilities on the Great Lakes—now either standing idle or operating part time as repair yards for lake steamers—could be utilized for the construction of the cruisers, destroyers, and ocean freighters needed to win the Battle of the Atlantic. Use of Great Lakes shipyards need not wait on completion of the waterway. Once the project is approved, production schedules of lake yards can be dovetailed into those of our ocean yards in such a way as to speed up our shipbuilding program by two or three years. If we began building the seaway this year, the new canals in the St. Lawrence would be ready for use by the time the craft laid down now in Great Lakes yards were completed. According to Navy Department schedules some of our cruisers and destroyers will not be delivered until 1947 and 1948. The use of Great Lakes yards would permit the construction of many of these vessels by 1945.

Yards and ways suitable for the construction of from twenty-five to thirty ships of cruiser size are now available, or could be made so within a few months, on the American shores of the Lakes. About a dozen ways of similar size are available in Canadian yards. In addition, there are facilities on both sides of the Lakes for building large numbers of destroyers, escort vessels, and other types of naval craft, as well as merchant ships. If cruiser construction were transferred to the Great Lakes, seacoast yards could build the urgently needed cargo ships, which can be put together at the rate of three or four a year. Shifting thirty cruisers from salt-water to fresh-water yards would enable us to build three or four hundred additional freighters in the next four years.

Great Lakes yards at the present time could handle perhaps $1,000,000,000 worth of building; naval contracts so far awarded to these yards—for construction of a few submarines, sub-chasers, and other small craft—total $115,000,000. At a time when the safety of the democratic world depends in large degree upon our speed in moving new vessels off the ways, it is tragic irony that the lack of a deep-water outlet to the sea prevents us from utilizing more than 10 per cent of the potential capacity of one of the greatest shipbuilding regions in the world.

Expansion of electro-process industries producing vital defense materials on both sides of the border in the St. Lawrence region is now being thwarted by lack of power. Two of the five aluminum plants in the United States are located in this region—one at Niagara Falls, the other at Massena. Both are now importing power from Canada, and these imports may be cut off within a few months because of Canada's expanding needs. Plants of Union Carbon and Carbide, the Vanadium Corporation, and other companies producing ferro-alloys, chemicals, aniline dyes, and abrasives in the Buffalo-Niagara area are likewise compelled to buy Canadian power. The Federal Power Commission estimates that by 1945, when St. Lawrence power could be made available, the shortage of capacity in up-state New York, with allowances made for additions already scheduled by private companies, will approximate 500,000 kilowatts. Since this estimate makes no provision for the expansion of aluminum production at Massena or Niagara, it should be considered highly conservative.

A St. Lawrence survey made recently by the Department of Commerce revealed that the failure of New York State to develop its water-power resources in recent years, and its dependence upon the more expensive steam-power generation, has led to a decline in the state's industrial activity while other states have been forging ahead. "It is fairly clear," the report declared, "that New York State will suffer under an increasing competitive disadvantage so long as available sources of cheap hydro power continue to be neglected. In the Buffalo area, where industry has been based on cheap power to a relatively large extent, the threat of stagnation is perhaps even more serious than in the rest of the state." The proposed St. Lawrence-Niagara development promises "a new lease on life to New York State industry, a source of cheap electricity which should make possible the resumption of manufacturing growth."

The cost of electricity to most classes of consumers in New York is higher than the average for the United States, and the cost to some types of users is the highest in the country. The St. Lawrence Survey estimates that the development of public hydroelectric power at Massena and Niagara would reduce the average cost per kilowatt-hour to farm and residential consumers 64 per cent below 1937 rates and the cost to commercial and industrial consumers 25 per cent. According to the New York State Power Authority, the proposed development would bring savings totaling $26,000,000 a year to all types of consumers.

These figures give a clue to what is behind the opposition of the power and coal companies to the St. Lawrence project. Yet the proposed development does not threaten existing utility investments. Though it would one of the largest in the world, the St. Lawrence-Niagara power project would provide less than three-fourths of the additional generating capacity that will be needed in the New York area during the next decade. If this development is not undertaken, privately owned steam plants will have to be built to meet the future demand. Apart from the question of national power policy, it would actually slow up our defense effort, since factories producing steam-generating equipment are engaged in meeting the heavy demands of regions not favored with abundant water resources. Under present circumstances, power could be developed by harnessing the St. Lawrence and Niagara rivers more speedily than building coal-burning plants.

Its opponents assert that as a defense measure the St. Lawrence project is worthless because a minimum of four years would be required for its completion, because men and materials badly needed for other purposes would have to be diverted to its construction, and because, when completed, the seaway and power plants would be highly vulnerable to aerial attack. Not one of these objections is justified. Since our entire shipbuilding program could be speeded up if the construction of cruisers were transferred to fresh-water yards, the benefits of the project would be immediate. In any case to restrict our defense planning to what can be done in the next few months is to invite disaster. The "emergency" will continue longer than that. If this were not true it would be foolish to build a two-ocean navy or a third set of locks at the Panama Canal, neither of which will be completed before 1945.

No real diversion of men and materials would be involved, for the transportation, shipbuilding, and power facilities that would be made available in the Great Lakes basin would otherwise have to be provided elsewhere. Far from slowing up our defense effort, construction of the St. Lawrence project would be a use of our resources to bring maximum results in a minimum of time. As for their vulnerability, St. Lawrence locks and dams would present no more attractive targets to aerial raiders than the navy yards and vital industrial areas along the eastern seaboard. It is difficult to believe that those who raise this bogey against the St. Lawrence project do so in good faith.

Anti-Semitism in Exile

BY WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

NO STORY that has come out of war-torn Europe throws a more macabre light on the ironies of this war than that of the anti-Semitism of the exiled Poles in England—the story of a small group of vain, obstinate Polish reactionaries abusing the hospitality of a liberal people by attempting to revive on English soil the vilest prejudices of pre-war Poland.

Of all the peoples in Europe who have been conquered and enslaved by the Nazis, the Poles have suffered most. The ordeal to which they have been subjected surpasses in barbarism and cruelty anything known before in modern warfare. In some respects the sufferings of the Poles have been greater even than those of the Jews. It was difficult for Germans to look down upon the Jews as an inferior race when the diabolical cleverness and far-reaching power of international Jewry were so harped on by Nazi propagandists. Mingled with the hatred of the individual Nazi for the Jew was inevitably a secret respect, even a degree of fear. But for the Slav the German had an unbounded contempt which could be easily converted into hatred and persecution. The Nazi movement capitalized this feeling for its own purposes. For years the Russian Communists were groomed as the future enemy. Then, at the eleventh hour, the Nazi-Soviet pact brought a sudden violent change. The despised, inferior Russians had to be accepted as friends and allies. The psychological wrench was very great and explains in part the ferocious cruelty with which the Nazis fell upon those other Slavs, the Poles.

Shamelessly and with brutal severity the Nazis have reduced the Poles to a condition of virtual slavery. The system of forced labor which they have introduced in practically every country of occupation has in Poland been supplemented with the mass deportation of nearly a million Polish men and women who are being forced to live and work in Germany under the most horrible conditions. The Nazis seem to take a special delight in humiliating the Poles. Poles are transported to Germany like cattle and are examined in the market-place and selected for labor as if they were actually slaves. Polish families are brutally separated, fathers and children being deliberately sent to different provinces. The Polish slaves are not allowed to live under the same roof with their masters. Any relationship between German women and Polish men is punished with typical Nazi barbarism. German newspapers have carried stories of German women who, with heads shaven and with placards on their breast, were driven through the streets as despised examples of Rassenschande simply because they had been caught speaking to a Pole.

In Warsaw and other Polish cities the Nazis have segregated not only the Jews but also the conquered Poles in ghettos. There are streets where Poles are not allowed to walk, cafes and theaters which Poles are not allowed to enter. There are "Jim Crow" street cars for Poles in Poland and "Jim Crow" carriages on Polish railways. Like the Jews, the Poles are often made to wear special badges and armlets to distinguish them from the Germans.

If suffering can ennoble a people, the Poles should have emerged from the past year and a half as a great and purified nation. Of the Poles in Poland this may be true. But Poland is shrouded in silence no less than in oppression, and it is impossible to know all the facts about it. The reaction of the Poles who have left their country, however, can be observed. In London today there are as many as thirteen Polish-language papers. The government-in-exile publishes its own propaganda with the cooperation of the British. It has an army, navy, air force, and parliament. Polish statesmen, journalists, and intellectual leaders have gone to London to join what is probably the largest émigré colony in the world. Its spokesman and leader, General Sikorski, is now in the United States conferring with President Roosevelt and other government officials.

One does not have to look beneath the surface of Polish life in exile to encounter what is probably the most fantastic paradox of the war period: the Poles in London, themselves the victim of hatred, bigotry, and racial discrimination, are permeated with the very spirit that made Poland the shambles that it now is. The temper of these Poles in exile is shot through with hatred of the Jews. Interminable discussions of the Jewish question began almost as soon as the first Polish exiles set foot on English soil and have continued to the present day, as if these children of a nation destroyed had no problem but that of the Jews to solve, as if anti-Semitism were the only thing left of old Poland worth preserving and transplanting to foreign soil.

Even the small remnant of the Polish army which was saved from France after Dunkirk was divided by racial prejudices. All Poles of military age in England were obliged to join the Polish army. Polish Jews who joined were soon made to feel that they were still the inferior race of Zhidi that they had been in Poland and were treated with that supercilious haughtiness which is characteristic of the Polish upper class. But having experienced several years of British freedom and equality, these Anglicized Jews could not stand such treatment and openly revolted against the humiliation. Ten Jewish military doctors resigned in a body. Before the matter reached a scandal stage, Premier Sikorski, who is also the commander-in-chief of the Polish army, stepped in and with a few energetic military orders put an end to the discrimination.

But an attitude which could be suppressed by military order in the army could not be eradicated from civil life and anti-Semitism has persisted among the exiles, particularly among the Polish intellectuals—professors, historians, writers, journalists, civil servants, former members of the Diet, and government officials. Writing under the assumed name of Wengerski, a Polish professor from the University of Cracow well known for his anti-Semitism in former days has published a book, "September, 1939" (issued by the official Polish publishing house in England), asserting that the fall of Poland was due primarily to the sympathy of the Polish Jews for Germany. Another Polish professor, J. Dittler has published a book on Poland's "surplus Jewish population"; a large number of Jews, he says, must emigrate from Poland if the Polish people are to thrive.

In the field of journalism the Polish exiles have displayed the same spirit. Of the dozen or more Polish papers published in England, practically all except the outspoken Socialist press are more or less permeated with anti-Semitism. The semi-official conservative Dziennik Polski and the liberal Wiadomostki Polskie voice it only occasionally, but the Jestem Polakem, organ of the Polish National Democrats, is brazenly carrying on anti-Jewish Nazi propaganda in the Polish language with all the embellishments of the Nazi racial "philosophy" and Julius Streicher's phraseology. In vain have Jewish groups in Great Britain protested against this propagation of Nazi ideas; in vain have outraged British liberals, headed by the London News Chronicle, stormed against this abuse of hospitality and insult to democracy on the part of the Polish exiles. At the time I write the Jestem Polakem is still appearing, despite efforts to stop its publication by cutting off its supply of paper, and is proudly proclaiming on British soil the validity of Hitler's racial theories—theories which have resulted in the enslavement also of the Poles.

The climax of this fantastic tragi-comedy was reached at the first session of the Polish National Council, or parliament in exile, which met recently in London. On this occasion the Jewish question was formally discussed in the classic manner of the Sejm in Warsaw. Those who spoke were not irresponsible Polish journalists but former deputies of the Sejm, party leaders like Yushviak, and Polish statesmen like General Zheligowski, "the hero of Wilno." In effect they declared that after the war Poland would have no place for the Jews, and that the only solution for the whole painful problem was to deport all European Jews to a desert island off the coast of Africa.

In this most inhuman of all wars, greater crimes than this have been committed, and greater outrages against decency and justice have been perpetrated. But somehow nothing is more depressing than these trivial words and acts of a people who have learned nothing from their great ordeal.

German Strategy: 1914 and 1941

BY ALFRED VAGTS

MANY if not most wars are wars refought. This has been seen often enough in Europe: every war between France and Germany in the past hundred years has been called a "war of retribution." From the nature of things it is more often the losers than the winners who wish to repeat the trial of strength. The wonder is that the victorious Allies did not reckon with the strength of the passion for revenge in the humiliated leaders of Germany's defeated army. That war potential was overlooked.

Each side was, indeed, determined to learn something from past experiences. The moral drawn by British conservatives was that there must never be such a war again; thinking that conservatism must be like-minded everywhere, they looked for cooperation from the conservatives of the German army. French military conservatives, though admitting the possibility of a fresh war, were comfortably convinced it would be a repetition of the last, another war of stalemate and attrition; conscious of victory, they did not examine the last conflict critically to find out how to wage a different and better war next time. The conservatives of the German army, however, drew a wholly different conclusion from their defeat: that there must be a new edition of the war, an improved and altered—if necessary, a revolutionized—edition. Looking back with neither repentance nor horror, and certainly not with complacency like the French, they were bitterly determined to extract the last ounce of teaching from every fact they could collect about the First World War.

Perhaps the great difference between this and previous conflicts is that the same men, on the German side, are fighting it who fought the earlier war. Henry Adams in 1913 could say: "There is no such thing as a real consequence in history; the generations are actually separated and unconnected." This time, however, the same generation has suffered defeat and achieved recovery. The generals of today were lieutenants, captains, or, at most, majors in the last war; with their memories reinforced by innumerable historical studies, they have fought over again the battles of the Marne, of Flanders, and of Verdun.

The true "have-nots" in Europe were these German officers, the losers of the last war. It was not Germany itself that lacked resources but the German army, constantly intriguing and finally clamoring for prestige, budgets, soldiers, tanks, and heavy guns, all preconditions for that victory which had escaped them so narrowly, as they pretended, in 1918. It was these officers who to a large extent dictated German historiography about the First World War. A systematic campaign, carried on abroad as well as at home, to remove the war-guilt onus did much to weaken the belief of non-German peoples in the "justness" of the Allied cause in the last war and consequently in the war to come; this was directed by an ex-officer, Alfred von Wegerer, well known in this country though hardly well understood in his function as an innocentiste. (How much the present war is concerned with the question of war-guilt is indicated by the fact that the Musée de la Guerre at Vincennes, the headquarters of French studies of the World War, has been "transferred" to Berlin, a rather significant part of the loot brought out of France.)

"FIELD-GRAY SOCIALISM"

While the German officers were thus remaking history, striving to repair the errors they had formerly committed through ignorance of the psychology of other peoples, they were also pondering the best way to master and remodel the German civilian world to overcome those "weaknesses" of morale and material that had proved so fatal. In 1915 and 1916, long before the Nazi Party was founded, younger generals like von Seeckt, who may go down in history as the earliest organizer of the German victories in this war, discussed plans to organize and indoctrinate labor, with the help of social and mass-nationalism, in a labor party "which should remain national." The multiple and successive causation process of such a complex structure as the German National Socialist Party cannot be fully described without mention of these early desires on the part of army and navy officers and the later protection given that party by the Reichswehr. Despite the disgust with Nazi methods occasionally betrayed by conservative officers, such a party was needed by them as perhaps the only means of organizing the masses in the Reich for war, and in particular of organizing the economy for war—that is, of sustaining what in Gestapo language is called Kriegsschauplatz Innerdeutschland, or the home front.

The National Socialist Party was the instrument chosen by the army to regiment the nation. It called itself socialist—"field-gray socialism" was said to have a long tradition in Prussia as a socialism freed from Marxism and grounded in the paternalism of the Reich, which in a world of uncertainty promised to take care of everyone within its borders and beyond, wherever Germans lived. As such it was opposed to the "plutocracy" of the Western democracies, which was said to have caused the First World War and to be attacking National Socialism because it feared that the Nazis would dethrone gold; this virulence against plutocracy was in fact an expression of the very old antagonism between the poor Prussian officer and the powers of finance in the Second Reich. When a German publishing house in 1937 brought out a translation of General J. G. Harbord's book on the A. E. F., it took the liberty of inserting a statement that the true causes for America's entry into the war in 1917 were rooted in the financial world. In July of last year a writer in Deutsche Wehr, a military weekly published for soldiers, said, "The world revolution kindled by the German Wehrmacht will also cure the peoples of the gold delusion and will cut a decisive stroke through all the effects of this gold mania, including those of an institutional character." Such a war economy as National Socialism, the same journal asserted in a later issue, would enable Germany to conquer the "Carthage of the twentieth century," England, and to retaliate for the murder of 762,796 German women and children, whose death, according to the calculations of Professor Shotwell, had been caused by the British hunger blockade.

The socialistic features of National Socialism were not, therefore, "put over" on the army, as so many conservatives abroad believed, unaware that army conservatism in Germany had always been peculiarly hostile to business and finance. Nor was the foreign policy of the Third Reich, the line-up with Russia, displeasing to army circles; in their accounts of the pre-1914 history of Germany the unpardonable error of earlier rulers was said to have been not the naval race with England but the non-renewal of the reinsurance treaty with Russia. This, it was maintained, had led to the fatal "encirclement" of the Second Reich. With increasing violence Germans of the Third Reich denounced this encirclement, which in actual fact was quite as much a self-isolation; in cold military language what they protested against was the dreadful war on two fronts. This was another error which the German fighters had decided not to suffer from again.

BISMARCK'S DREAD

Determination to prevent the repetition of a two-front war, a purely military consideration, was behind the bi-lateral pacts of non-aggression concluded by the future aggressors. Germany's efforts to prevent the formation of an eastern front with the help of Poland in the days of Litvinov's "indivisible peace," with the help of Russia after Rapallo in 1922, and again through the Moscow pact of 1939, had all the one military aim: to avoid what Bismarck dreaded above everything—the cauchemar des coalitions, the nightmare of coalitions. This cooperation with powers which had been called the worst names by Germany occasioned many misgivings among the Germans themselves. Hitler's eastern policy seemed highly inconsistent, not in keeping with his anti-Communist rantings. But as a visitor from the Third Reich who understood military matters once said to me: "While we listen to the Führer's speeches and watch Ribbentrop sign treaties, we also do a little lip-reading, and what we read is not the same thing heard by the world. Their lips silently say: Wait, we merely postpone the evil day for the eastern powers. One thing at a time, one artichoke leaf after another; not all at once again, as we did so recklessly after and before 1914, when the Germans thought they could not take on enough enemies and when exuberant soldiers wrote on the sides of box cars, 'War declarations still accepted here!'"

Such restraining influences were particularly called for between 1933 and 1939 as a check on the ambitious German navy. This service had been harder hit by the Versailles treaty even than the 100,000-man Reichswehr; moreover, many army officers during and after the World War held it responsible for having made England and the United States Germany's enemies and for having used funds and man-power that ought to have gone into the making of the additional army corps needed on the Marne in 1914. As a consequence the navy was even earlier and more thoroughly Nazified than the Reichswehr, for with the Stresemann policies continued, its outlook would have remained dark indeed. After visiting a warship in May, 1932, Goebbels wrote in his diaries:

The navy is fabulously in form. All of them, officers and men, are all the way for us. They read the Völkischer Beobachter and the Angriff [Goebbels's own paper]. From the cruiser Schlesien comes an officer to invite us to dinner. During all that time eager discussion. The lieutenants are fabulous slim fellows, true images of soldierly men. And all are for us. Poor Weimar system! I talk long and answer all questions. The navy is O. K. A few officers in civilian clothes go to the meetings.—"Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei."

Despite the eagerness of naval officers, the German navy was to be kept small in order to win British toleration for German rearmament on land and—what tradition-bound Britons did not realize in its full impact—for armament in the air. The Anglo-German naval treaty of 1935 seemed to the British to indicate that the Germans at last had become much more "reasonable" than in the pre-1914 days, when proposals for naval holidays had been rejected by the Reich Naval Office under Tirpitz. Even though a new Navy League was founded after 1933, in the place of the dissolved Flottenverein, to propagandize sea power in the Third Reich, particularly among industrial workers, the navy men, like the colonials agitating for the return of Germany's colonies, were told up to 1939 by the governing powers that they would have to wait. Meanwhile, the building of submarines and aircraft went on without interruption.

German students of the last war were also painfully aware that they or their former superiors had neglected the use or full development of certain potent arms like the tank, an oversight on Ludendorff's part which they found hard to forgive. If they had had tanks during the great spring offensive of 1918 they could have fully and finally separated the French and British armies in northern France. During the offensive of May, 1940, "the fast troops" which were missing in 1918 were on hand to make the deep and fast thrust to the Channel coast (Deutsche Wehr, July 17, 1940, in a parallel between the two offensives of March, 1918, and May, 1940). A little less outspokenness prevails about the faultless timing of the great attacks in Poland in September, 1939, and in Norway, where ground conditions helped the aggressor coming with the spring from the south rather than the defenders of Norway's autonomy in the northern part of the country. In each case the meteorological and ground conditions could not have been more favorable to the attacking Germans, who, however, would not praise themselves for this choice because at home and abroad they had declared that these offensives were undertaken solely in order to forestall impending British attacks.

CONQUEST OF PREJUDICE

Defeat drives out at least some prejudices, and it was the determination of the German army leaders that none were to stand in the way when arms or methods tried out by others were to be tested and adopted. For the conservative French and British, parachutists, the "air infantry" or "vertical attackers" originally developed by the Red Army as a military analogy to the revolutionary method of stirring up trouble behind the front of the governing class in a foreign country, possessed too much of the "carrion smell of the revolution" to be acceptable. No such prejudice prevailed on the German side. Nor was "danger" to men and machines a hindrance to the adoption and fullest utilization of dive-bombing methods which had originated elsewhere. Rather did the Stuka methods become the very expression of the fervent desires of the newest and youngest elements in the regenerated German army. "You go into a dive a lieutenant," goes a saying in that army, "and you either get hit or come out of it a captain." This meant that no prejudice, no deference to birth or seniority, was to stand, as they had stood so effectively and disastrously during the last World War, in the way of promotion of the fittest. Nothing is more fascinating to those who know the social significance of names in Germany than to see "new names" singled out in the daily communiqués of the German High Command and appearing in droves on the lists of the promoted, while the nobility is cited relatively less often. The highest commanding generals are still those whom Seeckt groomed for the coming war, but the names of the lower-ranking officers indicate that this war is a war of the German petty bourgeoisie, which has never before realized its aspirations as it does now; through National Socialism it partakes of the nationalism of the upper bourgeoisie and the socialism of the proletariat. War, this war, is the way for this hitherto undistinguished class to win distinction for its sons; at the same time the effort stops short of the extreme risk inasmuch as salaries and pensions are guaranteed to the bold.

With this equipment of men and morale, materials and methods, the Schlieffen plan, combined with certain features of Ludendorff's attacking methods, was to be tried over again. What it meant in strategical and tactical terms is at once too obvious and too technically involved for me to describe here. German military writers have done so in articles under significant titles—for example, Schlieffen's Cannae Theory and the War of Our Days (Deutsche Wehr, August 23, 1940). In political terms this plan meant that the small neutrals bordering on the Reich were to be treated with even less regard than in 1914. This time there were to be no neutrals, and no German qualms about neutral rights such as the half-hearted Bethmann-Hollweg had admitted in 1914 were to stand in the way of German victory. Besides, the function of these neutrals within the German war economy had changed fundamentally since 1914. Then this economy had relied on the surplus production and imports of these countries; now it wanted the whole of their stocks and of their agricultural and industrial productive power. (What other power had these neutrals?) In the world of neutrals, the feelings of two nations only were to be spared—those of the Soviet Union and the United States.

From the beginning the directors of German rearmament took care not to estrange America. German history professors in Berlin took Ambassador Dodd in hand and tried to make him overlook the sinister rearming that was going on under his nose. Wissen und Wehr, a military-science monthly, in March, 1938, expressed the hope that the United States would stick to the decision of 1920 and "take a conscious stand against Versailles and against a universal League of Nations of the Versailles brand. For what Germany has to say is no message of hatred and discord but—with due recognition obtained for Germany's vital claims, which the Führer has sharply defined and which are not to be renounced or limited—the message of a new order, a message of peace."

As compared with 1914-17, Germany since 1939 has invoked international law much less often and used infinitely less propaganda and sabotage against the United States. This indicates no higher moral standards on its part but rather a determination to use more caution, more self-restraint, to give less provocation for America's entry into the war on the side of Germany's enemies. A repetition of that intervention must by all means be avoided, and in particular an early or timely intervention. A German admiral inspecting the French coast in September, 1938, observed with satisfaction the destruction of Allied war monuments. "The American soldier who landed on the back of an eagle on the beach of St. Nazaire," he wrote, "has lost his sword. No one will repair it" (Deutsche Wehr, September 27, 1940). But no one will venture to say again that Americans can never cross the Atlantic in the face of German submarines.

EASTWARD TO CHECK AMERICA

The German war-makers have a great deal of respect for the industrial war potential of the United States; they tried to get the start of it by beginning their own war production well ahead of their M-day. Their "geopolitical" and industrial counterweight against this American might is, in the terms of times gone by, Mitteleuropa and Berlin-to-Bagdad; in the terms of our own day, the thrust toward Suez and through the Balkans, perhaps as far as the Persian Gulf, the firm control of a territory containing enough grain, oil, and metals to make up for German deficiencies. Control of this territory was considered as early as 1916 by generals like von Seeckt to be the most effective way to check America, whose entry into the war was even then expected by the German leaders.

Resumption of the Berlin-to-Bagdad march in the interest of Hitler's New Order for Europe—which is in many ways a copy, only worse, of Napoleon's nouveau système européen—is resumption of preparations against American participation in the present war. While they were marching eastward through the Balkans and outflanking Russia, the Germans were largely thinking westward. They are also thinking westward while driving eastward in North Africa, where their control will go far to exclude a possible landing—whether contemplated on this side of the Atlantic or not—of American forces in Africa. These operations serve to bring out that this New Order is essentially anti-American. As such it is by no means new—which is one more reason why Adolf I is also Wilhelm III, Oberster Kriegsherr of the second phase of the World War.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Jesse's Rod

And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a branch shall grow out of his roots.—Isaiah XI:1.

SINCE Banker Jones came out of Texas in the dark days of 1932 a thick institutional growth has sprung from the roots of his first planting—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That tree, in fact, is now merely the oldest and tallest of a grove which includes also the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Federal Housing Administration, the Federal National Mortgage Association, the RFC Mortgage Company, the Federal Home Loan Bank, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Disaster Loan Corporation, and the Import-Export Bank. In the past year a vigorous group of saplings have been added—the Metals Reserve Company, the Rubber Reserve Company, the Defense Plant Corporation, the Defense Supplies Corporation, and the Defense Homes Corporation.

This whole arboretum is now designated as the Federal Loan Agency, over which the infatigable Mr. Jones presides as administrator. As such he is the biggest investment banker in the country, and there are few fields of business where his influence has not been felt at one time or another. In the early days of the RFC he shored up many a tottering financial institution, but of late his popularity among his fellow-bankers has waned, for he is a believer in low interest rates and able to back his beliefs by actions.

Last year, as the defense program began to get under way, the banks claimed that if they were to help finance plant expansion the law must be amended so that government contracts could be assigned as security. Congress was impressed by the argument, and the necessary legislation went through. Bankers talked cheerfully of making loans, which would be amortized by government payments in the course of five years, on a 3 or 3½ per cent basis. But at this point Jesse's rod descended on their backs. The RFC, he announced, would be willing to arrange five-year loans at 1½ per cent interest in cases where the credit was extended on the basis of a "definite agreement for reimbursement" by the War Department or the Navy Department. This move damped the bankers' hopes of combining handsome profits with negligible risks and led to some bitter comments in the financial press. But as Mr. Jones wrote in a subsequent letter to P. D. Houston, president of the American Bankers' Association: "1½ per cent interest is a high rate for a government-guaranteed obligation with an average maturity of two and one-half years, and if the War and Navy contracts are not good, banks should not rely upon them as a basis, whatever the interest rates." That was straight professional talk from one banker to another, with no comeback possible.

Mr. Jones again had an impregnable case in the recent controversy over the state of Arkansas's \$136 million bond refunding. A nation-wide syndicate headed by the Chase National Bank, Kuhn, Loeb and Company, and the Mercantile Commerce Bank and Trust Company of St. Louis had been expected to make a bid for \$90 million of the issue, the remainder to be taken by the RFC on the same terms. However, as the day for calling the existing bonds approached, the bankers seemed uncertain whether they could take up the whole of their share, and they indicated that the interest rate would have to be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Mr. Jones considered this out of line with the yields obtainable on comparable issues and therefore took over the whole amount at an average of slightly less than 3.2 per cent. A howl against unfair government competition rose from the disappointed bankers, and the Wall Street Journal accused the RFC of risking the taxpayers' money in order to give Arkansas a cheap rate. But within a month Mr. Jones was able to announce that the whole \$90 million worth of bonds had been resold at a premium to various dealers and investment houses, including many of the original syndicate members. This implied plainly that the rate previously suggested by the bankers was higher than necessary to secure the distribution of these securities.

The latest move by the RFC to safeguard borrowers against unjustified interest rates is in the utilities field. During a press conference on April 30 Mr. Jones expressed approval of the Securities and Exchange Commission's new competitive-bidding rule and said that the RFC might submit bids in cases where the issues were too large for the bankers to handle; so as to insure "decent rates" for the borrowers. "We are perfectly willing," he went on, "to cooperate with investment bankers, not with a view to competing, but with a view to making funds available at low interest rates." It seems likely that this hint of steel beneath the velvet glove will not be lost on the financial district. With the RFC standing in the background ready to finance good risks on reasonable terms, efforts to defeat the SEC ruling either by collusive bidding or concerted refusals to bid at all are no longer practicable.

Meanwhile at least one branch of the financial community appears eager to appease Mr. Jones. The New York Stock Exchange, after long cogitations over the choice of a successor to "Bill" Martin, now in the army, has offered the post of paid president to Emil Schram, chairman of the RFC, who has been associated with Jesse Jones for seven years. Mr. Schram has not been regarded as one of the left-wing New Dealers, but he is a liberal with a rural background and as such should be able to freshen the atmosphere of Wall Street with a good western breeze. Originally a land-drainage expert, he will now have to tackle, among other problems, the removal of stagnant water in the brokerage business.

Whether he will be able to boost the Exchange's volume of business is another matter. At present Wall Street is definitely in bad shape. Few brokerage firms are able to make money so long as the daily average turnover is only a few hundred thousand shares. To some extent, at least, the trouble is due to a deep-seated lack of public confidence which dates back to the orgies of the twenties. That is a matter which Mr. Schram may be able to help remedy, provided he is given a free hand. But if he has been picked as a man willing to use his Washington connections to "fix" the SEC and other government agencies, the Stock Exchange is likely to suffer another disillusionment.

In the Wind

W. LEE O'DANIEL, the singing governor of Texas, which has passed both houses of the legislature. On April 4 he addressed a letter to a Boston industrialist urging consideration of Texas as a manufacturing locale on the basis of its restrictions on labor. Quotations from the governor's letter follow: "I think some of these wild-eyed labor-leader agitators . . . will think twice before they come to Texas to start their foolishness. We are not taking away from labor the right to strike. They can strike all they want and go fishing; but when they strike and quit their jobs we have plenty of other men in Texas. Anyone who . . . tries to prevent these men from working at the job which he has just quit will find himself picking cotton on one of our prison farms."

ANTI-SEMITISM, according to a recent report by a group of Negro ministers and teachers in Harlem, is again becoming an issue in the New York Negro community. The Christian Front has carried its campaign to Harlem, and a new anti-Semitic leader is rapidly being built up by the profascists. He is Charles Reed, who organizes picket lines around Jewish-owned stores and who works under the slogan "Hitler took from the Jews what belonged to the Germans; let us take from the Jews what belongs to Negroes."

JOHN MALONE, a financial writer on the Philadelphia Bulletin, was recently discharged for a "flagrant violation of Bulletin news policy." The "flagrant violation" was this lead on a story: "Last week should have been an opportune time for retail-store employees in this area to approach their bosses for a raise. The reason: business was good."

ELEVEN MEMBERS of the New York Newspaper Guild will soon be brought to trial for criticizing an action of the city's Guild leaders. The eleven are members of the press unit of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; in a letter to the secretary of the local they criticized the Guild leaders for precipitating the strike against the Jewish Day. Although the letter was not published anywhere, the Guild's executive committee regarded it as tantamount to strike-breaking. The I. L. G. W. U. unit claims that the letter was merely an exercise of intra-union freedom of expression and that it is being tried for lèse majesté.

IN ITS ISSUE of April 21 Father Coughlin's Social Justice gave its views on anti-Semitism. Semitism, it said, "in its tertiary, or third meaning, . . . is defined as 'Jewish politics or Jewish influence in the state or in society.' In [this] meaning Social Justice is definitely 'anti-Semitic'—and always will be—because we abhor Jewish influences in politics, Jewish influences in the state, and Jewish influences in society."

Soldiers' Saturday Nights

THE office of Bascom Johnson in the big new Federal Security Building in Washington looks a long way from the honky-tonks, the juke houses, the tourist cabins, and the dimly lighted trailers around the camps where the soldiers of a whole nation spend their Saturday nights. But he has taken on in defense a job he handled once before in another war, and handled well. He is dealing with a problem he has tracked around the world.

The problem of dealing with the oldest profession is not new to him. He needs luck in it, however; but so also—even if it seems strange to say it—do the girls, the bad girls of the hot places where now the soldiers are made to seem assailed.

Not everybody in Washington agrees with the official policy, being put into action by Mr. Johnson, of a national mobilization in a sort of national vice raid in all communities close to the camps. Around the corner from his office in the Federal Security Agency another official said of him, "If he put on a stovepipe hat he'd look like the picture of prohibition." That may do him injustice. Other men laughed at a law already halfway through Congress which would make prostitution near a camp a federal crime. There seems to be no end of bawdy jokes possible in connection with his job.

It is always possible to make morality funny even when it is very serious. But immorality in the places where the camps are can be hilarious and still terribly sad. Sad or not, in towns close to the camps, and particularly in adjacent towns just beyond the circle of the m. p.'s, the girls seem to be as determined as Mr. Johnson.

In one Louisiana town, when the community bought a certain piece of land to lease to the army—or sell to it cheap—the leading madam was a subscriber to that community fund, as she has been to all others. As morale officers are learning, lesser ladies than this madam became mobilized before the army did. One general at Fort Bragg told me that some of the scarlet sisters had even learned to put children on the steps of trailers in which they welcomed soldiers as camouflage against the m. p.'s.

But the most frequent disguise is the waitress's uniform. There are enough waitresses in a good many joints to stop waiting on table and become guests when there is demand for their company, as there often is. Wherever they are, the best disguise of all is no disguise at all but the simple fact that they look the ordinary, tow-headed country girls they are.

Not anything about the situation is a secret. Mr. Johnson knows all about it. Wisely a part of the program to save the soldiers from the consequences of sin goes beyond repression of the girls, and recreation and education for the men in uniform, to consideration of the problems of the prostitutes themselves—or girls who might become prostitutes. This does not mean trying to make good girls out of bad girls in any revival-meeting fashion. It does mean some attempt in the camp communities to deal with their welfare problems. Unfortunately, the welfare problems which hurry girls at the pace of the hottest nickelodeon music into the old trade in a big market of womenless men are not limited to the camp towns.

It is almost possible to trace the prevalence of prostitution and the incidence of syphilis up from the poverty of the Mexican border, through the deep South, to the safer, richer North. The prostitution around the camps where it is worst in the United States is the familiar prostitution of all lands where birth rates are high and incomes low. In Mississippi there once was a saying that the most whores came from Smith County. It might have been true: it was a poor piney-woods county, and its Sullivan's Hollow was the Mississippi phrase for the bottom of Mississippi.

Defense officials concerned with the safety of soldiers cannot, of course, solve all the problems connected with the prostitution they are going to "repress." Nobody can do that quickly. But the "waitresses" deserve some attention from welfare workers in places where they come from as well as from those around the camps. The federal wages-and-hours law specifically exempts their employers from paying them even minimum wages. They have to eat. Maybe they prefer to eat to the sound of "Bounce Me, Brother, with a Solid Four." Or they may be the naturally bad girls of a naturally bad land to which hundreds of thousands of the good boys of better places have been sent.

I am as much interested as Mr. Johnson is in protecting the boys from the girls. But without wishing for any relaxation of protection for the boys, I am for the girls, too. No generals are guarding them. No wide land regards their welfare as a part of its security. But the mobilization of a nation has brought them to national attention as a disturbing aspect of this democracy we defend.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Poem from France

TEN days ago a letter from a French friend in the unoccupied region mentioned, among other things, that he was sending "under separate cover a poem that is circulating widely among us here. Read it first," he added, "in the normal way; then fold it along the crease in the middle and read each half separately." On May 7 the poem arrived by air mail, typed on a single sheet of paper with no identification as to sender. The envelope had not been opened. Here are the verses with a literal translation, which unfortunately loses the double rhyme:

L'AME DE LA COLLABORATION PAR P. LAVAL

Aidons et admirons	le chancelier Hitler
L'Eternelle Angleterre	est indigne de vivre
Maudissons, écrasons	le peuple d'outremer
Le Nazi sur la terre	sera seul à survivre
Soyons donc le soutien	du Führer allemand
Des pays navigateurs	finira l'odyssée
A eux seuls appartient	un juste châtimement
La palme du vainqueur	attend la croix gammée

THE SOUL OF COLLABORATION BY P. LAVAL

Let's help and admire	Chancellor Hitler
Eternal England	is unworthy of living
Let's curse and crush	the race beyond the sea
The Nazis on this earth	will alone survive
Then let us be the aids	of the German Führer
Of the sea-going race	the Odyssey will end
To them alone belongs	a just punishment
The victor's glory	awaits the swastika.

The lines testify not only to the state of mind of the French but also to their age-old ingenuity. In the fourth chapter of "Zadig" Voltaire tells us how his hero tore up his tablet and threw the pieces into a rose bush after writing a poem to a lady. An envious courtier, finding one half of the poem, which seemed to contain an insult for the king, had Zadig and his friends imprisoned. They were released when the remainder of the tablet was found.

The spirit of Voltaire still walks the French earth.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Notes on a Spring Journey

THE PROCEEDS from Garden Week in Virginia this year went to Bundles for Britain. And spring itself seemed driven by emergency. It came suddenly and very early; production was speeded up, fruit blossoms fell more quickly than usual. I heard they were making paper apple blossoms for the festival in Winchester because the real ones had already faded. Tulips and iris, which should bloom tandem, flowered together. One's mind slipped easily into the pathetic fallacy, the feeling that spring was working overtime lest it be wiped out before the fruits were formed. And the sense of bombs falling in Europe hung like a precarious haze over the whole green, incredibly beautiful landscape from Washington to Williamsburg to Charlottesville, over the Skyline to Gettysburg and the dogwood grove at Valley Forge.

WASHINGTON IN THE SPRING. The way to Garden Week led through Washington, where the sun of defense is hot. Bottlenecks and bureaucracy seem to bloom faster than anything else in the kitchen garden of democracy; priorities have been slow; and too little planting is being done for the winter of post-defense. But there are promising shoots as well. The refusal to let Big Steel go into a price-and-profit spiral is one. The growing talk of union-company, not company-union, cooperation is another. The fact that most of this talk is going on in labor and left New Deal circles is not as discouraging as it might seem; for one cannot help feeling that labor is more powerful, having coped successfully with big industry, including Ford, and more intelligent, having studied Hitler and survived the Stalinist measles, than it has ever been. Labor, especially C. I. O. labor, has grown greatly in social awareness in the past few years; the days of pure and simple trade unionism are numbered. Labor knows its strength and its facts. It knows, for instance, that the defense program has been slowed not by strikes but by industry clinging to its patents and its profits, its privileges and differentials. Not even that nervous old lady the New York Times can give it a sense of guilt. The miners' delegation that walked so jauntily into Senator Truman's coal hearings knew that the real hitch was the determination of the "so-called Southern operators" (as O'Neill of the Northern operators called them) and the Southern Senators (who really looked like Art Young's Southern Senators) to preserve the principle of the differential, though in this case the Guffey Act has reduced the amount at issue to something like three cents on a ton of coal.

I spent a few minutes with Philip Murray and came away feeling that the difference between the archaic Bible oratory of John L. Lewis and Murray's quiet, reassuring, Scotch-burred speech was the difference between the revivalism necessary to organize the mass-production industries and the efficiency and social shrewdness now essential to keep the C. I. O. a going concern. With labor facing its greatest crisis, it was good to hear a lawyer for the C. I. O. speaking of the social future, both at home and abroad, in the same realistic, specific, and militant terms as he might have used in discussing a strike for better working conditions.

The dollar-a-year men describe themselves in this war as WOC (Without Compensation). . . . On the lower corner of a government building appears the neat notation, Bidders Entrance. . . . The current Washington quip is that defense is the OPM of the people.

EARLY AMERICA. Williamsburg, the colonial capital of Virginia, is well on the way to becoming an Early American Coney Island. The sleepy old town I saw some years ago has been practically demolished and its streets are overrun with tourists and horseless carriages. Not only have the public buildings of the eighteenth century been rebuilt, but some 177 private buildings have been torn down to make way for more restoration; and even the A. & P. now displays its wares in bowed colonial windows. It gets to be a little thick, this new, artificially pocked brick. The public buildings—the Capitol, the Governor's Palace, the Public Gaol, the Raleigh Tavern, the old courthouse—are in themselves intensely interesting; and Mrs. Rockefeller's fine collection of American folk art, on view in the Ludwell-Paradise house, is worth the trip to Williamsburg. The restoration of the public buildings would have been enough, for my taste. I understand that Colonial Williamsburg, Inc., encountered a good deal of resistance as it persisted in its typically American project of doing too much of a good thing, and I shared the feeling of many Virginians that this carpet-bagger Rockefeller had gone too far with this Reconstruction.

Virginia is solid for Britain; and during Garden Week it teemed with nobility and royalty, come to lend glamor for the benefit of Bundles for Britain. Lord Halifax was due in Charlottesville, where the presence of Th. Jefferson is almost palpable. A queer confrontation. But Jefferson was so far ahead of his time that Halifax, not Jefferson, is the ghost of the past. I'm told that some people at the University of Virginia still call its founder and designer "Mr." Jefferson, and his energy and ideas—so many, many ideas, inventions, plans carefully drawn on an architect's table of his own design—meet one at every turn.

The editorial pastures of the Virginia Quarterly Review and the building, designed by Jefferson, which houses it made me envious. . . . If you collect howlers you'll like the report of the Virginia student that Keats said that "Beauty is truth" and vice versa.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The National Gallery

ONE is tempted to open a description of the new museum in Washington with an itemized price list of its paintings. That would seem a simple and direct way of emphasizing the contrast between the spirit of the collection—which is preponderantly Renaissance and should be viewed in its correct historical perspective—and our own times. It would also bring to mind comparisons between the Medici and twentieth-century merchant princes, between the role of art in the quattro-cinque-cento and in the world today. The ramifications are numerous. They relate Uccello and Picasso, Dante and T. S. Eliot, Columbus and Freud, and they are based on the difference between an expanding world and a contracting one, or between man's successful struggle to dominate nature and his failure to dominate himself. The transition through the centuries from belief to skepticism includes war, revolution, and the invention of the machine; it is also marked by the consistent decline of human values (man's loss of a sense of personal identity) and the rise in value of the thing.

In just this connection it may be observed that Mr. Mellon's by-laws for the National Gallery make no provision for the inclusion of living art. Contemporary society, with its emphasis on use, has created no function for the spirit; consequently its products best command a market value in terms of the past, in which it still served some function. The difference between Botticelli employed as a talent by the Medicis and Botticelli acquired as an investment by Mr. Mellon is the difference between two systems: one concerned itself with man's origin and his relationship to the universe, while the other is preoccupied with man's survival and his relationship to his immediate environment. The spiritual expression of the former is quite logically converted into the materialistic equivalents of the latter; dead art becomes a live commodity. According to twentieth-century rates of exchange, a Raphael is as good as a yacht. That is the judgment of an era which has reduced the purpose of its own artists to something between the madhouse and kitsch—or, in terms of profit and loss, to an economic risk. Mr. Mellon, for example, paid $1,115,000 for the Alba Madonna, $800,000 for the Niccolini Madonna, $745,000 for St. George and the Dragon, $838,000 for Botticelli's Adoration of the Magi, $650,000 for Titian's Venus and the Mirror, and so on through a list which betrays something more than a simple love of beauty and the mystical experiences in life. We do not mean to suggest that Renaissance patronage was purely impersonal and idealistic in its motives, but it did exercise a creative and vital interest in the development of art; the interest, on the other hand, of our own Medicis is as posthumous as an inheritance tax.

The task of reviewing the collection, painting by painting, is almost impossible. It contains some six hundred pieces which are the joint gift of Mr. Mellon and Mr. Kress, ranging from the thirteenth century to the baroque and housed in a mock-Pantheon conceived by John Russell Pope. The exterior of the building itself is unimpressive, designed in a style which might be described as the Grant's Tomb American classical, a dismal attempt at architectural dignity accomplished by means of an opaque, windowless façade, squat proportions, and the sudden, unexpected height of an enormous cupola, crowning it all like a non-sequitur. The interior, although it is well lighted and well installed, communicates that same cold, mausoleum-like atmosphere, spreading through some fifty galleries, one opening interminably upon the other, until I had the feeling I was boring my way through solid pink marble. I mention the physical monotony of the place because it is characteristic of the museum as a whole. The collection lacks and requires variety. Both Mr. Mellon and Mr. Kress share an overwhelming and almost exclusive devotion to Italian art. (In fact, Mr. Kress's devotion has even been recognized by the Italian government to the extent of his elevation to the rank of a Knight of the Grand Cross of the Order of the Crown of Italy.)

There are startling omissions and even stranger inclusions. Often one finds the work of an entire school of disciples but no examples of the master; sometimes there are examples which are unauthentic or belong to an inferior, transitional period in the artist's career. We are offered the School of Orcagna but no Orcagna, the School of Piero della Francesca but no Francesca, Luini but no Leonardo da Vinci. Of the Lorenzetti brothers, the work of Ambrogio, which was the only important painting to come out of fifteenth-century Tuscany, is missing, although Pietro Lorenzetti, who succeeded in resisting the Renaissance, and a follower of Pietro

Lorenzetti are represented. The Germans muster a Dürer (even questioned in the catalogue) and two English Holbeins; there is no Schongauer, Grünewald, Wohlgemut, or Pleydenwurf. Van Eyck leads off the Flemish with a superb "Annunciation," although Rubens is only dubiously present in a portrait of "Isabella Brant" commonly attributed to Van Dyck, while Breughel, Bosch, and the important Flemish primitives are nowhere to be seen. There are nine Rembrandts to bolster up the Dutch, of which two only are really noteworthy, and a number of calendar-pieces by Hobbema to the exclusion of Ruisdael; one may also find a Nicolas Maes, whose chief virtue is his religious imitation of Rembrandt, but no Dirk Bouts, Goltzius, or Poelemburg. The French section is the real scandal of the exhibition; it contains an inconsequential Lancret and two Chardins and ignores almost in its entirety a painting tradition second in importance only to the Renaissance. The hiatus becomes all the more conspicuous in comparison with the plethora of Milanese, Siennese, Florentine, and Umbrian pupils, imitators, and journeymen. Giovanni del Biondo, Giovanni da Bologna, Giovanni da Milano, Giovanni di Niccolò da Pisa, Giampietrino, Tino di Camaino, Ambrogio de' Predis, Pietro da Montepulciano, to mention a few at random, but no Claude, Poussin, Fragonard, Watteau, Ingres, Courbet, or Delacroix. It should be remembered, too, that the collectors had unlimited resources at their disposal, that price, as they say, was no object. In fact, much the same sort of choice, care, and discrimination which would ordinarily be spent on compiling a valuable collection of stamps has gone into the selection of the pictures. We should like to add parenthetically for those who look upon this enormous museum as just a seed and germ of art that although it depends upon the government for support, its control remains perpetually in the hands of the Mellon family; so that no brash inconsistencies in policy or taste are likely to occur in the future. CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

A New Wave of Old Tyranny

THE WAVE OF THE PAST. By R. H. Markham. University of North Carolina Press. 25 cents. Cloth, $1.

SIZE is not grandeur, as Thomas Huxley wrote, and success is not necessarily value. Mr. Markham's book of thirty-five pages is worth more than all the achievements of the German military machine—at least from the point of view of that morality which Christ, Buddha, and Confucius heralded and embodied. But we are bound to admit that cave men, too, have their ethics, which become manifest in bombs and flame-throwers, in the slaughter of women and children ad maiorem Germaniae gloriam. Admirers of success who are anxious not to miss a possible bandwagon may even call these ethics the "wave of the future."

Mr. Markham's views are different. He thinks the "new order" is neither new nor an order. As early as King David's time Absalom became "a sort of Führer or Duce." The Nazi order is no newer "than the temples of Luxor, Egypt" or the Pyramids at Giza, built by enslaving "millions for one man," as the Hungarian poet, Madach, expressed it. Little it matters that the Leviathan of Hobbes is substituted for the stony memorials preserving the embalmed Pharaohs. It would not be easy to disprove that "the totalitarian state is the old tyrannical state made more destructive" or rather "a temporary resurgence of a black and bloody wave of the past."

Students of mankind's past are likely to indorse Mr. Markham's statement that "every bright page in history tells something of human liberation"; and that the wave of the future "in all the lands among all the peoples has been a movement toward more freedom." The story of our civilization, indeed, is the record of our gradual release from the tyranny of nature and the despotism of men. If mechanized cave men could be defeated with arguments, Markham's sermon on human history would become a powerful weapon. But the Nazis and their fellow-travelers understand only the language of machine-guns and the philosophy of depth charges.

However, those who jabber of the "wave of the future" pretend that war, crimes, and cruelties are but the scum on this wave; citing the French Revolution, they say that some good may come of all these undesirable happenings. To this Mr. Markham retorts that the French Revolution destroyed absolutism, whereas the new wave would restore it. I think we had better drop the comparison altogether, not merely because there was no Montesquieu, Rousseau, Diderot, or d'Alembert to usher in fascism, but also because it is doubtful whether the inconsistency of liberty and equality, the surge of nationalism as a heritage of the French Revolution, are, indeed, so valuable as to justify the hope that an eventual benefit may be derived from the ascendancy of cave men professing cave-man philosophy.

The arguments offered by the author certainly suffice to convince those who use their own brains and who are not utterly devoid of the moral principles common to civilized men. Mr. Markham's brilliant style admirably combines the good qualities of a missionary and a town crier. There is a story that someone hearing the chant of the latter in a German town—"the clock has struck midnight; beware ye all of fire and light"—remarked to his friend: "What sense has all this? Whoever is awake knows it is midnight, and those who are asleep do not hear him." "Yes," replied his friend, "but there are a good many who are drowsing." Persons who are inclined to nap may be aroused to danger by Mr. Markham's little masterpiece. RUSTEN VAMBERY

Holmes and Pollock

HOLMES-POLLOCK LETTERS: THE CORRESPONDENCE OF MR. JUSTICE HOLMES AND SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, 1874-1932. Edited by Mark DeWolfe Howe. Harvard University Press. $7.50.

THE major interest of Americans in these letters will naturally be evoked much more by those of Holmes than by those of Pollock. Yet Pollock was doubtless a necessary foil for Holmes's best. He was the more learned man of the two, but much the less vital. He could write about Arabian syntax; Holmes could not. But on the antiquities of common-law doctrine they were on a par. On constitutional law Pollock was sympathetic with Holmes, because in England what Parliament says goes, except as it can be diluted by interpretation when Parliament is slipshod or is uncertain about what it really wants.

Both men were aristocrats, in thought and in an insulation against what we are wont to call social sympathy. Their economic tenets let them dismiss socialism with almost a brief brandish of the pen. Holmes thought that anti-trust laws were foolish and mistaken. He wrote about flow of goods and seemed unaware of what economic power can do to those without it. Those who have wrongly claimed him as a radical will now have ample evidence to modify their meed of praise.

His great achievement as a Supreme Court justice came in part from his skepticism and his complete awareness that his preferences were his preferences and not of necessity dictates of nature or of the broad phrases of the Constitution. His greatest zest as a lawyer seemed to be for nice tracing of common-law doctrine back to its original font. And as a common-law judge he was unduly cautious about being creative. Changes were for the legislature, and when the legislature willed, judges must obey, unless some negative in the Constitution were clear and compelling.

All this, however, is a minor matter for the reader of these two rich volumes of a correspondence of nearly fifty years between two of the most learned and acute lawyers of a century and two scholars and thinkers who were equally at home in history, philosophy, and literature. On page after page there is good wine which needs no bush from a reviewer. Holmes is the more human and has the lighter touch. He relished frivolities which had little temptation for Pollock. Yet both swapped views on life's ultimates and the cosmos with a profundity worn so lightly that one wonders why the professional philosophers must so often be so wearisome and so reluctant to shoot directly at the target posed most plainly by the only questions which really press for answer.

Richness and breadth and depth have seldom if ever been borne more gaily. Some of the legal genealogizing of the earlier interchange may have but a limited appeal, but those who start skipping may miss gems that are not beyond their power to appraise. Holmes on the whole is as good as his talk, and those who have had the privilege of his talk cannot say more in tribute. Pollock is much better than any of his talk that has ever been reported. His shy averted face does not put its chains on his pen; and never did his learning or his decorum turn a valve against the bubbling that was Holmes.

Holmes writes little of his actual doings, outside of his engrossing job on the Supreme Court. He writes much of his reading and his thinking. It is something of a surprise that so much of his heavy reading was pursued from a sense of duty, usually in hopes of something more than he found. For his light reading he had great zest. He was dominantly interested in ideas, though skeptical about conclusions and ultimates, and his letters are filled with flashes of insight, as were his more formal essays and his talk. His thoughts often repeat themselves, but without getting stale. They are shots at the same target, but from different angles, or at different targets, from the same angle. Those on law and on philosophy will be in the main familiar to those who have read him elsewhere, though here they are often still more pungent, when prompted by a particular book or by something just at hand from Pollock. There is more that is new in the swift comments on literature and art. Good as these are, however, there may be a regret that the decorum that was Pollock and perhaps the decorum that was Holmes robbed the letters of some of the famous one-line book reviews that sparkled in his talk.

Though Holmes wrote but little about the big constitutional controversies in which he gave his famous dissents, he wrote enough to emphasize the core of his conviction that it is not the function of a Supreme Court justice to try to play God. The contrast between his attitude and that of Chief Justice Taft as exposed in Taft's perhaps too revealing letters throws a bright light on the ineptitude that lay behind the demand for judicial reformation in 1937. Now that the reformation has come, it would be tempting to speculate where Holmes would stand in the new alignment. The safest answer would seem to be that he would not belong in any strong-willed determined camp. His make-up was far from that of a reforming enthusiast. He had zeal enough in his protests, but in constitutional matters it was the zeal of self-denial. In him were a depth and reach that were safeguards against too great eagerness for immediate special ends. He wrote that certitude is not the test of certainty. He was the thinker rather than the governor. His thinking still may govern after the governors are gone.

THOMAS REED POWELL

Irvin Cobb's World

EXIT LAUGHING. By Irvin S. Cobb. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

IRVIN S. COBB has written a rambling, loose-jointed autobiography set in a world that ended sometime during the 1920's. Up to that time Cobb, who omits the exact date of his birth but admits it happened in Paducah, Kentucky, "two days before Custer and his men were wiped out," found life exciting, amusing, and profitable. But the times changed, and Irvin Cobb didn't. His reactions to such modernisms as income taxes, government regulation of industry, and social legislation strike the only sour note in a book that is in the main nostalgic and mellow. It reveals the author as a kindly, modest, well-meaning, "folksy" fellow; a defender of decency in life, letters, and politics. Missing entirely are the vituperations he poured upon President Roosevelt and the New Deal when he spoke over the radio during the 1940 Presidential campaign. But, then, Cobb is too skilful a writer to spoil his effects. His aim is to titillate and please the reader. In this he is successful.

A handy man with an adjective, possessing a sure touch for the bizarre, he is always a first-class journalist and storyteller. During his long career as reporter, war correspondent during the First World War, creator of the Judge Priest stories, lecturer, after-dinner speaker, scenarist, actor, and radio performer he met and knew the great and near-great. There are stories about Pulitzer and Chapin of the World, Woodrow Wilson, Calvin Coolidge, Theodore Roosevelt, William Travers Jerome, and many others. There are anecdotes about his boyhood days in the South, his World War adventures, his experiences as a Chautauqua lecturer, and his impressions of Hollywood. In fact, the book gives a one-sided but fascinating picture of life in America from 1900 until about 1928. "Exit Laughing" is swift, easy, harmless entertainment.

ART

Architecture of the TVA

QUITE plainly there is something unusually heartening and bracing about the architecture of the TVA, with its huge program of eleven dams and associated power plants, navigation locks, fertilizer plants and other industries, its fish hatcheries, its highways through recreational parks, its reforestation showing as pattern on the ground, its erosion-control projects, rural electric lines, defense plants, and new communities. Writers try to deal with the Tennessee Valley like Whitman. Younger architects report an experience not unlike getting religion. The director of the Museum of Modern Art in New York, in the course of opening the current show, said bluntly that the architecture of the TVA was "the greatest that America had yet produced."

The show itself is built around the magnificent photographs for which the Authority is noted, and which translate the homogeneity of the endeavor with a fine consistency of their own.

What is there about a building project such as that of the TVA that puts it so entirely apart from other large correlated ventures such as Rockefeller Center? The difference lies in the sense of something big being done for literally everybody, of unbounded power used with unreserved magnanimity.

Even in technical terms, the problem set in the Tennessee Valley had an unprecedented scope, complexity, and grandeur of scale, and the designers knew it. Of architecture as an art it used to be said that it dealt with the inclosure of space. That was when the primary concern was with individual buildings. Then projects of a higher class were conceived—involving a consistent character for whole city areas or royal estates, as in the squares of Bloomsbury, the boulevards of Haussmann, the gardens of Versailles. In the Valley, however, architecture has taken hold of an area of 40,000 square miles, inhabited by 2,000,000 people, based on 650 miles of the all-important river.

Really to get hold of the idea, it is necessary to be quite strict in thinking of the whole Valley as the unit that was reshaped. The dams are merely the climaxes. The wooded areas and more level farms are an element that it was not necessary to touch. Nevertheless, they played their assigned parts in a grand theme first announced through the contour plowing of sloping hillsides, and then carried with ever-increasing complexity into the industrial culmination.

Before going into the handsome way in which this larger theme was knit, it may be well to speak of the most obvious part, the dams, locks, and power houses. The grand scale was not frittered away. The usual American dam is a giant with Lilliputian scholars and clowns posturing all over his back in togas or cap and bells. The ruggedness at TVA, the blocky big simplicity that is found even in auxiliary structures such as, for example, the control house at Gunthersville, may seem to casual visitors to be a natural consequence or purely "functional." This is not so. It is carefully evoked, a matter of design having to do with proportion, craftsmanship with materials, placing, scale, and a sense of the drama in the whole thing. Consider, if you will, the tall dam at Norris with the power house at its foot. The stately curved profile of the dam itself is the result of pure engineering calculation, but the way in which the power house below has been juxtaposed as a compact cube, off-center, and the way its openings have been cut in the geometrically patterned surface, even the way the roof has been covered with concrete slabs chiefly for the appearance from above, all are architecture in its oldest and most basic sense.

Much could be written on the cunning correlations made all up and down the line, and the more serious reader is referred to Architectural Forum for August and Pencil Points for November, both 1939. These magazines, along with the exhibit at the Modern Museum, give some notion of what was produced in the way of a new index of current American design, in which the controlling thought was to hold to the larger purposes, to be neither clumsy nor overclever, to do generously the job at hand and then quit.

What remains to be done here is to insist on the larger view of architecture itself that TVA has generated. A glimpse of this larger formative pattern might be found in the cunning that quarried the stone so as to leave behind parking slips for pleasure boats after the water had risen. The same thought could be found in the design of roads as a new kind of "freeway" assuring both more rapid deliveries for farmers and a greater enjoyment of the landscape for the visitor on vacation. It could be found in the multiple-minded fashion in which means were shaped to several sets of ends and the entire area so homogeneously treated that there could be no reason for confining the term "architecture" to the one part where the materials used happened to be concrete and steel instead of soil, trees, water surfaces, or rock. Here all elements conveyed the same theme—of nature tended and controlled so as to yield nourishment, power, and enjoyment all together.

It's as if Joshua had fit a new battle of Jericho and the walls had come tumblin' down. In the forward view that is opened at TVA the walls, even the big ones, have dropped to a minor role. The glimpse that is given is of man working upon the whole of his environment to put it into habitable, workable, agreeable, and friendly shape. As a concept, architecture can today be no less.

The spirit manifest in TVA shows that the designers were aware of such an aim and sought for architectural expression that would make it speak. There is something still further that seems important in the Valley. Here the complexity of the planning put the American people to a severe test, and they came out of it with colors flying, with a collaborative venture. Not only did the architects collaborate with the engineers, and both with the farmers, and so on, but nobody had his name put on a commemorative tablet. All the inscriptions give only the date and the motto, "Built for the People of the United States." It could have been added, "—and by Them." In this collaborative effort the people of America showed themselves so much more than the equals of any loudmouth for some superimposed "new" order that their doubts ought to dissolve away.

Mayor LaGuardia told, with great effect, how close we came at the start to thinking it was "too big" for us and "giving it all away." The thought that a people might turn nerveless now that a TVA has been built, and proceed to give over, is enough to make one sick.

RECORDS

BACH'S own translations of his works from the terms of one medium into those of another are cited as justifying the work of modern transcribers: he made clavier concertos out of violin concertos, a movement of a concerto into a choral movement of a church cantata. But the important thing about all this is that each different form of a work—even when thought out somewhat differently in the different terms of the different medium—is recognizably, unmistakably the expression of the same mind, personality, feeling; and this undoubtedly would be so if Bach were himself to transcribe one of his organ works for present-day orchestra. What his own transcriptions of his works demonstrate, in other words, is that a composer's instrumentation is no less an integral part of his artistic thought than a painter's color, and his way of scoring no less an expression of his way of feeling than is his way of writing melody and counterpoint. Even a Schönberg, then, applying orchestral color to the lines of Bach's texture with precision and subtlety that express his fastidiousness of mind and taste, imparts to the music an emotional quality that is not Bach's. The others—Stokowski, Respighi, Elgar, and the rest—remind me of what a musician I know said of Strauss: "Debussy is like a painter who looks at his canvas and asks himself what more he can take out; Strauss is like a painter who has covered every inch with paint and when there isn't another inch to cover takes the paint he has left and throws it at the canvas"; and they inject into Bach their own crude vulgarities and excitements. In Columbia's Set X-195 ($2.50), it is the uncomprehending vulgarity of Weiner, who orchestrated the Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C for organ, and the equally uncomprehending sensationalism of Mitropoulos, who performs this version with his Minneapolis Symphony.

The recording is clear and brilliant, with occasional rattles; and my set has one unusually noisy surface.

Then there are Stokowski's "syntheses" of Wagner—an impressive name for the monstrous procedure of tearing passages out of Wagner's original order and context and piecing them together in an order of Stokowski's contriving. Two years ago he recorded a "Tristan und Isolde: Prelude-Liebesnacht-Liebestod" which spliced together passages from Acts 2 and 3 and ended with the catastrophic conclusion of Act 2 instead of with what was described as "the conventional ending." Now he has recorded—this time with the American Youth Orchestra for Columbia (Set 427, $3.50)—what he calls "Love Music from Tristan und Isolde": the second-act duet beginning with "O sink hernieder," in which one is astonished to hear suddenly a few measures from Tristan's delirium in the third act, which in turn lead to "So stürben wir" of the second act, which eventually is spliced to the "conventional ending" of the opera. Years ago, when he recorded his first orchestral version of the second-act music, I pointed out that Wagner had used the color of the human voice with as much design and precision in this music as he had the colors of instruments, and that the music lost disastrously by the substitution of instruments for the voices; but in the present instance the strands of the texture are not even clearly defined in the murky fog of heaving, billowing sound without structural outline that comes off the first two records. There is clearer and sumptuous sound from the last record; but the style of performance remains the same—remains, that is, with its breaking up of every continuous line of phrase into discontinuous expansions and contractions of lush sonority, the final violation of the integrity and character of Wagner's music. The recording is also afflicted with bad rattles.

It is a relief and pleasure to turn from all this to the beautiful clarity and balance and refinement of the recorded sound, the imaginative power and musical taste and technical finish of the performance, in Columbia's set of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," made in England by Beecham and the London Philharmonic (Set 447, $3.50). The work is superb in substance, but diffuse and repetitious in form. And on a single disc (71049-D, $1) are three dances from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," played with verve by the Columbia Broadcasting Symphony under Barlow, and recorded with brash, reverberant brilliance.

Prokofiev's String Quartet Op. 50 is arid stuff, well performed by the Stuyvesant Quartet, and well recorded except for slight sharpness (Set 448, $3.50). And Ravel's "Valse Nobles et Sentimentales" are his usual slick trash, well played by Casadesu, and clearly recorded (Set X-194, $2).

That leaves a single disc (71048-D, $1) with Leporello's "Madamina, il catalogo è questo" and "Ah, pietà! Signori miei." The mischief and wit that Mozart put into the orchestra behind "Madamina" can be heard in the orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf, but only faintly behind the sonorous singing of Baccaloni.

To its valuable Add-A-Part recordings, which enable one to participate in performances of chamber music, Columbia has added its Student Music Library series, for which I think it claims a little too much. Someone playing the piano by himself and struggling with the particular pieces recorded by Sergius Kagen (Sets E-1 and E-2, $2 each) will find it helpful to have these recorded performances to turn to for an idea of the ordered and significant forms that are to be achieved out of the clutter of notes and beats and rests. But someone studying with a teacher gets this idea from his teacher; and while the teacher will want him to listen to what shape and significance a great artist gives to a piece of music, the work in such a case will be not a beginner's piece by Beethoven but one of the great sonatas or concertos, and the performer not Mr. Kagen but Schnabel. So with the volumes of violin music recorded by Alexander Cores (Set E-3) and 'cello music recorded by Bernard Greenhouse (Set E-4); and I would question the choice of music in the 'cello volume.

Letters to the Editors

Unfair Attacks on Wages

Dear Sirs: The sense of fair play of the American public is being unfairly exploited by certain employer spokesmen in what seems to be an attempt to reduce the percentage of national income that labor will receive during the war boom.

One line of attack assumes that if prices are to be frozen, it would be only fair to freeze wages also, by government action. It implies that this would be equal treatment for labor and capital. Actually, as war orders increase the volume of sales, percentage profits will greatly increase even if the sale price of individual items remains constant. And while profits thus soar, the wage-earner with frozen wage will have no such multiplication of his income.

Another widely broadcast attack upon high wages, this time with patriotic appeal, assumes that fair play should prevent workers from receiving high wages in safe jobs back home while the drafted men are getting ready to risk their lives on a mere pittance. It would seem more logical for the draftee to say, "I am giving up all chance of good wages to serve my country in defense of American democracy and living standards. In compensation, my country should let my father and brothers back home have higher wages than ever to protect my family and our wage standards while I am away."

Negroes in Defense

Dear Sirs: No fair-minded man can object to Jonathan Daniels's complaint published in your issue of April 26 that the South is not getting its fair share of defense contracts. But the same complaint applies with even greater force to the utter failure of defense industries to provide jobs for Negroes in anything approaching their proportion of the total population. In one vitally important line of defense production, aircraft manufacturing, the companies absolutely refuse to hire Negroes. As a result of this discrimination, joblessness persists in Negro communities just as before the defense program started, and the country is deprived of the use for defense purposes of an important section of its labor force.

This situation has another terribly serious aspect. As a trade unionist I am fully aware that the life or death of organized labor on the continent of Europe depends on the outcome of the war. As a Negro I know that our struggle for genuine justice and full democratic rights irrespective of race, creed, or color will be set back a generation or more if Hitler, with his vile racial ideas of a master race and slave races, wins the war. But the failure of colored Americans to gain any jobs from the defense program has left them a prey to the propaganda of supporters of totalitarianism of all kinds—Nazism, communism, anti-Semitism.

It should be plain that the defense of democracy must be in the hands of those who truly believe in and live up to democracy. Those who practice or light-heartedly ignore race discrimination are not genuine believers in democracy. The continued presence of such people in high government positions—Mr. Knudsen, for example, who refused to see a delegation of representative Negroes protesting against job discrimination—affords a basis for the propaganda of fifth columnists among Negroes.

Sandburg and Halifax

Dear Sirs: Lord Halifax on a Horse, Carl Sandburg's article in The Nation of April 26, would please Hitler, for it ridicules English aristocracy. As for Mr. Sandburg's scorn of English fox-hunting—a sport which, incidentally, is not in England confined to aristocrats—in the days of Andrew Jackson this attitude might have been considered red-blooded Americanism, but now such petty provincialism is generally left to demagogic politicians.

Mr. Sandburg also seems to object to Lord Halifax's traveling in a private car. This, however, is often done by Americans without unfavorable comment. Finally, he suggests that in America Lord Halifax should not ride a horse in a fox hunt because in Europe some people lack horse meat.

Why all this animus? Is it because Lord Halifax was born an aristocrat? Or—since Mr. Sandburg notes that he is an Anglican—is it because throughout a very busy life he has attended religious services before breakfast every day in the week? Perhaps some cannot forgive either aristocracy or piety.

The Nation fights valiantly against Hitler. It is a pity to aid him, even remotely, by awakening old prejudices.

FRED R. BRYSON

Little Rock, Ark., May 3

Dear Sirs: Carl Sandburg suggests that Lord Halifax and his fox-hunting antics in the United States were "merely indicative of a fraction of the British embassy which lives in the past and hopes the future will be the same." Blotched leaf after blotched leaf of the record of the British government since 1931 lends some credence to the suggestion that perhaps Lord Halifax, with his values and interpretations, constitutes more than a small fraction of the British embassy and its home government. To permit a license, a great deal is to be said for the proposition that it is an improper fraction—altogether improper in view of the increasingly "all-out" position being taken by the American people and government.

It may come to pass that a considerable part of the population of Great Britain will see that there was logic in the dispatch of Halifax to the United States, Hoare to Madrid; that the forces behind the "renounced" policy of appeasement linger on. If this should come to be the prevailing opinion, something may happen to shock both Lord Halifax and Mr. Sandburg. It is not at all inconceivable that Lord Halifax and his horse and all they represent may be torn apart and eaten.

Deferment and Strikes

coercion on the workers in any plant. However much one may regret strikes in defense industries, the facts have often proved them justified. Certainly it should not be in the power of a draft board to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the right of labor to strike.

The regulation permitting deferment to a person engaged in a defense industry, if it is to be interpreted in this way, may prove to be a Damoclean sword over the head of organized labor, and might better be abolished. If it is continued, the national draft board should promulgate a ruling to the effect that no worker deferred because of his employment in defense shall lose that deferment merely because he joins his fellow-workers in a strike.

LINCOLN LAUTERSTEIN

Cambridge, Mass., May 2

C. D. A. A. A., Jr.

Dear Sirs: In recent years the more prominent leaders of the youth organizations of this nation have prostituted their programs and members to a defense of the foreign policy of the U. S. S. R. As a result, American youth as a whole has come in for a great deal of unwarranted criticism. Some accuse us of being wholly divorced from any belief in democracy or trust in the American way of life. We are viewed contemptuously by many as skeptics drifting without a compass. Yet in spite of some false leaders, youth has still an unqualified faith in the promise of America.

There are, I admit, many reasons why youth should be critical of some of the aspects of our system. We have the right and the duty to point to the shortcomings of a political democracy which refuses to recognize the need for economic democracy. However, only by battling for the major tenets and basic axioms of a free society can we hope to arrive at a time when we can abolish the inequalities in America. This is a time for positive democracy. American young people should recognize their responsibilities.

When peace comes, American youth must demand (1) that no vindictive peace be written; (2) that some new form of world organization more effective than the League of Nations be created; (3) that America play a leading role in this new state and be not duped by isolationists into retreating once more from the battle for a New World Order based on the triumph of reason and justice.

In the minds of those whom I represent, the only assurance of the continuance of liberalism as a force in world politics is a victory of Great Britain and its allies. The least American youth can do is to present to the aggressors a united front of an aroused but critical student youth ready to defend a theory of government which gives it the right to be critical. Unless we are willing to battle the forces which would deny us this right, we shall lose the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity. Let us guard the right to be critical! Let us help those who are fighting for that right!

For the purpose of clearing youth's name of the stigma cast upon it by false representatives and to solidify the opinion of high-school students behind America's policy of all-out aid to Britain, the Committee to Defend Democracy has been organized as a junior division of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. Briefly, our program is this: (1) to oppose isolationism in all its manifestations; (2) to encourage people of foreign ancestry whose home lands have been overrun to support the exile governments of these nations; (3) to work for a just and lasting peace after the defeat of the aggressors. A complete statement of this policy will be sent to all who request it.

We would welcome the formation of associate committees in any part of the country. Anyone interested in our movement is urged to write to the Defend Democracy Committee, 516 Davis Street, Evanston, Illinois.

WILLIAM YOUNG,

Vice-Chairman

Evanston, Ill., May 6

India Is Calling

Dear Sirs: India is calling for help. Not audibly and not officially because that it cannot do. Nevertheless, the long-suffering Indian people are calling to our consciences.

Civil disobedience is on again. Jawaharlal Nehru has been imprisoned since the fall of 1940. Soon all British-Indian jails will again be filled to overflowing. How does it all agree with the slogan "We fight for freedom and democracy"?

Britain needs America's help and should get it, but it is our privilege and our duty to use the tool which Providence has placed in our hands. We should demand a solemn promise from the English to grant freedom to the Indian people when their own battle for "freedom" is over.

Exploitation of peoples or countries belongs neither to the progressive spirit of the twentieth century nor, I hope, to the coming democratic world order. It is in its way just as evil as fascism or dictatorship. Our great sympathy and respect for the British people should not dull our deeply felt compassion for our Indian friends. We are indeed our brother's keeper; let us not forget it even in this tense hour.

The Shape of Things

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN ADMIRAL DARLAN and the Nazis are still in progress. So far, the concessions obtained by the Vichy representative do little more than give France the privilege of being squeezed to death rather more slowly than heretofore. In accordance with Marshal Pétain's demand for the blind trust of the French people, nothing is being published about the price of German "generosity." Clearly the use of Syrian air bases is only a first instalment. Attempting to justify the accommodation offered to the German air force, which openly violated Pétain's many pledges against taking any action detrimental to France's former ally, General Dentz, Vichy's henchman in Syria, declared that the Nazi planes were all the victims of "forced landings." This impudent excuse is worthy of Goebbels's office and, indeed, may very well have originated there. It is hardly surprising that the British ignored it and proceeded to bomb the bases used by the Germans. By the time this issue appears, undeclared war may have broken out between the French in Syria and the British, for there is every reason to suppose that the former have already gone far beyond refueling Axis planes and are providing equipment to German troops brought in by air. It is also credibly reported that large quantities of French military stores have been dispatched to Iraq. However, despite the backing of the Axis, General Dentz's position is by no means secure. His much-reduced army has been carefully weeded of anti-Vichy elements, but it is doubtful whether it can be relied upon to fight the British. Moreover, while many Syrian Arabs sympathize with the Iraq nationalists, they have their own quarrel with France and may well seize the present opportunity to rebel.

AT THE SAME TIME THE DIFFICULTIES OF THE British in the Near East have been multiplied by French treachery, and despite some local successes their position is serious if not critical. The arrival of German planes and troops in Iraq, even though in limited numbers, has raised the flagging spirits of Rashid Ali and his followers and is helping to prolong a campaign that Britain can ill afford with so many other vulnerable spots to be guarded. It also increases the danger of a general Arab revolt, although this hope of the Axis may be thwarted by the many religious and political rivalries that have long cut across the pan-Arab movement. Some account of these factors is given by Raoul Aglion on page 607. Meanwhile it is worth noting that Ibn Saud, the most astute ruler in the Arabian world, is imitating Brer Rabbit. He has been intensively and expensively wooed by Germany and Italy, but undoubtedly he is well aware of the worth and purpose of their proffered "friendship."

WITH THE SURRENDER OF THE DUKE OF Aosta at Ambi Alagi the Italian East African empire vanishes, and the King of Italy's title of emperor becomes an empty one. No doubt the simultaneous announcement that a prince of the house of Savoy has been named King of Croatia is intended to compensate Italy by providing it with a new colony. For although Croatia is proclaimed as an independent state, the treaty which it has signed with Rome clearly gives it the status of a vassal. It is deprived of its natural outlet to the sea—the Dalmatian coast, which is now to be annexed by Italy—receiving only special facilities at Spalato and Ragusa, and has undertaken not to create a navy. Further the "independent Kingdom of Croatia," under its terrorist puppet dictator Ante Pavelich, has agreed to "collaborate" with Italy in everything concerning the organization of its army and has promised not to maintain any defense works which might interfere with Italian control of the Adriatic. Finally, Croatia is to be completely dependent economically on Italy and Germany. Already workers are being shipped to the Reich, and both the Axis powers are reported to be requisitioning huge quantities of raw materials, food, and other goods. Prices are soaring, and the peasants, distrusting the currencies offered them, are refusing to deliver commodities to the market. It is certain that the majority of Croats, however much they may have been irked by their former domination by Belgrade, will not welcome independence in this guise. Born in terror, the new kingdom seems doomed to a bloody, though probably brief, history.

TWO OBSERVERS WHO KNOW THEIR NAZIS give expert views, on other pages of this issue, concerning the mystery of Rudolf Hess. Whether his flight was the simple escape of a gangster who was about to be liquidated or part of an elaborate new attempt to revive appeasement is a matter of opinion. It cannot be a matter of known fact, though in either case it seems clear that, as one guesser remarked, the lone Nazi eagle is less confident of a German victory than the lone American eagle. Churchill's delayed statement may clarify the riddle. Meanwhile we are glad that the strange tendency to make something of a hero of Hess has shown a sharp decline.

ONE OF THE MORE ELOQUENT CONTRIBUTORS to this tendency was Hermann Rauschnig, who has achieved great prestige as a man of insight and a defender of democracy because he discovered after two years of hand-in-glove collaboration with Hitler that the Nazis were dangerous fanatics. In a long dispatch to the New York Times he described Nazi No. 3 as a "desperate patriot" and a "man of the highest bravery" who deserted Hitler when he saw that he was leading Germany to destruction and/or an alliance with Stalin.

Herr Hess was not only an opponent in war . . . but also a man of good-will, however little I want to whitewash him for his mistakes [sic!] and his complicity in Nazi crimes.

Rauschnig, of course, is defending himself. That is one phase of his career. But we prefer to his sultry sentimentality the statement of Ernest Bevin, simple and sharp as lightning, which had the effect of clearing the air.

You will understand my feeling about Hess [he said] when I say it was he who collected every index card of every trade-union leader in Germany, and when the time came they were either sent to concentration camps or murdered.

ALL KNOWLEDGE OF THE ZAMZAM'S FATE was at first denied by Berlin, but after the press had voiced the mounting anxiety and indignation of America, the Nazi authorities thought it better to admit that the vessel had been sunk by a raider, but that all aboard had been saved. This mitigates an act of piracy but does not excuse it. The Zamzam sailed under the flag of Egypt, a neutral state which the Axis powers had pressed to stay neutral. A majority of its passengers were American missionaries, but there were also on board twenty-four volunteer American ambulance men with their equipment, going to aid the Free French forces in Africa. The German communiqué declares that the ship carried contraband, but this is very positively denied by the American agents for the Egyptian Line. According to Berlin, the passengers and crew have been taken to "somewhere in occupied territory." We trust that the State Department will insist on the immediate release of all Americans among the captives.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECENT ORDER FOR A tenfold increase in bomber production indicates that he regards heavy bombers as at least a partial answer to the convoy problem. A few hundred of them might enable Britain to carry the war to Germany instead of having to fight chiefly over the British Isles. Even fifty "flying fortresses" in the hands of capable pilots might turn the tables for China against Japan. But the most important thing about heavy bombers, as far as the immediate situation is concerned, is that they do not need to be convoyed. They can be flown directly across. In fact, they can be used for convoy work, thus sparing more costly ships. Passage of the Administration bill permitting use of the foreign ships, including the French, recently seized in our harbors, promises to relieve somewhat the existing shipping shortage, and the intercoastal lines have recently placed forty freighters totaling some 300,000 tons in the hands of the Maritime Commission. But more effective means will have to be found for safeguarding vessels if Britain is to pull through the coming fall and winter. If bomber convoys are the answer, a way will have to be found to speed bomber production to a far greater extent than any yet proposed. *

VICHY'S ENTRY INTO ACTIVE ECONOMIC AND political cooperation with the Axis makes it necessary for the United States to reconsider its resources for giving immediate assistance to Britain, since Vichy's aid to Germany will be immediate. To increase production will not be enough, vital though that is; supplies must be released that we have hitherto considered indispensable for our own defense. And beyond the general question of aid to the Axis, Vichy's capitulation raises serious problems regarding Martinique and the other French possessions in the Western Hemisphere. Under the decisions taken at the Havana Conference last year the American nations are committed to the policy of preventing the Axis powers, directly or indirectly, from gaining a foothold in this continent. What action is to be taken in the face of this threat is of course a matter for the Inter-American Committee set up at Havana to decide. Unilateral action by the United States would be wholly unjustified. *

SECRETARY OF STATE HULL'S SPEECH IN observation of National Foreign Trade Week was perhaps more noteworthy for its spirit and intention than for its substance. In the main it was a call to the kind of easy-trading world which Hull has doggedly championed for the past two decades: an end to the dominance of economic nationalism with its excessive restrictions on trade, and to discrimination in commercial relations among countries; availability of raw materials to all nations; protection of consuming countries by regulation of the supply of commodities; and the reorganization of international finance to aid the development of all countries and make possible repayment of debts through trade. The formula may prove too simple for the world that will emerge from the appalling chaos of this war, but the address was none the less of prime importance as the first pronouncement by a responsible American official which could reasonably be considered a statement of war aims. There are plenty of social-minded isolationists in this country who demand war aims without recognizing that one ingredient of war aims is war; there are, on the other hand, plenty of interventionists who think only of beating Hitler and are willing to leave the future to chance. Hull falls into neither of these dangerous fallacies. He made it perfectly clear that the peace he envisioned could never be had without a defeat of the Nazi regime. In this he had the able backing of the President, who opened National Foreign Trade Week with a speech asserting that trade in a totalitarian world "would be merely another weapon for further ruthless aggression," and of Secretary of Agriculture Wickard. Whatever the merits of the Hull proposals—in the main they are good—we rejoice in the inclination to state peace aims now. Americans should know what they are sacrificing for and what they may have to fight for; Germans should know what to expect when they are rid of Adolf Hitler.

"TRADE UNIONISM IS AN EXTENSION OF democracy from the political into the industrial field. But trade unionism in the narrow sense, indeed even modern industrial unionism, will not be enough unless organized labor assumes certain fundamental responsibilities and for that purpose undertakes an even broader extension of the principles of democracy." We quote a passage from a speech by John Brophy of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which was remarkable for more than one reason. It committed the C. I. O. to full aid to the defenders of Great Britain; it recorded the specific and impressive plans that the C. I. O. has offered for more efficient production, devised out of the expert knowledge of men whose lives are bound up with production—the Murray plan, the Reuther plan, and the steel-production plan; and finally it projected an extension of production of both guns and butter that would not only fill the immediate needs of defense but insure the nation against another epidemic of post-war misery, economic and social. It was, in other words, an important statement of C. I. O. policy—a policy which might be defined as the determination to turn the imperialist-capitalist war into a struggle for an international democratic economy of abundance. In our opinion that is the only policy by which Hitler can be defeated. Yet Brophy's speech received little or no publicity in a press that hugs its view of labor as a band of irresponsibles exploiting the defense program; just as labor's constructive plans for increased production have had little or no attention from the OPM.

SOME REVISION OF DRAFT PROCEDURE SEEMS inevitable within the next few months, but reports as to the nature of the changes are conflicting and unreliable. Criticisms of the present draft system concern both the law and its administration. The chief weakness in the law, as shown by experience, is the drafting of men over thirty who have become settled in their careers while there is an abundance of younger men who have not yet obtained their first job. General Hershey has asked Congress to authorize the Selective Service to defer older men at its discretion. More serious than the matter of age have been the admitted blunders in administration. Local draft boards have differed widely in their interpretation of dependency, with the result that some have deferred all married men and others accepted them unless dependency was established beyond reasonable doubt. Most serious of all has been the practice of many draft boards of taking skilled workers from the defense industries merely because they did not press for deferment. Local draft boards have recently been specifically instructed to avoid such practices, but the instructions were not sent until shortages of skilled workers appeared as a result of thousands being inducted into the army. A broader conception of the purpose of the draft seems to be needed. At the moment the first line of our defense is in the factories and skilled professions. The draft should be modified to serve this need as well as to provide men for our armed forces.

Now We Must Act

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IT IS no longer possible to fool ourselves. The small remaining outlying areas of compromise have shriveled into non-existence. The deal between Vichy and Berlin has wiped out the last pretense on which the appeasers could base their miserable maneuvers. The France we honor and love lives only in opposition and latent rebellion. And the France of Darlan and Brinon and Pétain has met its appointed destiny; despite its denials, it has become openly the France of Abetz and Ribbentrop and Hitler. Mr. Roosevelt's appeal to the people of France to resist collaboration with the enemy was strong and moving. But it will mean nothing unless it is backed by actions in this country that speak at least as loud. The seizure of the French ships in American harbors may be a portent of such actions. But time presses; and the people and the opposition leaders in France can be expected to resist the traitors and tyrants who rule them only if they are given reason to hope that resistance can succeed. We must give them solid support, not only noble words. Too many noble words have been spoken in the past; too many hopes raised. The time for that is past, too.

Let's look at the record for a minute: it may clear our brains and strengthen our purposes for the days to come.

The present agony of the world was made by the appeasers. The failure to apply effective sanctions against Italy when it invaded Ethiopia in 1935 not only doomed Ethiopia to defeat; much more important, it notified Hitler that he could go into the Rhineland in 1936, and Japan that it could move into China in 1937. The treacherous non-intervention policy applied to Republican Spain did more than give Hitler and Mussolini their first victory over democracy on the Continent. It led directly to the catastrophe of Munich and to all that has followed. The futile gestures at Geneva against Japan's aggression succeeded merely in driving the Japanese out of the League while assuring them that their plan of conquest would be opposed only by China itself.

It is useful today to recall this history, and to consider American policy in its ugly light. Useful and disquieting. For one also recalls that the policy of the Roosevelt Administration toward the depredations of the dictators, from the invasion of Ethiopia to the capitulation of Vichy, has been a confusing mixture of outspoken condemnation and mealy-mouthed concessions and surrenders. At each crucial milepost on the way to disaster the appeasement state of mind has ruled. In the Ethiopian crisis we combined smug disapproval of Fascist aggression with a refusal to cut off Italy's oil supply. After all, why should we? Neither the oil companies nor the British Foreign Office wanted us to do it. Such an act would have exposed the pretenses of the great powers, which had never seriously intended to implement sanctions but rather, as the Hoare-Laval pact amply revealed, to sell Ethiopia for a mess of Fascist promises.

And what did we do about Spain? An unheard of thing. Our precedent-ridden State Department defied precedent to aid the overthrow of republicanism in Spain. We passed a special resolution, after the rebellion had started, prohibiting the shipment of war supplies to either side in a civil war. That made it possible to do what we had never done before—cut off arms from a legitimate, friendly government facing a military revolt. And so, of our own will, we shared the treachery perpetrated by the French and British appeasers and insured the victory of Franco and his Fascist backers. We might have saved the Spanish Republic. We could certainly have shown up the shameless farce of "non-intervention." But we preferred to trail the Chamberlains and Hoares down the broad road toward Munich. And when, along that road, Chamberlain made his ill-fated pact with Mussolini, the deal received the personal blessing of President Roosevelt. I have often wondered who in the State Department wrote that unbelievable note of congratulation.

Meanwhile Japan continued, as it continues today, to destroy the undefended villages and cities of China with bombs made out of American scrap dropped from planes fueled with American oil. Some women in the United States stopped buying silk stockings, but no oil companies stopped selling oil. And the United States government refused to embargo sales of war material to Japan.

It isn't a policy. It is a state of mind. It prefers to risk total catastrophe rather than an immediate, minor danger or even mere dislocation. Better play safe, is the guiding principle of the appeasement state of mind. So it "plays safe" until the nation and civilization itself are threatened with extinction.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt is not an appeaser. But he has acquiesced in the acts of appeasers in both the State Department and in the European democracies. And he must accept responsibility and blame for his acquiescence. His own desires have been on the side of resistance, and it was because the people sensed this that they voted him into office again last November. Every bold move he has made has brought an overwhelming response from the country. Every sign of hesitation or withdrawal has produced a quick reaction of anxiety. The people feel that in these days the safest policy is the boldest. They want no hesitation—and most of all they want no appeasement.

But appeasement still rules a broad area of our national policy. We still sell oil—all but the very best grade—to the Japanese. We still sell scrap—all but a few select varieties—to the Japanese. And at the very same time, while the bombs drop on China, we assure the Chungking government that they can count on our support, and we lend them $50,000,000 to stabilize their currency. But no other help can even approximate the help that an embargo on oil and metals to Japan would give to China.

Why don't we establish an embargo? Because, say the appeasers, Japan would seize the Dutch East Indies if we embargoed oil. (The appeasers had other reasons that satisfied them just as well in the days before Holland was overrun by the Nazis.) And the oil companies would lose a lot of business. And anyhow we are not at war with Japan, and an embargo would be looked upon as an unfriendly act. So the reasons pile up, and Japan is able, with our active help, to go on conquering China and preparing to conquer the Dutch Indies and the Philippines and the rest of the Pacific territories, and ultimately to fight us.

We send food to France, and up to the day of Pétain's capitulation we continued the pretense that the men of Vichy were the rulers of a nation instead of the agents of a conqueror. We have tried, by a diplomatic concession here and a food ship there, to buy Vichy out of the clutches of the German Armistice Commission and the German army. No wonder even the recipients of our bounty sneer at our "humanitarian" gestures. Those gestures are contemptible because they are neither honest charity nor successful strategy.

We send food to Franco's Spain. An important American diplomat in Central America said solemnly to me a month ago: "Thank heaven our State Department has the sense to discriminate between the Axis dictators and Franco. Spain deserves our sympathy and help, and Franco, after all, is a gentleman." I tried to remind him of the hundreds of thousands of Spanish Republicans tortured, executed, or shut up in jail. I mentioned the presence in Spain of uncounted Nazi agents and soldiers and the German guns at Ceuta and Algeciras. He was unconvinced. Spain was a victim not an accomplice; we could win its good-will and save it from the clutches of the Axis. And when the Nazis on the spot and their Spanish supporters usher in the German troops for the occupation of Gibraltar and Spain's bases on the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, this American diplomat and his hundred counterparts in the musty offices of the State Department will be shocked as they were shocked the other day by Vichy's capitulation—and when they have recovered, it may be too late to keep the Nazis out of the Azores and the Canary Islands.

It all goes together, because it is a state of mind. You placate Hitler and Mussolini and Franco and the Japanese. You prefer soft words to hard ones, and words to acts. You try to buy what you dare not command. You refuse to recognize facts when they are uncomfortable; and you always prefer diplomatic maneuvers to sturdy resistance.

Now it is over. The gentlemen of Vichy, whose robes of office have won such unctuous admiration, are finally admitted to be stark naked even by the bemused officials in Washington. Nothing is left for us but the necessity to act, and to plan our actions in the light of one cold, shining fact. In Europe we have only Hitler to deal with. There are Frenchmen left, and no doubt 90 per cent of them hate Hitler with an intensity we cannot even imagine. But there is no France. There are Spaniards, but no Spain. These and the other lands that have been conquered and occupied are no longer nations; they are raw materials and factories and above all bases; and they belong to Adolf Hitler.

Our job is immeasurably difficult and absolutely inescapable. We can no longer dodge and prepare ourselves to act at some remove in the future. Our job is to combine today with Great Britain—and with every existing anti-Nazi element in every country—to defeat Hitler by all the forces at our joint disposal. If this means sending an army to England or Africa we must do it. Certainly it does not mean that now. We have no army ready to send, and if we had, the sending of it would interfere with tasks that need doing immediately and at top speed. But it may mean supplying warships and planes, both to protect the goods we ship to Britain and to prevent the Nazis from seizing new strategic points of attack. Specifically it may mean collaborating with the British fleet and the forces of General de Gaulle to occupy the Portuguese and French islands and the French African ports before the Germans get there.

It means, too, producing goods for the war faster than we have done or thought we could possibly do. It surely means using American ships to carry those goods to the fighting fronts; and this in turn makes it necessary to wipe out the last legalistic pretense of "neutrality" that stands in the way of our full aid. It means freezing the credits of the Axis powers and ruthlessly preventing goods from reaching them, by whatever round-about routes. It means breaking off diplomatic relations, which no longer serve even as a useful source of information, and throwing out the agents of our acknowledged enemies. Perhaps more than all, it means carrying on an imaginative political war, in which we make use of every anti-fascist group and individual still free in any country on earth; giving them encouragement and support—and arms, where possible. It means, in short, an acceptance of the total meaning of total war; and this, I am afraid, demands a revolutionary change in Washington. The appeasement state of mind must be blasted out of the places of power or the fascists will win the battles of the future as they have won every major battle in the past.

But this we need not allow. We, the citizens of a free republic, can end the policy of dodging and cringing. We have only to say what we want—out loud and in one voice.

Up to Mr. Roosevelt

THERE are signs that the President's desire for full-capacity operation of our productive machinery for defense is slowly beginning to percolate through the bureaucracy of the OPM. But the response of the dollar-a-year men is still "too little and too late," in the manner of their counterparts in the democracies abroad. I. F. Stone's recent series of articles stressed the necessity for compulsory subcontracting and the utilization of the automobile industry's capacity for defense purposes. The ideas expressed seem to be making headway, for we note in the Wall Street Journal of May 13 a report from Washington that a new "twin drive to speed defense production is in the making." One phase of this drive, according to the Journal, will be compulsory subcontracting; the other, "compulsory diversion to defense manufacture of productive facilities now devoted to the production of civilian goods."

Despite industry's hostility to them, the main ideas of the Reuther plan, first disclosed in The Nation last December 21, retain their vitality. "One OPM official," the Wall Street Journal went on to say, "points out that the automobile industry could divert a substantial part of its facilities to defense work even though much of its machinery is the single-purpose type. By using the output of its machine shops and whatever machinery in its production lines is suitable for uses other than automobile manufacture, the industry could contribute considerably more to the defense program than it is at the present time . . . the same is true of practically every other industry." But there is no indication as yet that the automobile industry is to be asked to make these contributions to defense. The industry's resistance is easily explained. One of the greatest sellers' markets in its history is developing, and despite the current production boom dealers' stocks have dropped below those of a year ago. The automobile manufacturers hate to give up any part of this business for defense. Moreover, they probably make a good deal more money on their normal business than on defense orders, which is not true of many other industries. The latest National City Bank report shows that General Motors, Knudsen's company, is still averaging a shade less than 25 per cent a year on its investment. It does not seem to do so well on defense. While defense sales last year were 3½ per cent of total sales, the profits on defense sales were only about 1½ per cent of net profits.

The reluctance of the OPM to mobilize the automobile industry is matched by its reluctance to end the concentration of defense orders in the hands of a comparatively few great companies and speed up production by subcontracting. It is significant that the first hint of compulsory subcontracting came not from the dollar-a-year men but from the labor end of the OPM, in an interview with Sidney Hillman. Even then it seems to have been only in answer to a question that Hillman said it "might" be necessary to put something in defense contracts to require subcontracting. A few days later Joseph L. Trecker, co-chief of the defense-contracts service, which is in charge of subcontracting, uttered a similar hint at San Francisco. He told a regional meeting of the National Association of Manufacturers there that "if necessary" we might have to "take steps" to force subcontracting. The necessity is sufficiently demonstrated by his own admission in the speech that—one year after the launching of the defense program—we are still operating at only 50 per cent of capacity.

The Nation believes it the President's job to order an investigation of productive capacity in every industry that will show what it can do for defense and what pooling of its facilities would accomplish toward increasing productive efficiency. Obviously the dollar-a-year men cannot be trusted to make this survey alone, for they have fought against the suggestion and its implications. They must be aided by representatives of labor and independent engineering technicians. Obviously also, the President, if he wants to achieve the full operation he asked in his press conference of May 2, must take the initiative on subcontracting. We need an executive order providing for compulsory subcontracting and reallocation of orders where backlogs are so swollen that delivery cannot be made in any reasonable time. The fate of the world depends on the battle of production in America, and the President as commander-in-chief must take over personal direction of the fight. Not to do so is to risk disaster.

Their Monopoly, Right or Wrong

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 17

THE extraordinary story on aluminum unfolded here this week before the Truman committee investigating national defense has been meagerly reported in the press, but it is one that the people of this country and their President dare not ignore. On Wednesday morning Richard S. Reynolds, president of the Reynolds Metals Company, testified that early in the summer of 1939 Philippe Levelle, one of the officials of the French Aluminum Company, visited him at his home in Richmond, Virginia. "I had become quite concerned," Reynolds told the Senate committee, "over the knowledge that Germany was buying more bauxite from France than the French were reducing to aluminum metal, and I asked Mr. Levelle in regard to this, and he said that Germany was short of brass and was using the excess aluminum for making things like window frames and door knobs." Reynolds wondered whether this was the real reason Germany was buying so much bauxite. "I stated to him at that time I thought they were using it for airplanes and that France would later hear about it." But Levelle was as complacent about bauxite sales to the Reich as our steel and oil men—and some of our admirals and State Department officials—are about our continued steel and oil exports to Japan.

Men like Levelle control production of most of the basic war materials in this country, and we risk the fate of France so long as we leave them in control. In May of last year, after the Blitzkrieg began, Reynolds came up to Washington to see Senator Lister Hill of Alabama, a member of the Senate Military Affairs Committee. "I had become convinced in my own mind," Reynolds testified, "that this would be a light-metal war, and I had figured from my inadequate source of information that Germany, her allies and conquered territories, including France if conquered, could produce one billion pounds of aluminum, while the total production in the United States at that time was less than one-third of that amount." Senator Hill asked what could be done, and Reynolds said he would see Arthur Davis, chairman of the board of the Aluminum Company of America. Reynolds went to Davis and told him that "he should inform our government of the true situation and not permit us to be caught in the same position as France." Reynolds, whose company at that time merely fabricated aluminum, suggested that Davis ask the government for funds to enable the Aluminum Company of America to raise its output to one billion pounds of aluminum a year. Since so vast an expansion of aluminum capacity would lessen its scarcity and lower its price, thus interfering with the Aluminum Company of America's monopoly policies, Reynolds thought Davis could ask the government for "full protection to his company . . . these emergency plants should be closed at the end of the emergency so as not to embarrass the Aluminum Company." Even on this basis, however, Davis did not care to cooperate. "Mr. Davis felt that I was unnecessarily alarmed," Reynolds said, ". . . stating that in his opinion there was ample aluminum and that there would be no shortage." Davis's optimism turns out to have been as fatuous as Levelle's.

The most favorable picture of our aluminum situation was presented to the committee by W. L. Batt, who came to the OPM's production division from the SKF roller-bearing company. Batt said that if all present plans for expansion work out perfectly and "100 per cent on schedule," we shall have only 1,209,000,000 pounds of aluminum next year, although our "direct" military needs on the basis of present plans will be 1,400,000,000. This does not include "indirect" military needs. A more pessimistic picture was presented by Leland Olds, chairman of the Federal Power Commission, who indicated that he felt the OPM estimates of productive possibility were much too high. The production of aluminum is closely tied in with production of power, and that in turn is affected by rainfall. Olds said that if weather conditions adversely affected the hydroelectric plants supplying the Aluminum Company of America, it would be able to produce only 500,000,000 pounds of aluminum. Even under average water conditions, Olds said the Aluminum Company would be able to generate only enough power for the production of 642,000,000 pounds of aluminum in 1942.

This is a terribly serious situation, but it will be less so if we shake loose from the grip of the business-as-usual crowd. With RFC help, the comparatively tiny Reynolds Metals Company was able to build an aluminum plant and two metal-reduction plants in six months' time. Reynolds felt that the Aluminum Company of America could beat that record if it wanted to. "It is evident, in my mind," Reynolds testified, "that the production of aluminum ingots should not be allowed to embarrass or interfere with any possible requirements of defense. Aluminum ingots can be increased and multiplied as fast as aviation, automobile, and other defense contractors can expand their facilities." The way to get aluminum is to begin construction of a chain of government aluminum plants that will give us planes now and cheaper pots later.

The dollar-a-year men who make a great to-do about coming here to serve their country should be criticized even more severely than Mr. Davis and his Aluminum Company. Of these men, the one who bears the heaviest share of the responsibility for hiding the true facts on aluminum from the American people is Edward R. Stettinius, Jr. The testimony before the Truman committee provides a damning bill of particulars. Admissions wrung from the Aluminum Company's arrogant vice-president by Hugh Fulton, chief counsel for the committee, disclosed that at the time Stettinius was assuring the country that we had plenty of aluminum, the Aluminum Company of America was already unable to fill orders on its books. Moreover, according to the testimony of Grenville R. Holden of the Eastman-Kodak Company, a dollar-a-year consultant on light metals, Stettinius and the men around him tried to discourage Reynolds Metals from entering the aluminum-manufacturing field. They pigeon-holed an offer from a Swiss company to build an aluminum plant here at its own expense. They ignored offers of other companies to build aluminum-manufacturing plants, and they offered to help the Aluminum Company get around the Federal Power Commission's licensing regulations for the construction of a $37,000,000 power project at Fontana, North Carolina. The OPM in October announced that the Aluminum Company as its contribution to national defense was going to construct this power project to expand manufacture of aluminum. But the company abandoned the project rather than submit to the uniform-accounting and unearned-increment provisions of the Federal Power Act.

The subordination of public need and the country's safety to considerations of profit and monopoly was likewise disclosed in testimony on the priorities setup in aluminum. Priorities can be used by big business in war time to put smaller and less favored concerns out of business. One of the two civilian representatives on the Priorities Committee comes from General Motors, the other from a small aluminum-fabricating company completely at the mercy of Alcoa for its supplies. Senator Mead of New York expressed surprise that officials of companies using aluminum were allowed to determine priorities. "I can't imagine a Senator who was an officer in an aluminum company," he said, "participating in the tariff discussions of the Finance Committee and voting on that particular schedule in the Senate." In New York, he went on, the director of a private corporation was forbidden by law to vote on questions in which he had a private ax to grind. There has never been a bigger grinder of private axes than the OPM as now constituted.

The Mystery of Rudolf Hess

Hitler's Alter Ego

BY WILLIAM L. SHIRER

REGARDLESS of why Rudolf Hess made his fantastic flight to Scotland—and we must wait upon Mr. Churchill for the all-important answer—one fact stands out after an orgy of speculation and guessing such as this confused world has seldom indulged in before. It is simply that the Nazi regime, in the midst of a life-and-death struggle for existence, has lost one of its key men, and that Adolf Hitler, who is carrying the main burden of that struggle, has been deprived of an aide who was considered in inner Nazi Party circles to be indispensable to him.

Whether Hess flew to Britain with or without the connivance of Hitler does not alter the fact that he is lost to the Third Reich for the duration of the war. Nor does the contradiction in these two hypotheses detract from the importance of the weird journey. For if Hitler knew of it and approved it, his gamble must have been for high stakes. Otherwise he would not have sacrificed a man who was closer to him than any other and whose arrival in Britain, regardless of how Dr. Goebbels might explain it, was bound to spread consternation among party leaders and further bewilder the German people. If he did not know of it, then Hess's defection was even more important. It could not possibly be the result of another personal squabble—so common among the Nazi leaders—because Hess, whatever other characteristics he possessed, was neither vain nor ambitious. Moreover, he had been fanatically loyal to the Leader for nearly two decades. If, as C. Brooks Peters, in a dispatch from Berlin on May 7 to the New York Times, suggested, with a skill which evoked admiration from one who has worked under Nazi censorship, Hess's flight was the "carefully planned resolve of . . . one man," then it would seem reasonable to conclude that it was provoked by very serious dissension in the Nazi hierarchy.

Hess was not considered, even in Germany, a great man. And his position in the nation and especially in the party was by no means what many writers in this country have made it out to be in the last few days. He was not the boss of the party. Hitler was the boss. It is true that Hess had the title of Deputy Leader, and he also was chief of the party's Central Political Committee. But this committee had neither power nor influence in the affairs of state. It was not even all-powerful in the Nazi Party. Equally strong, if not in many respects stronger, was the so-called Political Organization (P. O.) of the party, headed by Dr. Robert Ley. In the mad jungle law of Nazi politics any post is what you make of it. And in recent years, as chief of the P. O., Dr. Ley, a ruthless, hard-drinking brawler, appeared to most observers in Berlin to have more control over the machine than Hess, who in his complete lack of jealousy was somewhat of a phenomenon in the party's upper ranks.

I think there is no doubt that in recent years Hitler regretted that his protege did not develop more of those traits of character by which all the other Nazi paladins have reached their present positions—jealousy, ambition, ruthlessness, cynicism, imagination, drive. For after the purge of June 30, 1934, which rocked the party and nearly cracked Hitler's already frayed nerves, the Leader let it be known that he intended to make Hess his successor. And it was one of Hitler's greatest disappointments that this shaggy-browed young man, who had first attracted his attention because of proved ability as a bouncer, never quite took on in the ensuing years the stature necessary for a job so exacting as that of dictator of the Third Reich.

Until about 1937, however, Hitler clung to his idea of having Hess succeed him. Most party bigwigs in Berlin were sure Hitler had already written it down in his will. Until 1937 it would have been impossible for Hitler to nominate Göring as his successor, because of the bitter rivalry between the fat Marshal and the club-footed little Minister of Propaganda, Dr. Goebbels. Perhaps it is not generally realized in this country that that rivalry scarcely exists today. Göring, since September, 1936, when he was put in charge of the Four-Year Plan and in effect superseded Dr. Schacht as economic dictator of Germany, has been out-distancing Goebbels. By the time the war started, Göring was definitely the Number Two man in Germany, with the Propaganda Minister scarcely in the running for third place. Both Ribbentrop and Himmler were crowding him out for this position. It was logical, therefore, for Hitler to name Göring to take his place in his speech to the Reichstag on September 1, 1939. It caused no surprise in Germany, where it was commonly accepted that the bemedaled Field Marshal was the only man who could carry on the regime if Hitler departed this world. Hess was named second in line to thwart any ambitions which may have lain in the breasts of such self-pushers as Ribbentrop, Himmler, Goebbels, or Ley. But no party leader in Berlin believed that Rudolf Hess would ever take over supreme power in the Reich or that, if he did, he would last long.

If this was Hess's position in Germany, then why is he such a loss to Hitler and the Reich? Hess was important for two reasons: first, because of his relationship to Hitler; second, because of his carefully built-up reputation as the one pure, unsullied, "idealistic" man in the top Nazi hierarchy.

To take the second point first, it must be remembered that even a people as gullible as the Germans have few illusions about the type of men around Hitler. Before 1934 they knew that Röhm was a homosexual. Today they know about Goebbels's affairs with many of the leading film and stage stars who are dependent upon him for their careers. They know about them and resent them, as they proved a couple of years ago when they hissed a beautiful young film star off the screens of Germany after they learned that Goebbels had taken her away from her husband.

Germans know that Dr. Ley drinks too much, that Himmler is cruel to the point of perversion, that Ribbentrop is a vain and unscrupulous man who will stop at nothing to advance himself in the Führer's eyes, that Göring spends millions to maintain a fantastically medieval personal life.

But they have never known any scandal about Hess. To them he was quiet, retiring, sober, incorruptible, and devoted to his family. And in time he came to be the pattern of Nazi virtue and the idol of German youth. It was in this role that he was important in Germany, a key man who could not be easily replaced.

But his greatest importance lay in his peculiar relation to Hitler. I think Hitler resolved after his break with Strasser in 1932 and with Röhm in 1934, both of whom were shot on his personal orders during the purge, that it would be wiser in the future not to take any of his "strong" men completely into his confidence. Though Göring is his right-hand man and furnishes much of the drive that is back of Germany's war effort, Hitler even today does not speak his mind fully to him. Nor does he confide completely in Ribbentrop, Goebbels, Himmler, or his military chiefs, such as General von Brauchitsch or General Keitel. They all get a part of the picture in Hitler's fiery mind, but not the whole picture.

And yet like any other human being, Hitler has to confide in someone. And until a fortnight ago that "someone" was Rudolf Hess. Hitler trusted him implicitly, as he trusted no other. And sometimes for hours on end the Great Man unburdened his torrid mind to his patient confidant. His words, Hitler knew, never went any farther.

In the earlier days of the party Hess of course made considerable contributions to Hitler's education, being second in this only to Alfred Rosenberg. It was he who introduced Professor Karl Haushofer to the Führer and probably to a greater measure than the famed Geopolitiker himself, drove into Hitler's mind the vaulting historical concept of Lebensraum which Haushofer had evolved.

Haushofer's influence on Hess, and through him on Hitler, raises a hypothesis advanced by many American observers last week—namely, that Hess flew to England in a last, desperate effort to achieve peace before Hitler inexorably fused the Nazi revolution with the Communist revolution for a final Russo-German assault upon the Western world. There may well be something in this, but if so, Hess was not only deserting his Leader but also his great mentor. It was Haushofer who ever since Versailles had preached two great things above all else—that England was the arch-enemy of Germany's drive to Lebensraum and that a German rapprochement with Russia was both desirable and possible.

Professor Haushofer was overjoyed with the Soviet-German pact which Ribbentrop brought back to Berlin in August, 1939. If his pupil Hess was not, the news never got out in Berlin. The only Nazi who declined to indorse it publicly was Rosenberg, who thereby lost his last hold in the upper party ranks. Hess remained loyal to Hitler on this great departure from Nazi orthodoxy, as he had on all other similar occasions. In fact, his greatest intolerance, and one that Hitler loved, was of those who even mentally wavered from the strict party line, whatever the Leader happened to make it at the time.

Munich in Reverse

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

RUDOLF HESS'S Wellsian—or shall I say Wellesian?—invasion of Britain from the skies has let loose an unprecedented flood of wishful thinking. The same people who only a few days ago were submerged in gloom are now jubilant. Overnight they have come to see Nazi Germany cracking up, a new blood purge in the offing, Hitler's vital military secrets turned over to the Berlin Intelligence Office.

I cannot understand how anybody can seriously think that Rudolf Hess, if he really wanted to escape from the gang with whom he has been associated for a lifetime, would have tried to do it in this manner, or have succeeded. A man whose face is known to every schoolboy in Germany, let alone to air-field guards and plane mechanics, takes off in a military plane and escapes to the enemy. He chooses for the start, not some obscure air field near the border, but the Augsburg airdrome, in the very heart of Germany, adding to all the other hazards of such a venture the quite unnecessary risk of a two-hour flight over German territory. And the Gestapo and the German military intelligence service see nothing, hear nothing, know nothing—until the fugitive has arrived on enemy soil.

We can pick up another small clue in this super-thriller. It has been officially established that Hess, on his hop to Britain, took with him photographs and documents to prove his identity beyond doubt. Obviously, then, he had no intention of concealing his identity. Yet when a slight mishap in landing brought him down, not on the estate of the Duke of Hamilton, for which he was headed, but near the cottage of a farm laborer who had probably never in his life heard of Deputy Führer Rudolf Hess, he said he was Horn, not Hess. Why?

The answer, I think, is that the strange parachutist wanted to hide his identity just a little while. We know now that Hess, after his discovery, asked first to be taken to the Duke of Hamilton. Until he reached there he wanted to be Horn, not Hess. The police constable or rural guard who, he must have reckoned, would take him into custody might have an idea who Hess was and feel he must turn him over to the authorities at once. That short-lived alias, I believe, was intended to serve just this one purpose: to bring Hess to the Duke before anyone else started asking questions.

If Rudolf Hess really was fleeing from Germany, why should he so carefully select his landing place? He didn't drop haphazard or wherever he found suitable conditions for a descent. Why didn't he fly to Eire instead? That would have provided safer landing fields and still have been out of reach of his pursuers. He headed, skilfully and methodically, for a specific place—the estate of the Duke of Hamilton, who happened to be an acquaintance. Everything went according to plan, except that he bungled the parachute landing.

Now if Hess was not running away, what did he go to Britain for? Obviously, he went there on a mission, and I believe that he did so with the full knowledge and approval of Hitler and the German High Command. I don't think Rudolf Hess dropped from the sky as a bearer of peace proposals alone, but as a messenger carrying an ultimatum. This ultimatum, accompanied no doubt by fairly reasonable suggestions for a negotiated peace, was not addressed, in the first place, to Prime Minister Winston Churchill. It was addressed to the Duke of Hamilton and his kind—the aristocratic and moneyed classes of Britain, the eternal Cliveden set of yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

Hitler has not made many miscalculations in this war. And there is one thing he should have learned by now—that he cannot beat Britain. He has proved that his mechanized juggernaut is irresistible everywhere on land, but he has also discovered that it is not amphibian. It will not take him across the Channel.

Britain ought also to have learned one thing by now—that it cannot beat Hitler. After Norway, Flanders, and Greece I cannot see how anyone today can hope that Britain will be able to wrest the Continent from Hitler's grip; perhaps in five or ten years, but not this year or the next.

As one clear-minded observer has expressed it, Great Britain and Germany have about as much chance of one defeating the other as an elephant has to beat a whale or vice versa. Hitler knows it, the Nazi Party knows it—and the Cliveden set knows it. One man doesn't know it, because he doesn't want to know it. That man is Churchill, superb embodiment of the Briton who doesn't know when he is licked. That is why Hess did not parachute on Downing Street but chose the estate of the Duke of Hamilton for the approach. In doing so he returned the courtesy of Chamberlain flying to Godesberg. Chamberlain flew the terms of the Cliveden set to Hitler; Hess flew Hitler's terms to a successor of the Cliveden set. They landed in somewhat different fashion, but, then, one was an appeaser and the other is a firebrand. One went to Munich; the other came from there.

Rudolf Hess's message to the upper class of Britain was, I should venture to guess, succinctly, this: We know and you ought to know, you can't beat us and we can't beat you. Meanwhile we are destroying the very foundations of each other's wealth and power—und der Teufel (Stalin) lacht dazu! Hadn't we better patch it up now? The Continent for us, the Empire for you, and then with your permission we'll turn on Russia. Now here, for the last time, is our outstretched hand. If you take it, we share the world; if you leave it, Germany goes into the closest alliance with Soviet Russia, welding the continents of Europe and Asia together for a thirty-year war, if necessary, against Anglo-Saxon sea power.

Deputy Führer Rudolf Hess was just the right man to carry such a message to the British ruling classes, above the head of their crusading Premier. As Hitler's deputy he has authority and knowledge, but he is not an indispensable cog in the Nazi war machine. Unlike Hitler, Göring, Goebbels, or even Ribbentrop, he is a man who can be sacrificed and one who is willing to sacrifice himself. He is a member of the Nazi Party's inner circle, but he never belonged to the German High Command. London's boast that Hess is "talking" now is probably bluff. Even if Hess wanted to talk, even if he were forced to talk, he could not spill a first-class war secret. What he could and probably would do is sacrifice himself. That would be entirely in keeping with the man's character. Like no one else in the top ranks of the Nazi Party, Hess is self-effacing, fanatically devoted to the cause, and mystically loyal to his leader.

I think it was a masterful plan, and if it had succeeded, you might have read in a few weeks the sudden announcement of a British-German armistice, followed by a smashing drive into Russia. That may still happen, but I doubt it since Churchill is now forewarned.

If the scheme has failed, what next? Undoubtedly, the great unholy alliance between Nazi Germany and Communist Russia. Hitler doesn't like the idea, his highest military and political advisers loathe it, but what can he do? The coming stalemate in the West, turning a Blitzkrieg into a war of attrition, makes it imperative for Germany to seek the Russian alliance. Stalin is all set for it. At the last minute before signing the pact of "eternal" friendship Hitler, through his best friend and confidant, made a desperate bid for peace in the west and war in the east. His armies were ready for the job, from Bulgaria to Finland and Sweden. When Rudolf Hess sprained his ankle, Stalin scored his greatest triumph.

Allah's Divided Children

BY RAOUL AGLION

TO FURTHER their drive to the East the Germans are doing their utmost to stir up the Moslem peoples to a "holy war" against Great Britain; they have even induced the Mufti of Jerusalem, one of their satellites, to announce that the revolt in the Near East has already begun. Actually, any report of a revolt of more than a mere fraction of the Moslem peoples can be discounted. In the last war the Sultan of Turkey, spiritual leader of the Moslems, tried vainly to bring about a Jehad, or holy war, against the Allies. The Mohammedans of North Africa remained faithful to the French, those of India to the British, while the Arabs of his own realm rose in revolt. Today with no Ottoman Empire, no Caliph, and the reforms instituted by Ataturk still a dividing issue, there is not the slightest possibility of anything approaching an all-inclusive Moslem uprising.

Many tribes and peoples, as followers of Mohammed, are grouped together under the term "Moslem." In North Africa and southwestern Asia the Moslems are often referred to as Arabs, but this is an inexact use of the word. In Morocco the natives are Berbers, blond with fair skins and blue eyes, and are supposed to be descended from some of the barbarian invaders, Goths or Visigoths, who settled in North Africa a thousand years ago. In Egypt the so-called Arabs are of pure African origin. They are Hamites in the Biblical sense. The term "Arab" is applied to all these people because Mohammed, the founder of the Islamic religion, came out of Arabia, a sword in one hand and a Koran in the other, planning to convert the whole world.

The spread of the Koran's influence has been prodigious. Even today many people in the Far East are being converted to Mohammedanism; the growth of Islam in China, where there are already 25,000,000 Moslems, is extraordinary. All the natives of North Africa from Morocco to Egypt are members of the faith, as are large numbers of blacks in Central and even in South Africa. In Asia the Moslems form huge majorities in Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Transjordan, Iran, and Afghanistan; India has 80,000,000 Mohammedans, and Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, and the Dutch East Indies have considerable numbers. The only European country in which Moslems are in a great majority is Albania, but small communities of them are found in Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Lithuania, and Finland. The whole Soviet state of Turkestan is of Islamic faith. In all, the Moslems number 250,000,000, representing one-eighth of the total population of the world.

Because of this racial and national heterogeneity a common language and faith have not sufficed to bring unity to Islam. Economic, ideological, and dynastic wars have been common. Turkey can no longer be considered a truly Moslem country, for the government has banned all religion, and is even attempting to root out all Arabic words from the language. Persia also has seen the passing of the old ways. Its present ruler, Riza Khan, an officer of the Persian Cossacks of the Russian army during the last war, seized the government by force in 1923 and made himself dictator. Two years later he called a constituent assembly, had himself declared Shah, changed the name of the country to Iran, and took steps to modernize the state. He conserved, however, some of the ancient Islamic rules concerning marriage and divorce.

Riza Khan has acted with extreme vigor to drive out all foreign influences. One of the secretaries of the Iranian embassy in Cairo told me that no state official or high-ranking officer may associate with European women or attend receptions given by foreigners. All British officers were turned out of the Iranian army, and sheiks who had been under British influence were forced into line. Russian influence has been eliminated in the north, where a few years earlier the Soviet Republic of Gilan had been established. The new Shah very cleverly played off the ambitions of the British against those of the Russians and conducted a dramatic and successful fight against the powerful Anglo-Persian Oil Company. Always cautious, he did his best to refuse all offers of German collaboration, and when he needed Western technical help for the modernization of Iran he called in only Americans, French, or Belgians, whose countries had no political ambitions in that region. German agents, however, have recently been extremely active and have stirred up anti-European feeling among Iranian provincial sheiks.

Iran has a well-trained army of some 70,000 men whose patriotism and morale are very high. But it could of course do nothing against a modern mechanized force. The Shah well knows that if the British are defeated, his country will be handed over by Hitler to Stalin.

Three years ago the heir to the throne of Iran married the beautiful sister of the King of Egypt, and the ties between the two nations have grown steadily stronger since that time. But the influence of Iran in the Moslem world is not great. In the first place the Iranians belong to a particular sect known as the "Shiites"; and in the second the modernization of the country has alienated the devout Moslems of Afghanistan and India.

In Afghanistan, where the Russians and British have always vied with each other to gain the ascendancy, King Amanoullah endeavored to copy the Western reforms of Ataturk and Riza Khan, but his subjects were more religious than the Turks and Iranians and turned him out in 1929. The young king, Nadir Shah Ghazi, is torn between English and Soviet influences. But here, too, the Nazis are playing an active game. An uprising in Afghanistan would endanger the hold of the British on India, and the Nazis have been spending money freely to prepare such an event. It is not improbable that Hitler has offered Afghanistan to Stalin as a reward for remaining a friendly neutral while the Nazis advance toward India.

The rest of southwestern Asia—Palestine, Syria, Iraq, and the kingdoms of Arabia—is Moslem and Arab. Before the First World War Iraq, then known as Mesopotamia, was a part of the Ottoman Empire. The British conquered it and after the war governed it by a mandate from the League of Nations. At the Cairo conference of 1921 Winston Churchill, then Colonial Secretary, recognized the independence of Iraq and signed a "treaty of alliance" with it. As a result the British withdrew their army but retained a few air bases.

Feisal, the first king of Iraq, was a very religious Sunnite Moslem. His wife and daughter were kept in traditional seclusion, though his son and his young brother were sent to England for their education. Adopting modern techniques, he traveled by plane and car, but he never enforced any reform that interfered with the laws of the Koran. His son, King Ghazi I, was faithful to the treaty of alliance with Great Britain, signed in 1923, and as soon as England declared war on Germany, severed diplomatic relations with the Nazis. King Ghazi died last year in a strange automobile accident. After his death his six-year-old son, King Feisal II, was placed on the throne and a regency was organized, but the government was no longer in strong hands.

The oil fields of Iraq are connected by pipe line with Tripoli in Syria and with Haifa in Palestine. The British Mediterranean fleet is almost entirely supplied with fuel oil from the base at Haifa. After the Franco-German armistice the British cut the pipe line to French Syria. Since early April of this year the Nazis have been organizing riots all over the country, and as a result the supply of oil to Haifa has often been interrupted. I have recently received private information concerning the continual infiltration into Iraq of agents appointed by von Papen, who has turned his embassy in Ankara into headquarters for Arab disaffection. The so-called "German Lawrence," an archaeologist named von Oppenheim, has been in Syria since the French armistice using that country as a base for repeated trips into Iraq. He has been in constant touch with Ali Beg Gailani, who recently seized control in Bagdad and whose puppet government has already been recognized by Vichy and the Soviet Union. Along with Ali Beg a number of semi-independent sheiks to whom the Nazis have promised power and money have risen in rebellion.

In Syria since 1920 the French have had to face one uprising after the other. Inspired by the example of Iraq and Egypt, the Syrians demanded independence and the withdrawal of French troops. France agreed at one period and signed a treaty to that effect, but the French Chamber of Deputies refused to ratify it. After the outbreak of war the country was kept calm by the presence of General Weygand with 100,000 men, but since the armistice this powerful force has been largely demobilized and sent home, and the French army in Syria now numbers about 35,000 loyal colonial troops led by new officers sent out by Vichy. The Nazis have sent in "armistice" and "commercial commissions," so-called, whose principal work is to organize uprisings among the Arabs of the Near East. The French authorities have been induced to release all Arabs who have been sentenced to prison, and the Nazis have systematically collected and trained these ex-convicts in a camp near Damascus and then sent them, with arms and money, into Iraq and Palestine.

It has been easy to stir up trouble in Palestine, where before the war many Arabs, under the leadership of the Mufti Husseini, were hostile to the Jews and fighting was constant. For the past year the Mufti has been in Bagdad, where he spends much of his time at the Italian legation, and where only a few days ago he had a meeting with the mysterious von Oppenheim. Arms are being constantly smuggled into Palestine to arm the Arab mountain tribes, and with the British occupied in Iraq civil war may break out at any time. Since the Jews and the loyal Arab population are completely disarmed the result is bound to be a massacre.

In Transjordan the ruler, Emir Abdullah, remains loyal to his old allies and has helped organize an Arab legion to fight under General Wavell. His second son, obviously under the influence of the Nazis, who have promised him the throne of a "Greater Palestine," tried not long ago to murder him.

Ibn Saud, King of Hedjaz and Nejd in southern Arabia, enjoys great prestige among Moslem peoples because he is the ruler of the sacred cities of Mecca and Medina. An active and clever politician, Ibn Saud signed treaties of "good neighborliness" with the nearby Arab nations a few years ago. Since the Abyssinian war the Italians have been busy throughout the Arabian Peninsula helping native tribes to arm. They have poured considerable sums of money into Yemen, but so far not one of the Arab countries near the Red Sea has done anything to help the Axis. That situation may change at any time, however, for the spectacular advance of the Germans in the Balkans has greatly enhanced their prestige.

Egypt, unlike Turkey and Iran, has always been a very conservative, orthodox Moslem kingdom. The university of Al Azhar, which was in existence centuries before any of the European universities were founded, is the center of the Islamic world, and its head, the Sheik Mustapha-el-Maraghi, an extremely wise man, is spiritual leader of Islam. When I was in the diplomatic service in Cairo, I twice had the honor of a long conversation with him. He was clearly opposed to any dictatorship and to any form of racial distinction. "Islam preaches the brotherhood of all human creatures," he told me. Sheik Mustapha-el-Maraghi answered with great dignity Mussolini's boasting speech at Tripoli in which he claimed to be the "Sword of Islam." The Grand Sheik replied that only a Moslem could take that title and then only if he were ruler of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

Another of the old sheiks, Hedji Suleiman, who has a world-wide reputation for knowledge and wisdom, said to me when I went to see him at Al Azhar, " 'The Faithful are brethren,' says the Koran, 'therefore make peace between your brethren and fear God.' " He emphasized the fact that the unity of mankind was an essential part of Mohammed's doctrine. "Our faith is opposed to any racial hatred. No other civilization has been so equalitarian as the Moslem. We have never made any distinction between whites, Africans, or Asiatics." "We never forget," he added, "that Mohammed often said, 'The Arab does not excel the non-Arab unless he is the more pious of the two.' "

The members of the Egyptian government are all loyal to the terms of the treaty of alliance signed with Britain in 1936, in which their country was declared completely independent. Members of the various political organizations have often assured the British, "Your war is our war." So far this has meant nothing in the way of military aid on the battlefield; no Egyptian soldier has fought in this war despite the physical invasion of the country. The Egyptians are pathetically ill equipped to fight and fear the bombing of Cairo and other cities should they formally enter the war. They have severed diplomatic relations with the Axis, however, and are giving the British every aid short of actual participation.

As to the Moslems of India, they are today more loyal to Great Britain than ever before. They form the largest Moslem community in the world, though with their 80,000,000 they are in a minority beside the 270,000,000 Hindus with whom they live. England has always protected them in India and has often clashed with the Hindus over their rights. Their loyalty will prove extremely important in future political developments in Afghanistan and Iran. I met in Cairo Prince Ali Khan, son of the Agha, supreme ruler of the Ishmaelite sect. He had enlisted in the French Foreign Legion and had been garrisoned in Syria. After the French armistice he crossed into Palestine and placed himself at the disposal of the British. He has since proved very able at organizing and training Indian troops and I believe is to head an army that he has just recruited in his country.

Nazi and Fascist agents will always find groups of malcontents, jealous local sheiks, or ambitious tribal chieftains whom they can win over to their side through bribes or force of arms, but in the main the world-wide Moslem communities will remain loyal to the cause of the democracies.

Luxury or Liberty?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

WE ARE about to shift our defense program into high gear. During the first six or eight months after the collapse of France we operated in low. In the past few months we have been in intermediate—gradually gaining speed but still not ready for the all-out effort the President promised. The delays have been inevitable. A year ago the United States did not have, in any sense of the word, an armament industry. Factories had to be built or reconditioned, tools made, raw materials obtained, and the errors and breakdowns that go with any new enterprise overcome. Now that the construction has been completed in large part and production has started, we are faced with the real test of what we can achieve. For it is plain that if Britain is to be saved, and our own defense assured, we must reach productive heights during these next few months undreamed of a year ago.

During the first year of the defense program it has been widely assumed that the United States, unlike Germany, could have both guns and butter; that no essential sacrifice would be required. All we had to do, some argued, was to put our nine or ten million unemployed to work in the armament industries. We would then have the greatest armament industry in the world without any interference with the production of goods for everyday living. They completely disregarded the fact that the unemployed were mostly unskilled, and that we lacked tools and equipment for the defense industries. As a matter of fact, we did expand our production of consumers' goods during the period in which our armament program was in low gear. Our clothing and shoe industries operated at well above their 1939 levels. Meat consumption rose sharply, despite higher prices. The production of automobiles in the last quarter of 1940 was more than 30 per cent higher than in the last quarter of 1939. This situation continued into the early months of 1941. Consumer purchases of luxury articles increased even more rapidly than production. Instead of making a sacrifice for national defense, the American people as a whole were profiting from it. In that sense they deserved the Nazi gibe of being war profiteers.

Even in money terms America's contribution to national defense and aid to Britain has so far been insignificant in comparison with the contributions made by the British or with those wrung from the German people for war purposes. In the fiscal year just ending we spent approximately $6 billion for defense. In the coming year the amount may reach $20 billion. Even this last figure is less than one-fourth of our national income. In contrast, England is spending £4 billion a year, or 60 per cent of its total income. Canada also is devoting considerably more than half its national income to defense. Germany is spending at the rate of 72 billion marks a year, or nearly two-thirds of its national income. And this is not half the story. In any discussion of relative sacrifices it must be remembered that the German economy has been on a war basis since 1933. This has given the Reich a tremendous head start. If the democracies are to win, they must not only match present German armament production—including that of the occupied countries—but they must make up the lead that Germany gained while they slept. In the long run American plus British capacity will greatly surpass anything that Germany can hope to achieve, even through the exploitation of the New Europe. However, it is not capacity but present production which counts. The war will in all probability be won or lost by production in the next six or eight months.

URGENCY AND LIVING STANDARDS

If we had eight years to build up our armaments, as Germany has had, there would be no reason why we should not have both guns and butter. A national income of $100 billion is well within our reach. With a quarter of this devoted to defense, we could have the greatest war industry in the world. And the $75 billion which remained would give us, at present prices, a standard of living appreciably higher than has yet been attained in this country. But we do not have eight years; it is more a matter of eight months. Barring inflation, the national income this year will be in the neighborhood of $85 billion. If we are to get $13 billion worth of defense materials, plus $7 billion worth for Britain—and these are minimum figures—it is evident that we shall have to cut deeply into that section of our income which now goes to provide consumer wants. In other words, we shall have to curtail our standard of living. The cut, on the basis of the foregoing estimates, would be some $5½ billion, or about 8 per cent. It may turn out to be much greater. It ought to be greater during these next six or eight crucial months. If our aid to Britain and the empire is to offset German arms superiority, it should average approximately $1 billion a month. It has yet to reach a third of that amount.

Any suggestion that the American people must cut their standard of living provokes a violent reaction in certain circles. By many it is regarded as a betrayal of liberalism. Some even see it as a threat to democracy, arguing that since democracy depends upon voluntary cooperation rather than compulsion, we must demonstrate its superiority by providing both guns and butter. Those who argue in this manner ignore the time element. They either deny or disregard the plain mathematical facts outlined in the preceding paragraph. Yet, to a certain extent, we must admit the truth of what they say. It is clearly against the interest of national defense, to say nothing of the more general objectives of democracy, to impose sacrifices which will undermine the health and efficiency of the American people. The third of the nation which the President has described as ill fed, ill clothed, and ill housed cannot be further deprived of essentials without the basic strength of the country being undermined. Already steps have been taken to improve the diet and housing conditions of these groups in the interest of defense. Further steps will doubtless have to be taken; and this may require some increase in the production of essential articles for consumption.

But there are many ways in which the "American standard of living" can be cut without sacrifice of essentials. It is not only the poor who have benefited from the war-time expansion of business. The well-to-do have gained as much or more. Net corporation profits, after deduction of taxes, were 27 per cent higher in 1940 than in 1939. They have continued to rise in 1941. Although complete statistics are not available, it would seem fair to say, on the basis of such figures as automobile sales, that there has been a relatively larger gain in expenditures for luxury goods than for necessities. It is somewhat startling to find that well over 15 per cent of our total manufacturing production last year consisted of what is known technically as consumers' durable goods. These include automobiles, electric refrigerators, furniture, heating equipment, musical instruments, radios, and jewelry. To cut down the production of such goods for a year or two could hardly cause hardship. For we have enormous stocks on hand. There are some 27,000,000 passenger automobiles on the roads today. Half of these are less than five years old, and nearly three-fourths are new enough to possess a substantial amount of unused mileage. The stock of durable goods in the hands of consumers exceeds $30 billion in value. With this reserve to go on we should be able to divert as much as $4 billion worth of durable-goods production to national defense annually. To strengthen further the case for such action, it happens that the consumers' durable goods industries are among our most efficient. They possess a disproportionate amount of the country's skilled labor and effectively harnessed horse-power.

FOUR WAYS TO CUT DOWN BUYING

Mere realization that consumer sacrifices are necessary is not, however, enough. Much depends on the way in which they are effected. The four methods most commonly used for limiting consumer purchases in time of emergency are (1) high prices, (2) direct control of production, (3) priorities, and (4) rationing. The first, which is also the one most frequently employed—allowing prices to rise and thus curtail consumption—is the least satisfactory. Although there can be no doubt of its effectiveness, the goal is achieved almost entirely at the expense of the low-income groups. The well-to-do pay the increased prices, grudgingly perhaps, and pare their savings accordingly. This runs counter to the government's plan for financing defense by tapping the savings of individuals. A more serious objection is found in the fact that increased prices under present conditions are bound to lead to inflation. A rise in the cost of living is certain to be followed by demands for higher wages, and any substantial rise in wages would make further price advances inevitable. Thus the cycle of inflation is started.

A much more reasonable method of attacking the problem is for the government to restrict or prohibit the output of the things that compete with defense production. It should take such action regardless of whether the competition is in machine tools, necessary raw materials, or skilled labor. The most obvious example of such competition is that offered by automobiles. Here our record is disgraceful. Whereas Germany stopped the production of private cars in the first week of the war, American automobile production for the week ending May 11, it has just been announced, was 132,000 cars, the highest for any week since 1937. We have been told that production of 1942 models will be cut 10 per cent and possibly 20 per cent. But why should it not be cut 100 per cent?

So far we have been able to conserve crucial commodities for defense uses merely by applying a system of priorities. But although priorities should be rigorously applied to cut down, say, the use of aluminum in consumer goods, they are ill adapted to bring about a general reduction of consumption. They may lead to sudden and marked price increases in the restricted articles; and they cannot bring a general reduction in consumption. They merely divert purchasing power from the restricted articles to others which are perhaps less crucial to the defense effort. If people cannot buy aluminum pans, they will buy some other kind. Enamel ware is, as a rule, cheaper than aluminum, but most people will spend the difference on something else—thus maintaining the total drain on the country's productive resources.

In an effort to avoid undue hardship while effecting a general reduction in consumption, the European belligerents have employed an elaborate system of rationing and price-fixing. Although it is perhaps the most satisfactory of the methods commonly used to restrict consumption, rationing also has its limitations. It has the advantage of being fair, but it is by far the most cumbersome and costly means of limiting consumption; and, like priorities, it fails to strike at the root of the evil. For if the amount of money that people can spend for many essential articles is restricted, they will tend to spend the amount they have thus saved for other things, chiefly luxuries and non-essentials—which is precisely what we should seek to prevent.

THE DIRECT ATTACK

The best way to avoid this is to attack purchasing power directly. This may be done by a combination of three methods: namely, taxation, compulsory savings, and restrictions on consumer credit. It must be noted, however, that curtailment of purchasing power would supplement, not replace, direct cuts in production.

Of the three methods, taxation is undoubtedly the most important. Taxation not only curtails consumer buying power but diverts to the government money that would normally be spent for everyday living, permitting the government to use it directly for defense. This is exactly what we should seek to do. The effectiveness of this method depends, however, on the kind of taxes which are imposed. Taxes which fall primarily on the low-income groups are undesirable because they tend to curtail expenditures for food, health, and other essentials while leaving the demand for luxury articles, which are bought chiefly by the well-to-do, virtually untouched. Progressive taxes, on the other hand, such as income, inheritance, and excess-profits taxes, which fall chiefly on the higher-income groups, tend to cut into savings and to restrict expenditures for luxuries. In theory the necessary curtailment in the consumption of durable goods and non-essentials could be accomplished solely through an increase in progressive taxes. But if we are at all realistic, we must recognize that there are definite limits to the tax increase that any Congress will vote. And that limit at the moment is far short of the English tax rate.

Compulsory saving provides a supplementary method of tapping excess purchasing power. This rather unique device was strongly urged upon England at the start of the war by John Maynard Keynes, Britain's most celebrated economist. Keynes early saw that the volume of consumer goods would have to be cut, and urged that the government reduce the amount of money in people's pockets to correspond by deferring a part of the wages and salaries of all persons with incomes above a specified level. By this means he sought to avoid the undesirable social consequences of financing the war by conventional loans. The Keynes plan, in modified form, has been adopted in England. It might well be tried here.

The third approach to the problem is peculiarly adapted to America. It happens that a very large proportion of our consumer purchases, particularly of durable goods, are made on credit. The total volume of consumer credit in the United States is probably well over $9 billion and may have risen as high as $10 billion. Automobile financing alone accounts for more than two billion, excluding the cars bought on loans obtained from commercial or personal finance companies and credit unions. Loans to encourage the purchase of household equipment account for another billion or billion and a half. Advances by regulated small loan companies and industrial banks, and the personal loans of commercial banks total considerably more than $1 billion—of which a large part is used to finance retail purchases. Since the total production of consumers' durable goods is less than $6 billion a year, it is safe to say that more than half of these goods are sold on time. It seems therefore that restrictions on consumer credit would go a long way toward achieving the cut in consumer expenditures that is necessary to match cuts in production. And the reduction would take place precisely in the area where it is most desirable.

NO MORE INSTALMENT SELLING

Complete elimination of instalment selling would seem justified under the circumstances. We might start, however, by outlawing it in certain fields, such as in the sale of new automobiles. In addition, a very considerable reduction in the amount of consumer credit could be effected if banks were compelled to curtail their advances to the various consumer-credit agencies. Most of these agencies are dependent on the commercial banks for a considerable proportion of their funds. Possibly as much as one-third of all our consumer credit rests on short-term bank loans. Since the banks are already subject to strict control by the Federal Reserve System, restrictions on this type of loan would be relatively easy to apply and enforce.

To be fully effective the restrictions on the banks should be supplemented by direct limitations on instalment credit. It would be desirable, for example, to stiffen the requirements for down payments. Or the length of time allowed for payment might be cut. If a down payment of 50 per cent were required for all instalment purchases and the length of the repayment period were cut in half, it is probable that a 50 per cent reduction in instalment sales could be effected. In automobiles alone this would mean a reduction of $1 billion a year in sales. The total curtailment in the demand for durable goods would probably be nearly twice this amount.

A similar tightening-up process might be applied to charge accounts and cash loans. Department stores could be instructed to insist on all charge accounts being paid within thirty days. Since most accounts run considerably longer at present, such a provision would bring about a substantial contraction in the volume of time sales. Restrictions on cash loans present somewhat greater difficulties. In some instances they might cause real hardship. But inasmuch as personal loans are often used as a substitute for instalment financing, some kind of parallel limitation is clearly necessary. Shortening the period of repayment would perhaps be the least objectionable means of achieving this purpose. An increase in interest rates would hardly lead to any appreciable reduction in the number of loans, and would place an undesirable burden on many needy families.

The only objection to restrictions on consumer credit is that their effectiveness may be temporary. Given time, many families could save up enough money to pay cash for a new car or a new refrigerator. And since they would save interest and instalment charges, they would have more money than ever to spend. But it would not always work out this way. Experience has shown that most families simply do not save for large expenditures unless they are compelled to by some such device as instalment selling. Barred from instalment purchases by rigorous down-payment requirements, such families would probably spend more for food, clothing, health, and other day-to-day necessities. This, of course, would work in the interest of national defense. In general, the families which are able to pay cash for large purchases are to be found in the high and upper-middle income groups. Left to their own devices, they would undoubtedly spend a substantial part of their income for automobiles and other types of durable goods. Spending of this type could be discouraged by imposition of a heavy tax—possibly as much as 100 per cent—on such articles, coupled with direct curtailment of the production of durable goods.

Adequate defense cannot be secured if our desire for comfort must be pandered to. Even less can we furnish the aid which Britain and China so desperately need and which we must give them for the sake of our own future. Unless we deprive ourselves voluntarily of needless luxuries at this time, we may find ourselves compelled to make vastly greater sacrifices later on—sacrifices comparable to those imposed on the populations of the Axis countries.

LIKE THE NEWSPAPER GUILD of New York, the State, County, and Municipal Workers of America (C. I. O.) placed on trial a union member who criticized the leadership. The offense was a statement published in the opposition paper saying that the union had opposed conscription both before and after the law was passed. The trial is over, and the decision, which will soon be handed down, may result in expulsion.

LOUIS MACNEICE, the London correspondent of Common Sense, was recently criticized by a reader of that magazine for dwelling in a poet's ivory tower. Just as the reader's complaint arrived, the editors received a letter from MacNeice saying that he was spending much of his time in the tower of St. Paul's Cathedral observing the air raids.

BANKNOTES for one and two kroner recently introduced in Norway are popularly known as "uslings"—the Norwegian word for scoundrel—and "quislings." If any one asks the explanation of these nicknames, the reply is that obviously it takes two "uslings" to make a "quisling."

CLASS ANGLE: Searching for an explanation of the Hess affair, the Daily Worker played up in its headings only Duff Cooper's statement that Hess was "not unwelcome." An editorial said: "Hess is being whitewashed. Embraces greet him. . . . There is no essential difference between the ruling cliques of Berlin, London, and Wall Street."

TOLEDO, OHIO, has in recent months been the center of an anti-Negro campaign. A Negro applicant for a teaching license was officially forbidden to take the examinations on the ground that a Negro could under no circumstances get a teaching appointment. The Toledo school board has proposed the erection of a Jim Crow high school. A committee of the National Association for the Protection of Colored People sent out a questionnaire to thirty-one employers asking whether they would employ skilled Negro help in defense production. Only one replied, and he said no.

AN AMERICAN SCHOLAR visited Benedetto Croce in Naples while the philosopher was working on the proofs of his last book, "History as the Story of Liberty." The American talked with Croce about the state of affairs in Europe and the evil days upon which scholarship and philosophy have fallen. Then he remarked consolingly that life in Italy was at least a bit less harsh and violent than in Germany. "Yes," Croce said. "It is a bit better. In Germany they had illusions and lost them. Here we had no illusions."

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

Laughter from Simon Legree

IT IS easy to see the progress of the Negro in Dr. Robert C. Weaver, who has the responsibility under Sidney Hillman of getting jobs for Negroes in defense. He sits well dressed in an office in the huge new building which holds the expanding forces of both Federal Security and OPM. In the room next door efficient-looking Negro secretaries put in long-distance calls for him to Chicago, Connecticut, the West Coast, to which his people by the hundreds of thousands have gone, and the Black Belt, where by the million they remain. He is well educated, energetic, intelligent. He could have been a college president.

As much as almost anybody I know, Dr. Weaver looks like security in America. Only his job is a symbol of the insecurity of his people. Defense has made dramatic the fact that in important particulars the Negro in the United States is worse off now than he almost ever was before—and I'm not forgetting Simon Legree in the old days.

Maybe Booker T. Washington seems now to some members of his race an "Uncle Tom" Negro or, in the more colorful Negro phrase for the same thing, "a handkerchief head." But he said a long time ago something important today—that the only way a white man could keep a Negro in a ditch was to stay there with him. When people talk today about using the whole manpower of America, the ditch seems even deeper than it used to be. And more of us than ever before seem to be in it.

Now it sometimes seems at least as deep as the hole which WPA makes in the Treasury, a hole that begins to look bigger and bigger as money is needed for defense. No people are more dependent upon WPA than the Negroes. Congressmen hoping to cut its appropriation heard testimony in Washington recently about the continuing necessity for it in both the black slums of great cities and the black belts of the old South unless Negroes can break the economic color line and get jobs. And that was approximately the point at which Dr. Weaver went into his job to try to help them to do it. How hard a job that may be is indicated by the situation in which the 13,000,000 Negroes in America find themselves. A Southern white student of the subject staked it off last month.

"Eighty per cent of all Negro farm operators are tenants," Dr. Guy B. Johnson said at Chapel Hill, "and the ratio of farm ownership is actually lower today than it was thirty years ago. Social customs, race prejudice, and even labor unions have operated to keep the Negro out of the skilled trades and white-collar jobs and even to displace Negroes from some of their traditional occupations, such as janitor work and hotel work."

He might have gone farther. Almost any job which pays decent wages is under white pressure and white threat. Wage-and-hour laws have meant white workers instead of Negroes, or have brought the quick introduction of such machines as the "Big Mama" in peanut processing, which will do the work for which four black human mammas drew little wages before. Not even tenancy is certain on the land. The migration to the towns which has crowded 100,000 Negroes into each of a dozen American cities was as often a movement of the pushed as of the hopeful. The best hope at the end of the push, North and South, has been the WPA. The cost of WPA is in part the price democracy pays for the luxury of its prejudice.

In the field of labor the prejudice is relatively new. That makes Dr. Weaver almost more significant as an ironical symbol than as an idealistic actor. As an agent of defense in crisis in 1941, he is discovering that finding places for skilled Negroes in defense industries is not easy even in the states where the Abolitionist societies were thickest in the past and where the need of skilled workers is greatest at present. But Dr. Weaver's great-grandfather was a slave and, even more important, a carpenter. Long ago in the slave South he found the time and the skilled jobs, outside the slave labor required of him, in which to make enough money to buy his freedom.

In 1941 it is not easy for the free to find skilled jobs. It is not easy even for the skilled slave's great-grandson, a Ph.D. backed by the power and prestige of the OPM, to help them find places where they can work for the arming of democracy. Democracy has made a lot of progress, but it seems to me either funny or sad—probably both—that the very necessity for Dr. Weaver's work makes it appear that in the matter of skills in defense freedom has got to move to catch up with slavery.

I don't at all like the way Simon Legree might laugh at that.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE HISPANO-AMERICAN'S WORLD*

BY WALDO FRANK

DIVERGENCES

MALAISE clouds the good-will with which our country turns to the peoples south. We have the intuition that we should be close, not for mere reasons of defense and commerce, but because we are close; and yet that we lack the key for understanding. America Hispana is a world enormously farther from us in culture than Europe; at the same time it is a world deeply and dynamically closer to us than Europe. This is a paradox—a truth, that is, hidden under divergent symptoms. And the best way to get at it is to know the differences: which means, first of all, to cut beneath the rhetoric and sentimentalism, vague or vicious, that are supposed to "unite," but merely dupe, us.

Ethnic: Our dominant stock, of course, is European; our minor elements were Europeanized before they came here (like the Jews), or are held in strict subjection (like the Negroes), or are long since nullified (like the Indians). The ethnic scheme south is infinitely more complex, not only because of the many strains which have been kept culturally alive, but because these strains have created new ones with new psychological traits. In Mexico, Central America, except Costa Rica, and the Andean countries, the mestizos and Indians are dominant. Along the Pacific coast down to Chile, mixtures of Negro with Indian (zambo) and of Negro with mestizo (cholo) have significantly shared in history and culture. And in Brazil a new Afro-Creole race that is neither Negro nor Portuguese shapes the life and, although it has not yet wrested political power from the "Aryan" minority centered in six southern states, must rule the destiny—if it is to be more than colonial—of the vast nation. None of the important countries is predominantly Western European except Chile and Argentina; and even here there are significant suffused non-European forces. The Chilean temperament, for instance, reveals traits of the Auracana Indians—as distinct from the Indians of Argentina as the Andes from the pampa; the Negro strain in Buenos Aires, entirely assimilated because never suppressed, continues to nourish and form the people in that profoundest of folk-dances and folk-complines, the tango. (I am not referring to the corrupt concoctions of our radio and night clubs.)

Cultural: Our country's culture stems from the late stages of the English Protestant Reformation and its bastard children—empirical rationalism and the Industrial Revolution. It has, therefore, in the main, the traits of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and is indigenous to our dominant race. The culture of America Hispana, in so far as it is European, derives from the Catholic Renaissance of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Hispana (the term includes Portugal); in energy and values it is a direct transplantation of Queen Isabel's crusade against the Moors. It is therefore much older and enormously different. But its European parts were at once complicated by the deep Indian cultures closer to Asia than to Europe—Aztec, Toltec, Maya, Chibcha, Quechua, Aymara—which the Conquistadores encountered from Mexico to north Chile and Argentina. Even this is too simple. The effect of Protestantism, which soon made alliance with empirical rationalism, was to suppress ethnic intuitions and personal emotions that did not conform with the march of the pioneer. The Hispanic Renaissance, although it conquered, at the same time preserved and transfigured.

Strictly speaking, there are no true survivals of Indian cultures, even in the remotest Andes; there are transformed beginnings of a culture with Indian and Catholic roots. Neither Spain nor pre-Conquest America exists in America Hispana. This holds with the Negro elements. The blacks, for instance, who fought in the wars of independence against Spain were already American; the "African" note in arts as distinct as the intellectual prose of Cuba, the folk-music of Brazil, the courtly verse of Peru, is not to be found in Africa. A unique virtue of Hispanic imperialism, setting it high above that of Britain, was that its ruthless "charity of the sword" kept alive, in new forms, the intuitions and spiritual tongues of the conquered and exploited peoples.

Geographical: There were other complications. Our Thirteen Colonies were a comparatively flat and friendly expanse of temperate forest and low mountain. The men who settled there, and on the way had to fight Indians of low resistance, took two and a half centuries to reach the Pacific. The Spaniards—they were ahead of the Portuguese in sailing from the Andes down the Amazon—in fifty years flung their passionate search from Chile to California. And they were opposed not only by stubborn native cultures that submitted and never surrendered but by some of the vastest mountains, jungles, and deserts in the world. Still another barrier opposed them: the stern purpose of the mother country to prevent colonial intercommunication. Each colony was dependent on the metropolis and otherwise self-sufficient. And within each frontier were these huge accumulations of conflict—ethnic, cultural, economic, enhanced by natural divisions.

Psychological: As the new generations were born, all these conflicts came to be stratified within every individual. This is a point difficult, yet absolutely essential, for us to grasp. A citizen of Mexico, Brazil, Peru, may be of "pure" Hispanic descent or "pure" Indian; he may be entirely of West European stock (Italo-Hispanic-German). He has nevertheless within him the whole complexity of his country and his continent. Past differences of race, religion, culture, have become actively present traits in a new human nature.

Political: By 1776, within our comparatively simple, expanding world, the people were divided into three great sections: the North with its free-labor farms and free-artisan towns; the slave-planter South; and the frontier. It took less than three generations to fuse them in the final act of civil war. Cultural homogeneity had already long been more than potential. Our entire people, able to read the same papers and listen to the same speeches, going to churches whose variety canceled them into impotence against the prevailing economic trend, was ready for political democracy. And with the directly inherited political genius and empirical philosophy of Britain, they got it. The revolutions from Mexico to La Plata were bewilderingly different, and far less simple. True democracy is a goal inherent in the aims of a literate, economically integrated, culturally harmonious people. We were not ready for it in 1776, nor have we achieved it now—nor ever will achieve it until we outlive both our economic system and our shallow vision of life. But the main elements were there, and had been prepared by two centuries of simple growth. The trend was in us. Britain was preventing a homogeneous people from going ahead. Our revolution freed us so the trend toward integration could proceed. The revolutions south freed the people into chaos. Spain, with her iron laws that forbade trade except from each colony to her, with her controlled church that fought the contact of the native clergy with the people, with her clumsy military rule, was holding the peoples from what had to be their first stage of growth: acceptance of the turmoil and conflicts within them. Worlds are born from chaos. And this was literally a new world in the making. America Hispana had to be free of Spain and Portugal in order to enter into the creativity of chaos.

And now another tragic paradox. The Hispanic colonies, boiling over with unsolved problems of religious, economic, and social life, had to take on some political form. None of their own was ready. They accepted the political design imposed on them by their soldiers, who, unlike ours, were political romanticists and idealists schooled largely by our statesmen. Our republic from the start was an organic form in which we proceeded to grow up. Their republic, at best, was a defensive armor against reaction—a theoretic form in which the people could at least begin to work out their chaos.

THE CENTURY OF THE MESTIZO

This is the key to the first century of the southern republics. We might call it the "century of chaos," if the thousand proofs were clear to us that this is a chaos pregnant of a great world. I prefer "the century of the mestizo," because the mestizo, born of the marriage of Spain and Amerindia, is the incarnate symbol of this creative chaos. Not everyone has liked this term; and when I first used it in my book "America Hispana" many a critic from Mexico to Argentina objected. Of course, there are whole nations, among the most important, with little mestizo trace; and there are other mixtures. But in the dynamic character of the marriage of the European with the Indian girl—a union part lust, part tenderness, part devil, and part Christ—I see the perfect symbol for the inward complexity of all Hispano-Americans, and of their first century of independence.

The reader must not suppose that this chaotic gestation period—a very brief one, in view of the immensely complex elements involved—had no cultural fruits, no moments of political peace. There were significant arts in the republics; fascinating projections of the high genius of colonial and pre-colonial days. And lands as remote as Mexico and Argentina produced successful statesmen. But the expression was of primitive parts of the whole, as the folk music and dance, or of simplifications of the chaos, as the work of a Juárez in Mexico, of a Sarmiento in Argentina. Neither in its political nor in its cultural life was America Hispana ready before our generation to come to grips with its whole self as an organic, potentially integral culture.

The world of the Hispano-American writers is still largely this "century of the mestizo." Nevertheless, their essential conditions for work are better than ours. For these reasons among others: a. The Catholic culture creates an atmosphere of respect for literature and art that was already waning in Britain at the time of Swift. b. It impregnates the people with that tragic sense of life, inherent in all great art (including comedy), which our sleazy eighteenth- and nineteenth-century optimism rubbed out; and with a receptivity to general ideas conspicuous for its absence in our historians, our critics, our anti-philosophical philosophers. c. Most important of all, it prepares the mind to conceive life as organic and whole. d. This Catholic attitude survives the Catholic faith (not many of the best writers of America Hispana have been church members; most, even in the nineteenth century, were radicals or socialists) and harmonizes with the intuitive values of the Indian and mestizo peasant, with the pantheism and aesthetic genius of the pre-Conquest cultures. From all this is derived a fact of paramount importance: the Hispano-American student can speak with the illiterate peasant. In the knowledge of the unity and of the tragedy of life, in the knowledge of the immediate conduits between the self, the soil, and the cosmos, peon and intellectual are close together. This knowledge, the source of all aesthetic work, prepares the Hispano-American writer for the overwhelming problems of his people, and tends to humanize and deepen his adaptation of economic and political creeds from Europe.

On the other hand, as both Sánchez and Mallea made clear in their essays, the environmental condition of the Hispano-American writer is far worse than ours. The peasant, although instinctively and spiritually close, cannot read him; the lack of communication which, until the airplane, made the shortest line between Mexico and Panama run through New York, often restricts his public to a few friends within his own frontiers.* Only Brazil and Argentina have thus far produced writers, not the best, who can live by their literary work. Every good Hispano-American writer is a journalist, a professor, a lawyer, a government clerk—unless fame gives him a consular or diplomatic position.

But, on the other side of the picture, every educated man in America Hispana tries to be a writer. The poetic ferment has been stupendous. I am no statistician, but I'll wager that more little sheaves of verse are published in a year in America Hispana than in England and the United States in a lustrum. Most of it, of course, appears in humble, privately printed volumes; but if little is important, surprisingly little is emotionally or technically dead. And from this ferment has issued the greatest poetry of the Western Hemisphere.

José Hernández in 1872 created "Martín Fierro," the rebellious epic of the gaucho against "respectable" Buenos Aires over which the schoolmaster genius, D. F. Sarmiento, author of "Facundo," was presiding. "Martín Fierro" is the best modern folk poem in the world; to find its equal one must go back to the dawns of English, Spanish, and German narrative verse. A generation later, Rubén Darío appeared in Nicaragua, possibly the one poet of indubitable first world rank that the Americas have produced.

Novels and tales are also often privately printed, and of late years have become a flood almost equaling the verse. So that it might be said that America Hispana has had more writers than readers. It has no novel equal in depth and furious power to "Moby Dick"; no colossus of virtuosity like the later Henry James. But it has far more profoundly expressed the frontier. Our best in that field, I suppose, is "Huckleberry Finn." Compare it with "Don Segundo Sombra," by the Argentine Guiraldes. Here too is the tale of a boy, wandering, not down a symbolic river, but on horseback through the pampa. His companions, instead of being adults of equally infantile soul and mind, are gauchos of whom the leader is a noble, unsentimental man whose great dignity, without transcending the rough terms of frontier life, reveals the depth of the potential American culture.*

THE ORGANIC CENTURY

History, needing dates, may say that the "century of the mestizo" began to die about 1910. The Mexican Revolution under political leaders like Madero, Carranza, Obregón, and, greatest of all, Lázaro Cárdenas, under cultural leaders like Vasconcelos, Manuel Gamio, Reyes, Rivera, Orozco, Siqueiros, Chávez, Revueltas, marks the beginning of an organic movement that has its counterpart in other nations—for instance, in Argentina, under President Hipólito Irigoyen. The reader will have noted the difference in the generations of poets described by Reyes and Mallea. For a Darío the abyss was too huge between the chaotic actuality and the ideal forced on his world by the romantic soldiers—of whom Bolívar was only the greatest among many. Hence literary power took a perpendicular and prophetic trajectory. With the generation of Pablo Neruda, the creative energy tends to suffuse and illumine the daily life of the people.

In the literary art most dependent on an immediate audience, the drama, America Hispana barely begins—in Buenos Aires, as was to be expected. In criticism the lack of communication between artist and readers has worked a havoc of false perspectives almost as bad as, with us, the atmosphere of ballyhoo and the refusal to face life in its depths, which are at once unitary, tragic, and divine. Nevertheless, men of creative critical power appeared in the "century of the mestizo"; and always they were men of action. In Argentina there were Alberdi, Sarmiento, the socialist Estebán Echeverría. Peru at the close of the nineteenth century produced the socialist poet Manuel González Prada. In Cuba, José Martí and Enrique José Varona; in Puerto Rico, Eugenio María de Hostos, inspired a whole generation of keen historical and cultural critics. Mexico gave, among others, José Vasconcelos, who, as Secretary of Education under Obregón, was midwife to a painters' renaissance, founded the still thriving rural schools, and wrote books whose passionate amalgam of Christian, Hindu, and socialist ideas made him a leader of youth in all America Hispana, until his political ambitions betrayed him. From Colombia came the essayist Baldomiro Sanín Cano, spreading, not only with his works but with his warm personal contacts as a diplomatic envoy, his noble continental vision. Finally Peru produced a man whom Mallea might have named, even if he did not live to carry out his promise. José Carlos Mariátegui (1895-1930) wrote in "Siete Ensayos de Interpretación de la Realidad Peruana" a treasure store and a model of revolutionary American criticism. His awareness of the primacy of religious, aesthetic, and psychological factors in the organic problem of social reconstruction teaches a lesson that our socialists and liberals have yet to learn.

* Until very recently most of the bookshops in all the great cities were owned by Spaniards of the sort who sided with Franco; who, encouraging the sale of books from Spain, refused their shelves to the works of even neighboring countries. Of the many forces that struggle against this poor intellectual circulation, one deserves to be singled out: El Repertorio Americano, the weekly journal published for years by Joaquín García Monge in San José de Costa Rica.

THE COMMON GROUND

The three earlier articles in this series have shown that, despite barriers and divisions, a deep common spirit unites the writers of America Hispana and makes of their works a common ground. Identity of problems and of aims has preestablished harmony between them. Even in mood, they are brothers. They share the dilemma of the rifts between ancient religious and modern political-economic needs; they share confusion within ethnic contrasts and an unwieldy opulent world that is overborne and menaced, more than ever, by foreign lusts; they share the sense of destiny—to create a true new world—and bewilderment before the enormous forces, internal and external, they must master to create it.

This harmony of the Hispano-American writers reveals a basic harmony with ours. (I have meant, throughout, of course, by writers the creative men, the artists, the knowers, the seers; not the clowns, the "informers," the dealers in slick shoddy who crowd every modern literary market.) No wonder the writers of the South read Jefferson, Whitman, Emerson, Thoreau, as soon as ours. And we too, like them, have our voiceless masses struggling for a true new world, although the jungle that overwhelms us is the jungle of the machine, the jungle voice of radio-movie-journal. And our masses are even more remote from our writers than the illiterate Indians of the Andes are from the makers of their potential Word. So the circle closes: harmony between our writers and theirs; harmony between our publics, who can know themselves and each other chiefly through the writers. Here is the body of a true alliance.

The Hispano-American writer has his enemies chiefly at home (this must not be forgotten: foreign imperialisms can never succeed without domestic allies). They are the same categories there as here: the foes, aggressive or implicit, of creative experience and creative thinking; the exploiters, the money-men, the political lackeys, the professional and professorial parasites, the prostitute-artists. In America Hispana you will find them, as here, in the usual places of power—from government bureau to rich journal, from church to school. There as here they are the rule, with occasional illustrious exceptions.

Most of our efforts for "better inter-American relations," including plans for defense against Europe's fascist forces, have been negotiations between members of these suspect categories: between men and institutions who stand between and implicitly against the interests of the peoples. Hispano-American business men and politicians are just as little concerned for the happiness and health of their people as are our own business men and politicians. But men of these categories in the southern republics will go along with their North American brothers as long as the going is good. If Hitler loses, if the United States emerges as the dominant power in an Anglo-Saxon axis, they will come to us anyway; and we could have saved our money. If Hitler wins, or a fascist Europe, our money is wasted. Facts—facts of trade and price, in so far as they mean pesos in the pocket—are what count with these minorities; even as dollars, and the power of which the dollar is the symbol, are what count with the oligarchy that sits firm in the American saddle. And let us not fool ourselves: in so far as men of these categories in both Americas are concerned with ideology at all, their hearts belong to reaction, even though they fight Hitler: they distrust democracy, even though they quote Jefferson and Bolívar.

Our true allies in America Hispana are the people; and their true spokesmen are the writers. Our efforts to make alliance with them, to undertake nutritive exchange with them, have been criminally weak. In this urgent need America Hispana has been more advanced than we. Its writers have learned from our teachers, have been nourished by our poets. They have shown aptitude and capacity to digest our strengths, far beyond ours even to guess at their values. Perhaps this is only natural, since their life is rooted in deeper cultures; since, for all their divisions, they have been far less disintegrated by the machine—or rather by our shallow philosophies that let the machine be master—and have preserved far better the contact with self, with soil, and with the people that is life and the beginning of wisdom. But it is time we did something about it.

The Trinity of Materialism

DARWIN, MARX, WAGNER: CRITIQUE OF A HERITAGE. By Jacques Barzun. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

MR. BARZUN has a lively, learned, and catalytic mind. This he uses, as he uses intellectual history, as an instrument for contemporary understanding and criticism. He is not simply a historian; he is obviously greatly concerned with the incidence of past ideas in present consequences. He is not a dazed admirer of grandiose nations—quite the contrary. He is never dazed by, and always skeptical of, the pompously systematic. He is patently interested in distinguishing the ancestry and lineaments of ideas from the cloud-cuckoo land of their popularizers and of their fanatic descendants. Many readers will recall Mr. Barzun's aseptic inquiry into influential nonsense in his book on "Race," and his eloquent historical analysis of the intellectual requisites for liberty in his book "Of Human Freedom."

In this book on Darwin, Marx, and Wagner the author examines, with no less remarkable scope and detail than animation, three nineteenth-century figures. These three are, in his erudite and documented judgment, central as symptoms and as symbols, and decisive as influences in the patterns of both actions and ideas in our own day. Darwin, Marx, and Wagner are important, not because they were original or because any single work of theirs was a masterpiece. In Mr. Barzun's handling, all three men turn out to be strikingly derivative and suspiciously second-rate. Not one of the three is a "hero" of the author's. His reasons for spending such loving care upon figures for whom he loses no love are those of a critic and a historian. The point is that, implicitly or explicitly, each of these three men has been the "hero" of a cult, and has, directly or indirectly, shaped the pattern of much that passes for "scientific ideas" in the last three-quarters of a century. Mr. Barzun clearly thinks it is high time that the isms which these three men propagated—though they did not originate them—be reexamined.

It should be stressed at once, especially because at first sight Wagner seems to fall oddly into this trio, that Darwin, Marx, and Wagner are, for Professor Barzun, three facets of the same tendency, three variations on a common and dangerous nineteenth-century theme, the worst consequences of which are with us still. They are responsible, in considerable measure, for our heritage of confusions, fanaticisms, and despairs. It is a tribute to the author's cogent marshaling of unassailable materials that by the end of the book one wonders why no one earlier discerned with such revealing clarity the common atmosphere which these men breathed, the identical idols which, for all their differences, they worshiped.

The unity of which this trinity are the expressions is Science, with a capital S, and Science as System, as Necessity, as Truth, with the implication of a fatal necessity and an unmanageable progress. "Science" revealed to Marx the "laws" of history which determine the process out of which the classless society was to emerge.

Darwinism yielded its basic law, and its name, when viewed historically, was Progress. All events had physical origins; physical origins were discoverable by science; and the method of science alone could, by revealing the nature of things, make the mechanical sequences of the universe wholly benevolent to man.

Mr. Barzun's summary of the Wagnerian idea is an example of his brilliant condensation:

... the pattern is the same. Art has its evolution, which follows the development of races and nations, the progress of culture ultimately requiring the union of the arts in a popular synthesis of sociological import. The "Ring" accordingly celebrates in turn the superman-to-be, the fall of the old gods through the curse of gold, and the triumph of Germanism, in one long tale of blood, lust, and deceit. The individual meanwhile finds surcease from a harsh world in the music drama which was the goal of the Greeks, and, dimly, of a few moderns now surpassed.

In Darwin "history was a sieve that worked. Man was the residue." In Marx the sieve was history too; "the proletarian Utopia was the residue." Similarly in Wagner, but here the residue was "the artwork of the future," Wagner's own grandiose term for his own work.

These conclusions—they occur in pages 351 to 355 of a four-hundred-page work—are the distinctive contribution of the book, an ordering not into a system but into a clear point of view of biography, history, methodological analysis, and aesthetic criticism. To these conclusions are added certain consequences. These three men invented slogans which are in our mouths, and their slogans had many sources and one character: that character was, in an age of materialism and machinery, the predominant faith in mechanical law and in a fatal burgeoning of history in terms of these mechanical laws.

Much of the book consists of highly entertaining and edged pictures of these three teachers and their doctrines, their personal histories and the sources of many of their alleged originalities in thought. These provocative sketches do not add, and are not intended to add, cubits to the stature of any of the three men. But the book, like "Of Human Freedom," is in a high sense a tract for the times. The conception of Progress in the fatal and external terms of "mechanical law" has led, as Professor Barzun sees it, to many grave distortions. It has distracted us from the really fruitful business of specific inquiry into the diversity of processes natural and human. It has clamped down on the minds of men reasons for despair that flow from the fatal necessities of science, allegedly discovered, but really self-imposed. It has generated dogmatisms of race and nationalism and waves of a future dialectically guaranteed. It has substituted system for inquiry in science, pseudo-science for flexible understanding in society, and elaborate contraptions and devices for genuine and organically living art. And we are paying for these things in brutality in world politics, enthroned obscurantism in science, and pastiche deceptions in art.

The elevation of scientific system, moreover, has blinded us to the insights provided by the great romantics, because we have been taught by alleged realists to ignore their awareness of the interior realities of feeling and of thought. One of the most interesting and original themes of this book is that of the close affinity between the celebration of all diversities of experience in the romantic poets, painters, and musicians, and the pragmatic emphasis on the many kinds of things current, and the many kinds of dealings with them necessary, in the world.

In the interest of making Mr. Barzun's theme briefly clear, I have been compelled to omit much: the happy and encyclopaedic range of illustration, the shrewd analysis of the Marxian theory of surplus value, the engaging malice of the epigrams, the obvious passion for human individuality and for human freedom, the contempt for fake "culture," and the fresh, non-idolatrous critiques of the three non-heroes. There are pictures, too, of the author's own heroes, too long, he thinks, obscured: Lamarck, Samuel Butler, and Berlioz, among others. Those who think these choices for admiration are reactionary or obscurantist show themselves particularly in need of this book. Those who have mouthed slogans as science, dialectic as discovery, and artifice as art need it even more.

Moscow Purge

DARKNESS AT NOON. By Arthur Koestler. Translated by Daphne Hardy. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

"THE cell door slammed behind Rubashov." Thus bluntly, with the slam of a prison door, begins the grimly absorbing story of N. S. Rubashov, former member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, former Commissar of the People, former division commander in the Revolutionary Army, presently to be purged for the greater glory of the U. S. S. R. because of his lack of enthusiasm for the policies of "No. 1." It closes no less bluntly: "A second, smashing blow hit him on the ear. Then all became quiet. There was the sea again with its sounds. A wave slowly lifted him up. It came from afar and traveled sedately on, ■ shrug of eternity."

Between this beginning and this ending lies a compelling narrative, told with an appearance of detachment that masks Mr. Koestler's acute sense of the irony of history as revealed in the notorious Moscow trials and the events that led up to them. Details from the lives of many of the Communist leaders who publicly confessed to egregious crimes against the state and went to their death are doubtless mingled in the career of Comrade Rubashov, who was guilty of no treason except the heinous crime of independent thought and of occasionally wishing that the state did not have to crush so ruthlessly every individual who did not jibe with its pattern. But the exquisite irony of his case, aside from his complete innocence of the charges brought against him, lies in the fact that his own logical, realistic mind has convinced him that all opposition elements, including himself, must be annihilated without regard to the sincerity or the degree of the opposition. His own fate, since the party naturally could never admit that it had made a mistake in arresting him, hinges on an almost academic question: Should he sign a "confession" of crimes he never committed and, by a show of abject repentance, bolster the faith and morale of the people, or should he indulge in the bourgeois whim of retaining his individual integrity and thus force the state to deal with him "administratively"—in other words, to have him shot secretly rather than executed by public decree?

Since the steps by which he resolves this quandary are the story, I shall not give away the answer here. But don't think that Rubashov's predicament is any the less agonizing for being a Hobson's choice; even the shrewdness with which he reasons out his position in relation to the state and to "No. 1" does not disguise the fact that he is, after all, ■ human being who, all other things being equal, would rather live than die. By deft, dramatic touches the writer induces the whole proceedings with a stark, grotesque reality, leaving etched on the mind the feel and smell of the prison and sharply outlined portraits of various men with whom Rubashov comes in contact: the examining magistrate and his cold-blooded assistant, the jailer, several fellow-prisoners, one of whom Rubashov never sees but only communicates with by tapping out a code upon a steam pipe. The most amazing thing about the book, in fact, is the austere economy with which Mr. Koestler has compressed one of the most crucial dilemmas of totalitarian political philosophy into ■ compact, meaty novel of less than 270 pages, presenting at once ■ vividly conceived personal tragedy and an ideological conflict of the first magnitude.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

An Exposure of Big Business

BIG BUSINESS, EFFICIENCY, AND FASCISM. By Kemper Simpson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS little book is a "must" for persons interested in economic reorganization. It is a popularization and amplification of ■ study, "Relative Efficiency of Large, Medium-Sized, and Small Business," made by the Federal Trade Commission under Mr. Simpson's direction and issued by the Temporary National Economic Committee. The conclusions, supported by convincing statistical data covering both capital-goods and consumer-goods industries, are important. The "efficiency" argument used to justify big corporations has been highly exaggerated; it is not their efficiency, by and large, that gives them dominance but their financial strength, their power to suppress competition, their use of government influence. In terms of costs and of their willingness to use new processes and to expand, as well as in other respects, the most efficient enterprises in most American industries are often of medium or small size. A big corporation may get advantages over a smaller concern which is just as efficient by spending a lot of money on advertising. And the big corporations do not necessarily pay the highest wages. The highest wages in the automobile industry are paid by the smallest and least integrated of the big four—Chrysler; the lowest by the second largest and most integrated—Ford.

Mr. Simpson's introductory argument relates big business to fascism in three ways: big business prevents a solution of the economic crisis that gives fascism its chance to get power; it directly helps fascism by giving financial support to its struggle for power; and fascism uses the monopoly relations of big business to build the corporate state. All this is true, but Mr. Simpson has not observed that fascism destroys capitalism as it consolidates its power. Nor do I believe that his suggested solution, the restoration of competition within capitalism, is a feasible one. But the problem of size which his discussion illuminates is important from the angle of both efficiency and democracy. Any program of economic reorganization and planning must include measures to break up the larger units and strengthen the smaller—to make

Africa from the Skies

FOCUS ON AFRICA. By Richard Upjohn Light. Photographs by Mary Light. American Geographical Society. $5.

THIS book is a record in words and pictures of an air journey from Cape Town to Cairo during which Dr. Light handled the controls and kept the log while his wife doubled as camera man and radio operator. But it is a good deal more than that, for these travelers observed Africa through wide-angled lenses with a scope beyond the merely scenic. They brought back magnificent pictures of the great mountain ranges of Central Africa, particularly of Kilimanjaro and the Ruwenzori range, the latter seldom photographed from the air because most of the year it is covered with heavy cloud. Their portfolio includes also some fine shots of big game. But most of the pictures illustrate the geography of the terrain covered and the social and economic problems of the peoples who inhabit it. So, too, Dr. Light in his text refers continually to water supply and soil erosion, to land settlement, native agriculture, health, and education. These questions all impinge on Africa's struggle to maintain a balance between an expanding population and a declining fertility. As Dr. Isaiah Bowman says in his short but thought-provoking foreword: "To put the matter in extreme form: if millions are saved from tribal war, malaria, and tsetse fly, only to be permitted to die of starvation, the controlling white has not improved the status of the population; he has only changed the categories of the vital statistics."

Dr. Light provides some interesting data on the tsetse-control work being carried on in Tanganyika. The methods employed include destruction of the bush which harbors the fly, but which also serves to anchor the soil. Removal of the fly brings the land into cultivation, for people crowd in from adjacent infested areas. Hence it is essential to carry on a simultaneous program of education in soil conservation.

Many devoted scientists and administrators, to some of whom we are introduced in these pages, are working on such African problems. But lack of men and money prohibits any long-range or inclusive program to reestablish on humanitarian lines a balance once crudely but effectively maintained by nature. Until far higher standards of education are introduced, the soil in most parts of Africa will not produce much more than subsistence for the native population. The exploitation of mineral wealth, on the other hand, does create a surplus for capital investment, though most of this now drains into the pockets of absentee owners. Britain has adopted the principle of trusteeship in relation to its African empire, and impartial witnesses, such as the Lights, offer evidence that this principle is not merely honored in the breach. But if it is to be fully implemented, Britain will have to recapture for the native population the continent's capital fund—its mineral resources.

FILMS

Pan-Americana

Hollywood, May 14

AT A recent showing of the musical film "Argentine Nights" in Buenos Aires, the audience rioted in protest at Hollywood's representation of Argentinian customs, and further performances of the film were banned. The industry has responded to this and similar little hints by announcing the imminent release of another batch of musicals with a Latin American background, bearing such titles as "The Man from Brazil," "Carnival in Rio," and "Down Mexico Way." Apparently it is hoped that with increased research and more authentic touches of local color Hollywood's comic-opera conception of Latin Americans will win their appreciation. Meanwhile, John Hay Whitney, head of the Motion Picture Division of the Council of National Defense and expert on South American relations, is suggesting that certain films about unpleasant aspects of American life are most unsuitable for South American consumption. "The Grapes of Wrath," for instance, and "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" he considers dangerous implements for Nazi agents and poor publicity for the United States. As a precautionary measure he suggests an "export control," operated either by the Hays office or the Whitney committee, to supervise the sale of productions to Latin America. Since South America is the only large foreign market now available to the industry, any kind of export control could be pretty effectively used for home as well as foreign censorship, and the idea seems thoroughly suspect.

RECENT FILMS

Joan Crawford has bravely taken the step which in Hollywood leads to heavy dramatics for life and the Academy Award: she appears in "A Woman's Face" with her beauty considerably, though temporarily, marred. It was Bette Davis in "Marked Woman" who first discovered the full dramatic impact of a distorted visage, though compared to Miss Crawford, who plays through half the picture with only one good profile, she was positively half-hearted. The horrid scar which Miss Crawford carries is the result of a childhood burn, and had she not had a nasty fall in the operating theater of a brilliant plastic surgeon (Melvyn Douglas) whose wife she is attempting to blackmail, she would have remained scarred both mentally and physically for life. The remainder of this melodramatic tale concerns regeneration by kindness, and the struggle between Good (Melvyn Douglas) and Evil (Conrad Veidt) for possession of Miss Crawford's embittered soul. Miss Crawford appears to have a poor choice: Good is rather a bore, and Evil is suffering from the new cinematic form of megalomania, the Hitler complex, and confesses in the final sequences to an overwhelming desire to rule Sweden. The story is enlivened by a good deal of action and excitement, including attempted murder, a chase by sleigh, and sudden death. Miss Crawford certainly has no need of a facial disfigurement to prove herself a talented actress.

For those who find badinage amid falling bombs acceptable and in good taste, "One Night in Lisbon" should prove highly enjoyable; but they must be stubbornly xenophile as well, for the English as they are represented in this picture can be relied upon to alienate the most ardent affections. The title is really a little teasing, for the audience is not transported to Lisbon until the American aviator hero (Fred MacMur-ray) has extracted every ounce of fun there is to be had out of a London air raid—quite a lengthy process. Madeleine Carroll plays a coy but classy English miss who meets the aviator in an air-raid shelter and proceeds to defy convention and war-time regulations with amazing impunity. With the encouragement and cooperation of the British government she flies to Lisbon for the night to see the aviator off on his journey home and captures some spies on the side. For the purposes of this story the English people are divided firmly into two classes—titled folk plus their friends, and Cockneys who react to condescension like cats to valerian. It is to be hoped that not many people accept this reading of the English character; otherwise the Lease-Lend Act will shortly be in the waste-paper basket.

"Affectionately Yours" exploits the humor of a custard-pie two-reeler in a supposedly sophisticated setting. Merle Oberon and Dennis Morgan fall about and get wet with as much grace as possible, but the screen play touches a new low in poor dialogue and dull situations.

RECORDS

VICTOR has made a special release of a recording of the Prelude and Finale of "Tristan und Isolde" by Furtwängler with the Berlin Philharmonic (Set 653, $2.50). The performance is superb in sound and effect, and is superbly reproduced by the records.

This is the finest of Victor's May orchestral releases; but a good one (Set 769, $2.50) is Vaughan Williams's beautiful Fantasia On a Theme By Thomas Tallis for string orchestra, well recorded by Boult with the B. B. C. Symphony (the first side of my review copy wavers badly in pitch). And on one side of a single disc (13597, $1) is a good performance of Johann Strauss's waltz "Voices of Spring" by Szell and the Vienna Philharmonic, with the less enjoyable "Songs of the Danube" of Johann Strauss, Sr., played by the same orchestra under Alwin, on the reverse side.

The set (762, $4.50) of Brahms's Third Symphony made by Kindler with his National Symphony offers a richly sonorous recording of an expansively rhetorical performance that for the most part gives the work good effect of the expansively rhetorical kind, with a few instances of the apparently inevitable vulgar excesses of expansive rhetoric. I still prefer the effect of Weingartner's unrhethorically straightforward treatment of the work, and its freedom from vulgar excess.

Victor also offers a fine recording of what appears to be an excellent performance by Böhm with the Saxon State Orchestra of Bruckner's Fifth Symphony (Sets 770 and 771, $10). The point about this performance is that it gives us the work as Bruckner originally wrote it, without the changes and cuts by the Schalks and Loewe that were incorporated into the published score used in performances until now. And the point the Bruckner propagandists make is that a Bruckner symphony with these changes is like a Rembrandt with the additions of some well-meaning bungler; and that to go back to Bruckner's original is to remove the faults which have alienated listeners from the music and to reveal a beauty which they will now find irresistible. Years ago we were told the same thing about Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" without the alterations of Rimsky-Korsakov; and hearing a performance of the Mussorgsky original one did in fact hear at once—without having seen it on the printed page—what Rimsky had changed in melodic contours, harmonic texture, and everything else that contributed to essential emotional quality. The Bruckner propagandists now contend that one has merely to hear a Bruckner original to be struck in the same way by the differences from the altered Bruckner; but listening to these records of the Symphony No. 5 I have, on the contrary, been struck by the absence of any apparent difference from the ways of thinking that I have previously found boring and—after an hour of persistent symphonic pretentiousness and impotence—unendurable. I am therefore inclined to believe the writer—I think it was Herbert T. Peyser—who contended that these changes which the Brucknerites were making such a to-do about were in many instances the corrections in scoring and texture which a conductor suggests and a composer agrees to at rehearsals of a new work in order to produce the effects in actual sound which the composer has miscalculated on paper. As for the cuts, even Tovey, who is generously sympathetic to Bruckner, says of a cut made reluctantly by Bruckner himself, presumably at the suggestion of a conductor, that it removes a redundant passage and leaves a perfectly balanced movement. And I would suspect that other cuts were also made to correct the miscalculations of a man whose principle of large-scale construction seems to have been to keep shoveling in chunks of material until the desired huge dimensions had been reached.

The remaining orchestral releases from Victor comprise one of Brahms's dullest products, the Serenade No. 2, competently performed by an Alumni orchestra of the National Orchestral Association under Richard Korn, and well recorded (Set 774, $4); the collection of technical formulas and stylistic mannerisms that Debussy threw together into the incidental music for D'Annunzio's "Martyre de Saint-Sébastien," excellently recorded by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Coppola (Set 767, $2.50); and on a single disc (17900, $1) the lurid collection of sound-effects, including the inevitable gong dying out at the end, which Stokowski has made of Mussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain."

How to Invade Europe

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IN THE end, it is clear, Hitler must be overthrown in Europe. He can never be defeated except on the Continent, and if he is able to make himself secure there he will effectively control the world. Most of us like to blink this fact, for it is an ugly one. We prefer to stress the fact that Hitler will not have won this war until he has conquered England; for that is also true. But it is true only because an unconquered England is an essential base of operations against the Continent—against the New Europe which is taking shape even under British bombs.

Europe must be invaded and the Axis defeated there. Only then will the war end. Until that happens, the most the anti-Axis forces of the world can do is to prevent a Nazi-Fascist victory; and that is not enough.

Winston Churchill has promised that with American aid Britain's magnificent resistance will finally be transformed into an offensive, that the war will be carried to the Continent, Hitler's control smashed, the captive nations freed, and the populations rescued from slavery to the Nazi machine. The United States has promised to provide in ever-expanding quantities the aid required to enable Churchill to fulfil his promise. As I write this article the President has yet to make his fireside talk; but it takes little prescience to know what he has decided to say. I am confident that when these words are read, the American people will have been called to uncompromising struggle against fascist terror. We have needed and awaited that call for many slow weeks; and we are ready to throw our whole national strength into the struggle because we know from the example of Europe that such half-hearted resistance as we have so far offered is even more dangerous than surrender.

So let us consider it settled. The debate over methods may go on, but the decision as to purpose has been made. We are out to defeat Hitler, and we are determined to do whatever that purpose requires.

What does it require? Just what must we do to help Britain carry the war to the European continent and defeat Hitler on his own ground? That is the question our nation must answer and answer quickly. So far it has hardly been faced—either by Prime Minister Churchill or by President Roosevelt, and even less by the men of smaller wisdom and courage who make up the majority of their collaborators. It is a question whose full answer carries implications from which politicians run as from a time bomb.

Hitler can be defeated only by revolution. That is the simple fact. But it has a corollary, equally obvious: revolution will never even get under way unless the economic-military struggle is carried on with unrelenting vigor. So far the men in power—army and civilian leaders alike—have relied on the production and use of arms as almost their sole answer to the question. Today they can no longer afford to do so. However much they may dread it, they must somehow be forced to face the fact that revolution can only be fought with revolution. And the anxiety haunting all persons who accept the need of revolution as a weapon against Hitler is that we in this country don't know how to use it. Slowly, but on a major scale, we are becoming prepared for a war of bombers and ships and armed men. But where and how do we prepare for a war of democratic revolution? Every tradition of our services and of our State Department is rigidly set against the methods we must learn to use if that absolutely crucial war is not to be lost. And if it is lost, the whole war will be lost. Revolution is the prerequisite not only to a democratic victory but to victory itself. Can our leaders learn that in time?

Revolution today does not imply anything so simple as men with rifles crouching behind barricades in city streets. That technique, which our brass hats could easily master however they might scorn it, has no meaning today. The revolutionary struggle against fascism is a world civil war; and it is as much a political war as a military and economic one. To win that war calls for a revolution first in the official mind. Boundaries must be forgotten, national political divisions ignored or used only as strategic fronts, people accepted as allies or enemies according to their allegiance to principles of action without regard to their national origin. In that war words must be used as weapons and social change as a Panzer division.

Let us look for a moment at France. Almost all the people of France are against Hitler. That is admitted to be true, but it is a fact the momentous importance of which has so far been practically ignored in the United States and Britain. Some modest uses have been made of it, to be sure. The organized supporters of de Gaulle put out propaganda against the Vichy collaborationists; the short-wave radio station in Boston and the BBC in London send messages of appeal and encouragement to the French people. But while Britain continues to support de Gaulle's military efforts, it has recognized no anti-Vichy, anti-Axis French government. And the United States recognizes Vichy and until yesterday continued its futile gestures of compromise and appeasement.

How are we to help the French people organize their smoldering resistance to the Nazis? There is only one way. Washington should send funds and help to every center of dissidence in France—to every local labor organization, to the Masons, to the surviving shreds of political opposition. Washington should send in agents—democratic revolutionary agents—to find what is going on and encourage resistance, to sow seeds of discontent even in the ranks of Vichy officialdom. France is not solidified in the Nazi mold; it is a ferment of potential rebellion. It is not impossible that with sufficient encouragement from Washington a new French government might be created, even now, which would win the confidence of the people and around which the forces of de Gaulle and the anti-Vichy elements in the French North African army could rally.

The same technique should be adapted to every occupied country. In this day of mechanized warfare, the best revolutionary weapon is industrial sabotage. It is being used throughout the Continent, but its efficiency could be immensely increased if organizers from the United States and Britain—particularly refugees with experience in the anti-Nazi struggle—were financed and sent to Europe to help coordinate this effort. Sabotage against Hitler's economic war machine should be organized on a Continent-wide scale. And the spoken word should be used with more tactical skill. The two Western democracies are brilliantly supplied with trained anti-fascist propagandists from Europe, men and women known to their fellow-countrymen. Why aren't they used—systematically and all day long—to penetrate the barriers of the captive nations with promises of help and reassurance? The radio can be made a deadly weapon of anti-fascist revolution; so far its use has been timid and correct and largely ineffective. Only by bold and imaginative collaboration with the democratic energies of the people can the ground be prepared for a final successful invasion of Hitler's conquered Continent.

Appeasers can't do that job. But let us assume that the Roosevelt Administration, openly committed to a finish fight against Nazism, relieves the appeasers of their power; it will have to do so if a strong policy is to be carried through. But neither can conservative bureaucrats do it, however honestly they may desire the defeat of Hitler. A democratic counter-revolution can be made—need it be said?—only by men and women who combine uncompromising democratic convictions with political wisdom and an aptitude for revolutionary technique. When Poland was invaded, the most important army leaders clung to their belief in the offensive value of the cavalry charge. Nazi tanks rolled that tradition into the Polish earth. But it was no more ridiculous than the attitude of our own officials toward Nazi political warfare. They see it going on and deplore it; but do they understand that it can never be combated by ordinary diplomatic and juridical methods? Not yet. They have not accepted the full meaning of the war. They still think in terms of the production and transportation of weapons and of battles on sea and land. They refuse to understand that the terrible power of the German army has other sources as important as these: that Germany is strong because its enemies are weak; that the hunger and inequalities of modern capitalism have given Hitler his political strength. Does it matter that what he offers is only a brutal falsification of the creed of social decency? It is enough that he offers something new, while the old bureaucrats cling to the belief that the existing system is basically sound and after the war can be mended here and there and used again without serious alteration.

It is this belief that places the democratic cause in mortal danger today. The men who run our country and run our defense program are unprepared to make a revolution. They don't even recognize the need for it. They know that we face a crisis, and they accept the necessity of a defense program which will in some measure temporarily dislocate business and our national life—though if possible without reducing profits. But the idea of committing this nation to an "all-out" effort to create a system which offers the people security as well as freedom and counters the Nazi political attack with an impregnable social defense is beyond their reach.

It is not too much to say that if such men continue to run the war, here and in Britain, the war is lost. But we should not for one moment assume that they must continue to run it. In Britain their control has been at least weakened by the vigor and imagination of Winston Churchill and by the effective work of the Labor men in the Cabinet. In the United States they face opposition from the genuine New Dealers—including the President himself—in the national Administration. More and more, and as rapidly as possible, we must bring to positions of power men who understand that the people of the world—Americans included—will wage a successful war against Nazi domination only if they feel under their feet the solid earth of democratic reality; who know that we are fighting to make a new world, not to save an old one. Only such men can win the war, because only they can in honesty set up a standard for democratic revolt.

This is the challenge the last democracies face in their hour of greatest danger.

The Shape of Things

THE BITTERNESS WITH WHICH THE STRUGGLE in the eastern Mediterranean is being fought, on its scattered fronts, is sufficient evidence of its importance. The war will not be won or lost there, but its outcome will at least be forecast by the result of the campaigns in Crete and Iraq and Syria and East Africa. As we go to press, the desperate battle for Crete is still in the balance. The skies continue to rain down Nazi parachutists, and the Germans are reported to have succeeded in equipping them from the air with light tanks and guns. On land the battle continues to sway bloodily but indecisively. The British and Greek forces under General Freyberg have recaptured control of Candia and Retimo in the center of the island, but the Nazis have maintained their hold on the Maleme airport and have begun a drive toward Suda Bay. The Nazi claim that they have destroyed the cruiser section of the British Mediterranean fleet is undoubtedly exaggerated, but reports from London admitting the loss of two cruisers and four destroyers and damage to several other ships testify to the terrible efficacy of the Nazi air arm even against powerful naval units.

THE BATTLE FOR CRETE IS ONLY A PART OF the larger struggle for the control of the Mediterranean. Crete itself is important as a base of operations within easy flying range of Port Said and Alexandria; it could be used by the Germans to guard the sea route to Syria. And, most important perhaps, its capture would prove that troops can be landed and supplied from the air even under the guns of powerful shore and naval units. This all-out battle between bomber and warship may not only decide the control of the Mediterranean but provide crucial information on which the Nazi High Command can decide whether or not to attempt the long-delayed invasion of England.

THE HOOD HAS BEEN RAPIDLY AND AMPLY avenged by the sinking of the Bismarck. This is more than a blow for a blow, since the Bismarck was much newer and more powerful than the British battle cruiser. Moreover, Germany has but few battleships and can spare the loss of one less easily than Britain. It is rather ironical, though, that the British victory should have been made possible by air power rather than sea power, and study of the battle ought to encourage furious thinking on the part of naval strategists. Every naval battle in this war makes it clearer that command of the seas cannot be secured by monster battleships unless they are supported by a large and powerful air fleet.

IT WAS PROBABLY NO COINCIDENCE THAT immediately after the sinking of the Hood within the American patrolled area Admiral Erich Räder gave an interview to a Japanese journalist threatening America. Warning against any attempt to convoy ships carrying contraband, Admiral Räder said that German naval forces would "if need be resort to arms if American warships should try to prevent them from exercising their right" to sink enemy merchant ships. The Admiral also complained against the American patrol system and hinted that American communication to the British of the positions of German naval units might be treated as an act of war. At the same time he protested that Germany had no intention of invading the Western Hemisphere. This mixture of threats and blandishments is a well-trying Nazi recipe for softening intended victims.

EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER, WRITING IN THE Chicago Daily News and the New York Post, presents what he says are the authentic terms of the German ultimatum accepted by Vichy. We quote them in full:

Defend your empire; retake those portions of your empire which you have lost; supply yourself freely and fully from your empire—and, at the coming peace conference, Germany will permit France to preserve its empire intact because you will have proved your right to keep it. If, however, France fails to do any of these things, then the victorious Axis powers will strip conquered France to the bone.

As Mr. Mowrer points out, those few words describe all Hitler now needs in the way of French subservience and assistance. The ultimatum obligates Vichy to reconquer the Free French territories which have acknowledged the leadership of General de Gaulle, and to protect French ships attempting to run the British blockade with goods from the colonies. And this, in turn, means certain war between France and Britain. It is a clever formula, and it leaves Vichy few fields on which to defend that "honor" so often upon the tongues of the men who betrayed it.

THE PRESIDENT HAS SIGNED THE FULMER BILL which raises the rate of government crop loans to 85 per cent of so-called "parity" in exchange for a cut of some $200,000,000 in direct parity payments to farmers. The huge crop loans, together with $212,000,000 in parity payments and $500,000,000 in soil-conservation payments already approved by both houses of Congress, would bring the farmer's return on his crops to a full 100 per cent "parity." On the surface it seems only fair that farmers should share in rising prosperity by obtaining full "parity." Many labor unions have won increases in pay, and industrial profits are at boom levels. Actually, however, the "parity" that the farmers are demanding—and are apparently in a position to obtain—is an unjustifiable standard. It is based on a brief pre-war period when farm prices were relatively higher than in any other period in our history owing to a series of crop failures abroad. Since that time there have been striking increases in the output per farmer of many of the leading crops as well as a catastrophic change in marketing possibilities. An agricultural policy which ignores these changes is unsound in normal times; in a defense emergency such as the present one it may be disastrous. Farm leaders concede that the program will increase the cost of living at least 5 per cent. Most economists believe that the rise will be at least 10 per cent. Such an increase can hardly fail to provoke a whole new series of defense strikes, which will lead, in turn, to higher prices for manufactured articles, if not uncontrolled inflation. This would bring the farmers back to the pork barrel again, little, if any, better off for their haul. The Fulmer bill should have been vetoed. Since it has become law, we must steel ourselves for a repetition of the price spiral of 1915-16.

HIGH LIGHTS AND RANDOM THOUGHTS AT the America First rally in Madison Square Garden: John T. Flynn warning that war will put American fascists in power, and at the same time wondering querulously why Bundsmen and fascist riffraff had come to cheer at his keep-America-out-of-war meeting. . . . Norman Thomas, the Socialist, conjuring up a Utopia for Americans Only, resigned, presumably, to letting the International, which, in the words of his party's battle song, "shall be the human race," shift for itself in a Nazi Europe. . . . Citizen Lindbergh hinting darkly that the country demands "an explanation of what happened at the elections last November"—an election he compared to a German poll in which Hitler should run against Göring. . . . Senator Wheeler giving Lindbergh an object lesson in rabble-rousing by pretending that his opponents, in quivering panic, fear Panzer divisions on Broadway and parachutists in Montana. . . . Chairman Flynn boasting that all the speakers were Americans in contrast to the shameful rally of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, at which representatives of the conquered European countries had the audacity to speak in public. . . . The insistence of all the speakers that England should win but that we must risk nothing to help it win; that we are in grave danger of defeat if we fight alongside England but can never lose if we face a fascist world alone; that we are doomed to fascism if we fight; that interventionists are defeatists for saying we are doomed to fascism if we don't fight; that what this country needs is clear-headed leadership—in fact, their leadership.

THE NATIONAL NUTRITION CONFERENCE FOR Defense, held in Washington this week, tackled one of the least spectacular but one of the most urgent aspects of the defense problem. In these days when everything from athletic contests to church socials is cloaked in the magic word "defense," there is a tendency to ridicule that tag when it is attached to activities not immediately connected with the training of soldiers or the production of guns and tanks. But the emergency has aroused an understanding and appreciation of the importance of nutrition such as never before existed. Adequate nutrition would not only save millions of man-hours of labor that are now lost through unnecessary sickness but would increase the efficiency of almost all workers. With the aid of new diets and vitamin-enriched foods it is possible for the American people to achieve adequate nutrition standards without excessive cost and without serious interference with present food habits. This goal cannot be achieved, however, as long as a third of America's families have incomes of less than $800, or as long as educational facilities are as poor as they are in many parts of the country. There is every evidence that the Nutrition Conference recognizes the breadth of its problem, and its recommendations should be heeded.

BY SMOKING OUT DR. KURT RIETH, GERMAN Minister in Vienna at the time Premier Dollfuss was murdered, the New York Herald Tribune has scored a beat and performed a public service. Like Dr. Westrick, the Nazi agent exposed by the same newspaper last summer, Dr. Rieth appears to be interested in oil, and one of his missions here, it is reported, is to persuade American oil companies to sell their European properties at bargain prices. Standard Oil of New Jersey has, for instance, a large Hungarian subsidiary which the Nazis would like to take over, as well as important distributing interests in most of the occupied countries. The Germans, of course, have full use of these properties, none of which are returning a penny at present to their American owners. Hence it is supposed in Berlin that an offer to pay, say, 25 cents on the dollar, to American companies which have kissed these investments goodbye would be accepted as a generous gesture. The necessary dollars could, presumably, be provided out of the gold and loot of the occupied countries. There is no doubt that many American oil concerns would be glad to cut their losses in Europe, but their executives are extremely chary of dealing with Nazi agents. Dr. Rieth has been introducing himself around town as the "very dear friend" of Walter C. Teagle, chairman of Standard Oil of New Jersey, who denies ever having met or communicated with him. Barricaded in his $600-a-month suite at the Waldorf-Astoria, Rieth has explained by telephone that he is on "a purely personal financial mission." But no German is allowed to take more than ten marks abroad unless the Nazi government expects to profit by his journey. Won't the Dies committee subpoena Dr. Rieth and ask him to explain his business, including his Latin American activities, in detail?

HARRY BENNETT, WHO HAS RULED THE FORD kingdom these many years, greeted the overwhelming victory of the United Automobile Workers in last week's Labor Board election with a statement rich in spleen. "It's a great victory," he said, "for the Communist Party, Governor Murray D. Van Wagoner, and the National Labor Relations Board." He went on to say, presumably with a straight face as well as a long one, "The law provides that we must live with them and we never violate the law (italics ours)." I. A. Capizzi, Ford counsel, who never goes anywhere without his pet red herring, said that the objective of the U. A. W. is to prepare for the "Communist seizure of governmental power." He also said the company would deal with the automobile workers "because the law says we must," but declared as well that it will continue to denounce the Wagner Act as tyrannical in concept, theory, and practice. The U. A. W. has suggested that bygones be bygones. If Henry Ford wishes to regain the prestige and the sales he has lost in four years of consistent violation of the law he will relegate his two leading bygones, Bennett and Capizzi, to one of his museums. And he might throw in W. J. Cameron for good measure.

LAST WEEK THE SATURDAY EVENING POST either abandoned its isolationist crusade or reaffirmed it. We don't quite know which. It printed an editorial saying in bold and unequivocal language that it still believed everything it had printed in opposition to the Lend-Lease law and all other steps in support of Britain; that it considered the United States hopelessly unprepared to carry out the obligations it had assumed; but that since the country had none the less blundered into war against the Post's advice, the Post would support the government. It would do so because a refusal now to join in the struggle against Hitler would expose us to the possibility of "national death." "If we turn back," says this astonishing pronouncement, "we shall be remembered forever as the Falstaff nation of the world, boasting of a power it did not really possess. . . ." So, hooray—from last week on—for the war we are unprepared to fight. This is the Saturday Evening Post's position. But one is tempted to apply a Freudian test to its sincerity, because the words quoted above did not actually appear in the magazine; they are taken from a press release. The words the Post printed were these: ". . . boasting of a power it did really possess." Were the editors, perhaps unconsciously, repudiating their own expressed contempt for the nation's strength? The psychoanalytic friend who pointed out the discrepancy insists this is so; we are inclined, more prosaically, to blame it on a patriotic or careless compositor. Whatever the explanation, the truth is as it appears in the magazine. The United States does possess the power it boasts of; it has only to organize that power and throw it into the balance against fascist tyranny, in defiance of the defeatist pleas, past and present, of the Saturday Evening Post.

Wall Street's Two Wars

WARS are won by courage, not complacency, and the pessimism which envelops Washington as the defense program passes its first birthday is a hopeful sign. It was time that we came out from under the spell of our own headlines and began to realize that there is more to the job of arming America than working out programs on paper and clearing enormous contracts. The aluminum shortage discussed by our Washington editor last week seems to have done more than any other single event to shock even conservatives into a recognition of the need for government participation in production. The most sensational revelation as to this shortage was made last Saturday in a Washington dispatch from the New York Herald Tribune's aviation expert, C. B. Allen. Allen reported that work on the great Boeing bombers "ceased entirely early this month and will not be resumed until some time in July." Although Allen says that "no actual shortage of aluminum is or has been involved in this situation," work ceased for lack of aluminum. We confess that the subtle distinction between a lack of aluminum and a shortage of aluminum is beyond us.

Whether there is a lack of aluminum or just a plain shortage, the Administration seems determined to remedy it, despite OPM hostility to any moves which endanger the Aluminum Company's monopoly. R. S. Reynolds of Reynolds Metals explained at a press conference in Washington last week that the RFC is preparing to spend $300,000,000 on government aluminum-producing plants to be operated by the Aluminum Company, Reynolds Metals, and Bohn Aluminum. The last, hitherto a fabricating company, will now become Alcoa's second government-encouraged competitor in a field Alcoa has monopolized since 1903. Since the $20,000,000 loan made last summer to Reynolds has increased our aluminum-producing capacity for next year by 100,000,000 pounds, presumably the $300,000,000 program will boost production by 1,500,000,000 pounds. This begins to sound like planning on the right scale.

Estimates of our need for aluminum seem to be rising steadily. Since last week's issue appeared, William S. Knudsen has said that we would need 1,600,000,000 pounds next year for direct military purposes alone, excluding civilian and British needs. Though Mr. Knudsen now, months later than he should have done so, at last recognizes an aluminum shortage, he is still opposing expansion of steel capacity. He turned thumbs down on Henry J. Kaiser's proposal for a $150,000,000 new steel plant on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Knudsen's remark that "we wouldn't know what to do with 30,000,000 tons more of steel if we had it" is likely to rank high among the fatuities voiced in this war. A shortage of structural steel is already delaying the new Midwest bomber assembly plants, and as Mr. Stone's Washington letter this week reveals, a shortage of steel plates haunts our ship-building program. Runner-up to Knudsen's remark among the week's inanities was Hugh Johnson's statement, "If there is one slight, solitary case of holding back of all-out effort by any industry or any group or unit of industry, I have yet to hear it." Old Iron Pants must be in seclusion.

The temper of the Administration is to let the needs of defense tread on the tender toes of monopoly. A bill adding $1,500,000,000 to the lending power of the RFC and allowing it to enter any business whatsoever at home or abroad in the interest of defense quietly passed the Senate a week ago last Friday and is now in the Rules Committee of the House. True, it was amended in the Senate so that none of the funds might be spent on St. Lawrence, Passamaquoddy, or other power projects, and there were a few cries of "socialism" and "fascism," but much less opposition than one would have expected. The Truman committee hearings on aluminum showed conservative Republican Senators like Ball of Minnesota and Brewster of Maine prepared to countenance vigorous government interference with monopoly in the interests of defense.

A battle may yet break out in the House during the coming week over the RFC bill, but we believe it will pass. This measure and the new plans for aluminum expansion have stirred misgivings, and the Charlie McCarthys of monopoly are beginning to issue plaintive sounds. Mark Sullivan rises to ask in querulous tones whether the New Dealers are most interested in defeating Hitler or bringing about socialism, and David Lawrence sees "favoritism and special privilege" in the determination of the government to arrange more aluminum for us and some competition for the aluminum monopoly. In the Wall Street Journal's opinion the government's decision "to invest $300,000,000 in aluminum manufacturing adds to the evidence that there are two wars that are troubling private finance, the one abroad and the one at home." The one at home seems to give some of our dollar-a-year monopolists more concern than the one abroad.

Shipping and Admiral Land

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 24

NOW that Admiral Emory S. Land, chairman of the Maritime Commission, has told the Truman committee how big and bold he would be in breaking the San Francisco shipyard strike, I think he ought to be recalled and asked how big and bold he is prepared to be in dealing with the private interests which are slowing up our construction program. Admiral Land thought there was "justification for every possible step the government can take, up to and including the use of United States forces, to take those picket lines away so people who want to go to work can go to work." The force of this call to arms was somewhat weakened when Senator Brewster, Maine Republican, asked him if the picket lines were preventing men from going to work. "Not to my knowledge," was the Admiral's answer. The Admiral's own enthusiasm for forthright measures abated visibly when Senator Connally of Texas said he believed the government ought to conscript the shipyards. "I believe that the government ought to be producing ships itself," the Senator declared. "I don't know about that," was the Admiral's alarmed reply.

I am not prepared to make a report on the strike itself, though I notice that our old friend, and the Admiral's old friend, Bethlehem Steel, is right up in front with the principal trouble-makers. Whatever the issues in the other San Francisco yards, the strikers certainly seem to have a clear grievance against Bethlehem, which has refused to sign the master agreement for the Pacific Coast and declines to make any agreements with the unions. It may be that Assistant Secretary of the Navy Ralph Bard was referring to Bethlehem when he said the strike was caused by "selfish or subversive interests," but on extended consideration I am inclined to doubt it. Bethlehem can kick the navy in the teeth on contracts, provoke strikes by refusing to obey the laws, and generally comport itself like a cave man of industry—the navy loves it just the same. One sometimes wonders whether Bethlehem exists to supply the navy or the navy to supply Bethlehem. Admirals who know the right answer enter into their reward on retirement by becoming Bethlehem's consultants. There is nothing like a hereafter to make men behave themselves.

I think that this would be a good time for the Truman committee to examine the mote in Admiral Land's own eye. I have in mind the story of the Admiral's failure to utilize idle shipyards in the Great Lakes—and elsewhere—at a time when ship construction, his responsibility, is among the most urgent of our needs if we are to save Great Britain. On the basis of the four months ended May 1, the British are now losing shipping at the rate of 6,400,000 tons a year, as compared with the 4,500,000 tons they lost in the first two and a half years of the last war. We have a shortage of shipping to bring bauxite from the Guianas for the manufacture of aluminum, and to bring rubber and other materials from the Dutch East Indies. A bill introduced by Senator Brown of Michigan a few days ago to end the American monopoly of shipping in the Great Lakes is supported by data showing that we have not enough ships to carry the Lake Superior ore needed by our steel mills. Our two-ocean navy program is not scheduled for completion until 1947; its urgency is indicated by a Navy Department report issued the first of this year revealing that our total combatant tonnage of 1,250,000 is topped by the 1,835,000 of the German, Italian, and Japanese navies combined. If the French navy is added, the total is 2,145,000 tons. These figures prove that we need the British as badly as they need us.

Yet despite these enormous needs, and despite the fact that the shipbuilding capacity of Hitler's New Order is reported as seven times our own, the scandalous fact remains that we have idle shipyards—and not only on the Great Lakes but even along the coast—while the big shipbuilding concerns are glutted with orders. The New York Shipbuilding Company, for example, with a half-billion-dollar backlog, has as much work as it can handle for five years. In shipping, as in other fields of defense, we tend to forget that figures on orders placed are not the same as deliveries obtained. Of 54 cruisers authorized, the latest figures show 9 on the ways, 45 on the order books. Of 205 destroyers authorized, 26 are actually being built. This is wonderful business for the big yards, but it spells trouble for us. In a critical emergency the big companies and the admirals who see eye to eye with them are in no mood for emergency measures. We had 1,099 slipways working in 223 yards during the last war; we have only 84 in 23 yards today. A New York Times editorial last December 21 stressed the urgency of the problem and at the same time threw a curious light on the role of our steel companies, which control many of our big shipbuilding companies and sell themselves steel. The Times said that only two of the old World War shipyards were being used and that a "relatively simple reconditioning" would place the others back in production. "It is true," the New York Times reflected, "that we may have a shortage of steel plates for shipbuilding, partly because of our naval program, partly because of our sales to Japan, but wooden ships would be just as serviceable today" (my italics). If our steel magnates go on selling steel plates to Japan, they might at least be good enough to let us build a few wooden ships.

On the Great Lakes are ten companies which can build steel ships and a much larger number which can build wooden ships. Four of the Great Lakes yards have been building lake carriers comparable in size to destroyers and cruisers. These companies have extensive auxiliary facilities—engine works and electrical, ironworking, boiler, and pipe shops. There are many idle and abandoned yards which could easily be reconditioned. In the last war the Lakes yards produced 286 small cargo vessels, more than sensational Hog Island produced. Some of the obstacles to use of these yards are serious; some are laughable. Spokesmen for smaller shipping interests on the Lakes have been trying since the war began to get Admiral Land to wake up to the part they could play in construction. I have a file of their correspondence. The War Department built the Chicago ship canal with drawbridges but has yet to put in lifting facilities; when these are added boats can go through the canal and be floated down the Mississippi on pontoons. Admiral Land ignored the idea until a suggestion even more dangerous to the steel and shipping crowd made its appearance on the horizon: one of the arguments for the St. Lawrence waterway is that cruisers, which take three years to build, could be shifted to Lakes yards; the waterway would be ready for the cruisers by the time they were completed. Space would then become available in the great coastal yards for cargo boats, which can be built much faster; we could get five cargo boats for every cruiser. But the steel companies, which control the big yards both on the Lakes and on the coast, are opposed to the suggestion. And so is Admiral Land, who dislikes the St. Lawrence project anyway because he dislikes public power. As I said, Admiral Land is ready to do anything to speed shipbuilding—well, almost anything.

Russia's Threat to India

BY W. E. LUCAS

FOR three-quarters of a century the Russian bogey has gibbered at India across the mountainous wastes of Afghanistan and disturbed the peaceful dreams of the British military strategists at Simla. The preoccupation of the army staff in India with the problem of a Russian invasion always seemed to me, during my stay in India, to be rather childish, but perhaps the bogey had internal political uses, since it was often cited as an excuse for keeping about 70,000 British troops in the country. Certainly in the days following the last war the Russian threat struck me as something left over from a bad dream of another age. Apart from the fact that the Soviets were heavily engaged on their own home front and had been driven from their bridgehead in northern Persia, the geographical obstacles to an invasion seemed insuperable. How was an army to be transported five hundred miles from the nearest Russian railhead across the desolation of Afghanistan, and how could it bring up the equipment to assault the well-fortified British lines at the Khyber Pass and Quetta?

The same geographical difficulties exist today. But now the Russian threat forms part of a formidable totalitarian offensive on the British Empire in the East. Today India's safety cannot be taken as axiomatic; the battles now developing on the fringes of the eastern Mediterranean will have a direct bearing on its future.

The Soviet Union is evidently beginning to bestir itself in the Middle East. Russian pilots are reported to be volunteering for the Iraqi air force, and Soviet pressure on Iran is increasing. Unrelated to anything else, these developments would not be important, but when they are coupled with indications of a closer Berlin-Moscow alliance and with the Nazi drive in the Near East they take on a special interest. Russia is a vast, almost landlocked continent which must naturally seek outlets to the sea, and its recent surrender of rights on the Danube may well have been induced by the promise of access to the Indian Ocean through Persia. This would mean that the movements in Iraq and Iran are the opening stages of a two-pronged Nazi-Soviet drive toward the East, Germany taking the low road via the Suez Canal and Mesopotamia and Russia the high road via Persia, to join hands perhaps with the Japanese in India.

At the moment the German Command can merely hope that India will become an embarrassment to the British, forcing them to weaken the military forces under the command of General Wavell in the Nile Valley and Mesopotamia. If another potential battle front can be created in India, more British man-power and equipment must be concentrated there than heretofore. How far the Nazis can succeed in this plan will depend upon the effect on the 78,000,000 Moslems in India of events now taking place in the Arabic world of Iraq, Iran, Syria, and Egypt, and upon the ability of the Russians to goad into activity the extreme elements of the Congress Party and to stir up the turbulent tribes of the Northwest Frontier Province.

The pro-Axis coup d'état in Iraq was something more than a palace revolt in a minor Oriental state. It had repercussions from Morocco to the Jumma Musjid in Delhi. It was potentially one of the most serious blows yet struck at the hard-pressed British Empire. Hitler has put his finger into the Arab lake and churned up a storm. The oil wells in Iraq and Iran are of immense value, but with the Moslem world in turmoil still richer prizes are within his grasp. By this one stroke the Nazis softened the mortar that holds together the wall of British defenses guarding the two great routes to the East, via Suez and the Persian Gulf. While Hitler masses his forces against the British positions in the Middle East, it may be expected that he will expand to the utmost his fifth-column activities in India, a country upon which this defensive line depends.

At first glance India would seem an admirable place in which to stir up hostility to the British. A vast country with three times the population of the United States, it is a welter of languages, religions, and customs, with deeply divided loyalties. For decades a growing Congress Party has been fighting the British rule in India and pressing for independence. Nevertheless, and this is the fundamental point, it does not favor giving aid to the Nazis. India is a country of startling contrasts, but there could be no stranger spectacle than that of the great Indian nationalist leader, Jawaharlal Nehru, being haled off to jail with a prayer for a British victory on his lips.

It is often difficult for the Westerner to follow the logic of Indian thought. It seems inconsistent that now, when the Congress Party has a golden opportunity to force a complete British capitulation to its demands, Mahatma Gandhi refuses to take advantage of England's plight. In spite of his insistence on complete independence for India, he recognizes the necessity for cooperation with England; but it must be a cooperation on Indian and not on British terms. He has promised to do nothing that will hinder Britain's full prosecution of the war, and as long as he remains the head of the Congress Party it is difficult to believe that Nazi attempts to penetrate its ranks will have any success.

It is for this reason that the job of fomenting trouble in the extreme left wing of the party will be left to the Soviets. Although the Comintern has never exercised much influence in India, the Communist ideology has made an appeal to the extreme socialists. Jawaharlal Nehru, viewing the poverty among the peasantry of the United Provinces, has advocated a fundamental reorganization of the rural economy patterned to some degree on the Soviet model, although he can in no sense be considered a Communist Party follower. Chandra Bose in Calcutta, who has always been an extremist as well as an opportunist, leads a section that believes in a revolution by violence. The terrorists in Bengal, who, though disowned by Gandhi and the more moderate Congress leaders, were the main thorn in the British side in the serious days of a decade ago, had certain affiliations with the Communists, and it is this group which might provide a fertile seed bed for Soviet intrigue. At the present time there seems little likelihood of the Moslems in India answering the call to a holy war against the British. During the First World War the Ali brothers with their large Mohammedan following were one of the main props of the Congress movement for national independence, but today there is no such unity. The constitutional reforms of recent years have emphasized the political split between influential Moslem groups and the main body of the Hindus under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi. The Moslems are a minority race, and they owe their present privileged position in the provincial and federal political setup to the British overlordship in India. It is only through a British victory that they can expect to maintain or improve the constitutional and economic advantages they now enjoy. And it is they who form the great reservoir of fighting men for the Indian army.

But outside India in the far north are the restless tribes of the Northwest Frontier, whose passions can always be played upon to produce open warfare, not for any political ideal, but for the possible loot in the fertile plains of the Punjab. While the Indian police forces may be fully competent to deal with civil disorders inspired by terrorist groups, the Northwest Frontier can present problems of a serious military nature. The campaign waged in this district after the end of the Great War was of major proportions and kept a very considerable number of British and Indian troops busy for more than a year. The same thing might happen today. It is highly probable, in fact, that the Axis and its Soviet partner, profiting from Mohammedan reaction to events in the Near East, will make every effort to foment an attack on Britain from this quarter. With a complete understanding between Hitler and Stalin, Russian volunteers might be employed, as they were in Spain, to stiffen the morale of the local tribal levies and to provide the technical knowledge required by the use of modern weapons. If Soviet troops were concentrated on the Persian frontier and in Turkestan the Afghans also might be encouraged to undertake a military venture.

The Russian bogey is again peering over the snow-capped peaks of the Himalayas. Even if the long dreamed-of invasion is not attempted, British awareness of the danger is a valuable asset to Nazi plans in the eastern Mediterranean. The British forces defending the Middle East are spread dangerously thin.

Judgment Day for Radio

BY D. A. SAUNDERS

WHEN President William S. Paley of the Columbia Broadcasting System uses such phrases as "calculated to torpedo the existing broadcasting structure" and "the first paralyzing blow struck at freedom of the air" to describe changes in the organization of radio broadcasting recently ordered by the Federal Communications Commission; and when President Neville Miller of the National Association of Broadcasters chimes in with "usurpation of power . . . which menaces the freedom of the American system of broadcasting," you can be sure the broadcasters feel that their vital interests are affected. The entire radio field is indeed facing changes whose far-reaching implications can as yet barely be discerned.

Before the annual convention of the National Association of Broadcasters opened in St. Louis on May 12, many persons expected that the much-discussed feud between ASCAP and the major networks might generate some heat, but there was no premonition of three events which were to rock the radio industry and make the ASCAP affair look like a Sunday-school spitball fight. The first explosion occurred when the Federal Communications Commission on March 20 issued its Order No. 79, announcing the opening of a broad investigation into the question of whether the ownership and operation of radio stations by newspapers were in the public interest. The investigation would concern itself with both frequency-modulation (FM) applications and the acquisition of future standard broadcast stations by newspapers. Though the public has shown little awareness of the interlocking of newspapers and radio stations, the FCC has long been awake to the danger of a possible monopoly of the channels of communication. A few years ago, when two qualified applications were made for a station in Port Huron, Michigan, the FCC granted the application of the non-newspaper group on the ground that the community deserved "a medium for the dissemination of news and information to the public which will be independent of and afford a degree of competition to other such media in the area." In the twenties about 10 per cent of the radio stations were owned by newspapers; today more than one-third of all stations are so owned. Moreover, newspaper radio chains, such as the Gannett chain of eight stations, have been developed. In nearly a hundred communities the one local radio station is owned by the one local newspaper.

The next bombshell was the issuance of a long-delayed FCC "Report on Chain Broadcasting." It was this which called forth the trumpetings from the presidents of the NAB and CBS quoted above. Dated May, 1941, the report ordered eight changes of great importance. (1) The operation of more than one nation-wide network by a single organization was prohibited. In its accompanying remarks the commission particularly condemned the NBC Blue Network as being chiefly a fictitious network operated for bargaining purposes, observing that 100 stations are shifted indiscriminately from Blue to Red Network and back again, and that NBC makes little distinction between the two in its operating and auditing departments. Since NBC is the only company which operates two nation-wide networks, the Blue Network is apparently earmarked for dissolution. (2) The commission stated that the ownership by one network organization of two stations in the same area, or of a single station completely dominating an area, was not in the public interest. At present NBC owns two stations in New York, Chicago, Washington, and San Francisco, and of these eight stations seven broadcast on the highest power now allowed—50,000 watts. Columbia owns eight stations, but no more than one in any city; Mutual owns no stations at all. Thus by the terms of the order NBC is required to dispose of four of its most powerful stations, and Columbia may be affected in some areas. (3) No "exclusive" contract may be signed; such a contract prevents a station affiliated with one network from carrying programs of other networks. Nearly all present contracts include this prohibition. (4) No station may have "exclusive territorial rights"—that is, no station may prevent another station in the same area from broadcasting a network program which it has rejected. Present practices allow a station both to reject a program and to prevent its broadcast by a competing station. (5) "Optional time" contracts are prohibited. Under these contracts networks may order the cancellation of local programs in certain specified hours to allow the broadcast of a network program instead. (6) Any local station is allowed to reject any program "which the station reasonably believes to be unsatisfactory or unsuitable," or which "in its opinion is contrary to the public interest"; and the local station may reject any network program to substitute "a program of local or national importance." (7) No contract of a network with an affiliated station may run for longer than one year. At present contracts run for five years. (8) Networks are prohibited from influencing the rates charged by local stations. This refers to the practice of NBC and

CBS—but not Mutual—of preventing the local station, by contract or penalty, from selling time at a rate lower than that charged by the network for that station.

These far-reaching orders were issued by the FCC with a weather eye sharply cocked for possible court battles. Thus every order, except the one referring to outright ownership of stations by networks, is phrased in terms of what the individual station may do. Seven of the eight orders begin, "No license shall be granted to a standard broadcast station having any contract . . . with a network organization which provides," etc. The legal powers of the FCC are defined in terms of individual stations.

The third and cruelest blow to the networks was the defection of one of their number: the Mutual Broadcasting System is taking a stand on current issues diametrically opposed to that of NBC and CBS. The chief reason for this split seems to be that since Mutual is a cooperative network owned and operated by the stations themselves, with pro-rata distribution of profits or assessments for losses, the prohibitions in the FCC orders in the main do not apply to Mutual. Also, Mutual is comparatively small potatoes beside the two other giant network organizations: though about one-fifth of all standard broadcast stations are affiliated with Mutual, their total power is about one-tenth that of NBC and CBS, and the gross intake of Mutual as a network is slightly less than one-tenth the combined intake of the other two.

The first sign of Mutual's defection came early this spring with the news that it was negotiating quietly with ASCAP for the return of ASCAP songs to the air, thus breaking the united network front. The directors of Mutual reached an agreement with ASCAP on May 1, and the contracts were submitted to member and affiliated stations for the required majority approval. Immediately the NAB and some Mutual member stations tried to have action withheld until after the NAB convention. The delay would have placed Mutual in a decidedly disadvantageous position, for if CBS and NBC pushed through the convention a resolution prohibiting separate agreements with ASCAP, Mutual would have to comply or leave the NAB. Representatives of Mutual stations met in St. Louis just before the convention, and after several stormy sessions a majority voted to sign the agreement with ASCAP. Thus any resolution adopted by the NAB convention would be beside the point as far as Mutual was concerned, and the other major networks were placed under strong competitive pressure to return ASCAP music to the air.

Another hint of Mutual's attitude was seen in its reaction to the FCC orders on chain broadcasting. While spokesmen for NBC, CBS, and the NAB were letting go with both barrels, Mutual's board chairman, Alfred McCosker, wired President Roosevelt that "many of the critics either have not read the report or reflect a vicious partisan viewpoint." The telegram continued that though Mutual was adversely affected in some respects, it considered the report "highly commendable for its thoroughness, fairness, and long-range enlightened vision." Mutual's position was also indicated when WGN, key Mutual station in Chicago, withdrew from the Newspaper Radio Committee on the ground that the committee was fighting the battles of the major networks instead of concentrating on the newspaper-radio issue.

The Newspaper Radio Committee, representing radio stations owned by newspapers, was expected to answer the threat of the FCC investigation into newspaper-radio tie-ups. At two April meetings in New York the committee organized a steering group of nine and set out to raise a $200,000 war chest by assessments on stations ranging from $50 to $10,000. Mark Ethridge of the Louisville Courier-Journal was selected as chairman at the first meeting, but he stepped down when President Roosevelt asked him to do a survey of the entire radio scene. In describing the situation to the committee, Ethridge warned the publisher-broadcasters against using newspaper editorial columns to build up their own radio stations, using the station to promote the interests of the newspaper, and offering newspaper space and radio time at joint rates. (The FCC in its hearings might well inquire why Ethridge found these cautions necessary.)

When the National Association of Broadcasters met on May 12 in St. Louis it had to deal with these combustible matters. The first blaze came when Ethridge resigned from his survey post because of his disapproval of the new FCC regulations for network broadcasting. Next the NAB board of directors disapproved the separate agreement between Mutual and ASCAP and reelected Neville Miller as NAB president. Whereupon some forty Mutual stations, including WOR in New York, WGN in Chicago, and the large Don Lee Network on the Pacific Coast, withdrew from the NAB. But the real convention fireworks came in the form of attacks upon the FCC and interchanges with FCC Chairman James L. Fly. Ethridge charged the commission with "bad temper, impatience, and vindictiveness," and asserted that broadcast licenses were "all too frequently" issued on the basis of "political pull." When Chairman Fly of the FCC was about to reply, the meeting was abruptly adjourned by President Miller. Fly refused to address any later session of the convention and the next day issued a stinging statement charging that the NAB was merely a front for the National and Columbia networks and that the networks planned to use licenses granted by the FCC to fight the new FCC orders.

That NBC and CBS would fight was evident. In anticipation of the new regulations NBC had quietly transferred from the Blue to the Red Network the 50,000-watt stations of KDKA in Pittsburgh, WBZ in Boston, and WBAL in Baltimore. To punish Mutual the NAB helped form the Mutual Affiliates Association, composed of some forty Mutual affiliates which sided with the NAB, some of which were also connected with NBC or CBS.

Network strategy, however, will chiefly consist of legal action, political pressure, and a large-scale propaganda campaign. The legal action will probably begin in the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals, which has never been too friendly to the FCC. Even if they are defeated in the courts, the networks hope that they can gain time to marshal their enormous strength. Their propaganda resources include not only the two major networks themselves but the newspapers, which are girding for battle with the FCC over the issue of newspaper ownership of broadcasting stations. That they will make an all-out attack upon the FCC, with no holds barred, is indicated by a hastily issued CBS pamphlet which misinterprets both the nature and the significance of the new regulations. NBC will probably shed many public tears over the "unfortunate necessity" of dropping the Town Meeting of the Air, the National Farm and Home Hour, and other public favorites if its Blue Network is dissolved.

But the main weapon will be political pressure—the CBS pamphlet was addressed in part to "government officials and others who seek a nation-wide radio audience." For years a broad Congressional investigation of radio has been in prospect, and nothing would suit the networks better than to turn such an investigation into an inquisition of the FCC. Senator White of Maine has already offered—and the NAB has promised to support—a Senate resolution calling for an investigation of the new FCC rules and deferment of their application until the inquiry is completed.

So far the White House has been carrying water on both shoulders. Mutual received White House thanks for its "fine telegram" supporting the new FCC regulations, but the next day the NAB was officially informed that this did not mean Presidential indorsement of the regulations, and two days later Presidential Secretary Early, commenting upon Mark Ethridge's attack upon the FCC, remarked that Mr. Ethridge was "a gentleman of great honesty and sincerity of purpose." All this may come under the heading of "smart politics," but without strong official and public support the FCC may be shorn of its powers as far as radio is concerned. If it is, the road back toward government supervision of radio will be long and hard.

Fate or Freedom?

BY AUREL KOLNAI

NAZI world tyranny, the accomplishment of which is in the making and may or may not be stopped, would be a thing of impossibility but for its mental background—the tyranny of fatality inherent in an impersonal process. It threatens to prove actually inevitable because we erroneously assume it to be substantially inevitable. We shall fail to prevent the triumph of Hitler's rule in so far as we submit to the belief that any alternative way out of the present crisis would be but slightly preferable, possibly even somewhat worse, or at any rate essentially equivalent to it. Too many of us indorse the fatal necessity of a "world revolution," a collectivist unification of human society, represented chiefly by the Third Reich's drive for world conquest, and acquiesce in the resigned belief that it would be futile to try to impede this process and perhaps rather harmful than otherwise to interfere with its evolution. Those of us who do not explicitly profess this faith are yet liable to be paralyzed in our actions by a half-unconscious admission of its possible truth. Unless we become fully conscious of the radical fallaciousness of that creed, we shall not be able to muster sufficient spiritual and moral energy to face and to overpower the enemy; unless we experience and reaffirm the free spirit and will in ourselves we shall have no chance to save the freedom of mankind.

The tremendous efficiency of the enemy's material weapons, his ruthless fanaticism, the cunning strategy applied in the pursuit of his aims may to a certain degree account for his successes. The numbness and supineness of many of his victims, or victims to be, are explicable in part by their sheer terror and the objectively desperate position in which they are placed. Yet the most effective and poisonous of the enemy's devices is something that might well be called sorcery, or at least fascination. Fascination may not mean actual seduction; it is even compatible with a sort of impotent hatred in the victim. Neither, however, is it mere power to frighten or mere bluff. It is the ability to impress on one's adversary the belief that the power which summons him to surrender is an emanation of a "higher" kind of power, above any resistance by the ordinary means of brains and muscles; the expression of a "superior law" beyond the range of human decision and control. This pretense to magic is cloaked by up-to-date intellectual apparel. In an age which prides itself on its rationality but is by no means immune to many forms of gullibility, which is trained to idolize notions dressed up as "scientific," and whose fad is sociology rather than demonology, the enemy will not indulge in ostensible sorcery; he will claim to incarnate, to borrow a phrase coined by American appeasers, "the wave of the future." By force of the law of nature, it is said, we are drifting into a collectivist order of far-reaching uniformity, ruled by maximum technical efficiency and subject to an omnipotent centralized government. Wisdom obliges us to offer sympathetic collaboration, which may entitle us to a more or less good place in the order to come.

The underlying assumptions, the concrete implications of this abject sophistry are manifold. A mechanical, linear, univocal trend of social evolution is overtly asserted or tacitly assumed. Functional efficiency is credited with an absolute meaning and acknowledged as an unchallengeable value. "Progress," instead of being merely appreciated as a gratifying phenomenon possible in certain historical phases, is worshiped as its own measure and as an automatic guaranty of the good state of man. Cooperation without regard to its content or aims, cooperation in the sense of clogs and wheels fitting well into a machine, is exalted to the rank of an unconditional good; conflict, strife, and dissension are labeled bad and despised as agents of "waste." If the balanced ethics of Christianity, of common sense, and of democracy—the ethics of justice, fairness, charity, liberty, personality, responsibility, mutuality, and truthfulness—are discarded, the narrow superstitions of pacifist ethics are welcomed, and free use is made of the phantoms of a smug pseudo-moral "idealism" or "perfectionism." Peace, no matter what peace, is proclaimed to be absolutely preferable to war, no matter for what ends it may be fought. War, the state of war, is the supreme evil, worse than any evil it is intended to avert, bound to conjure up the very evil it is meant to resist, the breeder of all evils (so they say); war provides no solution, war knows but losers on both sides, war is a mad raving devoid of sense and purpose. In particular, it is maintained that war to resist barbarian conquest cannot but precipitate the spread of barbarism; that war against fascists leads to fascism. If you put up military resistance to a foreign dictator, you will have to create your home dictator. If your home dictator uses his powers in the name of democracy, to save freedom, this will be but lip-service paid to ideals essentially forsaken, a mere difference in tags and labels; if your home dictatorship remains more humane and less total, it will prove inferior in the test of efficiency, and you will be beaten. Therefore do not move a finger against tyranny. If evil must come, let it come without vain efforts to escape it; let it come as smoothly as possible, and at the smallest cost. Since you must adapt yourself to reality, take care to do it on the most advantageous terms.

This is the spirit which kills civilization, the spirit which—far more than the "law of social evolution" it advertises—insures the advent of the barbarian; the spirit strutting by in a hundred guises, right-wing and left-wing, capitalist and socialist, economic and idealistic, scientific and Christian, cheerful and mournful, patriotic and internationalist, prudish and worldly wise. It is the spirit which is hopeful about evil, suspicious of good; which condones magnanimously the enemy's crimes and inflates the failures of good-will; which trusts our enemies to be at bottom "men like us" but haunts us with the bogey of our becoming savages "like them" if we fight them; which warns us against meddling with power politics but admonishes us to make truce and traffic with power deified; which bemoans past blunders and protests against redeeming them; which slanders good men and finds fault with noble nations but justifies devilry with the artifices of psychology and interprets the march of the Beast in terms of sociology. It is a spirit with many faces and many names—call it optimism or pessimism, doctrinal pacifism or the apotheosis of cowardice, complacent hedonism or fastidious primness—but all its formulas are traceable to one common denominator, a fatalistic view of the destinies of mankind; and all its facets and falsehoods converge in one pivotal point, the basic denial of the free personality of man.

If one pseudo-democratic mouthpiece of Hitler states that the outcome of the present war is a matter of indifference since Britain does not in truth fight for democracy but, like the enemy, for "imperialist" aims, whereas another pundit of the same ilk affirms that Britain is "bound" to lose, standing as it does for senile and decayed values, thwarting the path of a youthful new world, the two arguments are rooted in a common ground of fallacy. It is this—that right is fundamentally alien to might; that there is no point in measuring historical decision by a moral standard.

This line of argument presupposes that morality must be not only distinct but separated from vital interests, and that outside the pale of celestial perfection moral diversities, moral "degrees" or "shades," are irrelevant; whereas the fact is that the self-interest of the British Commonwealth is identical with the interest we have in the survival of democracy, civilization, and decency, and that British victory or defeat will determine the difference of a world—from the moral viewpoint, in particular—for all the human species. The pessimist argument, again, is intended to bamboozle us into a belief which is not true and never will be true, no matter whether the British lose or win the war. Hundreds of times in history an older and therefore seemingly more worn-out system has warded off successfully the onset of a more recent and buoyant force; a civilized society has broken the apparently overwhelming power of the barbarian. If Britain finally loses the war, this will not happen because it has all the time been "fated" to lose it.

Perhaps Britain will lose the war just because the seer who forecasts its defeat has had such great means at his disposal to disseminate the poison of his creed, and has found so many fools to listen to him. Perhaps Britain will lose the war because such people as knew better have been too sluggish in assisting Britain's cause in the spiritual field. Perhaps, again, Britain will not lose the war at all—already it has shown some signs of deplorable senile obstinacy in dealing with the German bombers, though their planes fly with the winds of the future or with Mussolini's inevitably victorious youth—but even in that case it will be false to claim that Britain was all along “bound” to win. Let the enemy rejoice in his “certitude” of victory; we will rather say with the English poet, “But if he fail or if he win, to no good man is told.” Our business is not to scan the entrails of fate, but to fight and to help the fighters, each of us as best he can.

There exists no such thing as a prescribed path of “progress”—or even of “decay”—a rigid fatality of social evolution determined by “conditions.” Certainly conditions and trends exist, and it would be unwise to neglect them. There are limits set to man's freedom to hammer out his destiny; there are topical problems for which a relative solution must be found one way or the other; man must continually renounce certain good things in order to obtain others. Within a given setting of conditions, however, man is free to react differently and to envision different patterns of settlement; he is free to scale his needs from the necessary and urgent to what he may dispense with or postpone as a luxury; what becomes of him and his world depends on his choice and decision. Dialectical forces soaring above human thoughts, emotions, and wills are a piece of irrational mythology. If, for instance, some of the previsions of Marxism have come true, this is due less to the “scientific” exactitude of the Marxian prevision than to the efforts and policies of labor movements imbued with the Marxian vision. Similarly, fascism is not the “logical expression” of the concentration of capital on a large scale, not the “inevitable consequence” of mass unemployment, still less the “necessary outcome” of the Versailles treaty or of the unequal distribution of raw materials, nor again a stage in the impersonal antics of the Weltgeist. Allowing for all the complex factors which have made its growth possible, fascism is above all—as Lewis Mumford has simply and correctly put it—“the evil work of evil men.” The thesis that fascism develops automatically, step by step, not in fulfilment of an original conception but out of the requirements of modern warfare and war-time management of modern society, has acquired great popularity because it panders to the passive moods of cowardice, sloth, and selfishness, all too ready to identify the amenities of life with the essentials of liberty, and to confuse discipline with servitude; because it suits the infantile pride in explaining human creations “satisfactorily,” as it were, by the pressure of materially palpable facts. Yet that thesis is manifestly and startlingly untrue. Fascism did involve conquest and, since the conquest happened to meet at last with opposition, war; but it was by no means born of the necessities of warfare; nor was it sponsored or imposed by men who had at the outset been non-fascists—liberals, conservatives, or any other brand of civilized beings. In no case has fascism displaced democracy as a result of war waged against fascists; on the contrary, the change has been brought about by peaceful surrender to the fascist aggressor or by the military victory of the fascist invader. War certainly breeds fascism if we stop in the middle of it instead of fighting it out, or if we conduct it so badly as to let the fascists win it. In briefer words, war breeds fascism if we omit to wage it.

It seems certain, indeed, that we have entered an era of mass civilization having of necessity many traits which distinguish it strongly from the liberal bourgeois democracy of our fathers' “golden” times. In some ways the “iron” times to come are certain to be less comfortable and delightful; in other ways, again, they are likely to denote a moral progress: to be superior in sincerity, earnestness, social equality, and responsibility. No “fate” wills it that they shall bring in their trail the extinction of human dignity and personality, of justice, fairness, and humility, of cultural heirlooms and creative impulses, of respect for objective truths and values. It is not infallibly true that Nazism owns the future; that communism owns the future; that the world is doomed to be cut up among four or five despotisms, divided by sullen jealousy but confederates in their zeal for iniquity and oppression. By the same token it is not true that democracy must perish. It is true, however, that democracy must either perish or remould itself so as to be able to meet the issue. It must become far more stern and militant, more concentrated and disciplined, more trained and certainly also more ruthless. There is no need meticulously to add that the limit must be drawn carefully lest that increasing ruthlessness should “lead straight to fascism”; for though fascism does imply callous and ferocious ruthlessness, its essence is by no means ruthlessness; and though by carrying ruthlessness very far you may obtain most unpleasant and undesirable results, you will never by that alone approach the fascist type of mind. You may well imprison a million spies and hostile propagandists, or suppress treasonable movements, or bomb a thousand towns in an enemy country, or annex a conquered province, or carry out boldly conscription of labor, or levy huge taxes on capital—without getting any nearer to such a tenet as that Mr. Roosevelt is always right, or that Mr. Churchill is the supreme arbiter of right and wrong, or that a small nation has no right to existence, or that the strong must devour the weak, or that one race is intrinsically superior to others, or that no spiritual communion is possible between different racial types, or that an American should believe in a God who is the incarnation of the American people's soul, or that truth is a function of the Anglo-Saxon spirit.

Above all, if we want democracy to survive, we must make it more intelligent, more capable of discerning its enemies, more conscious of its own primary and basic meaning, less entangled in the secondary implications of its mode of life, less open to attack with the weapons provided by its own technical apparatus. In several well-meaning treatises on the crisis of democracy, the strange but characteristic theory can be found exposed that the preservation of democracy depends on the maintenance of peace; that it is only in the climate of peace that freedom can thrive. It might as well be said that a man can remain honest only so long as his family provides him with a comfortable income, or that a man cannot preserve his judgment and sagacity unless he is constantly kept out of danger by some benevolent higher power. If the theory were true, democracy would never have existed at all. Moreover, if liberty were a matter of easy-going comfort, a hotbed flower of undisturbed prosperity, it would not deserve to be cherished. Fascism might then even seem superior in so far as at least it trains its thralls to a more serious outlook on life than that of a spoiled child. Yet it is not so. On the contrary, we may well assume that liberty, awakened to full consciousness and having found its way back to its true sources in order to master a new emergency, will have a wider and firmer grasp on reality than tyranny can ever have; that free men can be more terrible enemies than slaves, however drilled and drugged. By rediscovering the truth that liberty is not by rights a "frail" and "fragile" thing but a fruit of indomitable strength of soul, we shall perhaps some day frame a world of liberty not only safer but truer and more genuinely beautiful than was the fool's paradise with which we have often confused democracy.

To conclude, freedom is a hard-earned possession of free men, not a boon granted by happy circumstances to pampered dolls who conceive of themselves as the creatures of circumstances. Fatalist metaphysics are attendant upon, and instrumental in, the depraving of democracies; they have nothing to do with the vital substance of democracy. Nor will freedom perish under a dispensation against which we are powerless. If it ever perishes, it will perish through our own shortsightedness and languid nihilism; because we did not love it adequately; because we shunned effort and honest thought; because we persevered in either denying or embellishing the danger; because we preferred the diabolical power of foreign slave-drivers to the power of freedom-loving leaders of free men—to our own power; in a word, because we preferred slavery to freedom.

Report on Chungking

BY A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT

Kunming, China, May 1

RECENTLY I visited Chungking for the first time in nine months to attend a session of the People's Political Council. The scars of last summer's bombings are still there. Indeed, many streets still resemble the streets of Pompeii, but in general a new if somewhat temporary Chungking has been built on the ruins. Many streets, much widened, are now lined with new shop buildings. They are generally of one story, easy to build, pleasing to the sight, but not expected to withstand any severe shock. Their owners did well enough last winter to risk destruction during the coming summer, when raids will again be in order unless we have a stronger air force by then. More important than the flimsy restoration of Chungking proper is the construction of a truly greater Chungking that will be proof against attack from the air. On a narrow strip of land extending for almost thirty kilometers along the Kialing River, a tributary of the Yangtze, new houses, new factories, new offices, and new bomb shelters have been dug out of the cliff. The enemy may destroy Chungking proper again this summer, but it will never be able to destroy greater Chungking.

In the People's Political Council attention centered on the Communist problem and the economic situation, particularly the shortage of food. For some time the Communist troops, both the Eighth Route Army in the northwest and the new Fourth Army along the lower Yangtze, had been expanding at the cost of the armies having no sympathy with or opposed to their ideas. The High Command tolerated them for a long time, but early this year it felt compelled to take disciplinary measures and ordered the Fourth Army to disband. Its action aroused much indignation among the Chinese Communists and caused a flurry abroad. When the People's Political Council was about to convene, the Communist Party announced that its members would not attend unless its twelve published demands were granted by the government. One of these called for the punishment of the Minister of War who ordered the disbanding of the Fourth Army and of other high-rank commanders who carried out the order. All the demands were so excessive that the government could not consider them. Nevertheless, both the government and the neutral groups in the council were very anxious for the participation of the Communists, and negotiations went on continuously behind the scenes. Marshal Chiang, supported by the neutral groups, promised that the Communists would be allowed to air their grievances in the council and to make any proposal in regard to political matters; he was adamant, however, about maintaining the unity of military command. In the end the Communists refused to attend, and in order to lay the blame on the government, put forth another set of demands no less irksome than the first.

Both in the council and informally Marshal Chiang gave assurances that he would not consider military measures against the Communists. The matter of chief importance to him is the unity of command. Confidentially he even expressed displeasure that the police had lately been repressing certain Communist activities. But he had no intention of lying low if the Communists took the offensive, military or otherwise. My summary of the situation would be that friction will continue, but that neither the government nor the Communists will go so far as to bring on open conflict.

Recently some eighty students of leftist tendencies left our university, but by careful probing we found that the real Communists were still with us. Only the satellites had gone. They left because they were told by the Communists that drastic action by the government was impending. The Communists stayed and are still active, well aware that no persecution is in prospect. The foreign propaganda of the Communists is as clever as their maneuvers in our schools. They have a much better press abroad than the government because they publish their grievances, while Chiang Kai-shek hushes up all reports of dissension for fear the cause of China may be harmed.

The economic problem is in many ways more complicated, more difficult of solution, and more productive of controversy. Southwestern China is self-sufficient in grains only when there is a bumper crop. The insufficiency of cotton and other textiles is obvious. This could, however, be made up if transport facilities were increased or even if better use were made of existing facilities. The easiest way to overcome the shortage of grain in years of subnormal crops would be, I believe, the recapture of the Yangtze port of Ichang. But Ichang cannot be recaptured until we have a larger air force. My own opinion on this question was more or less confirmed by the military information I was able to obtain at Chungking.

The visit of Matsuoka to Europe naturally agitated us not a little. Various speculations are current; many of us being inclined to think that it will be of little consequence. The position of the Konoye Cabinet and especially of Matsuoka had been weak for some time, and Matsuoka's grand tour was designed to steady them. The non-aggression pact with Moscow will affect the United States more than it will us, according to the view of most persons here. It will undoubtedly hasten a war in the Pacific between Japan and the United States, but it may not cause Stalin to cease giving aid and comfort to China.

Salients on the Price Front

IT IS reported that the President will shortly recommend to Congress legislation giving the Administration more effective means of controlling prices than it now possesses. I hope that this report is confirmed, and that Congress will act promptly on the request. For at present Leon Henderson as administrator of the Office of Prices and Civilian Supply (OPACS) has at his command only indirect sanctions, and even the use of these is now being attacked by certain Senators. They have proved sufficient to hold a number of key sectors of the price front, at least for the time being, but against other parts of the line new salients are constantly being pushed out, and these together threaten to exercise a cumulative effect on the cost of living.

In the last few days Mr. Henderson has turned his guns in a new direction by imposing a ceiling on the price of combed cotton yarn—used in large quantities for army clothing. The limit he permits is 40 cents for 30's single-ply yarn with a possible adjustment not exceeding 2 cents to cover recent advances in raw-material costs. Quotations for this grade have been reported as high as 52 cents, although it is said that this is merely a level set by sold-out mills seeking to warn off buyers. The recent effective price has been nearer 47 cents, which itself represents a very considerable premium over what Mr. Henderson considers reasonable.

He is not alone in this opinion. Lew Hahn, general manager of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, commented: "Retailers, like all other business groups, are opposed to governmental price-fixing, but we are obliged to recognize that the cotton-goods industry has had several significant warnings and, so far as results are concerned, seems not to have taken the situation seriously." Mr. Hahn further remarked that buyers of cotton goods had been subjected to heavy pressure by being told that the industry was in a sold-out condition with shortages pending. "We now learn," he went on, "that far from that being the actual situation, the flexibility of cotton-goods production facilities is so great that its full capacity has never before been guessed at."

Cotton manufacturers have frequently protested against steps to raise the price of raw cotton on the ground that the inevitable result must be discouragement of consumption and the stimulation of competing fibers. This is sound economics, but it applies equally to price-boosting of the finished product. Nor can recent advances in yarn and cloth quotations be justified by reference to the current upward movement of raw cotton. According to the Wall Street Journal, "cotton costs, though mounting, are not keeping up with cloth price gains. Result: cloth-mill profit margins are expanding. Gross margin on three print cloths last week was 24.65 cents a pound, a week earlier, 23.68—highest since 24.18 recorded in November, 1936."

There are numerous other examples of commodities being pushed up unduly on exaggerated talk of shortages. Take black pepper for example. The outbreak of hostilities in the Pacific or even a further accentuation of the shipping shortage might cut off or seriously curtail imports of this humble but invaluable condiment. On the basis of this possibility heavy speculation has been going on in pepper, resulting in an advance in price of over 60 per cent since the beginning of the year. Now, following a request by Mr. Henderson to the New York Produce Exchange to raise margin requirements on pepper trading, it has been revealed that there is a two-and-a-half-year pepper supply on hand, most of which is controlled by a speculative pool started some years ago. Publication of this news brought on a wave of selling, and some of the pepper bulls may suffer losses not to be sneezed at.

It must be recognized, however, that speculation is not the only factor pushing up quotations of imported commodities. Shortage of shipping combined with increased demands for cargo space has produced a field day for the shipping companies. It is true that higher wages and insurance rates have raised costs considerably. But freight rates have soared far beyond any rise necessitated by increased costs, especially since under present circumstances ships are most of the time loaded to capacity. The result is profits such as have just been reported by American Export Lines for the first three months of this year, showing a rise of more than 100 per cent over a very profitable first quarter last year. Considering the enormous sums which have been paid out of the Treasury to subsidize American shipping, it is hard to see why steps have not been taken to hold down freight rates during the present emergency period.

Shortage of transport facilities is also being made responsible for recent advances in gasoline and fuel-oil prices. At the request of the government a large number of tankers normally employed in carrying oil from Gulf ports to the East Atlantic coast have been released to assist the British. Consequently it is necessary to turn to the railroads and the pipe lines to carry increased loads. Both these transport methods are more costly than sea hauls, and no doubt some increase in prices is justified. It should be noted, however, that prices started to move up some weeks before the government asked for the tankers. The reason would appear to be a much-improved demand for oil products due to the rise in purchasing power produced by the defense program. It is also worth noting that, despite wage and tax increases and the loss of much foreign business, oil profits are on the upgrade.

The latest upward movement in oil prices is an advance of 9 to 10 cents a barrel on crude in Oklahoma, Kansas, Texas, and a number of other fields. It is reported that this rise has been forced by a growing demand on Midwestern refineries for finished products at a time when production in the Illinois and Michigan fields has gone into a decline. Oklahoma and Kansas are producing at capacity, but output could be expanded in Louisiana, New Mexico, and Texas. In Texas, which is responsible for more than a third of the daily total petroleum production of the country, the rate of output is controlled by the state railroad commission, which is apt to be jealous of any federal interference. It will be seen, therefore, that in attacking the question of oil prices, as he seems about to do, Mr. Henderson is stepping into a delicate and involved situation. He may, however, find a useful weapon in the desire of some of the oil companies to receive federal aid in financing new pipe lines.

GENERAL ALLISON OWEN, a landscape architect known for his work in clearing the "white slums" of New Orleans, speaking at a luncheon there some time ago, advocated all-out aid to Britain. "Perhaps we in New Orleans," he said, "are so busy with our own affairs that we do not have a true estimate of the situation across the Atlantic. After the Carnival season is over, I think we should seriously study the situation."

THE REVEREND EDWARD LODGE CURRAN, Coughlinite leader in Brooklyn, is reported to be trying to oust John T. Flynn from the leadership of the New York chapter of the America First Committee. The case against Flynn is based on his liberalism in domestic affairs and his close association with Norman Thomas.

EX-SENATOR EDWARD R. BURKE of Nebraska is now leading a national anti-strike campaign in cooperation with the Committee for Constitutional Government. The aim is to write into the laws "the right to work" under all circumstances.

ALTHOUGH administration forces in the American Newspaper Guild were defeated in many large cities, administration candidates in New York made a clean sweep in the recent election. The victory was roughly seven to five among the 2,500 who voted. The Committee for Guild Democracy, the opposition bloc, claims that its slate was defeated by 2,000 Guild members who did not vote. Last year the Youngstown anti-totalitarian resolution, which the administration opposed, was carried by two to one in the New York referendum. On that basis the Committee for Guild Democracy figures that most of those who failed to cast ballots are in fact against the present administration.

JOE MCWILLIAMS, speaking at a meeting of his American Destiny Party in Queens on May 14, called President Roosevelt "Frankie, the King of Judea, the half-wit in the White House." He had this to say of Stalin: "I do not ask you to admire the man, but you cannot deny that he puts his country first and has accomplished tremendous things for the Russian people, and no doubt will rid the country of the control of the Jews, who are playing an increasingly less important role in the government. Stalin began with Trotsky, and eventually not a Jew will be left in Russia."

ACCORDING to Inside Germany Reports, the most common ailment suffered by members of the Luftwaffe is insanity. Overwork, inadequate training, and equilibrium disturbances send many Germany pilots into insane asylums. A letter from Vienna reports that Austrian homes for the aged and sanatoriums for the mentally ill are being emptied in order to make room for the Nazi airmen.

The Army Camp Mystery

IT IS about time somebody wrote a mystery story about an army camp, and maybe the strange case of Private Felix Hall, Army Serial Number 14005607, Company E, 24th Infantry, Fort Benning, Georgia, provides the plot. Hall, a Negro volunteer from Montgomery, Alabama, disappeared on February 13, but on May 17 neither the army nor the FBI was ready to say whether he killed himself, was murdered, or was lynched on the military reservation.

On March 28 soldiers of the 20th Engineer Regiment engaged in a field problem came across a decomposed body hanging from a tree. On April 2, according to the American Negro press, the boy's father heard of his son's death through a neighbor's son and went immediately to Fort Benning. There Austin J. Doyle, special agent of the FBI, "showed the father pictures of the body roped and wired hanging from a tree."

On April 18 the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People charged in letters to President Roosevelt and Secretary of War Stimson that Hall was lynched.

On May 17 Major General Robert C. Richardson, Jr., director of the army's new Bureau of Public Relations, sent me the following official statement: "It has not yet been determined whether this was murder or suicide. This is being investigated by Provost Marshal's Death Board and the FBI. So far as is known, the military police had nothing to do with the cause of this death."

This was my first information that anyone had ever thought that the military police might have had anything to do with the death of this Negro. And the suggestion of that possibility in terms of denial from the army itself seems to me to make some speedy solution of the case more than ever essential. If ever a case did, this murder mystery affects the morale of the American people, whose sons are in similar camps.

In public relations, as General Richardson's letter indicates, the army is making progress in providing news to the press. A dead soldier is no longer regarded as a military secret. The army has now a real news organization staffed by able newspapermen, and men are on duty all the time to answer questions—if they have the answers. When the report of the board of investigation in this case has been approved by the War Department, General Richardson says, there will be no objection to publishing its findings. But this publicity, after long, secret procedure in the investigation of the case of a man already presumably more than three months dead, is certainly not streamlined publicity about swift military justice.

If this death, which has been called a lynching, had not taken place on the military reservation, and the dead Negro had not been a soldier but merely a Georgian, it is difficult to believe that such deliberation as marks the army's investigation would be accepted with patience or awaited with confidence. Outside army posts no procedure is so much distrusted—and properly distrusted—as delay in the investigation of reported lynchings. There is a theory well understood in courtroom towns that the indignant public will forget almost anything if you give it time.

There is every reason to believe, I think, that the army wants to do a better job in its press relations. General Richardson took his post in an effort to put an end to plain stupidity in dealing with news. He has secured the assistance of experienced newspapermen. But no press section can give out the news until it gets it, and if army procedures of justice are as slow as this case indicates, what the press section will have to give out will not be news but history. Good sense in military press relations depends as much upon the officers who have the news as upon the major general who gives it out.

If there ever was any news which should not be surrounded with military secrecy this is it. Has there been a lynching of a Negro soldier in one of the camps to which thousands of young Americans are being sent? Did anybody ever suspect that the military police did it and then left the body hidden for a month? Why, even considering the condition of the body, does it take the army more than two months to decide what the public would expect a coroner's jury in a civilian case to decide in two days or two weeks?

This may not be a thrilling murder mystery, but it is a disturbing military mystery. What good is a press section which gives out news quickly if the whole system behind it still works in the philosophy of we'll tell 'em when we are ready and not a damn minute sooner? If the civil authorities in a Georgia county acted like that, they would provide argument No. 999 for the federal anti-lynching bill. This dead Negro is argument No. 1 for a belief that adequate army press relations cannot be limited to a press room, even one under the command of a major general full of the best intentions.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE ADVERTISEMENTS of Kenneth Roberts's newest best-seller, "Oliver Wiswell," are taking on a political tinge. "Should the American Revolution Be Censored?" runs the provocative headline. And then we are told to read this book for the truth about the Revolution, which most Americans "still do not know." The truth, according to Roberts, is that the patriots of 1776 were low-class rabble or weak-minded innocents misled by such blackguards as Sam Adams, whose only motive in desiring independence was to escape paying the British a fine of $100,000 for smuggling; and that the War of Independence was won only because General Howe was a philanderer and the King lost interest. It is all revealed in a volume of 863 interminable pages, which the publishers blithely describe as a "literary masterpiece," though the writing, the characterization, and the plot are all made of paper and print. One has the sense throughout of watching a bad movie, except that it is harder on the eyes.

Augustus Loring Richards, in a little pamphlet which has come to my desk, counters the publishers' claim of "truthful revelation" with an accusation of "reckless inaccuracy" on the part of Mr. Roberts. He begins by flaying, with convincing evidence, Roberts's intimation that John Jay would have regarded this book as true history. He cites a minor error in Roberts's reference to Millis, Massachusetts, pointing out that there was no town of that name until 100 years after the Revolution. "Roberts's 'original record' of Wiswell's route was probably a Socony road map."

Or consider this illustration: The passage through "Millis," above mentioned, was in the course of a journey made by Wiswell . . . and Buell from New York to Milton, Massachusetts, in the late summer of 1776. . . . According to the narrative the region they traversed was populated with a living chain of terror-stricken victims of pillage and pitiless persecution.

Now if Mr. Roberts had been interested in rendering a truthful account . . . he could have told a very different story. He could have pictured his Tory heroes as spending a comfortable night in a certain well-known inn near Worcester. The innkeeper was a Tory and . . . he made it a practice to confine his hospitality to Tories. . . .

Mr. Richards gives as his source the published memoirs of the secretary of Baron Steuben, who was warned against this inn when he was traveling from Boston to Valley Forge in January, 1777. Steuben and his party, caught in a snow-storm, were refused accommodations but enforced their rights as travelers. This might have provided Mr. Roberts with another "rebel outrage," but to have introduced the Tory inn into his tale would have conflicted with his determination to present the Revolution from the Tory point of view.

Mr. Richards's main attack is reserved for the Roberts thesis that Tories were a persecuted minority—of wealth and brains and property—and were forced into exile after the Revolution. Revolution and civil war are not pretty. The War of Independence was both a revolution and a civil war; and there were unquestionably excesses on both sides, but according to Mr. Richards the two camps were about equally divided, and "a very large part of our present population is undoubtedly of Tory descent." Mr. Richards also notes that thousands of Hessian soldiers remained in this country.

One of the most famous and effective of Tory leaders . . . was the Reverend Samuel Seabury. . . . After the war began he was confined for a few weeks in a Connecticut jail. Later he took refuge in New York City and became a chaplain of a Tory regiment. In 1783 he was consecrated in Scotland as Bishop of Connecticut, and in 1785 . . . took up his residence in New Haven as rector of St. James's Church.

Samuel Seabury of New York is his descendant and namesake.

MARGARET MARSHALL

A Voice of France

FRANCE MY COUNTRY, THROUGH THE DISASTER.

By Jacques Maritain. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.25.

"I BELONG to a people in whom temporal hope is so deep-rooted that it is of their substance." These words, which explain the complex beauty of this little book, are not easy words to understand. Their author is a Christian—one who believes that the essential life of man is of the spirit and transcendental. Their author is also a Frenchman—one, therefore, who will not relinquish hope that his value as an immortal soul is incarnately involved in the living history of France. Because this French Christian is also a poet, indeed primarily a poet, his spiritual vision and his temporal hope are sharply modulated to the experience of his country. This must suffice, in the brief space I dispose of, to suggest the quality of the book. It is an organic record of France in that its shrewd discussion of events and their causes reveals significances vastly beyond them.

To the reader who knows the intricate prosody of Maritain's work, the little volume is a cluster of filaments leading back and forth among his religious and social doctrines. But any careful reader will get a good deal from the eminently sane assembly of notations, even though not one of them alone may strike him as particularly new. The fall of France is analyzed: the political confusion and decadence, the divorce between the people of France and their rulers, the tragic fallacy of the Maginot generals who had prepared for the last war, the insufficiency of industrial production. The psychology of the dazing defeat is explained; and of the people under the Nazi asphyxiation. The mind here at work has quite as much information as the journalists and modish novelists, but moves within dimensions which the shallow gentlemen ignore. M. Maritain traces Machiavellianism to its final flowering in the false religion of political separatism which Liberal, Communist, Socialist, Nazi, and Vichy Catholic all share. He sees in the fall of France the fall of the bourgeois order. But he rejects the primacy of any specific cause for the disaster; his sense of life is too organic for that. Evil and error, he explains, are always present in any human situation; so that it is as easy as it is false after the fact to moralize a disaster. In the chapter on the French people in defeat his hope is well tempered by the analysis of dangers (we fear them also!) that make his beloved France vulnerable as it has never been in its thousand glorious years. The poet is a realist-psychologist, which explains why his patterns have taken the form of religion.

If the book has a fault, it is perhaps that it is too cursory and allusive in its variety of awarenesses. It assumes in the reader a knowledge both of France and of the author, justifiable in a Frenchman accustomed to a public with a cultural memory—a public, that is, non-existent in the United States. Of course, I cannot here adequately review this book. I content myself with raising a single question. M. Maritain says: "The French people were politically, not morally, demoralized"; they had not lost, he declares, "their natural virtues," and indeed, during the past decade, were enjoying a great intellectual and spiritual rebirth. He is at pains, therefore, to divorce the corruption of all the public leaders and of all the ideologies—Communist, Socialist, liberal-bourgeois, reactionary Catholic—from the health of the folk. If this were the mere emotional expression of a man of France before the agony of his people, one might be respectfully and humbly silent. But Jacques Maritain is too great a soldier of the human spirit to ask for such indulgence. Deep in his insistence on the moral and spiritual health of his Catholic people is the implicit defense of their religion. And deep in this process of separating essence from act, natural and spiritual virtue from immediate history, I feel and fear the presence of a cultural pattern which became the disease of France and which M. Maritain shares with his great and greatly beloved nation.

In 1936, when the fascist world revolution got in its stride with the assault on Spain, a Jew, Léon Blum, was Premier of France. M. Blum failed to do his duty, which was to give all-out aid to Spain's republic. He knew what he should do, and why. He flinched because he was afraid, and this also he knew. London's City on the west, Hitler on the east, his own fascist-commanded army and industrials at home, threatened war if he helped Spain's people. "How can a Jew bring war to France?" wailed the Prime Minister on the shoulders of his friends. M. Maritain would certainly agree that if Léon Blum had been a different kind of Jew, a true and serious follower of the Prophets, he would have risked civil war rather than betray justice and mankind. He would have relied on the peoples of France and Britain to sustain him; he would have said to his God and to his nation, "I can do no other." But, of course, had M. Blum been that kind of Jew, he would never have headed the French Socialist Party, he would never have been chosen Premier. In brief, the weakness of this ruler was not unrelated to the spiritual state of his electors. The French are the most intelligent, the most widely cultured people upon earth. They knew that the leaders of their army and navy were black fascists, haters of the republic. They knew, moreover, that a similar set of professional "defenders," having sworn allegiance to Spain's republic, were murdering Spain before their eyes. All these generals and officers were devout Catholics, shared the religion of their peoples. In 1938 I crossed back from Barcelona into France. I arrived at Perpignan on a Sunday noon: the good people of France filled the cafes, fat and merry within the shadow of Spain's death. They knew all about it. "Am I my brother's keeper?" For weeks I had been dreaming of the white bread, the sweet butter, the cool beer, that awaited me in France. I sat among the good fat folk and ordered my dream—and left the cafe with the food untouched. At that moment, in nausea and premonition, I knew that Europe would not profit by Spain's martyrdom, because the people of France were not worthy to be spared.

The general rot within the disaster of France goes deeper than M. Maritain allows. Deeper than the stupidity and venality of politicians was the huge cynicism which already branded Paris in 1935 as a semi-fascist city. Not for inorganic reasons did the soldiers and citizens of free and aware France intrust their fatherland's defense to reactionary Catholic generals. Not because of mere confusion did the burghers of Perpignan drink their lush wine within the shadow of Spain's dying. If a folk so clear and strong loses its reason and its hands, is it not for the poet-philosopher to seek the cause of the paralysis precisely where M. Maritain declines to find it? In the religion of the people.

Here are questions too deep to be even stated in a brief review—urgent questions for us who lack so many of the virtues, and none of the weaknesses, of France. A token of the significance of M. Maritain's book is that he brings us to these questions, forces us to face them.

WALDO FRANK

Mr. Percy's Culture

LANTERNS ON THE LEVEE. By William Alexander Percy. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IS IT possible that the South is the nation's economic problem No. 1 because it is first of all the nation's intellectual problem No. 1? Mr. Percy's interesting and provocative autobiography makes clear that it is quite possible. Here is the life story of a man who is not so much a typical Southerner as a superior Southerner. William Alexander Percy can trace his ancestry through some of the finest families of the old mint-julep South. He went to Sewanee and the Harvard Law School. He traveled abroad in the aristocratic tradition of the Grand Tour. Upon visiting Athens he was so eager to see the Acropolis that he rose at six o'clock and rushed out without his breakfast. Moreover, throughout a busy life this man has cultivated the arts of thought and of living. Mr. Percy is aware of at least some of the great social strains that underlie the fabric of Southern life, and he would like to do something about them. From such a man we have every right to expect the best of Southern thought.

So it is all the more astonishing, and all the more disappointing, to discover that the theories and opinions of this fine flower of Southern life are at bottom very similar to those held by the rednecks and the peckerwoods and the vulgarians. Take, for example, Mr. Percy on the Negro question: "I would say to the Negro: before demanding to be a white man socially and politically, learn to be a white man morally and intellectually."

This admonition will be popular in reactionary circles of the South. It possesses that air of benevolent paternalism so dear to the Southern heart. It does not say, Black Brother, the door is closed forever, there is no hope for you. Rather it says, Struggle on, Black Brother, be obedient, tip your hat to your betters, and in a thousand years or so maybe you will be as good and as smart as I am now, and then possibly you can have the vote and a berth in the Pullman car.

But everyone except the reactionaries will recognize Mr. Percy's paternalistic admonition to be pretty hollow nonsense. It is also dangerous, for it assumes that moral and intellectual development must or can come before social and political development. This assumption, I submit, is contrary to all experience. The Negro, like all other races, will make all four of these developments more or less at the same time. In the days of slavery Mr. Percy would no doubt have insisted that the Negro must attain moral and intellectual parity with the white man before he should have his freedom. But freedom, a political and a social gain, was the key to the whole world, without which there was nothing. Mr. Percy would probably argue that the Negro then lost a part of his freedom because he did not make the moral or intellectual advances necessary to sustain it. But that would be turning history upside down, for the Negro was robbed of his political freedom in large part before he had any chance whatever to show what he could do with it. Nevertheless, something of freedom did remain, and without it the progress since made by the Negro would have been impossible. Surely political freedom must come first of all; for the only way to prove that one deserves freedom is to be free. Just as emancipation was the key in the 1860's, so now it seems clear that wide enfranchisement is the key to further progress. By insisting upon an impossible perfectionism, Mr. Percy would lock the door and withhold the key.

Mr. Percy's position on share-cropping is equally disappointing. He says: "Share-cropping is one of the best systems ever devised to give security and a chance for profit to the simple and unskilled." Then he continues: "It has but one drawback—it must be administered by human beings to whom it offers an unusual [my emphasis] opportunity to rob without detection or punishment." Mr. Percy thus condemns the system in his own words, apparently without realizing that he is condemning it. He also seems unaware of this dilemma: if the croppers become skilled and informed they will doubtless overturn the system—and thus do away with the basis of Mr. Percy's culture; while if they remain simple and unskilled, somebody will always be only too happy to cheat them. The main indictment against the share-cropping system, however, is not moral but economic; the system is wasteful of labor, land, capital, and management. It would still be a vicious system, even if all the landlords were as sweet as Pollyanna and as kind-hearted as Santa Claus.

If a man so alert as William Alexander Percy can do no better than this, what are we to expect from the vulgarians? Our Southern reactionaries will be delighted to learn that, aside from a few dislocations which alarm Mr. Percy, so little is really wrong with our social system, and especially to have the assurance from so cultured a gentlemen and in such skilful prose. But the rest of us must say in sorrow, Somehow we must do better than this or we shall surely perish.

CHARLES CURTIS MUNZ

Manual of the War

BATTLE FOR THE WORLD. By Max Werner. Translated by Heinz and Ruth Norden. Modern Age Books. $3.

THE rise of Hitler made considerations of military strategy an integral part of every man's political reasoning. Every school of political thought evolved its strategic view and attempted to support its often merely wishful "military science" with arguments drawn from technical literature. At the present moment this phenomenon is even more striking. There is, for example, the honorable version of the strict isolationist view that provided the United States does not aid Britain all will be well. A book and an early article of Hanson Baldwin's are often doubtfully drawn on in its support. Then there is the half-isolationist school which contends that if this country aids Britain with one hand, good will result, but if two hands are used, the United States will be destroyed. The technical literature of this school appears to be confined to the releases of the Gallup poll. The right-wing interventionists have their justification in classical theories of naval power. The left-wing supporters of Britain have hitherto not been well served by military scholars. It is good, therefore, that Mr. Werner has written this excellent book, which might be described as a Nation reader's manual of the war.

Mr. Werner is clear and unequivocal. He has always been an anti-fascist opponent of appeasement. His earlier book was a carefully documented plea for collective security. "Battle for the World" sustains the same line of argument, in the form that it logically takes at this stage of the crisis. He is a supporter of aid to Britain, because "a British defeat . . . makes possible and even probable a war against America by four continents under the leadership of the fascist-imperialist triangle." He approves of Administration policies but would have them clarified and strengthened, with the object of defeating the Axis.

It was recently suggested to me, during the course of a conversation in which I was commending the book, that Mr. Werner is "pro-Soviet." What I note, however, is merely that he does not permit his expressed dislike of Stalin to falsify his military reasoning. He asserts, and supports his case with numerous citations from leading non-Soviet authorities, that the Soviet army is an extremely powerful one, and a well-trained one, informed with wholly modern theories of war. When he reviews the consequences of the Soviet-German pact he points out the striking paradox that the very fulfilment of the pact tends to annul it. He provides an illuminating discussion of the maneuvering of the two principal Continental powers in their efforts to outflank each other in the Scandinavian North and the Near East. Apropos of the Soviets, only one glaring omission strikes the reviewer. In his otherwise excellent analysis of the Finnish war Mr. Werner fails to mention the enormous importance to their offensive of the Soviets' total mastery of the air. Nor does he ask what would have been the result had the Finnish army had the mobile artillery and reserves which would have been at the service of a German front of comparable extension. The Mannerheim Line was destroyed by heavy and competently directed artillery fire. But had a first-class air force been active, and had great masses of mobile artillery, plus mechanical equipment, been engaged, the Soviet artillery would have found the duel less a matter of target practice than the low Soviet casualty list indicated that it was. Since the only point of discussing Soviet military strength is to compare it with the German forces, the omission is serious. Nevertheless, I believe that Mr. Werner's contention that the Red Army is as powerful as the German—at least for a war of no great duration—is sound.

The author possesses and expounds a global view of the war that includes an estimate of the political forces at work in the world identical with that expressed by the reviewer in The Nation. The last chapter of the book is entitled The Decision Facing America. It is so good that I wish he had doubled or trebled its length. I wish, too, that he had been more explicit concerning British and American relations with the Soviets. But, again, the omission does not seriously flaw ■ thoroughly creditable and useful piece of work.

RALPH BATES

In Solitary

SATAN'S SERGEANTS. By Josephine Herbst. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

ALTHOUGH the heroes and heroines of modern American novels are almost inevitably infected with loneliness and frustration, the minor characters are usually endowed by their creators with sufficient freedom to find some small measure of content and to form ■ salutary number of satisfactory human relationships. In Miss Herbst's novel all the characters lead thwarted, solitary, and unfulfilled lives. Two leading-strings determine their behavior: the separateness of human beings—"No wonder men accepted war that brought them together if only for disaster"—and the struggle to overcome and outwit the feeling of death. There is also a certain amount of nostalgia for the days when "those religionists" had "something inside of them, hard and good, and believing in man himself." The characters are natives of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, or rich newcomers from the city. They are homeless, feverishly alone, and, I suppose it follows, unhappily married. Their minds creep away from their own capsize lives to the island of their defeated past, where they worry and feed. Two of them try to write.

The whole book is conditioned by this view of life, from which both its virtues and its deficiencies derive. It is of course not a question of the validity of the author's particular exegesis, but of what it does to the book. The people are real; the perceptions are acute; the observation, the moods, are excellent. These qualities, however, are necessarily blighted and stultified by the passive feelings imputed to the characters, feelings which are presented neither profoundly nor passionately enough to become active. The characters are continually remembering or being reminded of their pre-history, and we learn all the facts about them by means of numerous flashbacks and chapter sketches. The ever-churning thoughts and reflections are strangely alike, all at the same far remove, dioramic. And the planned climax, the calculated hypodermic—the big fire which is to consume the burden of wasted expenditure and reanimate the death-ridden lives—does not burn brightly enough. "We are all guilty," says Mrs. Williard; that's all.

For the truth it has, the sympathy, the deep feeling, for the daily pendulum of American family life, the book is good; but its goodness as a novel is only as latent and unrealized as the goodness of its characters. We do have Will Armstrong. Will lives a foundering life, a stranger to his wife and son as they are to him, and the realization of his strangeness finally kills him. Will is magnificent. In his relationship with his son Johnny and his wife, Belle, the power of his own helplessness generates the best writing of the book. Then the book stirs with a little of that free energy a novel must have.

Novelists Between Wars

AMERICAN FICTION: 1920-1940. By Joseph Warren Beach. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN THIS study Joseph Warren Beach, who has written extensively on the problems and tendencies of modern fiction, examines eight American novelists of the inter-bellum period: Dos Passos, Hemingway, Faulkner, Wolfe, Caldwell, Farrell, Marquand, and Steinbeck. With the exception of Marquand, whom a sturdier sense of critical justice might have excluded in favor of a more expressive literary type, such as F. Scott Fitzgerald or Glenway Wescott, the novelists he considers are fully representative of the evolution of our narrative prose in the past twenty years. They certainly provide us with no end of examples both of a positive and negative nature. Mr. Beach, however, has chosen to inform his appraisals almost entirely with a laudatory content.

Although here and there, as in the case of Faulkner's style, he is not averse to noticing faults and sticking by what he has noticed, on the whole he manages to minimize or explain away altogether whatever weaknesses come to his attention. Thus he argues that the lack of form in Thomas Wolfe is more apparent than real, that actually his novels are ordered according to a symphonic pattern which makes them structurally comparable to the work of Proust. Moreover, the book is sustained throughout by a peculiar tone of buoyancy and elation that one has learned to suspect because it is of the kind that reflects more credit on a person's qualities as a reader—and these qualities are patience, loving-kindness, and gratitude for entertainment received—than on his values as a critic. It is plain that Mr. Beach takes most of the novelists he discusses on their own terms; he is concerned, as he admits when speaking of Caldwell, in putting them "in the best possible light with the intelligent reading public." Hence it is without surprise that we come upon the pretty tall claim advanced in his concluding chapter that "the social seriousness of American fiction today . . . is everywhere supported, in our most powerful writers, by an artistic seriousness and maturity such as we have never known before."

Consider to what lengths Mr. Beach has to go in order to maintain his claim. Having committed himself to the opinion that Steinbeck is a genius who typifies the "ripening of American literary culture," he must needs make out that each of Steinbeck's novels is an important work of art. Even "Tortilla Flat," that inconsequential romance of goody-goody vagabonds, he describes as "colored with the delicious humor of Don Quixote" and as possessing the "tender pathos of distance that attaches to St. Francis and Robin Hood and Shakespeare's Forest of Arden." And it is not Steinbeck alone who touches off a rhapsodic strain in this critic. Caldwell, too, he hails as a master who has his affinities with "Chaucer and Dickens, Balzac and Gorki." What can one say in face of such honorific statements? Obviously Mr. Beach, who once wrote an excellent book on Henry James, has lost the capacity to draw essential distinctions.

And the point is not that Mr. Beach approaches writing in a naive manner, or that he lacks the equipment to place the art object within the right perspective. The essays in this volume on Faulkner and Farrell, in which he does not follow the beaten track of current popular opinion, show him in a different light. The trouble is, rather, that all too often he fails to make any real use of the considerable equipment he has at his disposal. After all, it takes only a modicum of literary sensitiveness to realize that Steinbeck is at present the most overrated novelist in America, and that Caldwell, despite his great gifts as a story-teller and as a symbolist of rural abandon, is fatally limited to plowing up over and over again the same small patch of ground. Nor does Thomas Wolfe, who is so wholly symptomatic of the traditional dilemma of the American artist, present any inexplicable critical problems.

In view of all this, perhaps Mr. Beach's leaps into super-erogation might be explained by the fact that, like so many people today, he has been moved by the compulsion to inflate everything American. Now that European culture has proved itself so brittle, many are trying to ward off the disaster that threatens us too by insisting on the uniform perfection of our native products. There is no salvation, however, in talismanic thinking. In the end it cannot but lead to the further enfeeblement of the organism whose defense has become so urgent.

IN BRIEF

WHISTLE STOP. By Maritta M. Wolff. Random House. $2.50.

A sturdy, extremely capable first novel about a sprawling, ill-assorted family in a little Midwestern town, their lives a tangle of jealousies, squabbles, repressions, and, strangely enough, hair-trigger adventure.

HALF THAT GLORY. By Stanley Gray. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

A colorful costume-piece depicting the part of the American Revolution that was fought behind the scenes in Europe, with Franklin and Beaumarchais spinning threads in a web of international intrigue—all this and a love story, too.

CAPTAIN PAUL. By Commander Edward Ellsberg. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.75.

A rousing, if somewhat over long, celebration of the exploits and character of our first great sea captain, John Paul Jones, as mirrored in the eyes of a close friend and officer who sailed with him on the Bonhomme Richard.

PORTULACA. By Bernice Kelly Harris. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Because her portrait of Southern small-town life is so uncompromisingly honest, it is hard to see why Mrs. Harris lets her heroine compromise at the end of this novel. For a brief moment Nancy escapes from the deadening middle-class atmosphere that surrounds her husband, his family, and their uninspiring neighbors. But the next moment she goes back to them, and the explanation that the author invents for her action is not altogether satisfactory. Mrs. Harris writes with a sprightly pen. Her publishers say that her book is "unstained" by bitterness. A dash more of bitterness might have improved it.

THE OTHER WORLDS. Edited, with an Introduction, by Phil Stong. Wilfred Funk. $2.50.

If you like to proceed from impossible premises to impossible conclusions by perfectly logical steps, this anthology is for you. That is not said by way of derogation. It is a perfectly legitimate literary game and has excellent classical antecedents. Excessively serious, sober, and sensible people are warned to stay away, but for those who enjoy Lewis Carroll at his most nonsensical and Poe at his most horrible, Mr. Stong has spread a delectable feast. His taste in the field of fantasy is unfailingly good. This book has some virtues rare among anthologies: namely, well-worn items are rejected because they are too well known and authors are judged by their merit rather than by their reputations.

LOVE AND DEATH. By Llewellyn Powys. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

This novel, written as "an imaginary autobiography," is a sort of "Death and Transfiguration" in which the narrator, dying of consumption, recalls the idyllic love affair of his youth and distils from his memories a rapture that annihilates the agony of oncoming death. Written actually during the last few years of Mr. Powys's life, it is a modern "Daphnis and Chloe," an erotic rhapsody written in exquisite prose, an aging man's lyric hymn to the poetry of earth that is never dead.

THE DEEP. By Kaj Klitgaard. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.75.

A novel about a Danish lad with a restless, impishly inquiring mind who grows up at sea during the years before the first World War, building a philosophy out of the ocean's many moods to fit the men whom he learns to know on full-rigged sailing vessels, tramp freighters, and trim vessels of the W. I. S. A. Line. It is a leisurely, sometimes rambling, but always mature and sensitive story that should charm many readers with its humane tolerance and its all-permeating savor of salt, rum, and pitch.

CALL THE NEW WORLD. By John Jennings. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

Through ten years—and 450 pages—of love and adventure likable Peter Brooke battles in the armies of the New World, taking part in the defense of Washington against the British in the War of 1812, campaigning up and down South America with Bolívar, always fighting against the forces of European oppression. One suspects that the story, while lively enough in its own right, was intended mainly to furnish a romantic background for the scene in which President Monroe issues his well-known doctrine in a message to the Congress.

DRAMA

EVERYBODY concerned with "The Happy Days" (Henry Miller's Theater) seems to have done his best. That goes for Miss Zoë Akins, who adapted it from the French of Claude-André Puget, and also for a very pleasant company of juveniles, including Diana Barrymore, Joan Tetzl, and Peter Scott. It goes also for Raymond Sovey, who has designed an unusually substantial and unusually inviting set to represent the country-house living-room where the action takes place. But the best and most conscientious workmen need something to work with, and the play is one of the most insubstantial of the many insubstantial bubbles which recent French playwrights have devoted themselves to blowing.

It is about—in so far as it is about anything—a group of adolescents respectably discovering life and love during the three days when they are left alone on an island while their parents are away at the funeral of a relative. Except for a few unnecessary lush passages, it is written with a certain delicacy, and there are a few farcical moments that are genuinely funny; but there is far too much marking of time, and it hardly seems an evening's worth. If intended for a psychological study, it ought to say more; if it is not supposed to be more than an entertaining comedy, it ought to be funnier.

ART

Wrong for Latin America

THAT "carefully selected collection" of three hundred-odd American oils and water colors lately on brief view at the Metropolitan Museum and "intended to familiarize our southern neighbors with present trends in American painting" unhappily has got under way. Three exhibitions have been carved from it. Of these, one is headed for Buenos Aires, Montevideo, Rio de Janeiro, and possibly Sao Paolo; another for Mexico City, Santiago de Chile, Lima, and Quito; the third for Bogotá, Caracas, and Havana. We say "unhappily" for the following reason: assembled under the auspices of the Coordinator of Commercial and Cultural Relations between the American Republics and doubtless designed as a means of prompting the educated in the southern countries imaginatively to connect themselves with us, the collection and its offspring, unless the heavens prove clement, are likely to render our art and culture the laughing-stock of capitals such as Rio, Buenos Aires, and Mexico City.

The paintings do not form one of the brilliant, splashy shows that captivate the crowd. Neither do they constitute a demonstration of unusual abilities and aspiration, sincerity, imagination of the kind that wins the sensitive and intelligent to sympathy. Alleged to be a representation of the work of "some of our most gifted painters," the ensemble while it hung on the Metropolitan's walls reminded us of nothing quite so much as of the perennial jury-free shows of the Society of Independent Artists. What faced us, for all the famous names in the catalogue, was an indiscriminate heap, a scattering of wheat amid a mass of pictorial tares—which gave the impression that the level of achievement in contemporary American painting is unimportant, vulgar, dull. Works of art to be sure were not wholly wanting. There was a superb quartet of Marin washes. There were "Seated Nude" by Karfiol, one of the gentle lyrist's jewel-like canvases, Max Weber's warm "Music," Dickinson's soundly calculated "Industry," characteristically aggressive Hartleys, and good Demuths, Burchfields, McFees. However, the quality of the mass of the exhibits submerged these and other instances of the art of painting.

The biggest and thus most conspicuous canvas in the collection is the detestable "Draped Figure" by John Carroll. Designed in the manner of El Greco seen through Sargent, it is hopelessly cheap in spirit; evidently painted in cold cream and soot; giving the effect of the flesh of an overripe banana. Almost as conspicuous by reason of their number are the six oils and water colors by Reginald Marsh: they are most inferior examples of draftsmanship and color. Their lines, for example, possess no genuine vitality. What expresses itself through them is not the quality or inwardness of things but mere caricatures of essences. Conspicuous largely by reason of their squalid subject matter, the Marsh sextet, in fact, are illustrations. The assemblage, again, sports three sizable John Steuart Currys which vie with one another for the crown of red onions reserved for the perfectly commonplace. And the quantities of veneered academicisms masquerading as modernities!

Even some of the collection's examples of the painters who deserved a place in it are inferior. The silvery O'Keeffe, for instance, is one of this excellent artist's few pieces with a papery feel. The water-color section certainly would not have been crippled by the exclusion of Walkowitz's leaden pair of "Isadora Duncans," any more than the oil section would have suffered by the inclusion of a couple of his lovelier landscapes with figures. One of Demuth's rather static canvases might advantageously have been eliminated in favor of a representative group of this exquisite's lustrous washes. As for a Marin oil, there is no sign of one, nor an inch of anything by those distinguished creative painters Dove, Stella, Koppman, Bluemner, Varian, Friedman.

But it would be folly to expatiate on the character of the show. The pity is, the actual America possesses painters who if expertly presented might easily fascinate the sensitive and intelligent in Latin America: painters of extraordinary gifts, endeavor, vision, whose work not only has aimed at heights but has attained them. We still are a great nation; rich not only in promise but in performance, in social and intellectual elevation. And just as it is not the common but the highest level of their achievement which ultimately represents nations at the judgment bar of humanity, so it is this high level which continually represents them at that of intelligent and sensitive people. The advantage flowing from the achievement of interesting this stratum of persons is due of course to the circumstance that what prevails in the long run is their opinion. Meanwhile, Latin America has not yet made up its mind regarding the value of the American contribution to culture and potential creativity in the aesthetic realms; and, as I have remarked, it would seem that a miracle might be necessary to prevent the show now en route from costing us some of the recognition we badly require.

It is unfortunate, too, that while the disserviceable collection was on the Metropolitan's walls the critics of the great New York dailies not only did not utter a word of protest against its quality but never even sought seriously to appraise it, thus depriving our "southern neighbors" of a means of judging of its representativeness. In Mexico they possess brilliant indigenous art, and in the east-coast capitals of the southern continent the educated public is familiar with modern French art and, incidentally, possesses imitators and illustrators who will see through the tricks of their northern confrères. And, informed by the organizing committee that the bulk of the collection represents the work of "some of our most gifted painters" and the "present trends in American painting," they will judge us by these "fruits."

RECORDS

THE characteristically mingled wit and stabbing poignancy and sheer loveliness of Mozart's String Quartet K. 458 ("Hunt") are marvelously realized, in Victor's new set (763, $3.50), in the sound of the work created by the Budapest Quartet—a four-stranded texture that is as unique an achievement of as unique a combination of musical feeling and taste and technical virtuosity in this province as a Toscanini performance is in the other. With this set, made here a year ago, I played the Victor set of Beethoven's Quartet Op. 74 ("Harp") which the Budapest group made in England, and the set of Beethoven's Op. 18 No. 1 which it made here recently for Columbia—this for a comparison of recording jobs. The English recording—which reproduces the four strands with flawless beauty of sound throughout their range, with spaciousness and balance, with cleanness and roundness of definition—is the best; the American Victor offers the spaciousness, balance, and definition, the beauty of sound in the lower range, but a metallic sharpness in the higher range of the violins; the Columbia hasn't the cleanness and roundness of definition.

The power and grandeur that have caused Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 to acquire the name "Emperor" are in the music when Schnabel plays it with power and grandeur in the old Victor set, and are not there when Moiseivitch plays it with sentimentality and mincing daintiness in the new Victor set that he made with the London Philharmonic under Szell (Set 761, $5.50). Piano and orchestra are recorded with more richness and voluminousness in the new version; but the recording of the old performance is still acceptable in fidelity, clarity, and balance, and I hope that Victor will retain it in the catalogue. If it doesn't, the fine Columbia set made by Gieseking and Bruno Walter will be the one to acquire of this work. (Schnabel is now here—and here to stay. It seems likely under the circumstances that if it wants to Victor can secure H.M.V.'s permission to make recordings of his performances—of the Schubert sonatas that he is going to play for the New Friends of Music next season; of the last Beethoven sonatas that are no longer obtainable even in H.M.V.'s limited edition subscription sets; of some of the concertos he will play with orchestras next year. And meanwhile Victor might issue the Schnabel recording of Schubert's great B flat Sonata that has already appeared in England.)

The volume Italian Songs of the 17th and 18th Centuries (Set 766, $3.50) offers in most instances pieces that are lovely and charming, and that are superbly sung by Pinza. On the other hand the Russian Liturgical Music recorded by the General Platoff Don Cossack Chorus (Set 768, $3.50) I find wearisome—though possibly what wearies me is the music as sung in what seems to be the Cossack chorus style of constant oscillation between ffff and pppp. On his record (15601, $1) of "Dalla sua pace" and "Il mio tesoro" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" Gigli's voice sounds more agreeable than it has sounded on other recent records, but his phrasing is not in better musical taste.

The pieces in the volume Piano Music by American Composers (Set 764, $4.50), well recorded by Jeanne Behrend, are things one might be interested in hearing once; but I doubt that this hearing would leave one with a desire to hear them many more times or even—in some instances—a second time. And my hearing of the works of Villa-Lobos in the Festival of Brazilian Music (Set 773, $5.50) has left me with an unwillingness ever to hear another work by this composer even once. The performances by Elsie Houston, the Brazilian Festival Orchestra and Quartet, and the Schola Cantorum, all under the direction of Burle Marx, seem good and are well recorded. As for Sibelius's "Malinconia," well done by Louis Jensen, 'cellist, and Galina Werschenskaya, pianist (17920, $1), it is something only a Sibelius fanatic will want.

Though he had only musicians of limited capacities at his disposal—the Columbia University and Barnard College Glee Clubs and the Columbia University Orchestra—Mr. John Giddings, with unusual enterprise and courage, put on a performance of Berlioz's Requiem which could not give the work all the effect it would have had from a first-rate professional performance, but which gave me at least an idea of this effect that I probably never would have if I waited for one of our choral or orchestral conductors to give it to me. In much of the work I found the language strange and the thought not easily assimilated; but two sections were immediately accessible and impressive—the intense and intricate Lacrymosa and the radiant Sanctus (in the Sanctus it was painful to hear what the tenor soloist, William Hess, had been taught to do with a fine voice).

And excellent taste in the selection and arrangement of material made the program of Spanish music and dancing at the third of the Museum of Modern Art's Coffee Concerts a model of its kind. The dancing of the extraordinary Juan Martinez and his wife Antonita, of Ana Maria, of the youngsters of the Gaiteros de Galicia, the singing of Sophia Novoa and La Gitanilla, the florid singing of the guitarist Jeronimo Villarino—all these were delightful.

Letters to the Editors

Appeasement in Palestine

Dear Sirs: Recent reports of events in Iraq have again called attention to the notorious Haj Amin el Husseini, former Mufti of Jerusalem, now playing the Axis game in Bagdad. If he is today second only in influence in the Arab world to Ibn Saud, the British deserve credit for having deliberately built up his reputation and his trouble-making capacity. They appointed him Mufti in 1921, overriding the negative vote of the Moslem notables charged by law with making the selection. As head of the Palestine Moslem Supreme Council he was on the British pay roll; as sole administrator of the Waqf, a religious and charitable foundation, he was responsible for the distribution of large sums for which an accounting was never required of him. He was formally charged with instigating rioting against Jews and British in Palestine by several investigating commissions. In the disturbances that began in 1936 he was known to be receiving financial aid from Axis sources, and to be outfitting his terrorist gangs with Axis arms and paying them off with Axis money.

Yet the British made no move to halt his activities until 1937; even then they generously permitted him to "escape" from Jerusalem to Syria, where their French allies as generously permitted him to continue his Axis-financed leadership of the Palestine rioters and his pro-Axis, anti-British propaganda. With the outbreak of the war he removed to Bagdad, where he played no small part in fomenting the anti-British sentiment that eventuated in Rashid Ali's coup. And now he is calling for a holy war to raise up the new Aryan Allah, with Haj Amin as his prophet.

The name of Fauzi Kawakji has also cropped up in the news again as a leader of the Iraqi revolt. He was the self-styled "general" of the Palestinian rioters, whom the British studiously refrained from putting out of commission.

Haj Amin could have been deflated and rendered impotent at any moment of his British-made career. But the British were so intent on appeasing the Arabs that they deliberately catered to his personal ambitions, camouflaged as Arab "nationalism." The concessions they made in pursuance of this policy, such as whittling down the internationally guaranteed rights of the Jewish settlers until they virtually disappeared, only aroused contempt for Britain among the Arabs.

It may be noted, too, that the British have not yet learned from this experience. Palestine is in critical danger of an attack which will expose the eastern flank of the Suez and deliver it into Axis hands. Palestine is more difficult to defend, especially with Syria virtually open to Axis forces and Iraq in a state of disaffection, than is North Africa. Yet British appeasement of the Arabs has gone to the length of refusing to mobilize some 50,000 trained and eager Jews in Palestine—and at least another 50,000 elsewhere anxious to serve in Palestine—for fear of arousing Arab displeasure. Britain declines to place under arms more Jews than Arabs; and so the enrolment of Jews must wait upon the pleasure of the Arabs, who have shown themselves reluctant to serve, in some part, no doubt, as a result of Haj Amin's effective propaganda. This at a time when the empire approaches a major crisis, and every soldier counts. For the same reason Britain has deliberately refrained from developing Palestine's efficient industry, largely Jewish, to a point where it can supply the Near East armies with important war materials.

And so the Suez may be lost, the empire cut in two—but, praise Allah, the Arabs will have been appeased.

The New Master Class

Dear Sirs: In his review of James Burnham's "The Managerial Revolution" in The Nation of April 26, Lewis Corey mentions me as one of those who "helped to shape the theory" of the new social order discussed by Mr. Burnham. Corey says that I "formulated it in a general way" and "called the new rulers 'intellectuals.'" That word actually does occur rather frequently in my writings. I used it, however, in the "specifically economic sense of a stratum deriving its livelihood from mental occupations" (Foreword to my "Rebels and Renegades," 1932). Moreover, in my subsequent writings I spoke of "the rule of a new master class, the office-holders and technicians" (Scribner's, March, 1933) and, again, of capitalism having "produced its own successor in the form of a new social stratum of managers, organizers, technicians, and other educated employees" (Scribner's, June, 1934). Mr. Corey is therefore not quite exact when he says that the later writers dealing with this subject "made it more specific" by speaking of "technical and managerial middle classes" or of "technical, administrative, managerial groups." Furthermore, I wish to point out that the theory in question, at least in its basic outline, is much older than the writings Mr. Corey referred to. Credit for it belongs to the Polish-Russian revolutionary thinker Wacław Machajski, whose writings, in Russian, appeared about forty years ago.

Polish Anti-Semitism

Dear Sirs: Permit me to make a few remarks concerning the article Anti-Semitism in Exile by William Zukerman, in The Nation of May 17. There is no doubt that anti-Semitic tendencies exist among some of the Polish exiles, but the views of these reactionary groups should not be confused with Polish public opinion. Poland passed the high tide of anti-Semitism at least a year before the outbreak of the war, and reactionary influences had begun to decrease in strength despite the efforts of the regime. And even during the preceding period of rising anti-Semitism there was a strong mass movement in Poland definitely opposing it—namely, the labor movement. Moreover, other sectors of Polish public opinion—not only in the Peasant Party—agreed with labor on this question. Many prominent scholars and intellectuals publicly proclaimed their indignation at the official support given to anti-Semitism.

Most of the eminent Polish democrats and labor leaders remained in Poland and are still fighting for freedom and democracy. Some of them, however, are now in Great Britain, where they consider it their supreme duty to stand up for the same ideals. Jan Stanczyk, leader of the Polish Socialist Party and Minister of Labor and Public Welfare, has made many statements to that effect. The same may be said of the Polish Worker, a Socialist paper published in London, and of the New York weekly of the same name.

In Poland itself, in spite of the terrible conditions and the indescribable persecutions of the Polish people, the democratic underground movement still carries on. Scores of illegal papers are being published. This movement is fighting anti-Semitism, considering it an instrument of Hitler's domination, and has issued a special manifesto against the institution of the Jewish ghetto in Warsaw. In spite of the German determination to separate the Poles from the Jews completely, the two groups are co-operating. It should be noted that the defeat of the Polish people has stimulated their feeling for democracy.

Pétain and Darlan are not the French people, Franco and Suñer are not the Spanish people, and Juzviak and his friends are not the Polish people. Mr. Zukerman's article gives only a part of the truth, and was therefore unfair to the Polish nation.

"One Grand Republick" of Europe

Dear Sirs: That the nations of Europe could be drawn into closer relations, and that the experience of the United States might serve as a precedent for such an interesting event, was foreseen, and the process indicated, by Benjamin Franklin in a letter which he wrote to a correspondent in Europe under date of October 22, 1787:

I send you enclos'd the propos'd new Federal Constitution for these States. I was engag'd 4 Months of the last Summer in the Convention that form'd it. It is now sent by Congress to the several States for their Confirmation. If it succeeds, I do not see why you might not in Europe carry the project of good Henry the 4th into Execution, by forming a Federal Union and One Grand Republick of all its different States & Kingdoms; by means of a like Convention; for we had many interests to reconcile."

Youth Defends Democracy

Dear Sirs: Last January a group of students from ten colleges met in New York City to talk over ways and means of building democracy in America and saving it in Europe and the Far East. Out of these discussions grew the Student Defenders of Democracy, with headquarters at 8 West Fortieth Street, New York. The organization now has members on some 150 campuses and active chapters on about 30. At the rate of present additions, it will probably have between 3,000 and 5,000 dues-paying members next fall. This would make the S. D. D. the largest political student group in the country.

It publishes a student newspaper, SOS; it is engaged in a drive to win one million signatures to a petition favoring convoys; it has launched a drive among students in favor of labor rights and against the Vinson bill; it is campaigning in behalf of the "Student Bill of Rights" drawn up by the Academic Freedom Committee of the A. C. L. U.; and it is publishing a series of folders on current topics known as the "Freedom First" series.

Probably the S. D. D. received widest recognition when some fifteen of its high-school members braved a hostile pro-Nazi crowd at a New York meeting of the America First Committee. Their signs were torn, their literature was taken away, and many were beaten. These students were orderly, but they did not run away, and they did not consider it "beneath their dignity" to picket.

Because the S. D. D. believes in democracy and does not coerce those of its members who do not always agree with the majority, it has a real chance of becoming a lasting force in American student life. But it is necessary for it to raise a budget of $15,000 a year.

The Shape of Things

THE LOSS OF CRETE IS A BITTER BLOW FOR the British. In contrast to the setbacks in Yugoslavia and Greece, the defeat is particularly hard to swallow because it was unnecessary. The British were outguessed and outmaneuvered, but not outfought. First-hand observers make it clear that the parachute troops were by no means responsible for the victory. Practically all the early parachutists were killed, and the latecomers would have met the same fate if the Nazis had not gained complete mastery of the air. It is evident that the British were not ready for an assault of such magnitude. The defending force of 30,000 would perhaps have been large enough if it had been adequately equipped with anti-aircraft guns and tanks and supported by planes. The excuse that Crete did not have sufficient landing facilities for aerial defense seems hardly convincing, especially in view of the fact that the Germans used fields which the British had described a few weeks earlier as inadequate. The loss of the island is not so serious in itself; what is serious is the indication that the British can still be caught unprepared.

THE BRITISH TRIUMPH IN IRAQ DOES MUCH to outweigh the setback in Crete. For Iraq not only has strategic significance as the farthest outpost of Nazi influence but is of great economic value because of its oil fields. Iraq may also become symbolic as the first major Nazi miscalculation. There seems hardly any doubt that Germany could have gained control of this rich prize if it had thrown the same energies into the preparation that went into the attack on Crete. But for once its aid was too little and too late. The Germans who were sent into Iraq may still be in a position to make trouble for the British, but they have clearly failed in their major purpose. The famed Nazi propaganda service seems to have fallen down even more completely than the General Staff. Although discontent with British rule is undoubtedly widespread in the Arab world, the much-advertised Arab revolt proved to be still-born. Despite Nazi propaganda, the British had no difficulty in stirring up substantial Iraqi opposition to the defeated Premier, Rashid Ali al-

Gailani. Ironically enough, the British made effective use of Nazi tactics in their drive on Bagdad. The R. A. F. quickly took advantage of British aerial supremacy to bomb and destroy Iraqi airports and then turned their full power against the Iraqi troops. The British also made expert use of their mechanized forces to outmaneuver the natives and achieved their goal with surprisingly few losses. The victory should release a substantial number of well-equipped, expert desert fighters for the defense of the Suez Canal; it may prove to be a turning-point in the Nazi Middle Eastern campaign.

THE DIVISION IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT which has prevented the development of an effective Far Eastern policy was never more in evidence than last week. After the President's address, which avoided mentioning Japan directly, the appeasers immediately began to circulate reports to the effect that a change in Japanese policy might be expected soon, provided we did not antagonize the responsible civilian elements which were gradually gaining the upper hand over the militarists. In the past such a plea has usually been timed to coincide with some conciliatory statement from Tokyo. But on this occasion the Japanese themselves were the first to repudiate it. Foreign Minister Matsuoka hastened to reaffirm the Tripartite Pact and to declare that the time may soon arrive when Japan will be forced to end its "peaceful policy" in the South Pacific. A few hours later the Japanese government delivered a "final note" to the government of the Netherland Indies demanding widespread economic concessions. This was accompanied by a resumption of anti-British and anti-American attacks in the Japanese press. Meanwhile, Chungking announced receipt of an additional $100,000,000 in supplies under the Lend-Lease Act, and Secretary Hull, speaking for the anti-appeasement wing of the State Department, formally assured Quo Tai-chi, the Chinese Foreign Minister, that the United States was prepared to relinquish its last remaining rights under the unequal treaties, including extra-territoriality, after the restoration of peace. Secretary Hull's statement was of historic importance, not only as an indication of a new basis of relationship between the United States and China, but as a setback to Japan, which has been claiming unilateral repudiation of extra-territoriality in the name of its puppet governments in Central China and Manchuria.

IT NOW APPEARS THAT THE JAPANESE HAVE met with disastrous defeats in each of the recent spring offensives against the Chinese. The most important of these drives was that launched against Shansi Province, stronghold of the Eighth Route Army. As in many previous offensives in this region, the Japanese at first gained steadily, threatening to cross the Yellow River and occupy the important city of Sian. But the most recent reports tell of successful Chinese counter-attacks and an outflanking movement from the Chungtiao Mountains, which are still in the hands of the defenders. The Japanese are reported to have lost 40,000 men in the drive. In Central China, south of Shanghai, a Japanese offensive into Chekiang appears to have collapsed completely, with the Chinese regaining the railroad towns of Chuchi and Lintuchen. A Japanese advance northward from Canton appears to have been similarly checked. The Chinese have reoccupied Waichow, a strategic city on the East River, and the walled city of Poklow in southeastern Kwantung. North of Hankow the Chinese have captured Hwan-tanchen, which served as the base for a secondary Japanese drive in the Tahung Mountain section of Hupeh Province. Reports from Chungking indicate that despite recent heavy Japanese bombing attacks, the Chinese air force, strengthened by newly arrived British and American planes, may soon take the offensive against the Japanese. There is a possibility that newly trained Chinese aviators may be aided by American volunteers.

GAHO DUNN, WHO WAS ENGAGED BY OPM with the full approval of the steel industry as a practical engineer capable of gauging accurately the demand for steel during the defense period, has had to admit that the "theoretical" economists, whose estimates he was brought in to refute, were right after all. On March 1 Mr. Dunn reported that the existing expansion plans of the industry would enable it to satisfy all defense, export, and civilian needs this year and next. In 1942, he declared, there would be a "reliable capacity" of 91,100,000 tons to meet a total demand of 89,000,000. It now appears that this estimate did not allow for the passing of the Lease-Lend Act, for further expansion of the defense program, or, to a sufficient extent, for greater civilian consumption induced by growth of national income. So we have a new estimate of 97,000,000 tons, and since it is unlikely that the industry will expand sufficiently to achieve such an output, civilian consumption will have to be rationed. This will necessitate cutting production and employment in a number of civilian industries, which will in turn tend to reduce national income and hence the ability of consumers to buy steel. Thus Mr. Dunn and his supporters may eventually be able to claim a kind of Procrustean success in meeting the problem. It ought not to be forgotten, however, that six months ago the National Resources Planning Board advised a very large expansion in steel-making facilities in order to meet probable requirements for 1942. If a really imaginative construction program had been put in hand at that time we should by now be making some progress toward providing for next year's additional load. But with the industry working at around 100 per cent of capacity the question raised by Mr. Dunn of how to furnish steel for new furnaces, rolling mills, and so on does indeed present a grave problem.

AN ALARMING SHORTAGE OF ELECTRIC power to supply defense industries is revealed by an announcement from Chairman Leland Olds of the Federal Power Commission, who has arranged to meet with officials of both public and privately owned utilities at six regional conferences in various sections of the country to discuss the problem. The same announcement indicates the extent to which the shortage may be alleviated by coordinated planning and pooling of power facilities in various regions. By bringing eighteen private and public power systems in the Southeastern states into one great pool and allocating power out of that pool, half of the shortage in the area has already been met. The Carolinas, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas are all represented in the pool. These states are the scene of vast expansion in defense industries using electric power to make aluminum, ferro-alloys, steel, and basic chemicals. "With rainfall in the area at only 50 per cent of normal," Chairman Olds announced, "the flow of the rivers to date is less than any year of record. Without the extraordinary steps now under way, the deficiency of electricity to carry essential loads threatened to reach a total of one billion kilowatt hours before the end of the year." Planned pooling is making it possible to treat the public and private utilities of this entire region as one great unit, thus obtaining maximum utilization of generating and transmitting facilities. Power is not the only industry in which planning can provide a considerable increase in productivity.

THE DEMAND FOR A SHAKE-UP IN DEFENSE is growing, and since the publication of I. F. Stone's three articles on the need to get rid of "Knudsenism" the cry has been taken up in many other quarters, some of them conservative. Alsop and Kintner, Ernest K. Lindley, and Raymond Clapper have all touched upon the phony character of the "sacrifice" involved in the 20 per cent cut announced by the automobile industry and analyzed by Mr. Stone. The New York Herald Tribune of last Saturday declared editorially that the cut is inadequate and merely reduces production from present boom levels to those of last year. Knudsen is much less the sacred cow than he has been. "One disturbing thing at OPM," Raymond Clapper wrote recently, "is the complacent state of mind at the top. I don't like to throw brickbats, especially at such a grand old man as William S. Knudsen. Yet he and other top OPM executives laughed off reports from Federal Reserve Board economists some months ago saying that we would need a 20 per cent increase in steel capacity over the 80,000,000-ton capacity then estimated."

Even General Johnson wrote the other day, "Mr. Knudsen is a production man. He should never have been pushed into any other job." We do not doubt Mr. Knudsen's outstanding ability as a production man. Our objection to him is based on his inability to make the decisions needed to speed defense and to force his old associates in the automotive industry to subordinate their business interests to the country's needs.

WE HAVE A HIGH REGARD FOR SOLICITOR General Francis Biddle, but we think he spoke with less than full consideration in his speech before the National Conference of Social Work in Atlantic City. Mr. Biddle is disturbed by liberal and labor opposition to the Hobbs "concentration-camp" bill and the Model State Anti-Sabotage bill. It makes him "wonder whether many liberals . . . are more concerned over minor curtailments of private liberties than over defeating fascism." The prime movers of these bills hardly seem concerned with "defeating fascism." We think the government justified in taking stern measures against sabotage and enemy aliens, but the Solicitor General made two admissions which do not help his argument. Of the Hobbs bill he says it is "in a sense revolutionary, because it permits detention without trial by jury." To permit detention without trial by jury is not "defeating fascism" but inviting it. The three branches of the labor movement are agreed that the Model Anti-Sabotage bill is so broadly worded as to permit it to be used as state anti-syndicalism laws have been used. "That the statute is too broad in that respect," Mr. Biddle says, "is certainly arguable." He then proceeds to beg the question by declaring that he cannot "conceive that any American would argue that sabotage should not be punished." Neither can we. But we want to be sure that it is sabotage which will be punished, not something else.

THE HAIR-LINE DISTINCTION DIVIDING THE majority of the Supreme Court from the minority of Justices Douglas, Black, and Murphy in the Louisiana Primary case is one of the finest—and most obscure—we have encountered. But it is at least clear that all seven members of the court participating in this decision agree that Congress has ample power under the Constitution to protect the right to vote in primaries as well as in general elections. This reverses the decision in the Newberry case, which held that primaries were under state jurisdiction only. The assertion of a Congressional right to regulate primaries picking candidates for federal offices has obvious implications for the one-party states of the South and might prove important in the future if Huey Longs should appear elsewhere than in Louisiana. The difference between the court's majority and minority is really a difference in relative weight given conflicting rights. The majority chooses to give full weight to statutory provisions protecting "any right or privilege" secured by the Constitution, and among these rights it includes that of voting in primary as well as general elections. The minority is disturbed because Louisiana election officials will be punished for an offense not explicitly spelled out in the criminal code, that is, the false counting and certification of ballots in a primary. Douglas and his colleagues of the minority feel that to create a crime by inference is a danger to civil liberties. We decline to grant certiorari; before this subtle quarrel editorial omniscience quails.

JAN VALTIN SEEMS TO BE HOIST WITH HIS own melodrama. His statement that "it is impossible for anyone to be released from a Nazi concentration camp unless he signs a pledge to serve the Gestapo," with its implication that political refugees are willing or unwilling agents of the Nazis is both reckless and ridiculous. And it comes with bad grace and worse judgment from a man who is himself a political refugee. As Dr. Frank Kingdon pointed out, the record of every refugee seeking admission to this country is sifted and resifted, and the integrity of every applicant must be vouched for by unimpeachable witnesses. The final decision rests with the State Department, and as Dr. Kingdon says, anyone who knows the "meticulousness of its inquiries in this field will know how unlikely it is that any type of fifth columnist could filter through." Considering the "meticulousness" with which the department has obstructed the admission of known anti-fascists, Dr. Kingdon's statement shows remarkable restraint. More than one informed witness of the French débâcle has demonstrated that political refugees, subjected as they are to constant scrutiny, are not much use to Hitler—quite aside from the fact that they are anti-fascists to begin with. Valtin has denied any intention of slandering political refugees, but unfortunately his denial will carry less weight with the professional refugee baiters than his original statement. Meanwhile the case of Dr. Kurt Rieth suggests that it would make more sense if we denied admission to any German who had not been in a concentration camp.

READING ABOUT THE UBIQUITOUS ACTIVITY of the FBI we are moved to pray that the sagacity of its direction may be equal to its undoubted energy. We cannot help feeling a little disturbed, as well as very much amused, when we learn from the Washington News that agents assigned to the investigation of government personnel regard a subscription to The Nation as suggestive of "un-Americanism." If J. Edgar Hoover is going to point the finger of suspicion at all Nation readers in Washington he will have to send his sleuths right into the inner government circles. He might start, in fact, by dogging the steps of his boss—Attorney General Robert Jackson.

Vichy Versus France

THE British government has evidently come to the conclusion that nothing further is to be gained by attempting to appease Vichy. All hopes that Marshal Pétain would prove willing and able to resist Nazi pressure have vanished, and the implications of the bet which he and his henchmen have placed on Nazi victory have at last been boldly faced. In Syria the air bases used by the Germans have been constantly attacked and Vichy's protests ignored. Italian ships have been chased into the Tunisian harbor of Sfax and there bombed in spite of claims that this is a violation of French neutrality. French ships are being picked up in the Atlantic and taken to British ports, and all navicerts for cargoes to French ports have been suspended.

Admiral Darlan, who no longer attempts to hide his inheritance of Laval's policies with Laval's office, has replied by uttering threats against Britain which will no doubt be translated into overt acts as soon as the moment seems propitious to him, or rather to his Nazi masters. But certain obstacles remain to be overcome. For one thing, Hitler appears to have promised Vichy that he will leave French colonial possessions intact, and this pledge unfortunately conflicts with prior undertakings to Italy, still intent on securing Tunisia as part of its war loot. In the long run this point is of small importance, for if Germany wins the war, Tunisia, whatever flag it is nominally under, will in effect be at Hitler's disposal. But any attempt now to satisfy Italian ambitions in this direction would involve a risk of independent action by Weygand's army and would also make nonsense of the Vichy propaganda that the only threat to the French Empire comes from Britain. As we write, Hitler and Mussolini are meeting at the Brenner, and no doubt this little difficulty will be smoothed out by giving Italy compensation elsewhere.

A much more serious obstacle to total collaboration between Germany and France is the attitude of the French people. In spite of months of strenuous propaganda in both occupied and unoccupied France, the mass of the population is far more anti-Nazi and pro-British than it was a year ago. Every kind of pressure has been placed on the French public in the hope of forcing it to acquiesce in, if not welcome, the policy of accepting a niche in the "New Order." But neither hunger nor the peculiarly cruel form of blackmail which employs the two million French prisoners in Germany as hostages has moved French opinion to abandon hope of a final democratic victory. And while that situation holds, Vichy will probably hesitate to proclaim open adherence to the Axis and open warfare against Britain. Darlan's present tactics, therefore, may well be to goad Britain into attacking one or more French colonies in the hope that he may then be able to swing public sentiment against British "imperialism." His latest statement repeated all the favorite themes of the Wilhelmstrasse. It was British aggression that brought on the war and the British desire to ruin Europe that prolonged the conflict. Britain had always deserted and cheated its allies, and the best hope of France was a speedy defeat of the perfidious island. But most Frenchmen have politically trained ears able to distinguish original music from a phonograph record, and this Ersatz appeal to patriotic passion is likely to meet a negligible response.

Britain should call Vichy's bluff and march into Syria before the Nazis establish themselves there in any strength. It is highly probable that the occupation would prove a bloodless operation, for there are many signs that the French army in Syria, if not completely disaffected, has little stomach for a fight against a former ally. We do not believe that many Frenchmen would resent such a movement. On the contrary, they would regard it as a sensible step toward thwarting Hitler and therefore entirely in the interests of the true France.

The Coming Labor Crisis

FOR the moment we are enjoying a brief respite from labor strife. With the settling of the coal strike, the averting of a strike in General Motors, and the C. I. O. victories in the Ford and Bethlehem elections, the country is left without any major labor dispute in the defense industries. The West Coast shipyard strike is the only disturbance worthy of note. The situation has reached a point where the radio commentators, who bear a large responsibility for the hysteria over the supposed labor crisis, are finding it difficult to play up their daily list of strikes. It would be a mistake, however, to regard this lull as an indication that trouble is past. The truth is that the real labor crisis has not yet developed. What we have had so far has been largely a fabricated crisis. Powerful interests have sought, for reasons best known to themselves, to give the impression that the defense program was being seriously retarded by strikes and labor disputes. Actually, as the President and several members of the Administration have pointed out, the strikes never got to the point where they seriously held up defense production. That they did not is due in large part to the remarkable success of the National Defense Mediation Board.

The primary reason for fearing that the coming months will see an aggravation of labor trouble is to be found in the rising cost of living. For the first year and a half of the European war living costs remained fairly stationary. But recent weeks have brought the beginning of what appears to be a definite inflationary upturn. Food prices increased 4.5 per cent in April. There is every evidence that this upward trend continued through May, and now that the President has signed the Fulmer bill a much more drastic increase—estimated at between 10 and 20 per cent—may be expected in the next few months. Despite the efforts of Price Coordinator Henderson, other prices are also on the way up. The cost of clothing has been rising steadily since early in 1941. Gasoline and fuel-oil prices have risen substantially. Rents have got out of hand in many defense centers, and are rising throughout the country. The pinch resulting from the increased cost of living has scarcely been felt so far, except in a few cities. But we may be sure that it will become much more painful during the summer and fall months.

This means that the gains which labor has won in a few key industries, at great sacrifice, during the last few months stand in grave danger of being wiped out by the increased cost of living. The situation is even more critical, of course, for those workers, constituting a vast majority, who have not received wage increases. Many of these workers will have no recourse except to strike or threaten to strike.

Even this might not be so serious if we had some assurance that unions and management would be allowed a free hand to work out agreements through normal collective-bargaining and mediation channels. But with a new wave of disputes there is almost certain to arise new demands that the government clamp down on labor. The public's ignorance on labor issues was never more convincingly demonstrated than in the recent Fortune poll. This poll showed that two persons out of three believed that the government should forbid strikes in defense industries over such matters as wages, hours, and union recognition. Reflecting the manufactured hysteria of the public on the question of defense strikes, the anti-labor bloc in the House is reported to be pressing for a vote on the Vinson compulsory-labor-mediation bill, which carries provisions for a "cooling-off" period before a strike can be called. Even worse proposals are before Congress and might be rushed through if the strike situation became more serious.

It is obvious that neither the general public nor the Congressmen who are confirmed in their opposition to labor are familiar with the history of attempts to apply compulsion to labor disputes in democratic countries. The record shows that such legislation either accentuates labor strife or is ignored as unenforceable. It is not an accident that the only countries that have succeeded in outlawing strikes and strait-jacketing labor are the totalitarian countries. For the right to strike and bargain collectively is the cornerstone of the democratic process as it affects most men's livelihood. Destroy this, even as an emergency measure, and democracy loses much of its reality in present-day life. The facts on which this statement is based must be made available to Congress and the anti-labor section of the general public. The time is short, but the job must be done if we are to avoid catastrophe.

Before the Battle

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE tumult and the shouting dies, and out of it emerges the clear meaning of the President's speech. Through days of confused interpretations it lay there, implicit rather than obvious, waiting to be accepted. Everybody understands it now.

The speech means that the President has assumed direct executive control of the nation's defense. He will do what he considers necessary to prevent an Axis attack on this hemisphere. He will act directly and to the full extent of his emergency powers without recourse to legislation except where Congressional action is plainly called for. He will not declare war; but he will use our navy to insure the delivery of war supplies to England and Great Britain's other fronts, and he will apply force if necessary to prevent the Axis from seizing control of ports or territories which could be used as bases of attack against the Western world. And these acts may precipitate the country into war at any time. Whether they will or not depends upon Hitler rather than the President. If Hitler decides that the Axis needs the Cape Verde Islands enough to fight the United States for them, or that the American patrol is actually protecting shipments to Britain, then the President's announced purposes will lead to war. I believe they will lead to war, little as Hiler wants to fight the United States, because under the emergency powers assumed by the President, things are going to happen in this country that will present formidable obstacles to Hitler's essential plans. Hitler and Mussolini discussed those obstacles at the Brenner Pass this week; they will not be taken lightly at either end of the Axis.

If any doubt remains about the President's intentions, it arises from his remark last Wednesday that he saw no need of repealing the Neutrality Law. How he plans to reassert the "ancient freedom of the seas" against the blockade of that law is hard to imagine. And it is equally hard to believe that he will use his emergency powers to crash through the obvious intent of the law, although this is what many critics believe he did when he opened the Red Sea to American shipping. Perhaps he looks toward some limited legislation, amending the law at specific points rather than abolishing it. This remains to be discovered in the weeks to come. The President has many excellent reasons for avoiding an unnecessary showdown with Congress—time is perhaps the chief of them—but the Neutrality Law is at this moment a meaningless ghost, and it will rise to haunt him in the months to come if it is not exorcised. I think this is one Congressional battle the President should not dodge.

The problem of Congress is not any easy one at best. No one who believes in swift action and, if necessary, in secret action can seriously oppose the President's assumption of emergency powers. And, indeed, no one has done so except a handful of isolationists and pacifists who profess to disbelieve in the menace of Hitler's crusade. But to ignore Congress as completely as Mr. Roosevelt ignored it in his speech is not good tactics either. A close relationship between the Congressional committees and the President, full consultation with leaders of both parties in both houses, and a request for legislative action on major policies are important not only to keep democratic procedures from growing rusty but to preserve unity where it is most essential in a democracy—between the Executive and the people's elected representatives. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that the President's great address was directed to an audience of Latin American diplomats rather than to the Congress of the United States.

Meanwhile the first effects of his new powers are beginning to be felt. The appointment of Secretary Ickes as oil coordinator is a welcome symptom. Mr. Ickes is a fighter, not an appeaser. He will work for a vigorous defense at all costs, including costs to the oil producers, if necessary. He may cut off the gasoline supplies of week-ending Easterners, but not, I am sure, without also cutting off the oil supplies of the creators of East Asia's co-prosperity sphere.

Another emergency move was the request of the War Department that Congress pass a bill authorizing the President to requisition any sort of property when he deems it necessary for national defense. I thought he already possessed this authority under the terms of the Conscription Act, but if any loophole in the law exists, it is well that it be plugged immediately.

A third emergency measure, equally important though enacted long before an unlimited emergency was declared, was the mandatory-priorities bill signed by the President last Monday. Under the new law, industry must produce first those things the government tells it to, completely subordinating civilian needs when this appears necessary. What this may mean in changing the tempo and direction of American industry is suggested in statements by Stacy May of the Office of Production Management, and Leland Olds of the Federal Power Commission. Both men pointed to the alarming unreadiness of utilities and manufacturing plants to meet the demands of a defense program geared to the speed and efficiency of the Nazi war machine.

Small indications, all of these. But they show clearly the direction of the wind and suggest its strength. The President is not going to supply an exegesis with his statements on public affairs. It is not his way; and if it were he would be forced by the cruel logic of Axis warfare to leave out the interpretations and specifications. His job is to announce national policy. Events, carefully examined, will in due course provide the necessary explanations.

A Tale of Two Oceans

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 1

OF THE many currents in the wake of the President's speech, the most important leads to action within the near future in the Atlantic and to a deal with Japan in the Pacific as the counterpart of such action. This combination of policies may be inconsistent—a Munich in the Pacific while we set out to undo the disastrous consequences of past Munichs in Europe—but it faithfully reflects the stupendous military event of our time. The Germans were but recently encircled in the heart of Europe; now by a bold series of military victories and political maneuvers they encircle us. The shores that face us across both the Atlantic and the Pacific are in hostile hands; and we are unprepared to fight a war on two fronts. The conclusion to which many of the leading figures in the Administration seem to have come is that, in a pinch, we had best let the Japanese move south into the East Indies and concentrate on protecting ourselves in the Atlantic. That spells greater naval intervention to prevent the defeat of the British and the occupation of Dakar and the Cape Verde Islands. We cannot protect these outposts in the North and South Atlantic and fight a full-sized war with Japan at the same time.

I have yet to encounter anyone in the Administration who thinks it possible to concentrate on the Pacific and let the British hold the Atlantic for us. The British have shown themselves as brave as their leadership has been blundering, but it is doubtful whether even people as stout-hearted as they are would be able to hold out if the hope of American aid in greater quantity and more active form were taken from them. I don't pretend to know why Winant has returned from Britain, but the indications are that a major diplomatic offensive is now being carried out by the Nazis in London and in Moscow. Their freedom from the ideological preconceptions that their own propaganda fosters in other people has left the Nazis in an amazingly good bargaining position. Some of the shrewdest observers here think Berlin is telling Moscow that Hess wasn't as crazy as was pretended, that he bore a peace offer which represented more than his own private delusion, that unless Stalin permits Nazi technicians to organize and manage Russian industry and transport, there will be a deal with England and the Germans will move east. These same observers think the reverse tactic is being used in London.

Hess may well be telling the British that the Nazis must obtain either the Empire or Ukrainian wheat and industry. If the British will make peace, the Nazis will take what they need in the Ukraine, and London will become a junior partner in Nazi world domination. If the British refuse, though their strength dwindles day by day, then the Nazis will have no recourse but to invade England, an attempt which might not succeed but would certainly cause a lot of damage. A peace with the British would fit Nazi plans beautifully, for the method has been to take over going concerns wherever possible. If the Nazis hold all they have gained, they will need many junior partners to help administer the New Order. They would like to use the British as overseers for the empire, and it would be worth many concessions to effect this, for with the British navy to aid him Hitler would at last be within shooting distance of world dominion. Now I can conceive of only one thing which would make any such agreement politically possible in Britain, and that would be the feeling that we were letting them down. Winant will take more than rhetoric back to Britain with him. In some well-informed quarters here it is believed that transports are in readiness, and that we are preparing to send not only naval units but troops, should they be necessary to help the British fight off an invasion.

The big split in Administration circles is over what to do about the Japanese when the shooting begins in the Atlantic. Most people seem agreed (1) that it would suit Hitler's purposes to tie us up in a Pacific war while he tries to invade England, and (2) that the danger we face in the Pacific is not an attack from Japan but Japan's conquest of the Indies. This would be serious from the standpoint of our ability to obtain certain basic war materials but not so serious as a British defeat. The Pacific is roughly four times as wide as the Atlantic. The 1600-mile space between the bulge of West Africa and the bulge of Brazil is much too narrow for comfort. One Administration group thinks we ought to try to make a deal with the Japanese; the other thinks it would be better to fight a kind of rearguard action by giving what aid we can to China and shutting off all raw materials to Japan. The State Department crowd, which has always tended to favor appeasement of Japan, is already feeding out the old poppycock to its favorite journalistic mouthpieces on how the business men are about to make a comeback in Japan, lay a restraining hand on the army, and so forth and so forth.

In other quarters it is argued that the Japanese have never been impressed by weakness, that they will try to take the Dutch East Indies as soon as we are sufficiently involved in the Atlantic, that any agreement will become worthless when that point is reached, and that to continue to supply them with raw materials until that time is idiotic and suicidal. For it must be understood that we cannot make an agreement with Japan and at the same time impose embargoes on exports to it and continue to help the Chinese. An agreement would mean a repetition in the Pacific of all the errors our State Department has made in the Atlantic—the scrap iron sent Mussolini up to his very entrance into the war, the triangular Argentine loan by which we fed Franco while his Falange spread Hitler poison against us in Latin America, our long wooing of Pétain, and the possibility that now we may send food to French North Africa. All the basic war materials of which we are now short have been going in huge quantities from this country to Japan during the past two years, and some of them are still being exported to it. It is one thing to abandon the Dutch East Indies. It is another to abandon good sense, and there are indications that Mr. Roosevelt is not yet ready to play pat-a-cake with the Mikado. One of them is the deliberate "leak" of news that the United States army is permitting combat fliers and mechanics to resign for volunteer service with the Chinese. Aid to China is now in the hands of those administering the Lend-Lease Act rather than in the hands of the State Department, and appeasement of Japan is far from being the accepted policy. But I think one can safely expect that the Administration will not let the country be drawn into war in the Pacific.

There was some disappointment here, which I shared, in the President's speech. Those of us who have decided the issue of war or peace in our own minds and moved on to the question of adequate preparedness for a struggle we believe unavoidable felt that Mr. Roosevelt passed over the most important battle—the battle of production. In this the real problem is taking an economy geared to monopoly and relative scarcity and gearing it to maximum production for defense. It is clear by now that this cannot be done so long as the defense program is in the hands of men whose training, habits, and interests have conditioned them to keeping the supply of goods comfortably and profitably behind the need for them. But rereading the speech today and going over the press comment, I am no longer so sure of my own reactions to it. The task of leadership in a democracy is to find the common denominator, especially in so grave a decision as that of war. Mr. Roosevelt's address did clarify the issue and make clear our intention to prevent the Nazis from gaining a foothold at either the North or the South Atlantic entrance to the New World. His press conference the next day, with its curious disavowal of convoys and denial of any intent to ask repeal of the Neutrality Act, exasperated a lot of us. But this is the way in which Franklin D. Roosevelt is accustomed to move, two steps forward, one backward, taking leadership here, avoiding a frontal attack there.

On the home front Mr. Roosevelt makes progress in the same crablike fashion. The declaration of an unlimited emergency does not of itself set in motion the emergency methods required to end the lag in defense production. The first two executive orders in sight are not promising. The chief effect of making Ickes "czar" of the oil industry is to save the major oil companies from pending action against them under the Sherman Act and the Elkins Act. The ballyhoo about oil shortages due to lack of tanker facilities must be liberally discounted as an excuse for price rises. A shortage of tankers does not explain the rise on the Pacific Coast, which refines its own crude, or in the Middle West, which is amply supplied by pipe line. I have a high regard for Secretary Ickes, and it may be that the oil companies, suspiciously undisturbed by this new move, will get more than they bargained for, but my fingers are crossed. The other executive order will establish a Transportation Division of the OPM, and apparently this will be headed by Ralph Budd. Budd showed as much lack of foresight regarding a railroad-car shortage as Stettinius did in respect of steel and aluminum. His prospective appointment and the fact that the President is still relying on Gano Dunn for steel estimates do not make it appear that our defense machinery is being operated on the basis of an unlimited emergency.

The whole picture, however, is not so dark as it might be. There is a growing awareness of the dangers of business as usual. One of its reflections is the effort of the big-business crowd around Knudsen, Stettinius, and Biggers to place blame on the army and navy. Both branches of the service have their quota of brass hats and stuffed shirts, but neither has been quite as shortsighted as the dollar-a-year men. The latter scraped bottom in the interview given by Biggers, who is director of the production division, to the New York Times last week. The one suggestion Biggers advances to force subcontracting is to make the backlogs of the big companies heavier, in the hope that if they are made heavy enough the companies will not object to sharing the orders with smaller manufacturers. One of our biggest shipbuilding companies is booked five years ahead. One of our bomber-manufacturing companies has a backlog of $205,000,000, compared with output for the first third of 1941 of $9,000,000.

These backlogs are not unusual. To pile more orders on them might lead the big companies to share with the small from sheer surfeit. But I distrust wishful thinking in the field of hog psychology.

Are Empires All Alike?

BY LEWIS COREY

THE cry will not down that Nazi Germany, in its plans for a "New Order" in Europe and the world, is simply doing what the British did years ago—forging an imperialism of its own. That is another of the misunderstandings which, from the beginning, have given strength to fascism. New forces that alter the shape of things make the imperialist comparison altogether misleading. For the war is not shaped by capitalist imperialism. It is shaped by forces of economic, political, and moral change that go beyond capitalism and imperialism to a changed world. While the old capitalist imperialism is disintegrating, fascism is reintegrating imperialism on a new basis that gives it fresh strength and scope.

The old imperialism, though in opposition to democracy, operated within the democratic relations of capitalism; it could never wholly escape those relations to become an absolute tyranny. Imperialism used the state to further its aims, but the state was responsive to democratic pressures. Denunciation of imperialist abuses was allowed; changes and reforms were made, if slowly. Democratic rights exist in the British Empire, the dominions are self-governing, Ireland finally got its independence, the freedom of India grows despite Tory repression. Democratic forces among subject peoples obtained the support of democratic forces in the imperialist nations, and they carried on a joint struggle against imperialism. Democratic progress was limited, but it was not strangled.

The old imperialism, moreover, operated within the economic relations of capitalism, out of which it grew. Capitalism encouraged an economic freedom that imperialism could not altogether crush. Some measure of free enterprise and competition persisted in the world market, if only because of rivalries among imperialist nations and disagreements within cartels. This competitive imperialism prepared its own disintegration by bringing substantial industrial progress to the lands under its control. Dominated by the idea that capital should be exported anywhere and for any purpose if it would bring high profits, the old imperialism helped to build up local manufacturing enterprises in those very countries which according to imperialist theory were to produce foodstuffs and raw materials for export and to import manufactured goods. If the profits were great enough foreign capital was even invested in local manufactures which were in competition with the mother country's exports. As industry grew in the subject nations, local capital accumulated and was also invested in new manufacturing plants. This development is illustrated by the textile industry of India, which drove out of its markets—with the aid of imports from Japan—the British textiles that had formerly had a virtual monopoly. The same thing happened, to a greater or less extent, in all economically backward countries dominated by capitalist imperialism, whether they were colonial or independent. Latin America has been a playground of all the imperialisms, but it has moved, especially in the past ten years, through greater industrialization, to economic independence and the breaking of imperialist controls.

Fascism implements a new imperialism that would impose unlimited totalitarian tyranny upon the lands that are slowly breaking imperialist controls. Fascist imperialism—including Japanese imperialism, which is totalitarian if not altogether fascist—revives the bloody colonialism of an earlier capitalism—a colonialism that the Nazis clamp down on non-German Europe too. It destroys that increasing social morality which, limited as its application may be, is still part of the capitalist contribution to progress.

Britain's "balance of power" policy, however bad in other respects, allowed national independence and democracy to grow in Europe. Britain has neither the industrial and military resources nor the will to enslave Europe as the Nazis propose to enslave it, by destroying its industry and getting a monopoly of industrial power. The old-style imperialism of Britain lacks the means at fascism's disposal—the disregard of profits in favor of bureaucratic-military power, the corporate state that breaks down national capitalist barriers, the totalitarian ideology that recruits allies in the nations that must be dominated, the will to destroy all democracy and freedom. Nor would the democratic and labor forces in Britain permit their government to enslave Europe. Even if Britain went fascist, it would still lack the industrial and military resources for the job, and, in addition, it would no longer get support from the dominions and the United States.

The Nazis stay in a conquered country to uproot its industrial power and its democracy, labor unionism, and social progress. They stay to make the country a colonial vassal of Germany. The Nazis have allies within the nations they dominate—native fascists—who were not available to the old imperialists. In 1914-18 no elements in Britain, France, or the United States wanted Germany to win because they liked its imperialism; today there are elements that want a German victory in order to strengthen reaction and fascism at home. Where the old imperialist interests clashed, the new fascist interests coincide. A fascist peace will not be the old imperialist peace to promote the profits and power of monopoly capitalism. It will be a peace to promote the totalitarian power of a corporate state that transforms the old capitalism and imperialism to serve a new, more terrible system of privilege and exploitation.

The old imperialism disintegrates not only because it is caught within a progressive democracy but also because it cannot solve its economic problems. Those problems became acute in the crisis of the 1920's and 1930's, when lower profits, greater taxation, and more state controls over economic activity clipped the power of the finance capital that dominated the old imperialism. Imperialism cannot block the drive of colonial peoples toward economic balance and independence; it could do so only by using an overwhelming violence that democratic nations will not permit. The restrictive economic practices of imperialism meet progressive opposition in the mother country as well as in the colonies, and arouse action toward a consumption economy of abundance. Imperialism, finally, like the capitalism out of which it grows, is unable to make enough profits in a world where profits move downward as potential economic abundance moves upward. And since capitalist imperialism is primarily the pursuit of greater profits, the inability to make profits on the old scale is a serious disintegrating force. It leads to a breakdown of imperialism through which democracy may surge to power.

The problems of the old imperialism do not exist for the new imperialism of fascism. Not the competitive export of capital for financial profits, which promotes a measure of independent industrial power among subject peoples, but bureaucratic-military direction and controls shape the new imperialism. No competitive economic elements, no free capitalist enterprise, no democratic forces can be active under fascism. Allowed no manufactures of their own, colonial peoples can make no drive toward economic and political independence. Progressive forces that want to move from imperialist scarcity to an economy of abundance are strangled, and the productive resources of subject peoples are ruthlessly limited. The downward movement of profits creates no problem, since fascist imperialism is not interested in the profits of a defunct finance capitalism but in the privileges and power of the masters of a totalitarian state. Nor can cyclical crises arise to disintegrate the new imperialism, for in a fascist economy administrative controls suspend the business cycle. Fascism "solves" all problems by the use of inescapable force. If let alone to disintegrate, the old capitalist imperialism must give way to greater democracy and freedom and to economic plenty. If a fascist imperialism is substituted for it, subjection and scarcity will engulf the world.

The new imperialism is final proof that there are no constructive elements in fascism. It is madness to accept the easy-going idea that fascists are "bad boys who will grow up and settle down," for being "bad boys" is their natural condition and ideal. If the Nazis wanted to use, or could use, their transformation of capitalism and their economic controls for prosperity and welfare, they would not throw Europe into a war that consumes its wealth. They would not plan a "New Europe" in which non-German peoples are to be deprived of industrial power and forced to become colonial producers of foodstuffs and raw materials for a master Germany that has the monopoly of industrial power. That plan deliberately limits Europe's capacity to produce and consume, while prosperity and welfare call for the fullest development of the productive forces in all countries. Fascism is a throwback to Caesarian domination and plunder. Fascism is destructive, not constructive; its bureaucratic-military organization, economic controls, and ideals are all identified with a war economy.

Not only is fascism unable to solve economic problems in a rational, enlightened manner; it came to power by mobilizing reactionary forces that do not want such a solution. Fascism transforms the progressive struggle for social betterment within nations into a struggle of "poor" nations against "rich" nations. The people are made to believe that their welfare depends upon aggression, that it can come only from the spoils of the new imperialism. They could not be driven to war if their welfare were promoted by internal progressive action. So the Nazis exterminate "inferior" races and give their farms to "master" German peasants and promise the workers that they will become a "master proletariat" prospering on the slave labor of the workers in conquered countries.

The cry of "poor nation" used by Nazi Germany is a fraud. An American appeaser-for-profit has said that "Germany is fighting to keep from being starved to death." Yet every nation that the Nazis have conquered, including France, was poorer than Germany. If Germans were starving in 1930-32, before Hitler came to power, so were people in other countries and for the same reason—capitalist inability to solve the economic crisis. Germany had the most magnificent industrial plant in the world after the United States. It is richer in natural resources than any other European nation except Russia, and it was overcoming deficiencies through the production of synthetics. For seven years Hitler got all the raw materials he needed to produce armaments. The materials and production might have been used to produce goods for human welfare—to make Germany the envy of the world instead of its nightmare. If Germany had to pay high prices for imported raw materials, so did other nations; prices were rigged by international cartels with which Germany itself was identified. Germany still levies tribute upon American industry, upon American defense, by means of patent rights and agreements with American monopoly corporations to divide markets and raise prices. All nations had to struggle for foreign markets when the economic crisis limited consumer purchasing power. To prevent the exploitation that comes from inequality in natural resources and productive capacity, monopoly imperialist controls must be replaced by economic co-operation, but the Nazis propose to make the inequality and exploitation worse in their "New Europe" by giving Germany a monopoly of raw materials and industrial production of which the old imperialism never dreamed.

Italy can make a much better case than Germany for the claim that it is a poor nation. But Mussolini wastes his people's meager substance with wars for African colonies that cannot overcome Italy's deficiencies. That can be accomplished only by scientific agriculture, the production of synthetic materials, and the cooperation of other nations. The fascists drive the country into a blind alley, for Italy has neither the industrial nor the military power to carry on the new imperialism; its economic inferiority will become permanent as it sinks to the status of a vassal nation in the Nazis' New Europe.

Some complacent people, not all of them Communists, say: Hitler is doing a needed job of wrecking the old capitalist order in Europe; this will clear the way for progress as Napoleon's wrecking of the feudal order cleared it. The historical analogy is a false one. Napoleon was, by and large, the carrier of liberating democratic ideas; the impulse behind the wars he waged was the answer of revolutionary democratic France to the reactionary monarchical challenge. Hitler is the carrier of an enslaving totalitarianism, and his wars are a challenge to democracy. Napoleon wrecked feudal power and dynastic privileges and set in motion the forces of national democratic progress; Hitler wrecks free institutions and sets in motion forces that kill progress through an all-inclusive economic, political, and moral despotism. As the Nazis wreck the old order they build the totalitarian new order in which democracy and freedom become a memory that the masters despise and the people no longer understand. The war's destruction of capitalism will make for progress only if a decisive defeat of fascism gives democracy the chance for progressive reconstruction.

Convoy Out of London

BY M. B.

I JOINED my ship, a freighter of 7,000 tons, in London, ten months ago. To me the war had meant a stream of haggard men filtering through the harbor gates at Dover, my father, with his hoarse, tired voice, discussing Colonel Ruthenburg's plan to raise a Jewish army, and the ever-present threat of invasion. This was just another trip, though when I went on board I was pleased with the accommodations, two in a cabin, liked the crowd and the crabbed old bo'sun, and felt some excitement at the prospect of a first visit to New York. Ashore we had commented on the casual civilian life in the East End—not a uniform to be seen, as though there wasn't a war on. I did not think it would be nine weeks before we saw New York.

We sailed with forty ships from Southend on July 2, 1940, threading our way in single file through the graveyard of mined and stranded hulks in the Thames Estuary. Then we were in the Straits of Dover. I was working on the boat deck with Joe, my roommate. Joe was eighteen. On his arm was tattooed a blue lyre, and above it was "Mother" in fiery red with a blue border. Once an angry Irish boy had bashed Joe to unconsciousness for fifteen days with the metal tip of a cricket stump. This left him slow of speech, lethargic, and defiant. He had walked from Newcastle to London rather than sail on a ship that was full of bald-headed old "twats." That was Joe.

We saw three black specks outlined against a cloud over the French coast, but we were busy. Then there were loud, reverberating explosions far ahead of us. We jumped. They were the first bombs we had ever heard. Then a plane swooped down astern of us and dropped a couple on either side of a tanker, sending up great jets of water. We roared with laughter, thinking of the fellows being jolted. Then the shore batteries opened up. Well, most people know what that's like. One plane hurtled into the inner harbor. We cheered a lot at that. We laughed a lot then, but not the next day.

On Wednesday, near the Channel Islands, seven German dive-bombers came over and sank two of our ships. Two hours later they started to come again out of a black cloud. I was on the poop standing by the gun. They were Stukas. First three planes came out of that cloud, then four, then five, then seven. After that I stopped counting, because the sky was black with them. The official estimate was that fifty bombers attacked the convoy that day. Since our ship possessed no machine-gun, we had to fire our four-inch anti-submarine gun, perhaps the most ponderous weapon yet aimed at a plane.

We had had only one gun drill. I was loader. We got it loaded bloody quick, by intuition or something, pulling out pins and caps, and ramming the charge home. We blazed away at a formation of four planes. Seven times in all we let them have it. I was nearly blown off my feet by the noise, particularly when I drifted a yard behind the breach, which recoiled fourteen inches.

Four German aviators, attracted or insulted by our unwieldy attempts at retaliation, hovered over us. As our gun couldn't elevate more than 45 degrees, we were helpless. Our gunner, who seemed disgustingly in his element, shouted to us to take cover. We jammed in the scuttle down the booby hatch to our quarters, but managed to slither down to what scant security that offered us. With a terrific roar the Stukas dived and sprinkled twenty "eggs" around the ship in clusters of five. I felt as if I were inside a volcano that was erupting. Most of the movable things in the ship were tossed about and broken. The monkey island, the concrete slab on top of the bridge, was tilted by the explosion. However, our gunnery had done its work, the squadron had been split up, and the bombs fell wide.

Four more planes poised over us and hurtled down. I was lying in one of the cabins. My lungs were bursting with the impotence of my despair. I turned my head and saw a hand white and soft as a baby's (Joe always wore gloves when he was working). It was clutching the foot of a bench. There was the blue lyre, and "Mother" in fiery red. I turned and looked at Joe's face, dead white and agonized with fear of dying. Then we were smothered by two great roars that seemed to be inside us as well as outside. It seemed as if I was lifted in the air and fluttered about like an autumn leaf. Five bombs had fallen about fifteen feet outside the cabin.

We rushed outside. The bridge on the boat deck must surely have been hit. I thought of young Bruce at the wheel, ruddy-cheeked and kittenish, and Jack Gray, quiet and mellow, his brother a vicar. Somebody shouted, "It's O.K., take cover." Back again, as two planes dived to machine-gun us, thinking we were sinking. As a matter of fact we were, but didn't know it.

When the planes dived to bomb us, they started at about 2,000 feet. At from 200 to 300 miles an hour they roared down at us, and somehow pulled out of their dive a few feet above the funnel, to glide over us and drop their bombs. When they machine-gunned us, one plane dived level with the lifeboats and riddled them; while the other dived still lower and sprinkled the alley way. The gunner was standing on the steps in the scuttle looking out on the poop. As the plane dived past him, he looked full at the pilot and ducked. The bullet practically parted his hair. It pierced the steel plate of the booby-hatch, four-fifths of an inch thick, and imbedded itself in the plate on the other side, meanwhile retaining its point—so much for Ersatz bullets. The dungarees of Edgar, a Latvian who was sailing on British ships for adventure, were shot through the legs. He was delighted, for they were hanging on the line; they will be a splendid souvenir.

Then our fighters arrived and eleven Jerries were shot down. This we felt was some consolation for the ships we could see sinking or in flames. We lost no planes that day.

We emerged from the ordeal to find our engines broken down. We were drifting in the Channel. A bomb from the second load had struck the tilted monkey island on the bridge, glanced off, and exploded over the side by the galley, straining the plates apart. The water was seeping in. The bridge had nearly been brought down by the explosion. The foundations were smashed. The navigation compass had jumped out of the gimbal and been smashed on the monkey island. The dynamos had failed. The galley was a shambles. But no one was hurt.

Meanwhile the water was seeping in through the plates. The carpenter reported two feet six inches in No. 3 hold. The chief engineer had all hands racing down through the engine room with buckets of cement. Wading in oil and water, they managed to stuff the hole with the cement. It hardened. The ship was saved and so were we. The chief was decorated, and months later his wife and kids came to live with him on the ship in port.

This is anticipating, for we were still wallowing motionless in a swell. But soon the resourceful engineers patched up the engines, and we limped into Portland Harbor. But there was no lull to recuperate in. Twenty-three times in ten days gross intruders raided our haven. First they came in trickles, one, two, or three planes dropping their bombs before the sirens sounded. Later they came in waves. When they came in huge numbers, the sirens sounded in good time, and it was better.

It heartened us that our fighter planes, fewer in number, were flown by pilots whose skill and daring were more thrilling than anything we had ever seen. In superior planes, they out-maneuvered and out-flew three times as many of the enemy, so that the Germans seemed the helpless victims of a skill and courage they could not match. Twenty German planes I counted crashing to only one of ours, and that brought down by the fire of one of our own ships.

On board, the strain was beginning to tell. William-son, with his long, melancholy, penitentiary face, cracked grim jokes from Job and lamented with Solomon, gems of literature gleaned from long spells of enforced confinement. Then there was Paddy, excitable and irrepressible, yelling, "Whisht, whisht, here they come, be Jasus," and pointing at two seagulls skimming away in the middle distance. Jesters demonstrating their brazen nerves were discouraged as intolerable. Paddy was hotly attacked for mocking at Joe, who clutched him during a raid, calling out, "Mother, mother." After one heavy raid a stocky, carrotty, subnormal fireman staggered from the engine-room to the deck. His shaking hands failed to put the match to his cigarette. He walked round and round the deck muttering. His eyes were pleading for just one night ashore. The old cook was found huddled in a recess in the alley way four hours after an all-clear. Those two left the ship. Joe stayed and got better.

After four days the shore gang patched us up sufficiently to make the trip to Southampton. On a quiet moonlit night, with the Channel swarming with E-boats (German motor torpedo boats), we made a dash for the port. All night we stood tense and alert at action stations. The turn of the propellor sounded like the distant hum of a motor boat. We were off the Needles at crack of dawn and then compelled to wait for two hours, a lone target, until the port was open.

Southampton was a lull. We danced and skated. The bo'sun was rude to Joe, who took the next train home and hasn't been heard from since.

One gusty night, to our great surprise, we emerged from the Channel. We picked up a convoy at a Welsh port, where we saw a great blaze started by incendiaries in an oil reservoir. The Atlantic was tame after that. But the Manhattan sky line looked good to us.

On the next trip out, we really thought we were in for it. We were commodore ship of the convoy, replete with archaic admiral and naval staff. Off the coast of Ireland a long-distance bomber dropped a few duds on a Danish freighter in our convoy. And the pilot radioed our position to every U-boat in the North Atlantic. The old admiral barked a few orders, signal flags were hoisted, and abruptly the convoy dispersed. Our ship held its course. However, we doubled our speed. The U-boats converged. We were ahead of them, but they sank six ships in our tracks.

Now I am out in the Atlantic in another ship. We are clear of the worst and pushing on south. Mostly one's shipmates are important, because one lives with them through all this sort of thing, and doesn't forget. For seven months I was on the other ship, and I often think of my shipmates and wonder how they are. May Bruce find sanctuary in the arms of the girl who was like Hedy Lamarr; may Vic marry the Bishop's daughter, and may he find the canary-colored waistcoat I left in Brooklyn, which he coveted.

Of Coca, Cola, and the Courts

BY JEROME H. SPINGARN

FOR every man, woman, and child in the entire world three drinks of Coca-Cola are produced each year. Like "Gone with the Wind," it has spread from Atlanta to every corner of the world. Indeed, in the sacred gardens of the Taj Mahal the startled eye of the tourist is struck by the familiar red Coca-Cola sign-board nailed across an incongruous little refreshment stand; and no banner is more universally displayed in Latin America than that bearing the device Delicioso y Refrescante. From such outposts of empire, as well as from domestic markets, the Coca-Cola Company derives a gross revenue of $87,000,000 a year, of which $26,550,016 represents net profit.

It is hard to guess what the far-flung millions of Coca-Cola drinkers seek at their fountains each day—Nepenthe, stimulation, conviviality, the taste of sweet, of bitter, the tinkle of ice, or change of a dollar? Coca-Cola has been a patent medicine at least as long as it has been a soft drink. It was concocted by Dr. Pemberton, an Atlanta druggist, and its first label read: "Intellectual beverage and temperance drink, contains the valuable tonic and nerve-stimulant properties of the coca plant and cola (or Kola) nuts and makes not only a delicious, exhilarating, refreshing, and invigorating beverage (dispensed from the soda-water fountains or in other carbonated beverages) but a valuable brain tonic and a cure for all nervous affections—sick headache, neuralgia, hysteria, melancholy, etc." Since the passage of the Food and Drug Act the cocaine has been squeezed out of the coca leaves before use, and the most active drug in the beverage is now caffeine, which is present in about the same strength as in a cup of coffee. Indeed, more people will object to the high sugar content in cola drinks—about four level teaspoons to the glass in Coca-Cola, four and one-half in Royal Crown Cola, and five in Pepsi-Cola—than to any drug.

The nebulous chemical lore which surrounds it gives "coke" one of its chief attractions. High-school students are particularly fond of it because it is their first adult dissipation. In many parts of the country it is their universal "date" drink, partly because it is considered good form for a girl to order the cheapest item on the menu. They mix it with bizarre ingredients to give it taste or "potency"—milk, lemonade, vanilla, aspirin, ice cream, or spirits of ammonia—and call their concoctions by strange and wonderful names.

Covetous eyes have been turned toward Coca-Cola for decades, and lately strong competition has begun to challenge its supremacy. Strangely enough, the market is not the chief arena of this conflict; a far more dramatic battleground has been found in the law courts. One hundred and forty-three beverages registered in the United States Patent Office use "cola" as a suffix. There are, for example, Sola-Cola, Takeola, My Cola, Chero-Cola, Celery Cola, Herbs Cola, Nervicola, Mitch-Cola, Malticola, Star Cola, K-O Nut Cola, Lime Cola, Red Rock Cola, Macy's Kola, and Yukon Kola. There are also a few cola beverages which refrain from using a variation on that name, like Dr. Pepper's and Spur.

For almost thirty years the Coca-Cola Company has filed a lawsuit a week to protect its trademark, nickname, and color against infringement. Most of these have been against small, tea-kettle producers who, influenced by conscience or by financial inability to carry on expensive litigation, have either signed consent decrees or allowed the case to go by default. As a result the Coca-Cola Company can point to an imposing array of decisions upholding its exclusive rights against unfair competition. The most impressive one is the decision of the late Justice Holmes in Coca-Cola Company v. Koke Company, which held that the name Koke was an infringement of Coca-Cola's nickname and described the plaintiff's beverage as "a single thing coming from a single source and well known to the community." The Coca-Cola people had that decision, together with 700 pages of other decisions and injunctions against competitors, bound into a forbidding buckram lawbook and distributed widely among lawyers and law libraries, in terrorem.

But the old fear seems to be ebbing. Nehi, Inc., of Columbus, Georgia, is one of Coca-Cola's bolder competitors. The predecessor of this company did well with Chero-Cola for about twenty years, until 1921, when the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia denied registration to its mark because Coca-Cola claimed that it would cause confusion. ("Ordinarily," said the court, "the prospective purchaser does not carry more than a faint impression of the mark he is looking for. If the article offered to him bears a mark having any resemblance to the one he is thinking of, he is likely to accept it.") Instead of making slight revisions in their trademark and again attempting registration, the manufacturers entered into a contract with Coca-Cola by which they agreed to drop Chero-Cola entirely. They then began to make fruit flavors and Nehi, a cola. But about seven years ago they threw caution to the winds and added Royal Crown Cola to their line. A trial has just been held in Wilmington, Delaware, to determine whether this use of the word "cola" is a breach of contract and a trademark infringement.

The growth of Pepsi-Cola is a story of swashbuckling adventure in high finance and Delaware Chancery. Charles G. Guth, president of Loft, Inc., a New York chain of candy stores, decided that his fountains ought to get a jobber's discount, which Coca-Cola refused. So through a dummy Mr. Guth bought the forty-year-old name and formula of Pepsi-Cola for $12,000 at a bankruptcy sale. Mr. Ritchie, a Loft chemist, changed the formula slightly to make it bear a "competitive resemblance" to Coca-Cola, and thereafter patrons who ordered Coca-Cola or "coke" at Loft's were informed: "We do not sell Coca-Cola, sir. We sell Pepsi-Cola." Or at least they should have been so informed—the Coca-Cola Company claimed that the substitutions were being made without notice and brought suit. Loft filed countersuits alleging interference and libel.

All this was merely a prologue to livelier battles to follow. In 1935 Guth pulled out of Loft's after losing a battle for proxies, and took his beverage with him. His action did not seem quite cricket to Loft's. They felt that the drink really belonged to them, and they brought suit, charging that Guth, in acquiring Pepsi-Cola and building it up, was acting for the Loft organization and using its personnel, mechanical facilities, funds, and prestige. This lawsuit dragged on until April, 1939, when the Delaware Supreme Court affirmed a Chancery decree awarding to Loft approximately 91 per cent of the outstanding stock of the Pepsi-Cola Company. As a result, Loft stock jumped from 4 to 17. The irrepressible Guth is now promoting "Guth Cola."

Now opulent, Pepsi has begun to take the offensive in the battle of the colas. It has fought and overcome opposition to registration of its trademark in Canada and other British possessions. In Queens County, New York, it has filed a suit against the Coca-Cola Company to restrain it from further litigation, charging that the defendant is attempting to exhaust the resources of competitors by "nuisance" lawsuits and has built up a monopoly by litigation. Coca-Cola has interposed a general denial and charged a deliberate and fraudulent attempt to appropriate its good-will, with imitation of its trademark and script lettering, and efforts to induce dealers to market Pepsi-Cola "as and for Coca-Cola."

More important than the issues of fraudulent substitution and dishonest business practices, however, is the question whether competing manufacturers may indicate that their formula and flavor are substantially similar to Coca-Cola's by imitating its color and calling their beverage a "cola." To that question Coca-Cola answers a firm "no." Cola, it contends, has no meaning in the beverage field except as part of its registered trademark. It is a purely arbitrary or fanciful designation of a drink. It is descriptive only of a nut which was unknown to the general public at the time the mark was adopted and which forms a very minor, unimportant constituent of the drink. The competitors rejoin: Regardless of what cola meant fifty years ago, to the American public it now applies not only to a nut but also to the characteristic flavor of a drink. You cannot, they say, preempt an English word which describes a whole class of drinks. Coca-Cola could reply: If it carries that meaning, and we deny that it does, it is only because of our efforts and because it is part of our trademark.

The issue is thus clearly drawn, and until a court of ultimate authority passes on the question, the manufacturers of "cola" beverages will always wonder whether they are going to be haled before a court some day and ordered to desist from further use of the word and to account for the profits they have gained as a result of their infringement. That fearsome possibility seems more and more remote, however, as a result of two recent court decisions, one handed down by the Canadian Supreme Court and one by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, in Dixi-Cola v. Coca-Cola. Both courts declared the word cola to be a generic and descriptive term which, as part of the common tongue, was open to anyone who wished to use it as part of a trademark to indicate a type of beverage.

The conduct of the Dixi-Cola case was an indication of the aggressiveness of the new, well-financed competition Coca-Cola is encountering. Coca-Cola first sued some small syrup boilers, charging fraud and deceit "in that defendants sold their syrup with the understanding that the drink made therefrom should be sold as and for Coca-Cola." It was a typical weekly lawsuit, but the lower court, in granting an injunction against these particular practices, also enjoined the defendants—Dixi-Cola, Marbert Cola, Apola Cola, and Lola Cola—from using the word "cola" as part of their trademarks. This decree, the first of this type in recent years, had obvious implications for other manufacturers. At once the giants —Pepsi-Cola, Life Savers, which is being sued by Coca-Cola because of its new cola-flavor candy, and Royal Crown—sprang into brotherly action. They asked leave to appear at the argument of the appeal as "friends of the court" and argued not only that the word "cola" was free for all comers but also that the registration of Coca-Cola was invalid. By this clever strategy they selected a battlefield where they themselves were not in danger. The court enjoined the practice of deceiving soda-fountain patrons by secret substitution. But it stated most emphatically that today the phrase "cola drink" indicated to the general public "beverages which in taste and appearance resemble Coca-Cola" rather than Coca-Cola alone.

The fact that general use of the word is now allowed does not, of course, mean that names may bear a confusing resemblance to established marks. The court ruled that the process by which cola became a generic name for a class of beverages "was hastened by the fact that the combination of extract of coca leaf and cola nut employed by Pemberton was new and gave to the product a new and distinctive flavor for which there was no other name than that employed." The decision quoted a very interesting rule from the "Restatement of the Law of Torts":

When one has a monopoly of the original distribution of a specific article over a period of time, and especially if the descriptive name for the article is one difficult to pronounce or remember, there is a likelihood that the designation which he adopts as his trademark for the article will be incorporated into the language as the usual generic designation for an article of that type. When that happens, the designation becomes merely descriptive of the goods and no longer identifies a particular brand or performs any of the functions of a trademark or trade name. Moreover, the designation must then be used by others if there is to be any effective competition in the sale of the goods.

Through the operation of this rule the Coca-Cola Company lost rights only to a part of its name. The Dupont Company lost all of the word "cellophane," the Bayer Company all of "aspirin," and the National Biscuit Company all of "Shredded Wheat," for the use of which it had just paid a large sum of money. Harsh as this principle may appear to those who invent and popularize new products, it seems essential both to the enrichment and development of the language and to the maintenance of free competition. In the case of the colas, the consumer will benefit by having a choice among several competing brands varying slightly in flavor, and by a competition which is forcing some bottlers to give twice as many ounces for a nickel and to reduce prices slightly by selling six bottles for a quarter.

Coca-Cola likes to consider itself a sort of Cadillac of soft drinks, and its advertising, disdaining price competition, suggests luxurious swank and gracious hospitality.

It now offers for a nickel, not only six ounces of carbonated beverage, but a vicarious participation in the life of a smarter set who serve their coke, like their champagne, in silver buckets. With sales higher than ever, it is thus adjusting itself to a new phase in its long and successful history. The celebrated "pause," it may be confidently expected, will continue for many years to refresh millions, particularly lawyers.

Poison in the Air

BY PHILIP G. BRADY

ONLY unfavorable weather conditions, fear of reprisal, and possibly other strategic reasons have thus far delayed the use of poison gas in the present total war. Now with clearer skies and calmer air, and with an invasion attempt likely, the most reassuring sensation an embattled civilian can feel is the weight of his gas mask on his shoulder or hip. The defensive civilian population will bear the brunt of the suffering when the first sharp warning rings out, "Adjust your masks! It's a gas attack."

In anticipation of this, the besieged millions in Great Britain have been painstakingly instructed for the last year and a half in the necessity and use of gas masks. They have been impressed with the importance of always keeping within easy reach the mask with which each has been provided. Recently they were requested to test the effectiveness of their masks by putting them on, placing a sheet of paper over the mouthpiece, and inhaling. If the mask is effective, the act of inhaling should be enough to hold the paper in position. Defective masks are replaced by air-raid wardens for about 60 cents. Children who have outgrown their masks are supplied with new ones free.

The defenders of Britain are supremely confident that they are prepared to cope with every conceivable form of chemical warfare that may be used against them. During the last war more than 9,000 poisonous vapors were examined for possible use in gas attacks. Rarity, expense, volatility, and other objections cut down the number considered of practical use to about twenty-eight. Of these, only lewisite had not been known previously. Since that time much research and experimentation have been done by chemical-warfare divisions in every country. New discoveries, if there have been any, have not been made known to the public, for they come under the heading of military information. Civilian chemists believe that variations of known gases are more likely to be used than anything entirely new.

The most feared of the known gases is mustard gas, which was a favorite during the last war. It smells strongly of garlic. The oily, brownish liquid from which it is derived attacks the eyes and seeps into body tissues to cause severe burns. The vapor has a similar but less severe effect. Known as the maid of all work because it accomplishes so much, mustard gas can lie about for a long time without losing its potency. Even in a high temperature it can persist for several days, while in cold weather it can conceal itself for weeks in the tar of roadways, in brickwork, in clothing, and then spring to life when the temperature rises. The liquid gives off dangerous vapor as long as it lasts.

Lewisite, named after the American chemist W. Lee Lewis, is a colorless gas formed by a reaction of acetylene with arsenic trichloride. It smells of geraniums but is capable of raising extremely painful blisters wherever it comes in contact with flesh. Phosgene, which attacks the lungs and respiratory passages, is marked by the odor of musty hay. It received a thorough trial during the World War and is rated high among gas weapons. Prussic acid is not highly regarded. France used 4,000 tons of this volatile gas in the last war but was unable to harm a field mouse. In addition to the deadly gases, "irritant" gases, more annoying than they are fatal, might be used to undermine civilian morale. They include tear gases, adamsite, which causes violent sneezing, and smoke bombs.

Ranking next to chemical masks as a defense against poison gas is the weather. For unless climatic conditions are exactly right, gas attacks lose their sting. Heavy rain washes gas completely away, breaking up and destroying even mustard gas. A gentle wind of five miles an hour is enough to render a phosgene attack ineffective in ten minutes. Hot air speeds up the dispersal of gases, and makes the danger period, except for mustard gas, very brief. Clouds and the lack of wind act like a blanket. At night, when surface air collects and drains into little valleys, gas is stored in these pockets and remains a source of danger.

Poison gas can be let loose in two ways—by bombing and spraying. The first is safer for the attackers but less accurate. An area about 150 yards square could probably be covered with a blanket of gas 15 feet high by a 250-pound bomb. Spraying is most effective when done from an altitude of less than 200 feet. At this height, however, the spraying planes are easy targets for anti-aircraft batteries. If they keep at a greater height, the mist from the liquid gas has no serious effect.

In addition to their gas masks, civilians have been advised to wear, whenever possible, oilskins, rubber boots, and air-tight gloves. First-aid treatment for gas burns has been given wide publicity. A daily ritual in the life of every civilian is the gas-mask drill, in which he holds his breath, opens his gas-mask carrier, and attempts to don the mask before taking another breath. Practice in this simple operation begets confidence for facing the severe test of courage a gas attack would bring.

A PROVINCIAL Argentine newspaper, La Democracia, recently received a letter from the Nazi Transocean News Agency which ran in part as follows: "We have been surprised to notice in your paper a marked anti-German tendency contrary to the ideological interests of this agency. We wish to remind you that although the monthly payments for our services are in arrears we have continued to provide you with our service without mentioning unpaid accounts, as we are aware of the financial situation of the country's press at the present time. . . . But for obvious reasons we will be forced to take firm measures in defense of our interests. If your paper . . . maintains its anti-German tendency we will suspend service immediately."

REVOLUTION: From a London dispatch to the New York Times: "It is quite common now to see Englishmen speaking to each other in public although they have never been formally introduced."

TEN YOUNG NEGROES were barred from the celebration of I Am an American Day in Chicago for carrying picket signs advocating employment of Negroes in defense industries. The ten were told by the police that the subject was not only "controversial" but that "the American Legion would object to it."

IN HIS LAST international broadcast Winston Churchill finished his address by reading the two final stanzas of Arthur Hugh Clough's "Say Not the Struggle Nought Availeth." The verse before the two he read is also appropriate:

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers
And, but for you, possess the field.

HAVING HEARD that their city may be blacked out in the event of air raids, citizens of Kingston, Jamaica, have shown concern over the possibility that the fireflies which infest the city may betray it to enemy raiders. A recent letter to a Kingston newspaper suggests that a campaign to exterminate fireflies get under way immediately.

IN AN ARTICLE called Can Spanish Teachers Teach Students How to Think? in the educational journal Hispania, E. Herman Hespelt of New York University wrote "I am aware, as we all must be, that the time may be near at hand when our country will not want to make its young citizens thinkers, but to make them soldiers. War requires action and emotion, not reflection and judgment. It is the antithesis of the fulfilment of the individual; it is submergence and annihilation. In times of war our young people must not be taught how to think; they must be taught what to think. They must not challenge; they must acquiesce."

Drought, Defense, and Alcoa

BY THE time this is printed the rain may have come pattering on the dry brown watersheds of Southern rivers. It may have poured in gully washers across the red earth to fill up the lakes along the Tennessee River, to pour over the dams in now dusty Georgia and in Alabama, where the long drought has been keeping down the size of the potatoes and the onions and making silty the waters that hold the catfish. But when this was written, for the sake of power and especially power for aluminum, Southerners in a South already burning hot in May were being asked by the power companies to give up air conditioning in movie houses, baseball games at night when it is cool enough to enjoy them, and every other lavish use of electric power.

As far as I know, it was the first public sacrifice of major proportions asked for defense. It was a limited blackout, not for practice against the possibility of future bombing planes but for a present and essential purpose. Across the whole Southeast citizens were asked to sweat in darkness for the national security. And nobody complained about it. The country had to have aluminum even if dearly beloved "white ways" in little towns and big ones were turned off. But it ought to go into the record that the power shortage was not due merely to drought but also to the Aluminum Company of America, which everybody agreed had to have the power. The Aluminum Company had stubbornly declined to provide power for itself if, in providing it, it had to conform to the requirements of the Federal Power Act, which puts limitations upon the long-term unearned increment in the value of power projects using the nation's power resources.

As recently as the March just behind us, when people by and large and corporation officials also were aware of the increasing demands for aluminum, the Aluminum Company's subsidiary, the Nantahala Power and Light Company, undertook to withdraw from its declaration of intention to build the Fontana dam on the Little Tennessee River rather than build it under federal license requirements. That was after the corporation itself had spoken of the dam as essential to meet the urgent defense requirements. The Federal Power Commission refused to let it withdraw its application, but that refusal did not force the beginning of the project.

Of course, if it had been begun, it would not have been ready to help meet the conditions caused by the lack of rain in recent months. But the Aluminum Company did the same thing in 1937, when another of its subsidiaries, the Carolina Aluminum Company, for similar reasons abandoned its project at Tuckertown on the Yadkin River near its properties in central North Carolina. That project might be producing power now. Therefore at least a part of the power shortage which threatens aluminum production in the dry heat of early summer was created by the action of the Aluminum Company itself in what the Power Commission called its "complete unwillingness to accept provisions of federal law." But its deliberate failure to provide its power does not mean that the Aluminum Company is not going to get the power it needs. Plans have already been completed to create a power pool in the South which will assure the Aluminum Company of all the power it requires by a process which in effect provides for a rationing of everybody else.

There was no apparent disposition among power users in the Southeast to resist the request that "as a patriotic duty" they use as little power as possible. The city of Atlanta turned out its brightest street lights. Advertising signs became dark. Merchants turned out the lights in their show windows. If necessary, I think, people would be ready to forgo ice cubes, which have a very pleasant use in the late afternoons and the long outdoor evenings of the South. Indeed, I think they would go back to candles and spring water if necessary for national defense and with no more than good-natured grumbling. But it is not very pleasant in the dark to contemplate the fact that the sacrifice is not made to serve Uncle Sam alone but to help Uncle Sam save the Aluminum Company from the effects of its own declaration—before defense and in the midst of it—that it would produce no more power if, in producing it, it had to abide by federal law.

That the company must be given the power is not subject to much argument at a time when there is no argument at all about the necessity for aluminum. But even in national defense it is not the duty of the sacrificing citizen in the comparative darkness to make a part of his patriotism the faith that this drought falls on the just and the unjust alike. It doesn't. God alone may make the rain, but the Aluminum Company of America extended the dangers of drought to a danger to defense. It will take a lot of rain to wash away that fact.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE CLASSICS FIGHT BACK IN FRANCE

BY BERTHOLD C. FRIEDL and IRVIN EHRENPREIS

LATEST reports from occupied France indicate that the harsh Nazi censorship is provoking significant—though not overt—responses. Expressed as a return to the classics in general and to Montaigne in particular, these reactions have a meaning which can be appreciated only if we realize what the relationship between reading and censorship in France was before the occupation.

Indirect opposition to official suppression of important news has been reflected in reading habits since the very beginning of the war. A best-seller under the Daladier regime was "La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu" ("The Trojan War Will Not Take Place"), the theme of which is that, despite the overwhelming propaganda of the war-mongers and the withholding of essential facts from the people, a war—merely on account of "Helen's beautiful eyes"—is surely impossible. For the French the irony of the fact that the Trojan War had been neither prevented by popular disapproval nor caused by a woman's beauty was hardly humorous. And the grotesqueness of the situation was only enhanced by the selection of the author of the book, Jean Giraudoux, as Commissioner for Information—or, in effect, chief of war-time censorship. When the Parisian satirical weekly, Le Canard Enchaîné, found inordinately large areas of its pages whitened by the local censor, therefore, it was not without some bitterness, as well as audacity, that the editors planted in the midst of one of the blank spaces a mocking quotation from "La Guerre de Troie."

But within the year French censorship was replaced by Nazi. Everything from "Mein Kampf" to "Jean Christophe" was outlawed; textbooks and fairy tales were included in the ruthless suppression of all literature not conducive to the achievement of Hitler's aims; leading scholars, working on such seditious material as the novels of Gustave Flaubert, were imprisoned; and the official literary scene in France was metamorphosed into wretched announcements of the kind of trivial lending-library novels which unlucky Professor Cestre had to report on for the New York Times Book Review.

And what is the best-seller today? Montaigne's "Essays" (1588)! To interpret this situation, it is necessary to understand what the classics, in less extraordinary times, have meant to the French reading public and what Montaigne offers that is of peculiar significance to France today.

The traditional French love for the classics has more often shown itself in respectful admiration than in enthusiastic daily reading. Indeed, there were often rather critical reactions to the required texts on the part of the lycée (college) and university students. Little enthusiasm used to meet the state theater's sixty sessions devoted to the presentation of Molière's comedy "The Learned Ladies" in the schools of Paris and the Seine district. The receipts from these performances, put on with excellent equipment, seldom covered the costs; even though the company was subsidized, the theaters were usually half empty; the press was deprecatory; and young people were more ready to mock than to admire. The sauce de restaurant (cafeteria ketchup—insipid because always the same) quality of the shows did little to attract audiences for even the most respected classical tragedies.

On the other hand, just before the collapse of France Art et Action, a Parisian dramatic workshop, was producing the same essays of Montaigne which have become so popular since the Germans assumed power, and it had no trouble in gaining for them a genuinely interested audience—by invitation only. By presenting the essays in dramatic form the producers found it possible to state ideas which would have been suppressed in other guise and at the same time to lend them an immediacy of effect which they lack in print. Comments on resistance to invasion, for example, seem uncannily appropriate to the conditions of Europe today:

The most usual way to appease those minds we have offended (when revenge lies in their hands and we stand at their mercy) is by submission to move them to commiseration and pity. Nevertheless, courage, constancy, and resolution—means altogether opposite—have sometimes wrought the same effect. Edward, the Black Prince of Wales . . . could by no means be appeased . . . until . . . as in triumphant manner passing through their city, he perceived three French gentlemen, who alone, with an incredible and undaunted boldness, gainstood the enraged violence and made head against the fury of his victorious army. . . .

Nor is this example merely a lucky coincidence, for Montaigne—himself partly of Jewish descent—also saw France dominated by a vicious foreign autocrat, torn by religious pogroms, and divided against itself by selfish political dissension.

At the same time, he found the learned professions dominated by a dependence upon authority which emphasized the unquestioned acceptance of unsupported opinion; his essays were intended to fight this willingness to be indoctrinated and to stimulate critical thinking on the part of their readers. His success is demonstrated by the popularity of the essays in this time of crisis. Now as never before we must fight those who "profess to deceive and beguile, not our eyes, but our judgment; and to bastardize and corrupt the essence of things" (Of the Vanity of Words). For whether it be Catherine de' Medici or Adolf Hitler, St. Bartholomew's Day or November, 1939, France or America, we must fight not only the men but the ideas behind them, not only the soldiers but the doctrines which give them their driving force.

To interpret this return to the classics, then, as nothing more than the inevitable result of having little of current interest to read is completely false. It is rather the resistance of the democratic forces of France to the Goebbels propaganda machine. It is both a warning to the fascists and a signal to the democracies that literate Frenchmen are beginning to fight back surreptitiously, by using their classics as a weapon against enemy indoctrination.

Caviar for the People

AMERICAN RENAISSANCE, ART AND EXPRESSION IN THE AGE OF EMERSON AND WHITMAN.

By F. O. Matthiessen. Oxford University Press. $5.

A CLOSELY reasoned, closely printed volume of nearly 700 pages cannot be adequately discussed in as many words. It is possible here merely to touch upon some of Mr. Matthiessen's main themes, and to note the importance of his subject and the scrupulousness of his treatment.

The period which saw the publication of six such remarkable books as Emerson's "Representative Men," Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter" and "The House of Seven Gables," Melville's "Moby Dick" and "Pierre," Thoreau's "Walden," and Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" were not, literally, a renaissance; but because these writers themselves felt it to be one, Mr. Matthiessen has chosen to describe it thus. His purpose was to evaluate the fusion of form and content in their work. His method entailed the close scrutiny of what each of five major American writers believed concerning the function and nature of his art, and the extent to which his performance exemplified that belief. Their books are studied here in detail, not merely as the precipitate of the interaction between each author's intentions and talents, but also in relation to one another, and with a concern for their bearing upon the development of our literature. Finally, Mr. Matthiessen has sought to determine to what extent the works considered fulfil "the enduring requirements of great art," and so has occupied himself with the several writers' views of nature and society, of good and evil, and the effect of their convictions upon their style.

He has quite properly illustrated his exposition with copious quotations from the authors concerned, from their "ancestors," and from their literary descendants. The only relevant quotations that I miss are Pater's praise of the gem-like flame and Frost's query: "How can we write/The Russian novel in America,/As long as life goes so unutterably?" Indeed, the best writing in the book, as its author would be the first to acknowledge, is not his own: it is that of the greatest masters of prose in England and America and of one of our chief poets.

Recognizing that Emerson, Thoreau, Melville, Hawthorne, and Whitman were all devoted to the democratic ideal, Mr. Matthiessen brings his book to a close with a discussion of the various ways in which they responded to what he calls "the myth of the common man." It is noteworthy that his preface concludes with a quotation from Louis Sullivan to the effect that the true scholar's works must prove "that he is a citizen, not a lackey, a true exponent of democracy. . . . In a democracy there can be but one fundamental test of citizenship, namely: Are you using such gifts as you possess for or against the people?" Mr. Matthiessen holds these standards to be the logical outgrowth of those set forth by Emerson in The American Scholar, and declares his own volume to have value only in so far as it answers the same demands. Undoubtedly he desires to use his immense erudition and fine analytical powers for the people. He shares the view of the writers he treats that literature should be functional and social, in the fullest sense of these words. But he has so many points to make, and he makes them with such a tantalized awareness of their multifarious implications and complications, that his learned and subtle volume is caviar to the general. It addresses itself to the cultivated intelligence, but will prove of interest primarily to the literary critic, and is a veritable seed bin for future Ph.D. theses. Unfortunately, the vitality of the authors discussed has not communicated itself to their patient student, and Mr. Matthiessen's detailed scrutiny of the many problems presented has somewhat obscured the main structure of his work.

His judgments on the five writers considered are, with one possible exception, remarkably just. He is inclined to overestimate Hawthorne, whom he regards as an ancestor of Eliot, perhaps because this novelist entertained "a religious conception of man's nature," and makes a virtue of his very limitations. At the outset Mr. Matthiessen rightly applies to Emerson "his own words about Goethe: he was the cow from which the rest drew their milk." He shows Thoreau to have diverged from his master chiefly because of a greater capacity for sensuous experience, and notes the healthy effect of this on his style. Similarly, he observes how Whitman's awareness of the power of sex helped him to speak a more natural language than his mentor. He sees Hawthorne and Melville possessed by a vision of evil which permitted them a sense of tragedy foreign to the bland old transcendentalist, and makes a nice distinction between Hawthorne's allegories and Melville's symbols. Throughout he offers a fruitful discussion of the development of that organic style which Emerson desired, and touches repeatedly upon the nature of tragedy, which, unlike his best pupils, Emerson did not plumb. One may differ with the author on various points, and regret that he leads one along so many crowded bypaths that it is hard to see the wood for the trees. But chiefly one remains grateful to him for having elucidated with such discriminating scholarship the enduring values which make these writings live.

ONE is tempted to say that the best thing about "The Long Week End" is its title. A social history of Great Britain during the unhappy-go-lucky period of 1918-39 is an urgent necessity just now. However, few politically minded people will be satisfied with this behaviorist effort in mass observation, which, indeed, makes no serious pretense of analyzing social movements. What one is given is an amusing account of matters of public gossip, of the attitude of the press, and of the furors of the intellectual tea parties. The woman question, sex, screen, and stage, pacifism, nudism, and hiking—the last three nicely conjoined in one chapter—and so forth, are only occasionally ballasted by common-sense political observations. In the chapter Revolution Averted, 1919, and Revolution Again Averted, 1926, the authors touch lightly upon profounder realities. They have no prejudices, except in favor of being bright, and they write well and wittily. To one who saw England from another vantage point "The Long Week End" is a libretto for an opera bouffe to be performed on the side of a volcano in eruption.

And yet the book has its value. It reminds one that the mass of people are not so political as the columns of intelligent magazines appear to suggest. The superficial attitude of Britain during appeasement is adequately described. It serves to warn one that public support of that policy was based upon an unanalytical longing for peace, not at any price, but on extended credit. Again, the Britain that now fights a just war is in some part the Britain described in this book. That should warn all liberals that the war cannot be expected to have automatic consequences for social good in Britain.

To a great extent ideas of social progress are entertained and developed in war-time Britain outside the old political parties of the right and left. The orthodox ideas of conservatism, liberalism, socialism, communism, and the like are manifesting little power to shape men's minds. So much is suggested by the stream of books pouring out of Britain. In this country the war is very often viewed through purely ideological spectacles. That is, perhaps, easier at a distance, just as European revolutions are easy of contrivance in New York. Few of the books that have come my way show signs of serious political thought. The British war effort is most often regarded as an effort in survival. One might take "London Front" as an example. To be charitable to its authors, they are decent inconsequential folk who might well figure in "The Long Week End." F. Tennyson Jesse, a successful minor novelist of some distinction, and her dramatist husband write letters to prominent theatrical or literary persons, such as Alexander Woollcott. These letters, with replies, make up the book. The writers view the war simply as a struggle for liberty, the old sort of liberty. After the war everyone will be kinder, and doubtless some measure of the Labor Party's program will be put into effect. The authors' passion is directed against the external enemy alone. Against the interior one, viewed chiefly as indifference, they manifest, in the fine saying of Marx, melancholy indignation. One is distrustful of a "liberal" who can say, as Mr. Harwood does, that if one could press a button and annihilate that "cancer in the world" the German people, one would do it.

"Letters from Jim" is also non-political. The author, a protegee of Cecil Roberts, according to the publisher's statement is a "typical" English youth. His letters are naive yet rather self-conscious descriptions of action in France and encounters with people in England after the great disaster of midsummer, 1940. Apparently the war has no meaning for Jim. It is merely something to be fought cleanly and bravely. He seems not to have heard of fascism; at least there is no trace of political thought within the book's covers.

"Country Notes in Wartime" ought not to be included in this omnibus review. Its author, I know, does possess political ideas. They are deliberately omitted in this collection of finely wrought essays. Somehow this little volume awakened more nostalgia for England, and more admiration, than any of the others. That power it owes to its real beauty of style.

In "Mansion House of Liberty" one touches a more substantial conception of England. Phyllis Bottome was a conservative anti-Nazi long before the outbreak of war. Her vivid, popularly written account of London life beneath the Luftwaffe is the product of a vigorous mind and an informed social conscience. None the less, there is little hint here that people are much occupied with concrete thought about social problems. Courage, cheerfulness, and social morale are her matters. Jan Struther, also, is a genuine anti-fascist, and the letters she has collected in "Women of Britain" have been written by people of more than average intelligence. They are good letters and give a better picture of English wartime mentality than any others yet published. The Soldier's Wife, for instance, writes that the "Russian pact news today made me feel faint when I read it." Yet she sensibly rallies and decides that fighting a war is better than living like the German people.

The journalists have also been busy with the "social" scene. Sound reporting fills "This Is London," by the chief of the CBS foreign news staff. Among the books on the war as fighting, no other can touch the superb journalism of "Their Finest Hour." It is lean, muscular stuff, swift and thrilling and wholly objective, written by Life's correspondents. One notes again the entire absence of even a trace of political attitude in the soldiers whose experiences are described. And one is not looking for theoretical descriptions, but for even the smallest indication of political attitude. The level of journalism reached in this last book is nowhere achieved by "Wings of Victory" or "First Blood for the R. A. F.," both of which are badly written impressions of air warfare. They do not excite, and that is a serious fault in war books that do not seek to explain. What one does see is that the R. A. F. is composed of magnificently brave men who are fighting in a simple spirit of patriotism. The evacuation from Dunkirk receives a vigorous and thrilling description in "The Nine Days' Wonder." If we accept it as faithful, it is valuable for its illumination of British morale. A semi-technical and extremely interesting account of the August-October air warfare is contained in the penultimate book on my list. It is, perhaps, the only one among the shooting-war books that Nation readers would do well to read. The most interesting element of Captain Bartlett's book I found to be the perhaps unintended confirmation of radical criticism of France; for the rest it is a shrewdly observant, dry-humored account of war experiences, of no great moment for Nation readers.

Words and Music

THE RECORD BOOK. By David Hall. Smith and Durrell. $3.50.

OF ALL the guides to recorded music for the layman's use this is surely the most ambitious. The author not only gives a very full list of works in every department of the musical repertoire, with comparisons of the various available performances of each, but he undertakes to give, in a running commentary, an account of the development of music, of the styles of individual composers, and of the methods and difficulties of the several sorts of recordings.

But no one can reasonably expect all this information in one book; so that Mr. Hall's work is not to be judged by its fulness, even though the index that displays it is its most impressive and useful feature. There are still more valuable things than scope, particularly in works that profess to initiate a public of laymen to one of the arts, and it is in these preferable qualities that Mr. Hall, who cannot achieve an impossible exhaustiveness, fails to achieve even a moderate measure of success. I have in mind lucidity, oneness of critical tone, and the power of mediation between ignorance and the beginnings of true knowledge. I have no doubt that many people will find his book easy to read and rich in plausible remarks about music and musicians; others will take pleasure in seeing their prejudices confirmed by an expert; but I believe, nevertheless, that apart from the routine data about late and early records the book will enlighten very few.

The first obstacle is the vocabulary, which does not sufficiently seek its own level. Unprepared readers, for instance, in trying to pick up some notions of musical history from the author's proffered fragments, will understand well enough that Haydn and others "got the new trend off to a strong start," but they will stumble on a phrase like "recasting . . . the homophonic style of the Italian school into the molds of sonata, rondo, and song forms." Seventy-five pages farther they will find a none-too-helpful footnote on the meaning of homophonic, but it will be a trifle late. More knowing readers will be bothered in other ways—by the ambiguous use of "dynamic" or the contradictory meanings of "romantic." In one place "dynamic" seems to stand for vigorous: "Toscanini is superbly dynamic here"—referring to his actually disappointing recording of Beethoven's Seventh; elsewhere, it conveys the technical meaning common in music. As for romantic, it is used to describe both the reason why Bach's music has endured and—on the previous page—the reason why Rachmaninoff disregards the markings in the score of Chopin's B-flat minor Sonata. Throughout, inaccurate or chaotic performance is romantic ("incorrigibly") and the essence of musical feeling from Bach to Brahms is also romantic ("profoundly").

Nor is the confusion limited to words. In so far as Mr. Hall has a philosophy of musical history, it is the usual

IS THIS TRUE OF YOU?

"It is vain to hope that Hanson W. Baldwin's book, UNITED WE STAND, will be read by 'every intelligent citizen'," writes Lindsay Rogers in THE NATION. "It is too serious, too closely reasoned, and too replete with facts, figures and tables."

Does this apply to you? Or are you among those who will take the time to find out where we really stand today in matters of defense? Then get a copy now of this tremendously important book by the man of whom Malcolm Cowley in The New Republic says, "Baldwin is the most widely respected of our writers on military affairs. evolutionary scheme by which forms and composers grow out of one another like Russian dolls. This leads him to slight certain figures, like Gluck, or to force others, like Ravel, into derivative positions. At the same time, he has a high regard for something he calls perfection, or the perfect synthesis of subject and form, which is one of the two reasons he alleges for Beethoven's preeminence—as if every successful piece of music were not perfect in the same way, whether written by Beethoven or by John Philip Sousa. Yet by a turn that we come to expect from our author, he can also use "perfection"—as in speaking of Mendelssohn's chamber works—to imply his mild disdain of merely correct workmanship.

Throughout, the text is written like a blurb and the clichés of which it is composed ("succeeded amazingly well in piano works," "emotional hysterics," "Gallic reserve," "cerebral stuff," "a lovely songful work") makes it simply a pretentious amplification of the factual "Encyclopedia of Recorded Music" which many of us possess. Unfortunately, the pretense is not bad enough to be harmless, and when Mr. Hall hazards original subdivisions of musical periods such as "unpolitical Romanticism," including Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Brahms, in order to contrast it with the "nationalistic and revolutionary" romanticism of Weber, Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner, he is plausible enough to be misleading. In the same strain, he repeats the familiar cant about Berlioz, though without the usual animus; he supplies imaginary programs for pieces that have none; he ascribes the lack of success of certain operas to poor librettos, which is a convenient superstition; he insists on ranking musicians as the greatest this or that; he finds national traits wherever he can; and he utilizes existing popular preferences to insinuate the merits of old, new, or American music, "selling" us, for example, the St. Matthew Passion with the guaranty that it is "as dramatically effective as anything Wagner ever wrote."

This last bit of reverse English would be enough to prove that Wagner was always a lucky man, though I do not mean to suggest that Mr. Hall is a Wagnerite. His personal preferences are clear but not obtrusive. And no critic registers an oath in heaven that he will approve the same things as his fellows. But for this liberty he must pay. The price is that he shall never speak except in his own proper person. He must not, as Mr. Hall has tried to do, talk up good music by talking down to his readers and occasionally relapsing upward into the jargon of the schools. Writing about records seems to be a great temptation to this sort of sinfulness, for records are far from representing the whole of the musical repertoire and hence limit a man's choice artificially, not to say commercially; and records are also supposed to be a department of public education. Both features encourage canting, though Mr. Bernard Haggin has shown that this encouragement can be resisted by a critic who has a clear head, words to express himself, and his eye on the object rather than on his audience.

IN BRIEF

HOLY SUBURB. By Elizabeth Atkins. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Miss Atkins's novel explores, with both amusement and sympathy, an authentic and little-exploited phase of American life—the small Middle Western denominational college, with all its prudishness, provincialism, and secret hankering for the more worldly ways of the big state university. Miss Atkins, who now teaches at the University of Minnesota, once lived in a suburb of Lincoln, Nebraska, where there was a newly founded Methodist college, and she probably draws liberally on her own recollections for the outlines and details of the Epworth College of her book.

SOME MEMORIES OF W. B. YEATS.

By John Masefield. Macmillan. $1.25. The poet laureate of England remembering W. B. Yeats sounds impressive. But the conjunction of the two names is the only reason we can surmise for publishing this little book of thirty-four pages. Masefield's anecdotes of Yeats are skimpy and unrevealing. The poems he consecrates to the death of the great Irishman—who himself sang so magnificently the death of heroes—are a stodgy imitation of Yeats's artful and impassioned rhetoric.

Extras Again

Hollywood, May 29

A RECENT article published in this column entitled Screen Actors: Class B has evoked an irate and lengthy protest from William S. Holman, the producers' representative on the Standing Committee of the Motion Picture Producers and Screen Actors' Guild. Mr. Holman's letter is some four pages long, and space does not permit it to be printed in its entirety, but a few excerpts will give an adequate impression of its contents and allow a reply.

After a somewhat lofty opening Mr. Holman says, "On the whole his factual account of the situation of the extra player is facilely presented, although it bristles with minor inaccuracies. His conclusions, however, are simply inane. Just what does Mr. Bower mean when he says that in order to make the extras' lives tolerable there will have to be drastic revisions in the methods of hiring and classification?" This unwittingly cryptic remark refers to negotiations now under way to simplify classifications, improve hiring conditions, and increase wages, with the eventual end in view of creating a substantial body of extras earning a living wage.

Mr. Holman cites several minor inaccuracies in my article: "Anyone who hopes to obtain work as an extra at any one of the studios . . . must be registered at Central Casting." There are in fact one or two minor agencies for extra work in existence, and extras also obtain work occasionally through direct studio booking, but for any extra who hopes to work at all regularly registration at Central Casting is a virtual imperative, and I imagine that 100 per cent of the extras are registered at Central Casting, a privilege which costs nothing. He also cites my statement that the Screen Actors' Guild raised the minimum daily wage for extras from $3.50 to $5.50. Though the increase in extras' wages was coincidental with the activities of the Guild, it can, I suppose, be interpreted as benevolence on the part of the studios, but if that is what Mr. Holman means, his accusation should be not inaccuracy but a difference of opinion.

After another page the letter continues, "I have now finally arrived at the comment of Mr. Bower to which I take particular exception." Then he quotes from the article: "That this is a miserable form of making a living can be very easily seen. The Guild has already accomplished much for the extras. . . . but there still remains a great deal to be done." And he replies: "Just what is it that remains to be done? In view of the statistics cited by Mr. Bower in the body of his article the answer seems obvious, and yet Mr. Bower ignores the answer completely, and his comments carry the strong implication that what is required to remedy the extras' plight is further exactions from the employing studios on the part of the Guild" (my italics). Just what further exactions does Mr. Holman mean, since he does not credit the Guild with the extras' wage increase?

Mr. Holman's "obvious answer"—which actually was not within the scope of the article—is based, he writes, on the First Recommendations of the Standing Committee delegated jointly by the Guild and the producers to make a survey of the problem of the extra player. He quotes from the First Recommendations:

As we have indicated, our investigation has disclosed that the industry does not offer sufficient extra work to provide for all aspirants the possibility of a living wage.

We believe that the number will have to be made sufficiently small so that most of them can make a better than substantial living out of their employment.

No wage scale, however extravagant, is in itself adequate to support any person. An annual income is the only test of whether one is making a living.

Our investigation gives abundant evidence that the economic condition of most of the extras is entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. Holman's letter than continues: "This report, based on an exhaustive survey of conditions in the industry, shows conclusively that the only possible approach to a solution of the problem of the extra player lies in a sharp curtailment in the number of workers permitted to share in the annual expenditures of the industry for this type of work. Both the Guild and the producers have accepted and indorsed this solution, and negotiations are now in progress between them which confidently are expected to result in the initiation of practical steps to accomplish this end in the very near future."

Now Mr. Holman calls this reduction in the number of extras both a solution and an approach to a solution in the same paragraph; which does he mean? The operative quotation from the report seems to be the one that states: "An annual income is the only test of whether one is making a living." A sharp curtailment in the number of extra workers would not guarantee a livable income for the rest unless the cut were so drastic as to be absolutely impracticable. At the moment steps are being taken to bar casual extras, that is, to eliminate extras who for reasons other than ill health or accident have worked less than ten days during the past year. This will account for some 2,000 extras, leaving some 5,000 to share in an annual income which last year totaled $2,259,766, about $500 apiece. Under present conditions the industry could provide a livable income for only about 1,500 extras at the most optimistic estimate, and to reduce the number of extras to this level could not possibly suit anyone, least of all the producers. It is impossible to resist the temptation of asking Mr. Holman why, if the answer to the extra problem is so obvious and so simple, some $80,000 has been spent by the Standing Committee in investigating the "problem of the extra player."

THE RELUCTANT DRAGON

Walt Disney's plans to entertain the press with a conducted tour of the studio, a preview of his new picture

"The Reluctant Dragon," and cocktails were rudely interrupted, along with the general work of the studio, by a walkout on the part of the Screen Cartoonists' Guild. A threatened strike at the Schlesinger studio was averted when Leon Schlesinger decided to sign the Guild agreement. This Disney refuses to do, and he wishes to hold an election at the studio between the Guild and the recently created American Society of Screen Cartoonists, which the Guild declares is just the company-sponsored Federation of Cartoonists remade. There is so far no indication of an agreement, and the studio and the local theaters showing Disney products are surrounded by pickets carrying such signs as "Snow White and Seven Hundred Dwarfs," "One Genius—Twelve Hundred Guinea Pigs."

RECENT FILMS

Way back in 1923 Rudolph Valentino seared the screens of the nation with his passionate interpretation of the torero in "Blood and Sand"; now we have Tyrone Power, slightly trammelled by the Hays office but heavily aided by the most striking technicolor, playing the same role to some effect. The plot is both familiar and dull and serves only to provide material for a spectacle which is at times breath-taking; some of the color effects are a little too exuberant, but the bull-ring sequences are really exciting and beautiful. The most surprising feature of the picture is that while most of the players speak in measured and stylized tones meant to indicate that they are foreigners, Mr. Power, whose make-up is more Spanish than any Spaniard ever thought of being, talks tough enough to qualify for a gangster role.

A rather doleful piece entitled "Shining Victory" tells of life among the doctors in a Scottish mental home. Quite a lot of familiar characters are collected in the home—the frustrated spinster, the earnest young lady doctor, the wise and aging practitioner from whom words of wisdom simply gush, and the hero doctor, apparently rather crusty but in reality as soft as a marshmallow. A. J. Cronin was responsible for the story.

Miss Neagle's consistent reappearances in screen musical comedies is one of the mysteries of the movie world—"Irene," "No, No, Nannette," and now "Sunny." Miss Neagle, a most talented actress, dispenses the same air of dignity in her musical-comedy roles as in her portrayals of such characters as Queen Victoria, with far less happy results.

ANTHONY BOWER

RECORDS

TO LAST month's superb set of the Prelude and Finale of "Tristan und Isolde" played by the Berlin Philharmonic under Furtwängler Victor now adds an equally fine one of the Prelude and Good Friday music of "Parsifal" played by the same orchestra and conductor (Set 514, $3.50). It has been interesting to observe in these performances an emotional and stylistic continence and a related sense for continuity of structural outline that are not revealed in Furtwängler's performances of symphonic music. Not only interesting but a pleasure; for they are completely satisfying performances of these works—the first we have had on recent records as alternatives to what Stokowski has recorded.

Another fine set (772, $6.50) offers a large part of the music which Frederick Austin arranged for the 1920 London production of Gay's "Beggar's Opera" at the Lyric Theater, Hammer-smith, using the music which Pepusch put together for the original work out of the popular tunes of the time. They are delightful, and are well sung by Audrey Mildmay of the Glyndebourne Company, Michael Redgrave of "The Lady Vanishes," and a number of others with chorus and small orchestra under Michael Mudie. A serious fault is that most of the words can't be understood; and Victor does not supply a printed text.

My disappointment after hearing the duets and arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni" recorded by Rethberg and Pinza (Set 783, $3) is as great as my anticipation before I heard them. Rethberg, who used to delight one's ear with the exquisite sounds that she produced without effort, now seems to have difficulties with production that cause her upper range to be clouded by a strong tremolo, sometimes to sound acidulous, and sometimes to be off pitch; and the first two faults are evident on these records. Pinza, on the other hand, offends with the style of his singing, making his points with exaggerated nuances and contrasts of color. Nor is there the light-footed grace and sparkle that there might be in the orchestral accompaniments. And on a high-fidelity machine the recorded sound has a coarseness and harshness that can be eliminated by reducing the fidelity, and that is not heard on a small machine of limited frequency-range.

Though the so-called Trio Sonatas of Bach were written for the two-keyboard cembalo with pedals, Harvey Grace argues that they should be played on the organ. He points out that they were written as exercises in organ technique, and that the instrument they were written for was the practice-instrument which every student of the organ had in his home; further that the writing includes sustained notes which require the sustained tone of the organ, and that the three-voiced polyphony is most effectively projected with the varied colors of the organ. Although, therefore, the polyphony is spaced out in the two-piano arrangements of Nos. 4 and 5 recorded by Vronsky and Babin (Set 778, $3.50), and although in this way it is clearly defined much of the time, there are occasions when the voices are not distinguishable for lack of the organ's differentiating colors. For the rest the performances are polished and spirited; as for the music, No. 4 is engaging, and No. 5 has a fine opening movement followed by movements which I find uninteresting.

Suk's early Serenade for string orchestra, beautifully played by the Czech Philharmonic under Talich (Set 779, $4.50), is facile, melodious writing without much point. The music from Gluck's "Don Juan," well recorded by the Victor Chamber Orchestra (13648, $1), is moderately enjoyable (the part concerned with Don Juan being dragged down to Hell sounds like a passage in "Orfeo"); Hadyn's Overture in D and Mozart's Marches K 335 and 408, well played by the Société des Concerts Orchestra under Fendler (4549, $.75), are inconsequential. Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto in G minor is not a work that I care much about even when it is well played; much of the time it suffers from steel-fingered playing by Sanroma and the brassy accompaniment of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler (Set 780, $3.50). Nor can I hear any reason for investing in Hanson's Suite from his opera "Merry Mount," well recorded by the Eastman-Rochester Symphony under the composer's direction (Set 781, $2.50); Piston's "Carnival Song," recorded by the Harvard Glee Club with a brass ensemble of the Boston Symphony and organ, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth (18013, $1); and Kleinsinger's "I Hear America Sing," to words of Walt Whitman, recorded by John Charles Thomas, the I. L. G. W. U. Chorus, and the Victor Symphony, under Nat Shilkret (Set 777, $2.50).

For Action Not Debate

Dear Sirs: In the last analysis, we who are asking people to defeat Hitler are asking them to defend the status quo. Some maintain that this is asking too much, since the status quo has so many defects; I say that there is no time to cure the defects prior to effective national action.

I say further that the foreign policy of the United States must be the guide and not the result of public opinion. The Administration owes it to the people to use its total might to defeat the enemies of the national state. We are going to debate ourselves to death. I suggest an immediate national "debating holiday" similar to the banking holiday, followed by striking and unrestricted action to insure the defeat of Italy and Germany and Japan.

Our New National Gallery

Dear Sirs: I cannot imagine a more wrong-headed and wrong-hearted criticism than that of Mr. Lazare on the National Gallery in your issue of May 17. I fully agree with Mr. Lazare's strictures on the badly outdated, over-pretentious, and over-costly building. Where I emphatically disagree with him is on his criticism of this brand-new gallery as if it had been running for many years with abundant funds which it had misspent; he took the tone that one might reasonably assume toward the National Gallery in London or the Kaiserfriedrichmuseum.

Our National Gallery begins with the gift of two private collections, that of the late Secretary Mellon and that of Samuel E. Kress. The pictures were obtained with the money of these generous donors, buying, with on the whole excellent advice, what they liked themselves under the limitations of the art market of the past quarter-century. Considering these facts, the initial richness of the National Gallery is extraordinary. We are asked to minimize the magnanimity of these public-spirited citizens because neither commanded, say, the experience of a Dr. Bode or the volcanic energy of a Lord Duveen.

Naturally there are omissions. If they are really troubling Mr. Lazare too deeply, let him undertake a possibly unique adventure in historical research and compare the first catalogue of the National Gallery in London with that of our bantling National Gallery. The comparison should relieve his gloom. As to these desiderata, the accession of the Widener collection will fill many of them nicely, while the normal activities of a competent professional staff commanding a great income will in no very distant future go far to balance the collections.

Mr. Lazare virtually reprehends the donors for failing to buy an Orcagna or a Piero della Francesca. Does he think Pieros and Orcagnas are in stock at the great picture dealers? If he will locate a good picture by either master I am confident that the National Gallery or Mr. Kress will buy it promptly.

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.

Washington Crossing, Pa., May 26

Dear Sirs: Mr. Mather has evidently misconstrued my opinions on the subject of the National Gallery, and I am grateful to him for the opportunity to make them more explicit. I cannot, in the first place, regard as satisfactory any museum or private collection of the proportions of the National Gallery which excludes all aspects of contemporary art; second, this omission is all the more conspicuous in the present instance since the collection is, to an appreciable extent, made up of anonymous journeymen, pupils, and imitators whose chief iconographic significance is their own contemporaneity with the Renaissance; third, the comparative youth or age of the museum is of no relevance in this connection since its by-laws render the permanent acquisition of contemporary art virtually impossible.

Mr. Mather's suggestion that the museum's donors lacked the guidance and "volcanic energy" of experts seems to me a little far-fetched. The sources of many of the transactions may be traced through the catalogue (it has, in fact, been a matter of common knowledge in the art world how much intrigue, string-pulling, and personal profit entered into these various guidances). No, I do not know offhand where an Orcagna or a Piero della Francesca is to be picked up—nor did I mean to suggest that paintings by masters are shopped for like tea-cozies. But I do know that Mr. Kress footed extensive restorations in the cities of Cortona, Spoleto, Mantua, and Ravenna and enjoyed, in return, a considerable freedom of choice in Italy. I think, too, that the Hermitage in Russia, which sold Mr. Mellon a number of his treasures, might have been tapped more resourcefully.

Blitz on Glass and Plaster

Dear —: All day long yesterday and now again today there has been a continuous sound of shoveling glass in the street—the result of Wednesday night's raid. We live in a short street of rather large, strongly built brick houses, with a hospital opposite. The raid started early, which usually means that it is going to be a bad one. And it was! We moved out of a living-room with a large window on the garden to the top of the stairs, which had two inside walls. We stayed there until an old colonel who has the ground-floor flat invited us to come in and have some whiskey. It is pleasanter to be with people on such occasions, so we went in, and while he was becoming eloquent on taking bombs lightly, the whole of a big bow window seemed to lift up and bring with it a Niagara of broken glass. I suppose the thick black-out curtains must have stayed the passage of the glass, for only one woman got her head cut and that not badly. We all made for the door in case the house should follow the glass, for it was rocking gently. When it stopped, we went to size up the damage. Most of the other windows, with their frames, were blown in. The blast shattered two doors leading into two passages and then shattered two inside doors in its path. The sitting-room where we had been was in chaos—all the plaster on the floor, furniture blown hither and thither; I suppose we should have been blown, too, if we had stayed there. We could use only torches, for the black-out curtains had come down and anything was a target.

We then went to see what had happened to another house in the same street where my sisters lived. One had been sitting in front of the fire when the door immediately behind her was blown in, but she wasn't touched. All the curtain rods were twisted into serpents, and there was a sea of glass. The odd thing was that it was the inside and not the outside of the house that was devastated. All of us from the two houses had by this time collected in a ground-floor room—among us two young women in helmets and trousers and a young soldier. One group played animal, vegetable, or mineral, while another disputed whether this was a worse raid than they had had at—wherever it was. Then bombs began to fall—north, south, east, west; across the road, up the street. Of course we felt they were all aimed straight at us. Every minute or so there was a thud, so heavy that the whole earth shook. We heard the swish of the bombs—they take a pestiferous time to fall. Now and then the wearers of the tin hats ducked and banged each other's heads with a metallic clang. It is difficult not to duck. Then the room was brilliantly illuminated. An incendiary bomb had fallen in the back garden. One of the tin-hatted girls jumped out of the window and put a bag of sand on it, and it went out at once. They aren't difficult to put out if you aren't afraid of them. There were many more incendiary bombs, all of which were dealt with. In the street a Canadian soldier kicked one, scattering the bits about the street. A piece stuck to his boot, and he had to kick that off. These appalling thuds went on and on. We tried not to look at our watches.

At last dawn came, and we tried to find our beds, which were smothered in plaster. The lights in our house had gone out, and down the stairs of the other house water was dripping. My bed was whole, and after scrubbing half an inch of dust off my face, I slept deeply.

The next day all the devastation appeared. You could hardly see for the dust. The thing was where to begin. Mrs. Powell and I—she is the daily woman—began by lifting large slabs of plaster off the kitchen floor, for we felt we must be able to do something about food. The gas hadn't gone, fortunately. We carried bucket after bucket of mess out into the road, all the time swallowing dust by the peck. People turned up asking for lodging, but we hadn't any with all those wrecked rooms. They ought to invent something better than plaster for ceilings if we are to have the luxury of blitzes. Everybody was worn out but rather glad to be alive and a little proud of having managed the raid successfully. I must say morale was pretty good. You couldn't help feeling tense, but everybody talked and joked as though nothing much were happening. As I said, the noise of shoveling went on all day and is going on now.

I am sorry to say I have just lost all my work owing to further restrictions on paper. It is a bore not to do essential work—I mean like war correspondence or information, which is all there is just now. Wrecked homes are such a commonplace that it seems hardly worth while writing about them.

THE BRITISH DECISION TO OCCUPY SYRIA may seem obvious, but clearly it was not adopted without a very careful weighing of risks. The danger to the whole British position in the Middle East if the Nazis secured full military control of this vital region was plain to the most amateur strategist. But it was also necessary to take into account the possibility that invasion of this French mandate would give Vichy an excuse to become a military member of the Axis and to order its navy into action against the British Mediterranean fleet. General Wavell has a huge area to defend with limited numbers of troops and a limited amount of equipment. It was therefore essential to balance the prospects of rapid success in Syria against the risks of a strong Axis offensive in the western desert. One factor, no doubt fully considered, was the evidence of disaffection among the French soldiers in Syria. Interesting particulars on this subject are given on page 688 by Peter Stevens, who was in Syria not many weeks ago. His article also refutes contentions that Vichy remains in independent control of Syria. General Dentz, he shows, has been little more than a voice for the German representatives and has even been unable to check the Nazi propaganda among the Arabs which was steadily undermining all French authority in the two mandates. There is plenty of evidence that in the past few weeks the Germans have not merely taken control of the main Syrian airports but by one means or another have brought in several thousand soldiers. The latest reports suggest that these men are being hurriedly evacuated, partly because the French troops might refuse to fight side by side with them and partly because of the difficulties of supply and reinforcement.

ALTHOUGH THE VICHY GOVERNMENT HAS reacted to the British invasion of Syria with loud and indignant protests, it now seems improbable that it will forthwith plunge into general war with Britain. This is not because of any tender feelings toward its former ally, for Admiral Darlan has made it clear that Vichy's one desire is to see Britain beaten as quickly as possible. But the hopes of the vast majority of Frenchmen lie in the exactly opposite direction, and even a dictatorship cannot easily carry a country into war without some substantial measure of public support. Another factor tending to restrain Vichy's enthusiasm for an all-out alliance with Hitler is President Roosevelt's plain speaking. There is a fear that collaboration between Vichy and the Axis of a kind which would place Germany in open control of the African colonies might precipitate an American move against Dakar and Martinique. It is probable that Berlin is still anxious to avoid a showdown with the United States and is therefore willing to allow Vichy to continue on the present basis of open economic cooperation with the Axis combined with a limited amount of secret military cooperation. There has again been a persistent series of reports about disagreement between Vichy and General Weygand, but these should be regarded with a grain of salt. The belief that Weygand could be counted upon to take independent action if German demands on France became too insistent has been very useful in encouraging Anglo-American appeasement of Vichy. It may be that the Berlin-Vichy strategists hope that this myth can still be effectively employed.

THE FRENCH PASSENGER LINER WINNIPEG, which was seized by a Dutch naval vessel toward the end of last month, was found to have on board 210 Germans and 76 Austrians who were reported to be bound for Martinique. This statement was hotly denied by the French embassy in Washington, which declared that all passengers with German passports were bound for Latin America, and which implied that they were refugees. We now learn from an American who was in Trinidad the day the Winnipeg was brought in that most of these Germans were young men and believed by the authorities to be under military orders. What their mission in Martinique might be it is easy to guess. They could hardly add any appreciable strength to the garrison of the island, but they could do a skilled job of sabotage on French warships and planes at Fort de France. The extraordinary thing about this affair is the fact that the British authorities in Trinidad have remained completely silent since releasing the first news of the Winnipeg's capture. It seems not to have occurred to them that an attempt to land an organized party of Germans in Martinique is a matter of extraordinary importance, particularly to the United States.

HITLER IS SAID TO HAVE LAUGHED WHEN John Cudahy, former United States Ambassador to Belgium, now correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance, told him that many Americans feared he would carry his aggression to the American continent. The Führer cited the 2,500 miles of open water between Europe and North America as proof of the absurdity of their fears. Hitler also ridiculed the idea that Germany could be an economic menace to the United States. In the course of the interview nothing seems to have been said by either Hitler or Cudahy about South America or Dakar. Mr. Cudahy did not ask, for example, why Germany was pouring shipload after shipload of "tourists" into South America via Lisbon, as was recently reported from first-hand observation by Carl B. Wall in PM. Mr. Wall cites a German, perhaps a little more indiscreet than Hitler, as saying that Germany would rather take over South America than all of England. Our suspicion that the Cudahy "interview" was stage-managed to meet the immediate interests of Nazi propaganda is heightened by the parallel between its content and the orders issued by the official German propaganda agency in Berlin, as revealed by President Roosevelt. The first of those orders, it will be recalled, urged all Nazi agents to stress the idea that Germany had no thought of aggression in the Western Hemisphere.

BATAVIA'S REJECTION OF TOKYO'S DEMANDS has placed the Japanese militarists very much on the spot. The Japanese trade delegation, headed by Kenkichi Yoshizawa, had made sweeping demands for a large share of the island's oil, rubber, tin, and other strategic war materials. After a long period of fruitless negotiation, "final" demands were presented, accompanied by a press barrage that strongly hinted at war if they were rejected. A suspicion that these threats were largely, or wholly, bluff was confirmed when the Dutch authorities stood fast and presented a counter-proposal that gave the Japanese little of what they asked. At first the delegation announced that it had no choice but to break off negotiations. Later, after instructions had apparently been received from Tokyo, it consented to remain, at least temporarily. Meanwhile Tokyo officials have gone into a series of conferences to decide what, if anything, can be done about this unprecedented affront.

JAPAN'S FINAL DECISION WILL DOUBTLESS hinge primarily on the firmness of American policy. The United States is deeply concerned in the outcome of the affair, for the granting of Tokyo's demands would seriously affect our ability to obtain adequate supplies of tin, rubber, and other strategic materials. And it is fairly obvious that Japan wants these materials not only to strengthen its own military preparations but to enable it to transship vital supplies to Germany. Unfortunately, the critical situation in Europe has led American appeasers, and some non-appeasers, to seize this moment to renew the demand that the fleet be shifted from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It is argued that we must at all costs avoid being engaged on two fronts at the same time, and that the Japanese threats are merely a part of Hitler's strategy to keep our fleet tied up in the Pacific.

There is no indication that the Administration has been swayed by this special reasoning. Some units of the fleet may, indeed, have been shifted—Washington no longer gives out information on ship movements—but they probably consist solely of destroyers and other light vessels suitable for patrol duty. The speed with which the British tracked down and sank the Bismarck indicates that there is no need for additional capital ships in the Atlantic. But Tokyo has shown in the past that it keeps close tabs on the position of our battleships. If a half-dozen of our larger vessels were suddenly transferred to the Far Eastern fleet, it is probable that Japan's threat to the Dutch East Indies would be quickly abandoned.

THE OUTCRY AGAINST THE BILL TO DRAFT private property illustrates once again that sauce for the goose is definitely not sauce for the gander. It is true that the original bill was sweeping in character. It would have permitted the President to requisition any private property, upon payment of compensation, if such action was considered necessary in the interest of defense. The President, of course, had no intention of authorizing raids on private homes to pick up aluminum pans or, as was whispered in anti-New Deal quarters, of confiscating all bank accounts over $1,000. Administration leaders merely desired a measure broad enough to meet any contingency. The bill would have given the President roughly the same powers over property as he already possesses over young men under the selective-service law. It paralleled in its scope the provisions of the emergency legislation adopted in Great Britain a little more than a year ago. But it has met with such vigorous opposition—from the same quarters that have been urging the government to crack down on labor—that it will have to be drastically modified before it can be passed. In its modified form it will presumably give the President ample power to take over defense plants in the event of a serious threat to production. The refusal of Congress to put national interests above property interests in the emergency is not likely to sit well with the hundreds of thousands of young men who have given up their jobs and are prepared if necessary to sacrifice their lives in the cause of democracy.

THE DECLINE IN AIRPLANE PRODUCTION from 1,427 in April to approximately 1,350 in May is symptomatic of the lag in all defense production. The decline cannot be attributed to labor difficulties, although some newspapers have tried to make it appear so. There were no strikes in airplane plants during May. Labor disputes may have been the cause of some delay among subcontractors, but there is no evidence that this accounts for the drop in production. The chief difficulty is the lack of planning and coordination. The great Boeing plant at Seattle, for example, is at a standstill because the National Defense Advisory Committee failed last fall to allot the company sufficient aluminum to insure uninterrupted production. Changes of design, some necessary and some not, account for other delays. Since the decline in production figures reflects in part a shift from light to heavy models, it does not necessarily imply retrogression. It is evident, however, that 1,350 planes a month will not go very far toward saving Britain or guarding our own defenses when the Nazi production is nearly three times that figure.

WE HAVE ALWAYS BEEN PRETTY SURE THAT we knew what was behind the Christian Front; our suspicions were fully confirmed by the news of a meeting in Boston at which the Nazi film "Victory in the West" was shown to 600 people. Francis P. Moran, director of the Front in that city, admitted that his purpose was to spread the belief that the Nazis are invincible, and he urged mothers in the audience to write their sons in the army that the film had convinced them that the United States had little chance of beating the Germans. If this effort to undermine army morale is not subversive, that word has no meaning. Father Coughlin's Social Justice and the Brooklyn Tablet were sold at the meeting, and the film was preceded by a long speech in which Moran defended the Nazi conquest of Europe and attacked the British and President Roosevelt. "Under present laws," said the newspaper report, "the showing cannot be stopped because no admission fee was charged." We can't help feeling that if the Christian Front were "red" and "atheist" rather than reactionary and Catholic, a way would be found.

MISUSE OF FRANKING PRIVILEGES HAS BEEN a perennial scandal in Washington. But isolationists appear to have carried the abuse farther than any other group in recent years in their frantic opposition to the government's foreign policy. Certain of them, including Wheeler, Nye, Thorkelson, and Tinkham, are reported to have delivered large quantities of their franked, unaddressed envelopes to organizations like the Christian Front, the No Foreign War Committee, the American Coalition Society, the New York German-American list, and the America First Committee. Franked material under Wheeler's signature has been distributed by Joe McWilliams, leading American pro-Nazi. Since the Government Printing Office will not deliver franked envelopes without a requisition signed by the Senator or Representative whose name appears on the envelopes, the men named above cannot very well disclaim responsibility. The lending or leasing of a Congressional frank is a violation of the spirit if not the letter of the law, and isolationists should be held to account for their acts in the same manner as other persons.

THERE IS NO NEED TO REPORT THE MANY resolutions passed by the fourth annual American Writers' Congress, since by a remarkable coincidence they were practically identical with those approved by numerous other Communist-controlled organizations which follow the "line" from "imperialist" war to "release Earl Browder." We feel, however, that the following letter written to the League of American Writers by the veteran British artist, author, and Socialist, J. F. Horrabin, ought to be placed on record. It was not read at the Congress.

Dear Comrades: I am not entirely devoid of imagination and I did not, as a matter of fact, need to read "For Whom the Bell Tolls" in order to realize just what decent Spaniards must have felt about us British and French people when we covered up our cowardly "non-intervention" policy with high-sounding phrases. Now I don't even have to use my imagination any more to find out just how Spaniards felt—I know in my own person. Here in London, with the bombs dropping—the same make of bombs as smashed up Madrid—it is really thrilling to learn from your manifesto that in America there are writers and artists whose slogan is still "non-intervention," and whose main dread, apparently, is that their stories, poems, plays, essays, and books might be "abridged."

Thank you, dear comrades, for a good belly-laugh in a grim world; and may the Lord have mercy on your prim, little, self-preserving, non-intervening souls.

✱

THE "BUY SOMETHING BRITISH" MOVEMENT, which is carrying on a campaign in New York and elsewhere, should attract the support not only of advocates of all-out aid to Britain but of those isolationists who sincerely want Hitler beaten so long as it doesn't mean sticking out our own necks. For no one can assert that in buying British goods we are in any way exceeding our neutral rights. In Britain today manufacture for export is considered second only in importance to production of weapons and munitions. Every boatload of goods that can be sold abroad provides the means for the import of essential foodstuffs and war materials. Although the Lease-Lend Act relieved Britain of its most pressing financial anxieties in this country, it still needs to raise large sums in dollars from its own resources. It has almost exhausted its stocks of gold, and as rapidly as market conditions permit, it is realizing American securities and direct investments commandeered from British citizens. Only two weeks ago the shares of the American Viscose Company, the largest producer of artificial silk, wholly built up by British capital, were offered to the American public. Every dollar realized will stay in this country to pay for American goods exported to Britain, as will every dollar raised by the sale of British goods. Thus in "buying British" we are promoting reciprocal trade and helping ourselves.

Murray vs. Stalin

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S action in ordering the Army to take over the North American Aviation Company's plant at Inglewood, California, is a step which will be viewed with equanimity by only three groups—extreme reactionaries, Nazis, and the Communist Party. The reactionaries want to see labor crushed; the motivation of the Communist Party, which is filling the air with charges of betrayal, is more complicated. It wishes to disrupt the defense program, and its strategy is to discredit the Administration and the present leadership of the C. I. O. To gain these ends it is quite ready to provoke anti-strike legislation and other repressive measures—which would provide it with ammunition against the Administration and the C. I. O. leadership and a new basis for recruiting strength among workers as politically naive as those in Inglewood obviously are.

In all three of the West Coast strikes, involving nearly 50,000 workers in aviation, shipbuilding, and lumber, the workers are seeking redress of legitimate grievances; and the great majority of the workers involved are undoubtedly innocent of anything resembling a subversive motive. But it has become very clear that the aviation and lumber strikes are under Communist direction, that the course followed has been motivated by the desire to foment trouble rather than to secure benefits for labor, and that the leaders of these strikes have not hesitated to misrepresent to the rank and file the position of the National Mediation Board and of the national leadership of the C. I. O.

The walkout of 11,000 men at the North American Aviation Company was called, despite a solemn promise to defer strike action, after the Mediation Board had had only two days in which to work out a formula for a very difficult and confused situation. A clear indication of irresponsibility or worse in the woodworkers' strike of the Puget Sound area lies in the fact that a dispute in the Columbia Basin region involving the very same grievances was adjusted by the Mediation Board without a walkout. The settlement worked out by the board for both areas included a wage increase which brings the minimum to 75 cents an hour, vacations with pay, and a "union-maintenance" shop. All present employees must be union members as a condition of employment, while new employees will be "encouraged" to join. This is an excellent settlement. It was found acceptable by the Columbia Basin group and recommended by Philip Murray, but it was branded a scheme to "bulldoze the workers" by O. M. Orton of the International Woodworkers.

The machinists' (A. F. of L.) and steel workers' (C. I. O.) locals conducting the shipyard strike are said to be under the influence of the Maritime Federation, which is controlled by Harry Bridges. In this case a contest for power between the Bridges organization and the national leadership of the machinists' union seems to be one major element in the difficulty. Another is the refusal of a Bethlehem Steel subsidiary to sign the agreement accepted by its competitors.

The strikes have created a delicate and dangerous situation. The movement toward drastic anti-labor legislation has already begun. But such legislation would only play into the hands of those elements which are prepared to capitalize on the resulting discontent. The principal hope lies in the ability of labor's top leadership to put its own house in order. Philip Murray's letter addressed to the woodworkers' locals over the head of Orton and recommending prompt acceptance of the National Mediation Board's terms, the stout condemnation of all three strikes by the Labor Advisory Council of the OPM, and the suspension by Richard Frankenstein, head of the United Automobile Workers, of the leaders responsible for the walkout at Inglewood, are the first steps in that direction.

The task of heading off anti-labor laws and other repressive measures rests largely with Murray. John L. Lewis could help. He could retrieve much of his lost prestige by repudiating the use of his name by the Communist factions in the various unions involved and by throwing his support to Murray, whose devotion to labor's interests is beyond suspicion. We understand that Lewis is being strongly urged to do just that, and Washington observers say that there is a better than even chance that he will do so. Meanwhile the three strikes have at least served to bring into the open the real objectives of the Communists, whose efficiency as organizers is more than offset by their efficiency as wreckers.

Charles Evans Hughes

THE NATION, which opposed the confirmation of Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice of the United States, extends its best wishes to him on his retirement. The balance sheet of his accomplishments, struck at the close of an extraordinarily long and variegated career, does him honor. It is a pleasure to admit that though he did not fully grasp the needs of a changing time, as Chief Justice he amply refuted our fear that he would bring to the office the outlook of the typical corporation lawyer. The period of his life spent in private practice can now be seen as the comparatively short interlude it was, and there is much in his record which deserves gratefully to be remembered. Less spectacular, if more fruitful, than his brilliant work as a young man in the New York gas-monopoly and Armstrong insurance investigations was his successful fight as Governor of New York to save the resources of the St. Lawrence from the aluminum and power trusts. If his opposition to the recognition of Russia marks a blind spot in his service as Secretary of State, his work at the Washington conference of 1921 helps to weight the other side of the scales.

As a jurist, Charles Evans Hughes will be best remembered as a friend of civil liberties and the rights of minorities, particularly that minority which has most needed protection, the Negro. His decisions during his first term on the bench, though they do not rank with those of the Olympian Holmes, showed more knowledge of the business world and sometimes greater insight than those of the philosopher from Massachusetts. There are a number of cases involving problems of business regulation and at least one in the field of Southern circumvention of peonage laws in which Hughes stirs admiration where Holmes evokes indulgence. This is achievement enough for any judge.

Ambition drives men to the sources of power, but posterity is perverse and recalls their relations with the lowly. Hughes stood with Holmes in the forgotten dissent against the legal lynching in the Frank case in Georgia. He helped free Herndon and the Scottsboro boys. It was not until he became Chief Justice that majority opinion on the court accorded civil liberties the same protection under the Fourteenth Amendment it had so long accorded property rights. This is a proud record for the man The Nation, along with its brilliant Washington correspondent, Paul Y. Anderson, and Senators Borah and Norris, tagged a Wall Street lawyer in 1930.

It may be some years before the full facts are known as to the part played by Hughes in the Supreme Court fight, and attempts to judge it can be but tentative. There would have been no court fight if Hughes and Roberts had held to the conception of the economic emergency laid down in the Appalachian coal case and to the broad interpretation of government power to deal with that emergency in the Nebbia milk case. Their failure to apply the same wise standards to the legislation of the New Deal period made it necessary for the President to fight or surrender. He chose to fight. Whether the method he picked was the right one or not need not concern us at this moment, because it failed. Hughes's letter to Senator Wheeler on the work of the court and the condition of his docket refuted the President's claim that the court needed to be enlarged because it was overworked. What it needed was a change in personnel because its majority was behind the times.

The Chief Justice earned esteem by realizing that it was not sufficient merely to block the court plan. The principal reforms of the New Deal were approved before vacancies permitted the President to name a majority. The constitutional revolution of 1937 reversed doctrines which had grown up since the nineties and brought a return to older and broader interpretations. Hughes had the acumen to recognize the inevitable, and that is the larger part of statesmanship.

Wars and Rumors of Peace

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE two weeks since the President's speech proclaiming an unlimited emergency have been queer weeks. Things have happened which encouraged hope of strong consistent action. Other things have failed to happen which should have—giving rise to a new wave of doubts and to new rumors of peace. The peace talk has been a symptom of something even more sinister than Nazi propaganda at work, though it obviously was encouraged from Nazi sources, as the President bluntly charged. But its wild-fire spread was the result of an underlying pessimism which was evident before Mr. Roosevelt spoke and has persisted since, a pessimism based on growing doubt of the capacity of the British command—in Whitehall and on the fronts—to cope with the magnificently organized ruthlessness of the Germans. This doubt is not the creation of Nazi propaganda; it is the natural child of defeats and setbacks. The loss of Crete was more than a loss in itself, and more than a direct threat to the eastern Mediterranean bases of the British fleet. It was widely accepted as a new proof of Hitler's superior planning, of the shrewd daring with which his aggressions are carried through, of the degree to which the British were being out-maneuvered, outwitted, outnumbered, and surprised on their own grounds. The reaction was vigorous. In England it expressed itself in open and healthy criticism, and a full debate in Commons on the situation in the Middle East is promised. But the Nazi successes were also responsible for the wild rumors of a peace of capitulation that have played so handsomely into the plans of the enemies of democracy on both sides of the Atlantic.

Doubt cannot be stilled by pronouncements; and some of the official statements of recent days have only served to feed it. The war-aims talk of Anthony Eden was probably designed to buttress the fine effect of the President's speech by contributing content and aim to his analysis of the struggle. Its actual effect was quite the contrary. In the context of today's events the speech simply didn't make sense. Without quite knowing why, the hearer inevitably found himself harboring misgivings about a government whose Foreign Secretary offered nothing but lofty generalities to a civilization in mortal throes. It was the smooth, high-minded, unrealistic sort of talk that characterized the statements of British officials throughout the years of fencing and evasion that led to war. It provided no peace aims that a hungry Europe—or an anxious America—could get its teeth into. And so it did more harm than good.

The overwhelming vote against a negotiated peace registered at the British Labor Party convention in London was the most heartening event of the two weeks. It showed that no worm of defeatism has crept into the heart of Britain's workers and that they still consider the war against international fascism their own struggle. But the peace-aims resolution was disappointing. The Labor Party should have seized the opportunity to establish a clear and solid position in contradistinction to the vaporous suggestions of Mr. Eden. Instead, it wrapped up a collection of generous hopes in socialist language and let the matter go at that. In a time of desperate crisis it is difficult to formulate the terms on which peace can be restored and then organized; but this task is none the less pressing, if only to put a moral weapon into the hands of the anti-fascist forces of the world. Today all the concrete plans and promises are on the side of tyranny, and they comprise one of its most powerful instruments of penetration.

As a tonic for public confidence Ambassador Winant's visit to this country was hardly more effective. He reported to the President and to various department heads, but he made no public statement. This was unfortunate. Whatever specific private information he may have had for the government, there was much he could have told the people as a whole. He should have been authorized to speak openly about the general situation. Instead, his opinions trickled out in the form of rather pessimistic and qualified fragments often quoted at second hand, and the air of official secrecy which closed around his visit encouraged rather than helped to check defeatist rumors.

But even the best statements sound hollow unless they are backed by the only argument that can make them effective—vigorous and determined action. The movement of British and Free French forces into Syria has been almost as stimulating as a victory. Following the British success in checkmating Nazi moves in Iraq, the drive in Syria proves that it is not too late even now to seize the initiative from Hitler. That the effort was unduly delayed is not to be denied; Mr. Stevens's article on page 688 exposes Britain's all-but-fatal procrastination in this crucial region. But the energetic offensive now in progress has changed the situation in the eastern Mediterranean—and in men's minds as well.

In the end American confidence can be restored only by proofs of vigor in Washington. What is needed is the quality official Washington most desperately lacks—a keen, imaginative, fighting spirit. The country feels that lack; and it realizes that the President cannot inject it into the veins of bureaucrats merely by talking about it. Men must be found who can cut through obstacles to get things done quickly, and who are willing to face the realities behind smooth appearances. No wonder the people feel uneasy. How long are solemn warnings to take the place of firm action? How long are Nazi agents to remain in America disguised as diplomats? How long are we going to send our enemies supplies of war materials to be used against our friends—and ultimately against ourselves? When do we intend to change the neutrality law to permit the use of American ships for carrying goods to Britain? When are we going to begin really to protect the goods we send?

Doubt is no crime. It is a sensible reaction to slackness and stupidity. It can be wiped out only by evidence of realism and courage in high places.

Snub-and-Sell Diplomacy

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 8

VICHY need not think it can collaborate with Hitler unscathed. I hope I am revealing no military secrets when I predict that after the Nazis have occupied Dakar, Mr. Hull will take note in the strongest terms of the grave allegations arising and, should a new situation on full inquiry be disclosed, resume freedom to act accordingly. "Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration. . . ." Beneath the imperturbable mask of protocol beat the hearts of tigers, and I consider it a duty to report a growing suspicion here that American diplomacy has already delivered a crushing blow to Vichy. On Friday M. Henry-Haye, the French Ambassador, asked Mr. Hull for an interview. M. Henry-Haye was kept waiting. M. Henry-Haye, after a wait, was informed that unfortunately the Secretary of State was very busy. The suspicion spread that M. Henry-Haye, as evidence of this government's displeasure, had been snubbed. The clever part of this, if I remember my Grotius, is that a snub, even the snub intentional, is not a casus belli. The sly old foxes of the State Department had again taken measures short of war.

The clumsy amateurs in Congress do not understand that a war of blitzsnub as waged by the State Department requires the utmost secrecy, lest the element of surprise be eliminated. The complex questions of national policy which lead our State Department to seize the western end of M. Henry-Haye before the breathless Nazis have had time to consolidate their hold on the eastern end of the Mediterranean cannot be debated on the Hill.

Mr. Hull sent an emissary to the House Rules Committee on Wednesday to block passage of the Gillette-Coffee resolution to investigate the leak—a mild word for it—of American supplies to the Axis. The State Department seems to be cleverer at office politics than at international, and I am sorry to report that its spokesman on this occasion was Dean Acheson, whom the President put into the department recently to leaven the sodden mass of Breckinridge Longs. Though Mr. Acheson is no appeaser and is not in favor of providing the Axis with oil or other war supplies, he turned up neatly garroted in the old school tie. The department's point of view, as he presents it, seems somewhat lacking in clarity. It appears to be that disclosure of the facts would be unwise; that the facts are already disclosed in Department of Commerce reports on imports and exports; that exports to countries friendly to the Axis are being carefully watched; that of course, although they are being carefully watched, there is no way of being sure supplies are not being forwarded to the Axis; that one must be careful in shutting off supplies to countries friendly to the Axis because that would make them friendly to the Axis. If this still leaves you a trifle confused, remember that in diplomacy there are no blacks and whites—just fog.

In civil life a progressive and intelligent specimen of the corporation lawyer, Mr. Acheson seems something of a radical in the State Department. Unfortunately in this case he has let the old crowd in the department maneuver him into a position where he will take the rap for them. In a search for motives proponents of the resolution point to the fact that last year Mr. Acheson appeared before the Supreme Court as counsel for the Ethyl Corporation. Ethyl is jointly owned by the du Ponts and Standard Oil of New Jersey. Neither can afford to have this resolution approved. Nor can those in the State Department who act as their international errand boys. I am prepared to vouch for Mr. Acheson's innocence and high state of subjective purity, but I still think it was improper for him to appear before the Rules Committee in opposition to a measure that would hurt important clients he had served in private life. The result will be to make him the lightning rod for less honorable elements in the department. I wish they handled our national affairs as skilfully as their own.

The Rules Committee held an executive session, but some of the facts presented there leaked to the press, as they should have. The figures on shipments to Japan are an old story; Brigadier General Russell L. Maxwell, administrator of export control, testified recently that we sent Japan 157,534,350 gallons of petroleum from July 1, 1940, to March 15, 1941, although oil was "embargoed" on July 31, 1940. The Rules Committee learned that Japan is not the only possible channel through which supplies are going to the Axis and that oil is not the only war material being sent them. Toluene is one of the constituents of TNT. We sent no toluene to Spain in 1939. We shipped 1,574,000 pounds to that country in 1940. Tinplate and taggers' tin have many military uses. Shipments to Spain rose from 6,105,000 pounds in 1939 to 20,436,000 pounds in 1940. Shipments to Portugal rose from 1,911,000 pounds in 1938 to 34,976,000 pounds in 1940. The State Department thinks this is for tinning sardines. I think we ought to make sure it isn't for tinning tools and plane parts for the Germans.

Cotton linters and pulp can be used for stuffing mattresses. They can also be used for explosives. Spanish imports of American cotton linters and pulp last year amounted to 2,337,000 pounds; there were none the year before. Spanish imports of lubricating greases rose from 577,000 pounds in 1938 to 3,931,000 pounds in 1940. Both the State Department and the British Ministry of Economic Warfare have explained that Spanish imports of petroleum have been sharply restricted to Spanish domestic needs. But Spain's imports of petroleum from this country rose from 2,571,000 forty-two-gallon barrels in 1938 to 4,456,000 barrels in 1940. The committee's attention was also called to the sensational rise in the shipments of American lard to Finland. We sent Finland 122,000 pounds in 1938, 732,000 pounds in 1939, 17,602,000 pounds in 1940. Finland today is in the German economic orbit.

For all its eulogies of democracy the State Department has always had an aristocratic professional dislike of democratic processes. This inquiry is feared (1) because it might interfere with the possibility of appeasing the Japanese, (2) because it would reveal the powerful influence of oil and other interests in the department, and (3) because it would thereby hurt the department's behind-the-scenes fight to control the long-postponed establishment of a Ministry of Economic Warfare. The only safe place for that ministry is in the Treasury. The State Department would sabotage economic warfare as it has the "oil embargo."

Can Vichy Hold Syria?

BY PETER STEVENS

AT THE eleventh hour the British have marched into Syria in an effort to obtain control of a region which, from the dawn of history, has been the strategic key to the Middle East. As long ago as early April, when I was in Beirut, I could see that a showdown between Britain and the Vichy government was approaching. The Luftwaffe had not yet moved in, but the country was swarming with Nazi agents, and the administration headed by General Dentz was wholly subservient to the Axis. Since then the Germans have occupied the airports and brought in ground crews and perhaps some soldiers. But the main defense of Syria still depends on the French, and the success of the comparatively small forces which General Wavell can spare for this operation may well turn on the extent to which Vichy can count on the loyalty of a handful of French civil servants and officers.

The Germans are certain to do everything possible to maintain a grip on Syria, which with its good north and south communications offers a route to Suez far easier than the western desert. But they have not yet solved the problem of transporting large numbers of men and their equipment to the battleground. Unless they go through Turkey, how can they get to Syria? The British island of Cyprus lies between the German army in Crete and the Syrian coast. The strength of Cyprus is the subject of many conflicting rumors. Some say Chamberlain made a secret agreement with Mussolini in 1936 and 1937 not to modernize the fortifications of Cyprus. Some say it has been strengthened with new guns and planes since last autumn. To try to pass Cyprus and capture Syria from the air, or with sea-borne forces protected from the British ships based on Cyprus by an air escort, would be highly dangerous. It will not be surprising, therefore, if the Germans attempt to counter the British move into Syria by an attack on Cyprus after the Crete pattern. But the capture of this island could not be fully exploited if meanwhile General Wilson had secured full control in Syria. The vigor and extent of French resistance becomes, therefore, of vital importance.

A handful of French officials backed by a small military garrison sit on the safety-valve in Syria holding down a large French-hating Arab population. Vichy has in Syria not over 50,000 troops, 40,000 of them Senegalese blacks from Africa. There is one battalion of the Foreign Legion. This is a totally inadequate force to halt a determined invasion from any quarter. In the harbors, mainly in Beirut and Latakia, are three or four destroyers, one or two submarines, and a few small patrol boats.

Beirut, seat of the French government for both Syria and Lebanon, is a hotbed of petty intrigue and dissension. The headquarters of the Vichy-Italian-German group is the grotesquely ugly new Hotel Normandie, a colonial Frenchman's dream of a modernistic palace. The few Britishers, the pro-British French, and the Americans gather at the Hotel St. George on the waterfront. Between them the war is conducted in miniature, with plots and threats. The night that Keren fell to the British and Free French forces a daring group of Americans invaded the Normandie and drank loud toasts to the Italian defeats until the police discreetly suggested it would be well for them to stay in their own hotel.

The French military is split into two antagonistic camps. One is anti-German and pro-British, almost de Gaulist and anti-Vichy. The other is anti-British and pro-Pétain, with even a few pro-Germans. Roughly it may be said that majors, colonels, and higher-ranking officers form the second group, while the junior officers are pro-British almost to a man. Most of the men in the Foreign Legion are anti-Nazis and many are refugees from Germany. Everyone, of course, is anti-Italian.

A captain said to me, "We shall get orders from Vichy to oppose the British when they come in. My old colonel would execute them in good faith, but what if I and my lieutenants ordered our Senegalese to throw down their arms and surrender? They would gladly obey. These blacks know that Hitler called them half-apes. No, I think our army might dissolve before a British invasion and leave Fougère and his colonels to hold the fort for Laval and Hitler and Darlan."

Vichy can depend, however, on its naval forces, for the navy is bitter over Oran and Dakar and eager for revenge. At least one of the destroyers at Beirut in April was a veteran of both battles, and its officers were thoroughly pro-German.

An old French colonel, a shining exception to my rule-of-thumb categories, a veteran of both Verdun and the Maginot break-through, said rather bitterly, "Why don't the damned British come? They are always late. If they lose this war, it's nothing but too much cricket. Why, man, a brass band and four Tommies could have taken Syria last summer, unless they had been smothered to death under the flowers we'd have thrown at 'em." He bolted his drink and added, "Tell 'em down in Jerusalem that it's growing harder every day."

It is growing harder every day because the Germans and Italians have been far from idle. The Armistice Commission is busy everywhere, promising everything to each Arab group, fomenting trouble, and spending money like water. Baron von Rosen, German adviser to the Italian Armistice Commission, is frequently in the news. Behind him, and far more ruthless and more sinister, is Baron von Hentig. Both are working like beavers at Beirut and out among the Arabs. Hentig, an archaeologist, is an Arab expert and an intriguer of long experience. As a young man he went to Afghanistan in the last war and caused Britain no end of trouble on the Northwest Frontier.

General Dentz, the French High Commissioner for Syria and Lebanon, said to an American friend of mine, "As long as these Boches, Hentig and Rosen, are here I am really not High Commissioner at all. They appear humble and helpful and courteous, but every suggestion of theirs that I turn down comes through a few days later as orders from Darlan. Hentig tells Ribbentrop, Ribbentrop tells Abetz, and Abetz gives the order to Darlan, who gives it to me. I can save time by obeying my bosses here."

As relations between the Germans and the Vichy government become closer and closer, there must come a day of reckoning for the Germans who have subsidized anti-French Arabs. It will be difficult for Otto Abetz to promise Darlan the integrity of the French Empire while reports of Hentig's and Rosen's backing of the Nationalists in Syria continue to come in from General Dentz. And sooner or later even Arab Nationalists will come to realize that not each and every group of them can be the leader of a vast independent Arab empire while at the same time France maintains its empire on a German guaranty. Almost anybody can figure out after a while that two governments, like two objects, cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Either Abetz in Paris or Rosen and Hentig in Syria will have to begin to pull in their horns before long.

The chief Nationalist organization, the Shukri Koualty Party, is openly in the pay of the Germans. On March 24 it issued an interesting manifesto which said in essence: "Frenchmen, get out of our country. We never asked you to come here. You are defeated and discredited. You made this war, not we, and yet we are hungry as a result. Get out and allow us to eat our own food." Fundamentally this is true. Syria lives largely on imported rice and exported wheat. With the fall of France rice imports stopped, and the French fixed such a low price for wheat that most of it was smuggled out of the country and traded for Turkish money, which the Arabs are hoarding. On the long, almost uninhabited Turkish border the French are helpless to stop the smuggling. As a result many Arabs are hungry—and angry.

All during March and April street fighting was going on between French and Arabs in Aleppo, Homs, and Damascus. Six or eight dead were reported every day, and there were rumors of many more. Tanks finally had to be sent out to quell the Nationalists.

Wheat and rice are not the only shortages. All sorts of small manufactured articles are missing or terribly expensive. Gasoline and coal are rationed in such small quantities that few automobiles can be run at all, and the hotels furnish no hot water except in jugs once a day for shaving. A taxi is allowed less than ten gallons of gasoline a month. I was able to motor about Syria by obtaining gasoline from Palestine on a special British export permit.

Formerly the pipe line from the Kirkuk oil fields split at Haditha, and half went to Syria and half to the British refineries at Haifa. The French built no refineries in Syria but took the crude by tanker to France to be refined. After the armistice the British were able to cut off the Syrian supply by the simple process of turning a valve in Iraq. The French then built a small one-still refinery in Tripoli and refined the little oil they had on hand. When that is gone, there will be no more.

In the south of Lebanon a small pro-English Arab party persists. It took a lot of French misgovernment and stupidity to drive these Arabs to the point of becoming pro-British. They call themselves Chah Bander after their leader, who was assassinated last year by a Koualty man from the north. They are probably subsidized by the British; at any rate they are directed by a small independent Arab Office established in Jerusalem by the British army and headed by a very clever young man named Ogden, who was formerly consul in Damascus.

The French in Syria have been so corrupt and so selfish that it is difficult to feel very sorry for them in their plight. Scandal after scandal has occurred. Typical of these is the salt monopoly given to a Stavisky type of politician named Tallec, who destroyed all the Arabs' equipment for making their own salt from sea water and drove the price of salt to astronomical heights. Upon investigation it was discovered that not a penny had come into the treasuries of the two mandated republics and that all the profits had been split between Tallec and a group of ministers and political bosses in Paris.

In the struggle that has now begun Germany holds many of the best cards. General Fougère, commanding all troops in Syria, is a lifelong Anglophobe; Rosen and Hentig have worked long and well. But the British are on the spot, while the huge resources in men and material which Germany commands in the eastern Mediterranean are still some hundreds of miles away. The British have other assets in the proximity of their Palestine bases and their command of plentiful oil supplies, but the decisive factor may prove to be the attitude of the young French officers.

Anything can now happen—a great German victory and a break-through to the Persian Gulf, to Abadan and oil, to Suez, and even to India; or a new Marne, from which Germany, drunk with success, might not recover.

JAIRMANY CALLING-JAIRMANY CALLING-

The Liberals' War

BY STANLEY HIGH

POLITICS has never more notably justified its reputation as the maker of strange bedfellows than in the current fight against all-out aid to Britain. The brunt of that battle is being borne by an inorganic but none the less effective alliance between radicals and reactionaries, liberals and conservatives—a left-right coalition. It is the first joint job of its kind in our history.

Thus, shoulder to shoulder, stand the Chicago Tribune and the Daily Worker, the United States Chamber of Commerce and the American Youth Congress, the National Economy League and the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, Mrs. Albert Dilling and Robert M. Hutchins, Father Coughlin and the La Follettes. When Norman Thomas came to Washington to testify before a Senate committee, he was taken in tow by Alice Roosevelt Longworth. On the original list of sponsors of the America First Committee the name of Henry Ford appeared only two places removed from that of Kathryn Lewis, the daughter of John L. Lewis.

What these normally antithetical persons agree on, in effect, is this: that of all the possible evils that could befall us war is the worst. They mean, of course, this particular war. Whatever happens to Britain and however powerful and filled with blood-lust Hitler is due to be after it happens, they are for peace now. They are for peace, not primarily in order that we may have time to prepare, but because they are frightened. They are afraid of a war, not because they think we would lose it, but because of what fighting it, win or lose, would do to us.

The prospects which they see ahead of us are in line with the conflicting ideological settings from which they spring. To those of leftist-liberal persuasion, democracy would not stand the strain of war; to their reactionary colleagues, it would stand the strain too well. To the former, it would wipe out the social gains of recent years; to the others, it would too indiscriminately extend them. Prepare, says Norman Thomas, for a capitalist-imperialist dictator; look out, says Colonel McCormick, for Ernest Bevin. It is plain that the two groups who reach these contradictory conclusions cannot both be right. One or the other of them should know better. As between the two views, it seems to me that the reactionary makes far more sense. In fact, the reactionaries appear to be better caught up with their history and to have read the signs of the times with more intelligence than the leftist-liberals who are lined up with them.

That pacifism should have such powerful conservative support is in itself an indication of how times have changed. The assumption that big business was largely responsible for the last war and that, given half an international crisis, it would go hell-bent for another has been for twenty years one of American liberalism's most prized clichés. It is still prized, despite the Cliveden set, Manufacturer Neville Chamberlain's Munich, Henry Ford, General Hugh Johnson, General Robert E. Wood, and a host of other militant conservatives who in this particular crisis are unmistakably pacifist. This pacifism of theirs is firmly rooted in self-interest. Its growth, however, is not a result of the knowledge that the profits in the next war are sure to be more drastically curtailed than they were in the last one. It is not immediately related to profits at all or to fear of the consequences of over-expansion. The fear on which it is nourished is a matter of tendencies, or trends. And these trends are not hypothetical. Business, particularly big business, has been actually experiencing them ever since March 4, 1933.

Since that date government, which was once the convenience if not the servant of big business, has increasingly become its master. This has not come to pass as a result of one of those periodic and therefore generally superficial shifts in government emphasis from which, in due time, a shift back can be expected. It has been accomplished by the deliberate elevation to a place of decisive political power of that vast company of our citizens who in a more class-conscious country would be called the proletariat. Thus, what we have gone through, as the reactionaries size it up, is something that approximates a revolution. They do not believe that we are all the way through it. They cling to the hope that it can be stopped at about where it is now and eventually, perhaps, even pushed back a little. That is why they are for peace at almost any price. They know that in a war "big government" inevitably gets bigger. They particularly do not want this big government to get bigger, for the bigger it gets the more potent will grow the forces behind it and the more unlikely will be any reversal of the trend of the times.

Norman Thomas, Robert M. Hutchins, the La Follettes, and a great many other liberals of various stripe make, by implication, an exactly contrary appraisal of what has happened and the power behind it. They are not convinced that the legislation of recent years has come to stay, that the trend behind it is permanent, or that the people behind the trend can be counted on. A war, they say, is all that is needed to turn back the clock and send these newly articulate voters scurrying back to where they came from. "If we go to war," said Mr. Hutchins in a radio address, "we cast away our opportunity and cancel our gains. For a generation, perhaps for a hundred years, we shall not be able to struggle back to where we were. In fact, the changes that total war will bring may mean that we shall never be able to struggle back. Education will cease. The effort to establish a democratic community will stop. We shall think no more of justice, the moral order, and the supremacy of human rights. We shall have hope no longer."

The facts do not support Mr. Hutchins. The facts support the reactionaries. It is a notable phenomenon of recent crises that their chief beneficiaries have not been the "Mr. Bigs" but the "little fellows." From all outward appearances the United States was never freer from crises than during the regimes of Harding and Coolidge and into the first year of Hoover. The high spots of that period, in terms of Mr. Hutchins's humanitarian values, were Teapot Dome, the jazz age, prohibition, the Ku Klux Klan, Al Capone, Daddy Browning, and the bull market. Things of liberal moment began to happen when that world blew up—with the market crash. Since 1930 the United States has had more crises than in any other decade since the sixties—and has got more done of social significance. This is not to say that a holocaust is an essential prerequisite to progress. It is to say, rather, that the "little fellow" is better placed today than he ever was before to turn the aftermath of a holocaust to his own account.

In the United States the trend toward that situation got under way as far back as Bryan and the first Roosevelt's revolt against McKinleyism. Slowly but steadily ever since, the more or less underprivileged classes of our citizens have grown aware of the economic possibilities of political power and more familiar with the instruments and technique of politics. The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 was their first major achievement. He was elected not by a Democratic but by a class landslide. Most of what has been accomplished since has been designed to meet the needs and consolidate the power of the members of that class, who have won two more Presidential elections. Anyone who thinks that a war now would frighten that bloc away from its objectives has failed to note how long it has been on the way or how far it has come in the last eight years.

Moreover, the facts about the present war crisis just as plainly confirm the fears of the isolationist reactionaries, who are distressed at the prospect of too much democracy, and controvert the isolationist liberals, who are distressed at the prospect of too little. Far more than most, this is to date a little people's war. In every country they have suffered first and most. Particularly in England they have lost their lives and their small possessions. And all the signs and portents indicate that their sufferings, far from shaking their morale, have only increased it.

This, I think, is not chiefly because of their innate heroism. It is because long before devastation began to drop from the clouds these people were already acutely aware of what the war was all about. They are now taking it on the chin as the lesser of two evil alternatives. As between bombing and the tyranny of the evil agency behind the bombs, they have chosen to be bombed.

In the many pre-war efforts to placate Hitler, not one of any significance could have been called a little people's movement. On the contrary, appeasement was a policy pursued most energetically by those at the opposite end of the social and economic scale. One of the first great appeasers was Fritz Thyssen, assisted by other German big shots. He was joined—to their country's ruin—by the steel families of France. Appeasement in England was supported by Neville Chamberlain, the big business man, and behind him was the influence of those who are sometimes described as the Cliveden set. British labor—except, at a late date, the Communist minority—was all the time implacably anti-totalitarian. Stiffening the back of the British government, which involved the ousting of Chamberlain and the elevation of Winston Churchill, was almost wholly the work of middle-class and working-class opinion. And it is the continued and unchanged force of that opinion which has prevented the rise in England of any movement toward a negotiated peace.

It is a further mark of the ascendancy of this opinion that British democracy, in the midst of the war, continues to flourish. And there is every indication that, if Britain wins, the British working classes—as Britain's reactionaries shrewdly foresaw—will be the chief gainers. Their gains will begin with the modern housing projects with which London's bombed-out East End will be rebuilt. They will probably include a democratic revamping of the British school system and a similar overhauling of the country's vast landed estates. There will be no lack of other measures. Meanwhile, next to Churchill, who, though an imperialist, is no coddler of the aristocracy, the British man of the hour is Ernest Bevin, a labor leader. That Mr. Roosevelt senses what is in the wind is indicated by his dispatch to Britain of Messrs. Winant and Cohen, who are as unversed in diplomacy and military matters as they are schooled in social reform.

It is possible, of course, that when peace comes events will get out of hand as they did under Kerensky in Russia. In that case the worst that the far right looks for from the war will probably materialize. But if, on the other hand, the Roosevelt-Bevin point of view prevails, what we shall get will probably be only more of what, since 1933, we have been getting. That, as things stand today, is not a pleasant prospect for the reactionaries. But by the war's end it may be so much more pleasing than its alternative that it will be hailed with relief.

Meanwhile it would profit those liberals who are pacifist because of their liberalism to take a look around. A good many things may go to pot before the war and after it. But, given Hitler's defeat, there is very little present prospect that the objectives they pursue will be among them. Anyone who believes that in the event of a democratic victory democracy will be the loser has completely lost sight of the power which the democratic masses have accumulated, of their increased skill in the use of that power, and of the degree to which, using it, they forced the present showdown between democracy and totalitarianism.

Muscle Shoals Land Racket

BY ALDEN STEVENS

"HAVE you got $750? Do you want to turn it into $4,400 in three years—or less? Look at the profit you can make by buying land at Muscle Shoals." Sales talk of this kind is being heard again; people are again being offered the chance to become millionaires by the simple method of speculating in land. The people who will work in defense-industry plants must have houses to live in near the factories that are going up. These houses have to be built on land. So buy yourself a piece of land and hold it for a couple of years, and it will make you rich.

Land speculation is going on wherever there is a defense boom. Soaring rents mean higher land values, and rents have doubled and tripled in Norfolk, San Diego, Starke, Florida, and many other towns. The farms around one new powder plant have been turned into residential subdivisions; near another a real-estate man has bought an old cemetery and sold off twenty-foot building lots. There are many places besides Muscle Shoals where money can be made in that way, but Muscle Shoals offers Exceptional Opportunities.

It seemed to offer Exceptional Opportunities once before, toward the close of the last war, but the war was over before the government got around to producing nitrates with the power generated at Wilson Dam, and the opportunities didn't materialize. Three small cities are clustered near Wilson Dam: Florence, which T. S. Stribling writes about; Tuscumbia, where Helen Keller was born; and Sheffield, where most of the trains stop. These places are almost contiguous and are called by their inhabitants the "Tri-cities." They are all typical Alabama towns. But hooked on to one side of Sheffield is Muscle Shoals, and that is not at all typical.

Wide avenues run straight in Muscle Shoals and are crossed by wide streets with sidewalks and fireplugs and fine lamp posts. Handsome street signs proclaim the names of the broad avenues—Wilson Boulevard, Washington Avenue, Michigan Boulevard, Broadway. There is a City Hall, compact and neat. There are a couple of real-estate offices, a few scattered houses, and some miscellaneous other buildings. The rest of Muscle Shoals is the ghost of a realtor's dream. Grass really does grow in the streets here, and in the middle of the blocks too.

Now Muscle Shoals contemplates another boom. At the City Hall they are working nights recording taxes paid up by property owners who had let them slide for ten, fifteen, or twenty years. This boom isn't going to fizzle out, they think. One local real-estate man, between hurried dashes to New York, nodded his head prophetically and said, "It's sure going to hit us this time." Real-estate men are pushing lots as if they were some new kind of kitchen gadget. Do you want to hear more about these "opportunities"? Fill out the addressed postpaid card that came to you and drop it in the mailbox at the corner. Mr. Bixby, of the Bixby Associates, to choose a name at random, will be ringing the bell almost before you get back to the house. He will be a well-groomed, pleasant gentleman who talks frankly and convincingly.

The Tennessee Valley has been called the "Ruhr of America," he says; potentially it is the heart of the industrial United States. Three enormous dams—Wheeler, Wilson, and Pickwick—will develop 1,260,000 horsepower. Even today they have a capacity of 440,000 horse-power. All these dams, Mr. Bixby points out, are in "the Muscle Shoals area." Wilson Dam alone, he says, produces 81,000 horse-power today and will develop 130,000 when the powerhouse is fully equipped. (TVA figures, oddly enough, show more than this: 245,000 capacity today; 592,000 ultimately. Mr. Bixby has the natural conservatism of the real-estate salesman.) He then quotes a statement by Henry Ford, printed in the Dearborn Independent. Mr. Ford said that in his experience the ratio of industrial employment to available horse-power was one to one; that is, for every unit of horse-power developed, one worker is employed. So when Wilson Dam produces 130,000 horse-power, 130,000 men ought to be working there. Again the conservative streak in Mr. Bixby comes out. He doesn't want you to think he is exaggerating so he is going to divide this figure by five. The result gives a minimum of 26,000 men to be employed in the "Muscle Shoals area."

Where will they work? Mr. Bixby knows. The Electro-Metallurgical Company is going to triple the size of its plant, putting in $15,000,000. Reynolds Metal is going to build a $40,000,000 aluminum plant. The TVA is expanding its nitrate plant and also building a million-dollar office building. Mr. Bixby has newspaper clippings to prove it. Also, he whispers, du Pont is going to make synthetic rubber at Muscle Shoals if it gets the government contract it is after. At least $63,000,000 is going to be poured into the Muscle Shoals area in the next three years, plus whatever the government spends, plus the du Pont plant if this materializes, and Mr. Bixby does not doubt that it will materialize. "You know the rubber situation today, don't you?"

Every worker, Mr. Bixby says, supports four other persons (the national average is generally held to be two and one-half unemployed for each employed person). This means that the population of the area will be about 130,000 people. The average price of residential property, he says, in a community of 130,000 is $110 per front foot, and he has a chart to prove it. Mr. Bixby's choice lots for home building in the Muscle Shoals area are 40 by 128; so they should be worth $4,400 when the plant expansion is complete, that is, in two or three years. Mr. Bixby's price to you is only $750; $4,400 less $750 is $3,650—your profit.

Mr. Bixby frankly admits that this spectacular rise in land value is contingent upon the expansion he has outlined. Also, admittedly, the price per front foot varies even among communities of similar size. Let's see what the lowest price per front foot is, in a community of 130,000. Seems to be, he says, according to the chart, about $50. That makes a forty-foot lot worth $2,000; your profit, then, would be $1,250. How can you lose? Look here—even if the most fantastic things happen (or rather, if they don't happen) and a lot turns out to be worth only $25 per front foot, that's $1,000, and you're only paying $750!

Not only that, but Mr. Bixby, since he called on you himself, has no salesman's commission to pay and can afford to let you have it for 10 per cent less. Have you got cash? That's splendid—5 per cent off for cash. To you, only $641.25. You can practically be sure of tripling your money in three years, and if everything goes well you might more than quintuple it.

I don't want to imply that there is anything crooked about the proposal. I don't think there is. It's just that I was in Muscle Shoals and the Tri-cities a short time ago, and I carry a different picture of the area in my mind. The property Mr. Bixby is selling is in a town with a present population of only 5,500, and residential property has to be extremely choice in a town of this size to bring more than from $15 to $20 a front foot. It is true that all four towns are very close together, and if you want to call them all one community, and if the Muscle Shoals expansion turns out to be as big as Mr. Bixby and his friends expect, the price of $110 isn't fantastic; it's just pretty high.

One thing, however, is certain—somebody is going to be fleeced. If people flock in to work in the defense plants, they will be the ones to suffer. If they don't, the people to whom Mr. Bixby is selling lots will be stuck. In the long history of American land speculation the original speculators have rarely lost.

Luftwaffe Behind Bars

BY ALLEN A. MICHIE

London, by mail

THERE is no perceptible weakening of morale in the German airmen who are being captured in Britain. Once in a while a Luftwaffe pilot alights from a machine that has been shot down and cracks, "Thank God, I'm in jolly old England," but the vast majority are tough, truculent young Nazis who are fully convinced that Germany is winning the war in the air. Occasionally a bomber that carries a Gestapo officer in addition to the regular crew is brought down, but not often enough to make the presence of such an officer seem of any great significance.

Every German airman shot down is given a preliminary interrogation by R. A. F. intelligence officers on the spot and then a thorough going-over when he arrives at the prison camp. Nazi airmen captured in the south of England are taken to London and put on a train for a prison camp in the north, and the British guards usually manage to follow a long, slow route through a great deal of the city on the way to the railroad station. The Nazis are invariably surprised at the small amount of damage their bombers have been able to inflict on London's vast area (twenty-five miles across). And they always open their eyes at the absence of food queues and remark on the food in shop windows. Apparently they have expected to find most Londoners homeless and starving.

Unknown to the prisoners, the guards are supplied with dictaphones to record all conversation. Some of the remarks the Germans make are revealing, others simply amusing. A few weeks ago three members of a disabled bomber's crew were driven to Euston Station on their way north. From their remarks they seemed to be not professional party members but youngsters who had been attracted by the socialist appeal of National Socialism. This was how their conversation went:

As they stood on the grimy, black platform at Euston Station, the first Nazi muttered, "Filthy station . . . typical of Britain's decadence." A member of the Women's Auxiliary Air Force, neat as a pin in her blue uniform, passed by. "Hmm, so the British put their women in uniform," snorted the second Nazi. "Right step, left step, forward march into bed. . . . Shoot her in the morning . . . plenty more where she came from."

The three airmen were marched into a third-class railway carriage, whose comfortable plush seats contrasted with the hard bare boards of German third-class carriages. "Third class . . . plush seats . . . no wonder the British are soft," said one of the Germans.

As the train pulled out of the station a large American-sized limousine rolled past on the street bordering the tracks. "Pluto-democratic car," said one Nazi, pointing at it through the window. The pluto-democratic car pulled ahead of a tiny, typically British Morris. "Ah," said another Nazi, "German auto."

In the early months of the war, when captured German aviators were few, the army undertook to "educate" them politically. The attempt was a complete failure. The few who were anxious to hear the British side of the war were afraid to admit their deviation from the Nazi Party line, and whenever the British guards turned on the BBC news reports in German in the recreation rooms, the Nazis hurriedly left. British-edited German-language newspapers and English books and magazines remained unopened on the tables. The education of the Nazis has now been taken away from the War Office and put in the hands of a group of German refugees and English intellectuals who at least are showing originality in their propaganda methods. Radio loud-speakers have now been installed next door to the open-air latrines, and interested Germans can hide themselves away and listen to the BBC German bulletins in peace.

Reports that German airmen are all very young are untrue. Some boys of seventeen and eighteen have been captured, but the average age is around twenty-five, the same as in the R. A. F. Untrue also are the stories that only the squadron leader's machine is fully equipped with the necessary instruments and that the rest of the pilots simply follow the leader. All the Nazi planes I have examined, fighters as well as bombers, have been as well instrumented as any British or American plane.

All planes shot down, or what remains of them, are carefully examined for new devices and other clues as to the condition of the German war machine. For example, the substitution of a new metal in the construction of certain parts may indicate a vital shortage of some material. The manufacturer's stamp and date of production on the plane may bring a new German aircraft factory to the attention of the R. A. F.'s bomber command. Gasoline and lubricating oils are analyzed to discover source and quality. The Germans use a lower-octane gasoline for aviation purposes than the British and Americans, but its quality has been uniformly good and there have been no indications that the Nazis are short of it. German lubricating oil, on the other hand, has been of a poor quality for months and has given the Luftwaffe a good deal of engine trouble. Even the airman's clothes and personal papers are meticulously examined, since the maker's label on a new shirt might reveal the town near which the squadron was located.

Railroads Miss the Train

IN THE week ending May 24 freight-car loadings on the American railroads totaled 866,000. This was a 26 per cent increase above the figure for the corresponding week in 1940, and it compared with a 1940 peak, reached last October, of 637,651 cars. At that point it was estimated that the roads had a surplus of about 76,000 cars, which was just about the minimum necessary if freight forwardings were to be handled smoothly and expeditiously. Today the margin is almost certainly less; yet we are nowhere near the loadings peak for 1941. That is expected to be reached in October, when official estimates anticipate that traffic movements will rise to 925,000 cars. By October 1 the railroads hope to add 50,000 new cars to their stock, but even so it is impossible to see how congestion is to be avoided. Indeed, the Association of American Railroads is now hinting at a much earlier crisis.

Just about a year ago a report was presented to the National Defense Advisory Committee pointing out that the defense program, then still in its infancy, would place an extremely heavy burden on the railroads, a burden which could not be met without a big increase in equipment. The report suggested that in order to be prepared for this expansion in traffic, and to avoid the risk of shortages of labor or materials as the defense program began to absorb all resources, the purchase of 500,000 new cars and 2,000 locomotives should be put in hand as quickly as possible. This proposal was sat upon heavily by Ralph Budd, the well-known railroad executive who was then the transport member of the NDAC and who now occupies a similar position in OPM, and was the occasion of scornful comment by most "practical" railroad executives. There was no need, it was said, to worry in the least about the ability of the railroads to meet all expected traffic demands. Nor was any planned expansion in carrying capacity required: left alone, the roads would order the new equipment as traffic developed.

As the seasonal traffic peak developed last fall, the Association of American Railroads did show symptoms of anxiety about the situation and went so far as to recommend that its members purchase 100,000 freight cars during the coming year. But having paid that modest tribute to foresight, it relapsed into complacency. On December 7, writing on this page, I called attention to the signs of a freight-car shortage in the course of 1941, by saying:

No form of bottleneck can do more to slow up the defense program than railroad congestion. But that is something we are likely to experience six or twelve months hence unless drastic action is taken quickly. . . . The railroad signals are set at "Danger." Will the Defense Commission take heed or must we wait for action until demand crashes supply and the tracks are blocked?

Just after this article appeared, I noticed the following in the New York Times financial section:

"Self-styled economists" in Washington are disseminating "a lot of nonsense" to the effect that disarmament expenditure will unduly tax the capacity of the railroads, according to Samuel O. Dunn, a frequent speaker on railroad topics. "In spite of the huge expenditures for preparedness now beginning," said Mr. Dunn, "the railroads still have more reason for fearing they will not have enough traffic and earnings in the months and years immediately ahead than for fearing that they will be offered more traffic than they can move."

On January 21 of this year Mr. Budd said he was still of the opinion that existing transportation agencies under private ownership would be able to meet all needs of the defense program. The same day his optimism was buttressed by data made available by M. J. Gormley of the Association of American Railroads. Mr. Gormley estimated that the increase of freight traffic in 1941 compared with 1940 would not exceed 7 to 10 per cent, with a rise during the first quarter of about 9 per cent. Actually the first nine weeks of the year showed an expansion of 11.2 per cent in car loadings, and by March the weekly returns were spurting 20 per cent and more ahead of 1940. By April 1 the Shippers' Advisory Board was forecasting a 15 per cent increase over 1940 during the second quarter.

Meanwhile, the first note of doubt had been struck in OPM circles by W. Averell Harriman, then chief of the materials branch, who told the Traffic Club of Washington on February 13: "I am sure the railroads cannot guarantee that there will not be a tight situation in the autumn of 1941 or 1942." However, this leading railroad director hastened to reassure his audience. "I cannot agree," he said, "with the back-seat drivers who contend that we should . . . force the railroads to buy some hundreds of thousands of freight cars when it is not clear that they are needed."

Barely two months later it became "clear" even to the American Association of Railroads that an awful lot of cars were needed in a terrible hurry. In addition to replacements, it told its members, they should buy 270,000 cars during the next thirty months. Allowing for retirements of 40,000 annually, this means the production in the given period of 370,000 cars. The Wall Street Journal commented:

The decision of the A. A. R. . . . is a right-about face from the attitude taken until very recently. In some quarters it is felt that it is too late to avert some sort of car shortage next fall although the carriers will get some 50,000 to 60,000 additional new cars by that time.

Nevertheless, we now have a big equipment program, approaching that recommended nearly a year ago by the "unpractical" Washington economists. But here's the rub. In the past twelve months the car-building companies have taken on huge armament contracts, and in addition there is today a shortage of sheet steel, despite the many assurances from the steel industry that it would be able to deliver the goods. So we find one bottleneck thrust into another. No doubt there would have been shortages even if the steel and railroad industries had put their backs into expansion when they were first warned, but we should have gained the valuable production of many months, now lost forever.

Why is it that so many of our big corporation executives, who are supposed to owe their positions to unusual drive and foresight, have not displayed these qualities in planning for defense? Why have they ignored the lessons of the last war, the experience of every other country faced with similar problems? Why have they consistently minimized the economie repercussions of the defense program, which were so plainly visible to anyone able to read a chart? The answer in each case would seem to be a psychological inability to face the realities of the present emergency, an effort to escape its threatening implications to a system which profits by scarcity. It is the same attitude which, in other fields, has earned the dismal verdict: "Too little and too late."

In the Wind

NOT LONG AGO the Reverend Francis J. McConnell, Methodist Episcopal Bishop of New York, was waked at 2:15 in the morning by a ringing telephone. The voice on the wire told him that he was scheduled at that moment for a fifteen-minute radio talk on Spanish refugees, to be broadcast as part of the Milk Man's Matinee, a pre-dawn program on Station WNEW. Drowsily the Bishop protested that he had never agreed to speak. "You're scheduled," came the answer, "and you must begin immediately. You can talk into the telephone, and the microphone here at the studio will take your speech." The obliging Bishop pulled himself together and spoke for fifteen minutes on the plight of Spanish exiles in France. Next day inquiries were made. The station denied knowledge of the broadcast. It was all a hoax.

AN EMPLOYEE in a defense industry recently learned that he was on a list of persons suspected of being potential saboteurs. After careful investigation he discovered that he was on the list because he had been seen by an FBI agent in the Soviet Pavilion at the World's Fair two years ago.

THE COMMUNISTS have embarked on a campaign against Senator Wheeler. They class him as a warmonger and, because of his association with ex-Colonel Lindbergh, a conspirer in the plot to have a concert of democratic and fascist states destroy the Soviet Union. This is part of a slight turn in the Communist line, which now opposes a negotiated peace because such a settlement would probably be made at the expense of the U. S. S. R.

GENEROSO POPE, pro-Fascist publisher of the two largest-selling Italian-American newspapers, gave editorial support to the President's "unlimited emergency" speech but omitted anti-Axis references in reporting the speech itself.

A REFUGEE recently arrived from Norway reports that a theatrical strike was taking place in that country a few weeks ago and may still be going on. It began after an ad lib act in an Oslo play was suppressed by German authorities. During the course of the play an actor dressed in the king's robes walked slowly across the stage. He said nothing until he disappeared into the wings. Then he thrust his head out and said, "Do you want me to come back?"

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

John L. Lewis and Casey Jones

And the switchman knew by the engine's moans
That the man at the throttle was Casey Jones.

THAT song has spread across the country from Jackson, Tennessee, where they buried Casey. It seems to come from simpler, pleasanter times in America, even if also from a bad time for Casey. Today Isaac B. Tigrett is the big man of Jackson. He's a railroad man, too, better fixed if not better known than Casey. He was coming along as cashier of a country bank when Casey died. Today in Jackson he is Baptist, Mason, Rotarian, Democrat, railroad president, and president of a securities company. Also, he belongs to the Union League Club in Chicago and the Traffic Club in New York. He has gone farther at a faster rate than Casey did. As the reputed oldest railroad president in America in point of service, he speaks more clearly, I think, than some metropolitan financiers for a good many men who have made the same trip.

And what he says of America in general and John L. Lewis in particular is this: "When it becomes necessary for the people of this country to send representatives to New York to consult one man as to whether or not we may have fuel with which to keep our defense industries running, there surely must be something wrong either with us as a people or with our leaders."

It is a very easy matter in intellectual centers to dismiss Mr. Tigrett as a rural reactionary. But within his limits and on his side he is talking about the problem of bigness which has also preoccupied such a man as Justice Brandeis and which certainly has not been interrupted by the defense effort. Indeed, nothing has ever emphasized it quite so much. A great many Americans share the fear about the danger of power centered in the leaders of great unions. Even the friends of labor recognize in the national organizations through which they work a tremendous change from the old immediate relationship between workers and employers. The whole business is an old story, new only because of a change in the direction of complaint.

Even Mr. Tigrett is undoubtedly aware of the growth of huge centralized business and industry in this country during the last half-century. Big Business is not merely a politician's phrase but a fact. In Alabama, where Mr. Tigrett spoke, centralized steel in Pittsburgh and New York controlled the steel mills and the mines long before

John L. Lewis had any such power as that about which Mr. Tigrett complains. Men in the mines of Alabama were dependent upon a far-off decision as to what wages they would get, what jobs they would have. People everywhere were dependent upon a far-off decision as to what they must pay for a piece of iron.

The rise of Mr. Lewis did not end that situation. Indeed, Mr. Lewis's power may be exactly as dangerous as Mr. Tigrett says it is. Labor cannot deny the problems of democracy involved in its own centralized bigness, but nobody can look at Big Labor with intelligence or honesty without recognizing it as a part of the same process which first produced Big Business.

Both, however, endow with a special significance now the question of how a democracy of all the people can deal with the tremendous powers that have grown up within it. Long before Lewis appeared, bad as he may be, Big Business used the separations of government in the American system to devise a legal system by which it could escape all control while using both federal and state powers to control the people it exploited. Big Government in America grew straight from the people's necessity to end the legalized anarchy which smart lawyers made for their big clients. Now the same lawyers do a good deal of the talking about labor's irresponsible power. And the funny part about it is that for once they may be right—or half right, which is better than usual.

The powers within our democracy have multiplied. Mr. Lewis is one of them. But he is certainly not the only one. Monopoly is another. Sometimes, as has been pointed out often enough, we seem to have developed in this democracy a feudalism in which Mr. Lewis is a powerful lord contending with such another powerful lord as, for instance, Mr. Morgan. The growth of government, before defense, was the growth of hope that all powers could be made subject to the welfare of the whole people. Sometimes the growth of government has seemed only to foster the growth of equality in conflict. But that is gain. Not even defense has so far succeeded in quieting the contentions of powers outside the government. Bigness is still the problem of democracy. The Nazis had a solution for it. The Communists had one. We do not like them. Have we got a better one? If we haven't, we might as well stop singing "God Bless America" and start singing "Casey Jones." Our democracy will be going the same way the Cannon Ball Express went and at the same rate of speed.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

HAVE you a "little woman" in your home? Is she intelligent? Has she had a college education? And do you sometimes wonder why, since you have worked your head off to give her all the comforts of life, including a maid or two and a modern kitchen, cars and smart clothes and a bridge table, she seems dissatisfied with her "place in the home"? Then read "Of Men and Women" by Pearl S. Buck (John Day, $2). You may discover that you are harboring a "gunpowder woman" whose mental and physical energy so far outstrips the demands of running a modern home and a modern family that most of it goes to feed the fires of an undivine discontent which is likely to explode in Reno or lead to the psychoanalyst's couch, and which in any case fills the "English-style" suburban home with the fumes of insecurity.

The pioneer housekeeper had a real job. She was a partner in a struggle, and her work was creative and satisfying as well as hard. She performed an important social as well as domestic function. Today, to be sure, there are thousands of women in the lower-income groups who are allowed to be their husbands' partners, but only under the compulsion of a desperate economic need which robs the partnership of its satisfactions. But Mrs. Buck is primarily concerned with that large group of women who have received the same education as men and then "settled down." For these women, keeping house and raising a small family may be a full-time job while the children are very young. But the kindergarten takes the children at a younger and younger age, and keeping house has become a matter of a few daily hours of boring and sterile tasks. So, after a few years, the stage is set for trouble.

It is obvious that there are thousands of women in the United States who do not have enough to do, yet men have succeeded so well in convincing them that their place is in the home that they are the first to denounce anyone, particularly another woman, who questions the ancient shibboleth. And when a woman insists on taking part in the world's work as a doctor or a lawyer or a business woman she soon finds that she is barred from the highest posts in any of these professions, not because her ability is inferior but because the world has decided that she can't run a bank or deliver a baby as well as a man can. Needless to say, her fellow-women are the first to say so—just as in China the fiercest resistance to the abolition of the horrible custom of binding the feet of females came from women.

Chinese women resisted the change because their helplessness had given them an indirect power over men as vicious as that exercised over American men by "gunpowder women" demanding more and more luxuries with which to assuage their discontent. It is vicious because it is based on an assumption of inequality which poisons the relationship between men and women and between parents and children and in the end corrupts social relationships as well.

In Mrs. Buck's view privilege has been as great a curse to American women as prejudice has been to American Negroes. Women have been denied the necessity, as Negroes have been denied the opportunity, to take part in the world's work. And she thinks discontented women constitute as great a threat to the democratic way of life as any other discontented minority. For in her opinion American women, after so many generations of having been denied responsibility, do not really want freedom; they are glad of an excuse to take refuge in the home; and as a result one source of a great danger, the danger of fascism, lies in the "masses of half-ignorant, half-idle, indolent, and discontented American women . . . ready to run to the call of anyone clever enough to justify their futility and to sentimentalize their sex."

She thinks that men are mainly responsible for this state of affairs, that privilege is the bribe man pays to woman in order to keep his most precious possession, his belief in his own superiority merely because he is a male. But as she points out, it is no accident that the suppression of women is one of the first tenets of fascism—which eventually enslaves men as well as women.

. . . in the United States neither man nor woman is ready for democracy—man by reason of his strength and woman by reason of her weakness . . . neither is willing to discover that jewel point where liberties will meet, and the balance of liberty for both be found which is true democracy.

For at that point man must give up his illusion of superiority; woman must give up her present privileges, "of remaining ignorant in spite of education," of mental laziness, of not having to think thoroughly through anything because she knows the ultimate decision will not rest with her.

Mrs. Buck scoffs at the idea that if women were given genuine equality they would lose that "femininity" about which both men and women become so eloquent when they are defending the status quo of the sexes. The "doll," to be sure, might disappear; and Mrs. Buck thinks the "exceptional woman" who is so often desexed by the ruthless fight she must make to achieve even an inferior place in a man's world would disappear also. But equality would not wipe out the exciting difference between the sexes; nature has taken care of that. It would wipe out the superior-inferior relationship which today poisons so many marriages and keeps both men and women from achieving true maturity, either as human beings or as citizens of a world in crisis.

I have touched only the high points of a provocative and closely reasoned analysis. Mrs. Buck's comparison of the home in China and in America is particularly interesting. Her discussions of women and war, education, and the old issue of women in politics are intelligent and fresh. She is, thank heaven, not one of those irritating women known as "feminists" who substitute female for male superiority as their basic assumption. Her thesis is that both men and women would be much happier if women were allowed, or forced, to function, not as angels or as concubines or both, but as human beings.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Croce on History

HISTORY AS THE STORY OF LIBERTY. By Benedetto Croce. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

THE most obvious significance of Croce's book lies in the fact that this impassioned plea for liberty as the basic value of history has come out of Mussolini's Italy. Croce writes: "The adoration of the state or of might (Macht), born in Germany and introduced among other peoples, is nothing more than a base affection, not of citizens but of liveried servants and courtiers, for might as such, which is vainly adorned with sacred and moral emblems. . . . It is in fact stupid to exalt the state."

The ultimate significance of the book is that it represents a probably final word by a great philosopher on an aspect of philosophical thought which has been the preoccupation of his life—the philosophy of history. The fact that the book embodies a series of essays, not completely unified, detracts slightly, though only slightly, from its value as a comprehensive summary of his thought.

Croce approaches the problem of history from the standpoint of historiography. The question is: How can history be recorded? It cannot be recorded merely as a chronicle of facts and events, for these facts and events have a meaning. But their meaning can be appreciated only in the context of the meaning of the whole. Thus all but the most superficial historical records are involved in the problem of the meaning of history as such. Yet the historical perspective of the historian is itself relative, and his tendency is to interpret the whole past so as to justify a particular view of life, of society, and of history in his own present. (Thus a change in the party line prompts Communist historians to change their estimate of the character of Ivan the Terrible.)

Though Croce's entire work deals with this problem of historical relativism, he is inclined to underestimate its acuteness. Against all rationalists who imagine that it is easy to gain a position of rational transcendence over the relative stuff of history, he affirms the historical character of all thought; yet he criticizes Troeltsch for taking the problem of historical relativism too seriously. He believes that it is difficult, but not impossible, to achieve a "balanced judgment" which will correct the misinterpretations caused by the "arbitrary will of individuals." Yet the most plausible misinterpretations of the past arise not from an arbitrary or wilful falsification of historical data but from relative perspectives which are unconscious of the relativity and inadequacy of their position. The principle which underlies Croce's balanced judgment is that the interpretation of history must be governed by the total and perennial human situation and not by some particular human situation of this or that epoch. He finds the perennial factor he seeks in the struggle for freedom.

The most illuminating portions of Croce's work are his critical appraisals of alternative philosophies of history. He rejects naturalistic interpretations which regard history as scarcely more than an extension of the principle of evolution in biology. He is equally critical of eighteenth-century and later utopianism, which finds the meaning of history in the culmination of certain social values within history; and he wisely observes that to this utopianism it is not even clear whether history culminates in the realization of social ideals ad finitum or ad infinitum. Marxist utopianism is subjected to a particularly severe criticism because it seeks to realize perfect equality in history, a purpose which betrays it into the destruction of liberty. Croce points out, I think correctly, that equality is a transcendent principle of justice and not a simple possibility of history, and that where this is not understood, utopian dreams turn into tyrannical realities. Unfortunately his criticism of Marxism is marred by a failure to understand the economic, as against the political, factors in social life, an error which blinds him to the most illuminating elements in Marxist thought.

Croce's thought is, of course, closely related to Hegel's, but he is careful to underline the differences, as well as the similarities, between his and Hegel's philosophy: "Hegel aimed at resolving history into philosophy by giving it the movement of a system which develops and is completed in time. We, on the other hand, aim at resolving philosophy into history, considering it as an abstract moment of historical thought itself, and its systems as historical situations historically transient and historically justified." Thus the absurd culmination of history in the Prussian military state, or any similar realization of the eternal in the temporal, is avoided.

Croce is careful to point out that his idea of "balanced judgment" has nothing in common with either an impartiality which abstains from all judgments or a neutrality which merely finds a mean between contrasting judgments. The true historian "cannot remain immersed in events," but neither can he "stand outside them and move in a void. It is necessary to move through them, to feel the impact and the agony which they generate in order to stand above them, rising from suffering to judgment and knowledge."

But there can be no such transcendent judgment without a principle of judgment which transcends all particular historical circumstances. He finds this in the principle of liberty. "We always tend toward liberty and work for it even when we seem to be working for something else; liberty is realized in every thought and action that has the character of truth, poetry, and goodness." History is not the story of increasing liberty but the record of the fight for liberty under ever-changing circumstances "The problem of freedom is perpetually resolved and perpetually recurs" because it is the desire for liberty which defines man as man.

One would think that the nature of man required community as well as liberty, and that history could be more adequately described as the interaction between these two partially contradictory and partially complementary desires. Croce tends to identify them. He declares: "These two requirements form a single need, for we cannot conceive of liberty without social organization, nor can we conceive of society and state without liberty, for it would no longer be human."

One difficulty with Croce's interpretation of history is that it seems to give no meaning to history as an ongoing process with cumulative effects. Croce admits that modern man must win his freedom against the tendency toward tyranny in a technical civilization, whereas primitive man asserted his freedom against the necessities of nature, but he seems to find no meaning in this historical development, tragic or otherwise.

Such criticisms and questions must not be allowed to obscure the greatness of this book. It is the work of a profound thinker who has meditated deeply on the most perplexing problems of human existence and who touches no issue without illuminating it.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Famous Fortunes

MEN OF WEALTH. By John T. Flynn. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

APPLYING the biographical method to economic history, and thereby making more palatable to the general reader what is often regarded as a dull subject, Mr. Flynn tells the story of twelve famous men of wealth. In selecting his subjects he has chosen, not the makers of the greatest fortunes, but those whose methods of accumulation seem most representative of the economic environments in which they flourished. Thus he begins with Jacob Fugger, the Bavarian banker, who at the dawn of the capitalist era financed the rising house of Hapsburg and reaped a rich reward in mining monopolies. He ends with J. Pierpont Morgan, who achieved power and millions by perfecting the art of manipulating the paper tokens of wealth.

How do individuals become rich? Not by working with their own hands, says Mr. Flynn, but by "getting a fraction, large or small, of the produce created by the collaboration of many men." Every step in mechanical progress has made that collaboration more fruitful, and every new refinement in the technique of credit has made it possible for those controlling money and machines to enlarge their "take." But as this book illustrates, few really significant fortunes have been constructed without the assistance of special privileges and monopoly rights. The one man among Mr. Flynn's dozen who is an exception to the rule is that maverick of capitalism Robert Owen. He made his pile in the highly competitive cotton industry during the early stages of Britain's Industrial Revolution, despite the fact that he treated his workers with quixotic generosity according to standards of his day. And then he spent every penny of his fortune promoting socialism.

Mr. Flynn has shown commendable restraint in not pressing historical analogies too hard in support of his well-known views on current controversies. But occasionally the temptation has proved irresistible. Thus he treats John Law, whose discovery that money could be created through the agency of bank loans led to the Mississippi Bubble, as a precursor of Franklin D. Roosevelt, implying that New Deal finance will suffer a similar collapse. This analogy would have more validity if it were possible to show any similarity between the basic economic situation of eighteenth-century France and that of the United States in the 1930's. John Law's monetary experiments were attempted in a country of peasants and handicraft workers, where the possibilities of expanded production were extremely limited. Thus the rapid multiplication of the means of exchange almost immediately overtook the supply of goods, making inflation inevitable. But under the New Deal the margin between current and potential production has been so vast that only now, with the tremendous extension of deficit financing necessitated by the defense program, have we come within hailing distance of inflation. And today the causes and dangers of inflation and the methods of checking it are widely understood.

Mr. Flynn, it seems to me, also strains the function of historical analogy in his comparison of Cecil Rhodes with Hitler. Rhodes, it is true, entertained absurd theories of the basic superiority of the Anglo-Saxon and dreamed grandiosely of uniting the world under the British flag. But he thought of that world as a universalized version of the Empire, made up of self-governing dominions, and not as a collection of colonies and vassal states completely subject to London, in which only Englishmen were first-class citizens. He harbored no ideas of constructing his world state by force but looked rather to the slow processes of education. Thus he sought to give permanence to his vision by the Rhodes scholarships, which were to be available not only to citizens of the dominions and the United States but also, a fact which Mr. Flynn omits, to Germans.

There are a number of errors in this book which are perhaps worth pointing out for future correction. The British general defeated and killed by the Boers at Majuba Hill was General Sir George Colley, not Colby; the indemnity paid by France after 1870 was five milliard francs not five million; and the author of the "History of Great American Fortunes" is Gustavus Myers, not Meyer. Mr. Flynn also speaks of the machine-breakers of the British industrial revolution as "Ludites, named after Ned Ludite, a village idiot who to be avenged on his tormentors broke some machinery." Actually, they were called Luddites, and the Ned Ludd from whom they took their name was, according to G. D. H. Cole, the leading authority on the period, probably a mythical character who, like an earlier symbol of resistance to oppression, Robin Hood, was supposed to have his headquarters in Sherwood Forest.

"Parade Without Music"

SOMETHING OF A HERO. By I. J. Kapstein. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THIS is a thoroughly American novel, a novel of scene, character, and sentiment which could not conceivably be transposed to another land. It is a democratic casebook, a symposium of personal histories covering the years from 1907 to 1929 and showing the development of the city of Persepolis through the experiences of its representative citizens: the politician, the lawyer, the banker, the bootlegger, the small storekeeper, and the Civil War veteran, John Cantrell, who serves as hub to these spinning lives.

Though there is nothing directly imitative of Thomas Wolfe in this first novel, Kapstein's talents are in many ways similar. He has Wolfe's breadth of interest, his true ear for dialogue, his talent for welding a dozen parallel stories into a solid cable of narrative with all ends spliced in. But more urgently than Wolfe he has something to say, and the discipline with which to say it effectively. In these nearly six hundred pages there is little waste as the author shows by concrete and credible example the relation between the American creed and the too frequently futile struggle of faithful men to live by it. Despite the convictions of John Cantrell, the author's advocate, the many lesser characters make ■ mockery of the freedom we boast; prejudice runs rabid through Persepolis—against the Jews, the Negroes, the rich, the poor. There are few good neighbors.

Dr. Dave Bandler, the son of the Jewish junk dealer, discovers that medicine in Persepolis must be practiced exclusively by and for white Protestant Americans. Indie, the Negro prize fighter, dreaming always of his golden island where he will be free and contentedly alone, is fouled whenever he lifts his guard in confidence of American fair play. Old Marius, the Socialist, earnestly but clumsily trying to better the lot of the poor, rests at last with his head caved in on the floor of the union hall. Through all these stories runs the author's banal refrain, "The creed must not be separated from the deed," but it is separated, tragically. Only three of the characters find deeds to do that conflict neither with the democratic creed nor with their own integrity.

Mr. Kapstein is admirably impartial in presenting the beliefs of these contrary characters. All people, he feels, are fundamentally decent. Joe, the killer, has his spot of gentleness. Smitty, the "peacherino's" crooked lover, sincerely yearns for another chance. The capitalist's belief that he is helping labor by exploiting it is poignantly true to life.

This is a book built with care and economy, ■ book of continuous suspense leading to chapters of sheer physical drama that could only be bettered, perhaps, by something of the humor which is as normal to man as charity or lust. John Cantrell, dying because he fought for both labor and capital, saw the strikers pass as a "parade without music." That is the book.

HONORABLE ENEMY. By Ernest O. Hauser. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.50.

JAPAN UNMASKED. By Hallett Abend. Ives Washburn. $3.

BEHIND THE RISING SUN. By James R. Young. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

THE FIGHT FOR THE PACIFIC. By Mark J. Gayn. William Morrow and Company. $3.

IF WE are to judge by the four books listed above, journalistic interest has shifted abruptly, so far as the Orient is concerned, from China to the island empire of Japan. This is fortunate, because there has been a scarcity of good books on Japan in recent years. Those that have appeared have either been lyrically partial, like Willard Price's writings, or superficially hostile to everything Japanese. None of the present books are pro-Japanese, but their criticisms are in no sense superficial. All four are written by seasoned journalists and are based on exceptionally wide experience in the East.

Of all recent books on Japan, Ernest Hauser's is probably the most satisfactory for the ordinary reader. It is a vividly written, yet thoughtful interpretation. It is enough of an exposé to satisfy the sensation seeker, yet it goes ■ long way toward explaining why the Japanese are what they are. It tells why the Japanese have supported their government's expansionist policies, and how those policies have affected everyday life in Japan. Fundamentally, Mr. Hauser's argument runs, the Japanese are not a modern people and cannot be understood if viewed as such. For all their veneer of modernity, they remain feudal and Oriental in mind and social organization. And the trend of the times is to strengthen rather than weaken this essential characteristic. Nor is Japan to be feared as a strong rising power. If it is to be feared at all, the reason lies in the fact that its weakness has resulted in an alliance with Germany and Italy which may lead to an unwanted conflict.

Hallett Abend, who first broke the news of the Tripartite Pact, tells of the secret clauses in that pact whereby Germany and Italy pledge themselves to use their influence to aid Japan in acquiring control of French Indo-China and the Netherlands East Indies. But he also describes in detail the bankruptcy of Japanese policies—Japan's failure in China and the heavy sacrifice that has been imposed on the civilian population. His catalogue of Japan's economic woes is perhaps the most complete that has been compiled by any qualified observer. Abend also vividly portrays the hostility to Japan in the Dutch East Indies and American Hawaii. Although he has no illusions as to Japan's strength, he is desperately concerned lest our opposition to its aims involve us in a war that no one wants. This, he believes, should be avoided if possible, but he fears that in the end we shall have no choice but to accept Japan's challenge and fight to a finish.

"Behind the Rising Sun" is a report, cast largely in the form of personal anecdote, of one of America's most experienced journalists in Japan. Mr. Young has the distinction of having been arrested and held for two months by the Japanese police because they did not like the tone of some of his articles. His offense lay in describing in some detail the effect of the war on Japan, a subject which he enlarges upon in his book. It is perhaps natural, in view of his experiences, that he should be intensely critical of Japan; but his criticisms are so sweeping that a reader unfamiliar with the East will be at a loss to understand how a country with such glaring weaknesses can be of serious concern to the Western world.

The background of the coming war in the East is described comprehensively in "The Fight for the Pacific." The book is a veritable encyclopedia. It covers not only China, Japan, Singapore, Indo-China, and the Philippines, but Mongolia—where the author was born—Russia, Alaska, Britain, and Thailand. It gives the essentials of recent history in each of these countries in so far as that history bears on the Far East. As a handbook it is probably unexcelled, but it has the weaknesses of a handbook. Because it covers such a vast area its treatment of particular aspects of the situation is necessarily rather superficial. Although reasonably accurate on the whole, it is marred by numerous minor errors. Yet it deserves to be widely read because it brings together more general information than any other recent book on the Far East.

America and the War

AMERICA AND TOTAL WAR. By Fletcher Pratt. Smith and Durrell. $3.

AMERICA CAN WIN. By Major Malcolm Wheeler-Nicholson. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

OF THESE two books on America and the war, Fletcher Pratt's is by far the better, although it must be said that it suffers from a jerky style. Pratt makes the correct observations on the war in Europe and notes the displacement of the infantry-artillery combat team by the armored-air team, the revival of mobility and surprise, and the reappearance of verbal field orders. As to the United States, Pratt concludes that we have less to fear from a fifth-column movement than have the nations of Europe, that a direct invasion of this country is a military impossibility, and that while an attack through Latin America would stand a better chance of success, normal precautions on our part should suffice to forestall it. Fletcher Pratt is not a great military thinker or theorist, but he does possess the ability to present military theory in an understandable manner, and his aggressive and patriotic tone will doubtless be stimulating to many.

The publishers advertise Wheeler-Nicholson's book as a "concise" document, "based on realistic military logic," which expounds a "common-sense plan for utilizing our present strength." Among these common-sense plans is a project to send a division of Irish-Americans to Eire under the command of "Wild Bill" Donovan, and another is a scheme to place General Weygand in command of all the Allied forces, including those of the United States. Wheeler-Nicholson's principal suggestion is that the untrained American conscripts should be sent to garrison the various British possessions in Asia, Africa, and throughout the world. The native and other British troops on duty at these posts would thus be released for service in Europe, and the American troops could finish their training while performing police duty in the colonies. One does not have to be a military expert to detect the obvious weaknesses of this scheme, and it is probably the one plan which both the military and political authorities of America and Britain could unite in condemning. Even were there more merit in Wheeler-Nicholson's projects, it would be obscured by his manner of presentation, which is rambling and evangelistic.

HARVEY S. FORD

The Nazi Courts at Work

SKELETON OF JUSTICE. By Edith Roper and Clara Leiser. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

FROM 1936 to the spring of 1939 Edith Roper was the court correspondent of the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung. The appointment to such a position of a person as disloyal to Nazi ideals as Mrs. Roper had already shown herself was clearly a mistake, but it is a comfort to know that even the infallible machine that Adolf built occasionally slips. Allowing her to leave the country in possession of her voluminous notes was an even greater mistake. Add these mistakes together and the result is a fascinating account of the changes in German judicial procedure since Hitler's assumption of power.

The strength of this book lies in its painstaking documentation, which the author somehow accomplishes without for one moment fatiguing the attention of the lay reader. Scores of case histories are recited in detail; dozens of German judges, from those on the powerful People's Court to police-court magistrates, are named and sharply characterized. The organization of Mrs. Roper's material, credited to Clara Leiser, who rendered the account into English, plays no small role in the success of the book. Individual facts are gathered under such comprehensive and revealing chapter headings as The Jewish Trials, Rassenschande (Race-Shame) Trials, Foreign Exchange Trials, and The Political Trials.

The scandal of the Reichstag-fire trial begot a literature of its own, but to base our condemnation of fascist justice upon such sensational cases is not altogether safe. Herr Goebbels and his Ministry of Propaganda could quickly point to the Sacco-Vanzetti case as an instance of our own injustice. Infinitely more damning for fascism are Mrs. Roper's quiet accounts of hundreds of cases involving obscure individuals, cases that never reached the headlines. Injustice is shown to be not the accidental exception but the prevailing rule. This is not just another book about the horror inside Germany but an invaluable reference work for every anti-fascist.

War Aims for Victory!

"A heartening book . . . for those who have both hope and confidence in the capacity of democracy to fight for its own survival with weapons as revolutionary as those with which it started. . . ."

—Joseph Barnes, Herald Tribune "Books"

Fascism can be wiped out—but not by armies alone. We must know why fascism has spread—what democracy's weaknesses are—how to overcome them. The former editor of the London Daily Herald supplies an exciting blueprint for victory! Instead of saying, "Democracy must win," this vital book tells HOW! Here is strong meat with which to nourish every liberal's faith in victory—and especially in a victory worth winning.

Wild Sea Water

SOUTH STAR. By John Gould Fletcher. The Macmillan Company. $2.

WHEN, more than ten years ago, I first read John Gould Fletcher's variously colored Symphonies and Irradiations, I thought, "This is perhaps a poetry—like Edmund Spenser's—to which I will have to grow up."

Now I have read "South Star." It opens on a historical narrative, The Story of Arkansas. None of the twists of the rhythm, none of the varieties of rhyme—every device of couplet, quatrain, blank verse, free verse, short line to long line, invocation, lyric interlude is used—halt its mighty, headlong, irresistible prosiness. The events move like a high-school pageant. The characters have the animation of equestrian statuary: De Soto is "an armored man—a knight of ancient Spain"; "A marvelous vision cheered La Salle's stern heart"; "The steady gaze of Jefferson . . ."; "Then Woodruff came on. . . . And James Miller too came on. . . . And the governors came, Izard and Pope and Fulton. . . . And Albert Pike came. . . ." The cumulative effect can be seen in the lines:

Through the swamps, through the lake, through the clay,
Sinking down to their bridle reins,
They stagger and slash, but they find not a way;
So they ride back again for their pains.

After fifty pages of this come lyrics of Arkansas, the Upper South, the Deep South. Whatever their theme, the matter-of-fact still pursues them. Here are lines from the first five: "My father's watch this is, and it is old"; "Here was I fashioned and made"; "Low bosoms gleamed, the fiddlers scraped like mad"; "I have lived long. . . . Have felt the salty taste of kisses and the cold ache of being tired"; "Close by the door there hung a long lean scythe/Which, ere lawn-mowers came, was oft in play." This must be a falling-off from the 1939 Pulitzer Prize poems. I turned back to them.

The earliest suggest some of the graces and strangenesses of Chinese poems, without their brevity. If they are exotic, with "pale terraces" and "lacquered mandarin moments" and "flamboyant crenellations," the words are appropriate to one another; the repetitions and phrase permutations, the various "mood-movements," recall forms in music. But as they begin to move from "pure poetry" to personal meaning and observation, this resemblance diminishes. The orchestrations are ruined by an apparent belief that any theme, repeated and expanded, gains in significance. It is all done with pedals.

If I am right, if feeling, sincerity, industry, persistence have not been enough, what is it, for poetry, that corresponds to the 10 per cent of "wild sea water" without which fish in an artificial medium may not survive?

IN BRIEF

THE DAM. By Jerome Ellison. Random House. $2.

A short novel with a happy ending, telling about a Chicago construction engineer forced out of work by the depression and how he rehabilitates himself and his family when he is placed in charge of an important WPA project. A few Dos Passos touches attempt to relate the individuals' lives and tribulations to the crazy pattern of the United States in the 1930's, but they neither impede nor add much to the weight of a simple tale about honest, well-meaning American people anxious to do their rightful work.

THE CAPTAIN FROM CONNECTICUT. By C. S. Forester. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Another spanking good mizzenmast and broadside yarn by the author of "Captain Horatio Hornblower," this time about the War of 1812, when American commerce destroyers were preying on British convoys as relentlessly, though hardly as efficiently, as the Germans are now.

A collection of twenty-two delightful stories by the foremost living authority on family life and dialect in the Bronx, with additional local color supplied through illustrations by Hoff.

THOSE TORN FROM EARTH. By Frederick Hollander. Liveright Publishing Corporation. $2.50.

A somewhat fantastic and shapeless but moving odyssey of artists driven from the Third Reich and carrying on their work in new fatherlands not yet "purified" by the Nazis.

HOUSING FOR DEFENSE. A Review of the Role of Housing in Relation to America's Defense. Factual findings by Miles L. Colean and the Program for Action of the Housing Committee of the Twentieth Century Fund. $1.50.

From an extremely thorough and valuable analysis of the basic elements of a national housing policy in all its aspects, in the light of the experience of 1917-1918, the sound conclusion is drawn that an immediate plan of action is necessary to avoid the mistakes and delays of that time. More debatable is the finding that "private industry has the capacity to provide the major part of the housing needs of our defense program." Taken as a premise in the program of action, it raises some knotty problems, especially that of rent control, which a more candid use of the factual findings might avoid.

WANTED . . . A PATRON

This advertisement is inserted by a business man who back in 1926 retired to unravel the paradox of poverty and insecurity amidst potential abundance. Having achieved financial independence, after coming here as a poor immigrant, I wanted to repay my debt to America. I wanted to help make America's democracy a going concern.

My quest took me to South America and the countries of the Old World. I took time to observe the working of democracy in France and England. I went to see Soviet Russia and Fascist Italy in action. I observed the rise of Nazism on the spot. Later I went again to Germany to appraise its fruits. I have documentary proof that I spent thousands of dollars in this undertaking in the service of democracy.

In 1933, I put my findings in a book entitled "Enough for Everybody," published by Bobbs-Merrill. This was largely an analysis of our socio-economic ills. Later, I wrote a synthesis, or a way out of our difficulties.

As a trained economist, I say that my proposals are the first comprehensive plan since the one by Karl Marx (all others are fragmentary, with no blueprints for thoroughgoing action), with this difference: I do not ask to impoverish the rich in order to enrich the poor. I do not ask the dictatorship of any group. When there is enough for everybody, we don't have to hurt anybody to achieve the general well being. With our potential abundance liberated and rationally distributed, we can well maintain the high standards of living while raising the low standards.

Also, as a practical man, I have woven no theory that may not work in practice. Instead, my plan merely proposes to carry to their completion many of the creative partial adjustments already made in the New Age. A democracy, freed from the ills of maladjustment which brought many a past civilization to its knees, will, because of its inherent vitality, grow healthy and dynamic, and give us the real prosperity we want.

When I completed the manuscript in 1935, I let it rest for two reasons. First, I wanted to see if my thesis can stand the acid test of changing times. Second, I waited for the psychological hour when my proposals would have the chance of a hearing.

The hour has struck now. And on re-reading the manuscript I find that my proposals would also help fortify the democracies in their life-and-death struggle with totalitarianism. They would rid the economic order—of which our rearmament program is an integral part—of its anachronisms and its insufficiencies. They would help create a faith in democracy to surpass the fanatical faith of the Nazis.

To re-write the manuscript from the viewpoint of the war which broke out after its completion would take a full-time job of some months. To do this, I must put a capable man in my place to run my business, for I no longer have the means to retire again. Additional funds might well be used to supplement the publisher's advertising expenditures.

Therefore, I make the following offer to a person of means who would sponsor my book. I will give in return for his investment a share in the proceeds of the book. It is expected to have a large sale. Besides its sound and timely thesis, it will contain autobiographic sketches of my varied and adventurous life. These, I am told, would add color and life to the otherwise impersonal content of a politico-economic treatise.

Sponsorship of such a work is an appropriate combination of public duty and material benefits. Men in other walks of life have combined both with commendable results.

MUSIC

WITH no brilliant stage spectacle to claim one's attention at the recent concert performance of "Four Saints in Three Acts" in Town Hall, one gave it wholly to Virgil Thomson's music—to the unique method and its delightful and at times moving result. By separating and differentiating the flat repetitions of a Gertrude Stein verbal sequence Thomson's music articulates and differentiates them, gives them point and even sense; the music also imparts to them its own structure, climax; and its effect is often the most delightful humor. Some of the humor consists in skilful musical pointing up—by the high-lighting of a group of words, the placing of it in relation to its context—of Miss Stein's surprises and irrelevances of juxtaposition; and to these Thomson adds occasional incongruities of his own contriving between words and music—words of little or no sense or weight, and style and structure of great emotional import and weight in the music. But when such music is given to words like the "led, said, wed, dead" sequence the result is very moving. And in addition to the pleasure from the work there was the pleasure from the superb voice and style of Edward Matthews, the fine singing of Beatrice Robinson Wayne, the magnificent work of the chorus, in the performance expertly directed by Alexander Smallens.

A few days before this beautiful performance of a sophisticated work by trained Negro singers the fourth Coffee Concert at the Museum of Modern Art offered Negro religious music sung by members of the Reverend Utah Smith's congregation of the Church of God in Christ, Newark, who used only their fine natural voices and innate musical feeling. Recalling what such occasions can be made into one was impressed by the managerial skill and tact that had made these people feel at ease and had then placed them on the stage and left the rest entirely to them—left it to the Reverend Smith himself to run his show and get tangled up engagingly in his words, his ideas, his guitar, his wings, and left it to the others to sing and act their naive musical narratives with complete absorption, with affecting intensity, and in some instances with exciting vocal and musical style.

Decca Set 185 ($2.75) offers a number of the most popular Chopin Valses—the Grande Valse Brillante Op. 18

(23191); Op. 69 No. 1 and the posthumous Valse in E minor (23192); Op. 64 Nos. 1 and 2, and Op. 70 No. 1 (23193)—played with grace and good taste by Robert Goldsand. The performances, which are better than Cortot's on Victor and Kilenyi's on Columbia, are moderately well recorded; but Op. 64 No. 2, in my review set, has a bad rattle.

In Victor Set P-61 ($2) the Golden Gate Quartet give excellent performances of some of their Bible Tales: "Jonah and the Whale" and "Preacher and the Bear" (27322); "Noah" and "Job" (27323); "John the Revelator" and "Sampson" (27324). Victor Set P-53 ($2) offers six English folk dances played by the Folk Dance Band under Ronnie Munro, with directions for the dances. The first volume of Latin-American folk music recorded by the guitarist Oyanguren (Decca Set 174, $2.75) I have not found interesting. There are some good things in Folk Songs of the Americas (Victor Set P-55, $3.50), and others that I don't care for; some of the foreign songs are sung—by Elsie Houston, among others—in the original foreign languages, but others are sung in English by an American quartet.

Concerning the wavering in pitch that I have reported hearing occasionally on Victor and Columbia records a reader writes to explain that it is caused by a common defect in records—"an eccentricity between the grooves of a pressing and the center hole" which can be observed in the oscillation of the pickup as it moves across the record. He points out that an oscillation of 1/16 of an inch means that near the center of the record "a sustained note would vary within frequency limits nearly a quarter-tone apart. . . . An extraordinary number of records have an eccentricity of as much as 1/32 of an inch, which is usually not too objectionable except on sustained notes and near the center of the record. When the eccentricity becomes greater than 1/32 of an inch, records have noticeable waver . . . and are, in my opinion, defective records which the companies ought to reject in the first place, or exchange if sold." My correspondent tells me that "correspondence with the Victor Company about two years ago brought forth a smug reply that their records had no eccentricity" (he would have got the same answer from Columbia). And his conclusion is "If you could bring this matter before the public the companies might eventually recognize the value of correcting eccentricity."

Few Vote for Fordism

Dear Sirs: The striking feature of the recent NLRB election in Ford's River Rouge plant was not the victory won by the C. I. O. or the large vote polled by the A. F. of L. but the emphatic repudiation of Henry Ford reflected in the very small "neither" vote—less than 2,000 out of a total of nearly 78,000. The reasons for it are perfectly clear to anyone who has had a chance to observe, even casually, the innumerable irritations that a Ford worker must endure.

As one approaches any of the gates of the Ford empire, one is greeted with a barked-out "What's your business here?" from one of a group of men in civilian clothes who look more like loiterers than attendants who might be expected to give out information and directions. These loiterers, one learns, are the Ford service men, members of the privileged strong-arm squad, who keep an ever-watchful eye on the production men and see that the law, as Ford makes it, is unflinchingly enforced.

One of the rules is that there shall be no smoking anywhere within the 12,000 acres of the River Rouge domain. This is not merely a precautionary measure; it is a projection of Ford's personal asceticism. Smoking is prohibited in every nook and cranny of the place, including the foundry, where smoke and fire are always present, and the washrooms, where smoking could not possibly be harmful or dangerous. So absolute is this prohibition, enforced by the way without the aid of signs, that buddies changing shifts are likely to remark, "I'll think of you in here when I get out and light my first cigarette."

There are no chairs anywhere within reach of the production men; and in the most highly mechanized production plant in the world men must squat on the floor to eat their lunch, for which they are allowed fifteen minutes or half an hour. Anyone caught using the lavatories to rest his weight was, until quite recently, subject to dismissal, and there was usually a service man around to report the offense.

Henry Ford is referred to by both service and production men as "he." "He" will do this, "he" will do that, "he" will not tolerate the other. But "he" received few votes. During the tally, one ballot was found on which only the word "Christ" was written. The company watchers protested against counting it void, insisting that it was meant as a vote for Henry Ford.

A number of the service men and some members of the supervisory force, apparently under instructions from the company, tried to vote. When they were challenged, they claimed to be doing various sorts of work auxiliary to production. One of them said he was a "pipe-leak-looker-ater." Another said he was not a foreman but just a "gang boss." "How many in your gang?" "About three hundred," he replied. "Practically a Führer," the C. I. O. watcher snapped back.

The visitor to the Ford plant is deeply impressed with the cleanliness, the spaciousness, the smooth clock-like efficiency of the huge enterprise. But when one observes the arrogant strutting of the service men, their aloof and threatening silence, and the looks of resentment directed at them by the men in overalls; when one is told that a voter said to a coworker who was serving as a poll watcher, "I bet you think you're smart sitting down in the plant"; when a watcher sucking on an unlit pipe is ruled out lest he make the men "feel bad"; when, in other words, a chair and a cigarette emerge as the two most immediate desires of a River Rouge worker, one realizes why 97.4 per cent of Ford's 78,000 employees leaped at the chance to tell him that they don't like being treated as automata.

Let's Not Supply the Axis

Dear Sirs: I wish to express my appreciation of an editorial appearing in your issue of May 17 entitled No Henbane for Japan. Many of us are much concerned over the continued exportation of essential war materials to the Axis powers and feel that these shipments should be stopped immediately. It seems nothing short of criminal to continue to supply our enemies with steel, petroleum, and other war materials to use against Great Britain and possibly later against our own armed forces.

If this country is waging an all-out war against aggression, we should insist that American business firms join with our drafted men and boys now in army camps, and with our laborers engaged in production, in making whatever sacrifices are necessary to win the war. If the United States is helpless in controlling large international firms, the sooner we learn the facts the better; so that some type of world organization can be established which can control them.

I believe American sentiment on this matter is sufficiently aroused to insist upon proper action being taken by our State Department. Perhaps we need another national committee, one which might be called "The Committee to Stop Sending War Materials to the Axis Powers." The Nation would be performing a great public service if it launched a crusade to secure action on this matter.

Waiting for Leadership

Dear Sirs: Possibly your readers may be interested in this telegram which I have just sent to President Roosevelt:

For twenty years everything has been too late. We dare not permit our navy to lie idle while our only possible ally bleeds slowly to death. Our people are ignorant of their danger. They await your leadership.

A Natural Reluctance

Dear Sirs: It seems to me rather unjust that you should be condemning so harshly the OPM executives, particularly Mr. Knudsen, for their lack of cooperation in the present crisis in defense production. Men who have ruled industry for years can hardly be transformed overnight into big-hearted patriots just because it looks as if a distant crisis (it's way over in Europe, isn't it?) might remotely begin to affect this country some time.

One of the great inconsistencies of our capitalistic society is the encouragement we give the profit-seeking motive until disaster threatens, when we condemn industrial magnates for their natural reluctance to start throwing profits away—which is precisely what subcontracting would mean to Mr. Knudsen and his dollar-a-year brethren.

I entirely agree with you that something must be done to loosen the grip of the dollar-a-year men on defense production, but I still do not condemn Mr. Knudsen and the others for their attitude. It is a natural outcome of years of monopoly and power. Few of us common wage-earners would act differently if we were in their shoes.

Nazi Poles in London

Dear Sirs: Wladyslaw Malinowski's letter in your issue of May 31 could be construed as a confirmation rather than a refutation of my article in The Nation, Anti-Semitism in Exile, if it were not for its last surprising conclusion that I was unfair to the Polish people. In my article I drew a sharp distinction between the Polish people now actually under Nazi domination and the small group of Polish exiles in Great Britain. I even differentiated between the Socialist and reactionary exiles and made it quite clear that the Socialist press and speakers in Great Britain did not participate in the shameful anti-Semitic campaign. Mr. Malinowski confirms all these facts, but treats as entirely unimportant the activities of the anti-Semitic faction in England. Figures recently issued in official Polish quarters in London, however, showed that at least 50 per cent of the Polish National Council (the Polish parliament in exile) was outspokenly anti-Semitic. This section of the Polish people is far from insignificant, and its activities cannot be ignored.

The analogy which Mr. Malinowski draws between these anti-Semitic exiled Poles and the French "collaborators" with Hitler is not entirely complete, for whatever one may think of the Vichy collaborators, the fact remains that they are entirely at the mercy of the Nazis, whereas the Poles are conducting their campaign against the Jews on British soil. It was the shameless perversity of these Polish Nazis that prompted me to speak out in The Nation, not any political motive, still less any feeling of animosity for the enslaved Polish people, for whom I have the profoundest sympathy.

Release This Chinese Poet!

Dear Sirs: May I appeal to your readers for help in behalf of H. T. Tsiang, Chinese poet and patriot, for a period of years an earnest student in this country, now confined for nearly a year on Ellis Island awaiting deportation.

I have tried in vain to find out, in any clear and definite fashion, why this young man should be sent back to China, where in all probability he will be put to death. I can discover nothing but baffling technicalities.

It is my hope that legal proceedings now under way will accomplish his release. But an earlier, indeed immediate, release should be granted by executive authority. To this end I appeal to your readers to write to Secretary Perkins or to Thurman Arnold, of the Department of Justice, asking for action.

The Shape of Things

WITH THE RESCUE OF A SECOND GROUP OF the Robin Moor's passengers and crew, all those aboard the torpedoed vessel have been accounted for. But the happy miracle that saved the lives of these forty-six American citizens abandoned without mercy in mid-ocean cannot be allowed to excuse the German action. We may put aside the question of contraband, for both Britain and Germany have extended the definition of contraband to cover almost every article conceivably capable of being used to promote the enemy's war effort, and the Robin Moor's cargo included such things as trucks and steel rails. But granting that contraband was carried, the German submarine commander clearly violated the London naval treaty of 1930, which was signed by Germany, when he sank the ship without regard to the safety of those on board. The Administration, we are sure, will demand a formal explanation, an apology, and reparation for this incident. But it ought to go much farther and take steps to prevent any repetition. By the Neutrality Act we voluntarily abdicated the right to pursue our commerce in wide areas conceded to be danger zones. Now if any American ship carrying on any kind of trade with Britain and its allies is to be sunk wherever an Axis raider may catch it, most of our remaining trade routes will be blocked also. Authorized German spokesmen, commenting on the Robin Moor case, have been anything but conciliatory. "Germany," we are told, "won't be buffaloed by American or English discussions concerning the Robin Moor. Whenever any ship with contraband sails for England we'll shoot at it." Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles has pointed out that Americans have never been impressed by "bluster or threats." To do the Nazis justice, we think they are equally indifferent to bluff. Only by action can they be made to respect American interests.

THE BRITISH CAMPAIGN AGAINST SYRIA HAS not developed a Blitzkrieg tempo. Clearly Sir Henry Maitland Wilson, who commands the British and Free French forces, is anxious to restrict casualties on both sides as much as possible. But desertions from Vichy's army appear to have been on a smaller scale than had been expected, while the attitude of the main body of Syrian Arabs has not yet been clearly defined. If the British are successful in capturing Beirut and Damascus, food supplies rushed from Palestine to these big centers of population may prove a compelling argument in winning the native Syrians from their extremely tenuous allegiance to Vichy. Meanwhile the news of the conflict seems to have done little to swing opinion in France away from pro-British sympathy and closer to the policy of collaboration in the "New Order." Admiral Darlan in his latest speech found it convenient not to mention Syria. Instead, he begged his audience not to listen to external voices and to avoid a disastrous peace for France by following where Vichy led. It was a remarkable admission of the gap which exists between Frenchmen and their nominal government. "There are many," said Darlan, "who are trying to darken the nation's understanding. You are nervous and anxious because, unhappily, many of you believe everything that is said and whispered, even without taking time to reflect—many believe that what they hear every day over the clandestine or dissident radio, paid for by a foreign power, is the absolute truth." This is indeed so, and the Admiral might have added that few Frenchmen believe anything they see in the French press or hear from the official government radio because they are rightly convinced that both do no more than parrot the voice of Berlin.

THE SMOKE OF RUMOR HANGING HEAVILY along the two-thousand-mile frontier between Hitler's Europe and Stalin's Russia is diverting attention from the smoke of battle over the Syrian and Libyan deserts. Perhaps that is the intention, or perhaps by making threatening gestures in the direction of Moscow the Nazis hope to conceal preparations for an all-out attempt to invade Britain. For there is no doubt that Berlin is encouraging rumors of troop concentrations directed against Russia and of impending military and economic demands on Russia of a sweeping character. In fact, if these stories, which pop up in one European center after another, could be traced to their source, most of them would probably be found to have originated in Goebbels's busy production department. Germany, as usual, seems to be playing a double skin-game. By brandishing his sword toward the east Hitler may hope to give an argument to those appeasers in Britain and America who have always thought his lust for conquest could be assuaged at the expense of Russia. This argument no longer cuts much ice in Britain, but conceivably American isolationists might still attempt to use it. On the other hand, Hitler does genuinely need Russian cereals and oil if he is to keep his swollen empire functioning through another year or more of war, and he has reason to know that Stalin is ready to pay a very big price to stave off a conflict. A clash between Germany and Russia seems unlikely, but of course Hitler may overplay his hand and demand more than even the dictator of all the Russias dare concede. There does not seem much that either Britain or America can do by way of interference, except to make it clear to the world that, no matter what other enemies Germany may attract, they will press the war unrelentingly.

THE PRESIDENT'S ACTION CLOSING GERMAN consular and propaganda offices in the United States, coming on top of his order freezing Axis funds in this country, brings us as close to a break in diplomatic relations as we could come without taking that final step. No one can doubt the justification for this action. It has long been an open secret that German consular officials have been supervising propaganda activities detrimental to the policies of our government. Agencies like the German Library of Information and Transocean News have flooded this country with somewhat crude arguments in defense of the Nazi political system. Since these agencies were violating no law, exceptional measures had to be taken to stop them. As for the freezing of Axis funds, that came so late that it can hardly have much effect. Although it is estimated that Germany and Italy at one time had assets in this country of between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000, most of these assets were long ago turned into cash. Yet as long as the Axis powers were allowed financial freedom, there was no way of keeping them from using their balances to finance propaganda activities in Latin America. It is probable that they also found these balances useful for financing a subterranean trade in war materials to Germany via the Far East. This trade will now doubtless be financed by Japanese balances. Why Japan was not included in the order is not clear unless it was because the Administration is unwilling to antagonize Standard Oil and other companies which are still making large profits out of trade with an avowed enemy.

THE STATEMENT OF THE POLISH CABINET IN exile in London pledging equal treatment in the new Free Poland for citizens "regardless of nationality, race, or religion" and condemning all anti-Semitic moves as harmful to the Polish cause is like a fresh breeze through an old ghetto. William Zukerman, in an excellent article in our issue of May 17, nailed down the anti-Semitic tendencies of influential Poles living in England. He also reported that the London News-Chronicle had been storming against the insult to democracy and the abuse of hospitality inherent in this attitude. The statement of the Polish Cabinet is certainly an answer to the News-Chronicle's campaign. It is also designed to win the goodwill of Americans, Jews and non-Jews, and we can't help feeling that Mr. Zukerman's direct attack found its way into the councils of the Polish Government in Exile.

ALTHOUGH AMBASSADOR GREW'S PROTEST against the bombing of the American safety zone at Chungking, during which bombs fell near the United States gunboat Tutuila, suggests a stronger policy toward Tokyo, the most recent Washington news hints at appeasement. Sensational stories regarding the location of the American fleet continue to be heard around the capital. And it has been revealed that despite talk of "gasless Sundays" along the Atlantic seaboard, Japan continues to get 800,000 barrels of oil a month—including high-octane gasoline usable in airplanes. We hope the direct action of Harold Ickes in halting a shipment of oil to Japan will be repeated. It is said that the President hesitates to dispatch a fleet of battleships to Singapore or Manila lest the United States become involved in a "shooting war" in the Pacific at a time when the Atlantic situation is most critical. Such a possibility cannot, of course, be disregarded. But if the past experience of the democracies with the Axis powers means anything at all, the surest way to create a situation out of which a "shooting war" will inevitably develop is to use big words and a small stick—while providing the potential enemy with the sinews of war.

JAPAN IS STILL IN A QUANDARY ABOUT HOW to deal with the rejection of its demands by the government of the Dutch East Indies. The trade delegation headed by Kenkichi Yoshizawa remains in Batavia despite several reports that it would be withdrawn. Whether negotiations will be continued seems to depend on the nature of the Dutch reply, as yet unpublished. Meanwhile, veiled hints of Japanese armed action in the near future are in the air. From a Chinese source we hear that the Japanese navy is already moving southward. Such reports have been circulated so frequently in the past that it is well to take them with a grain of salt. Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that the extremists are urging action, and although the extremists are not so powerful as they were a few years ago, it is never safe to count them out altogether. A year ago the Japanese could have had the East Indies for the taking. But if they move today they will encounter not only much more effective Dutch resistance but a much-strengthened Britain at Singapore. This opposition they might risk if they felt confident that the United States would stand by and allow its chief source of rubber, tin, and other strategic raw materials to fall into Japanese hands.

THE PRESIDENT'S SUPREME COURT CHOICES are on the whole good. Senator Byrnes, who replaces Justice McReynolds, has long been regarded as one of the ablest men in Congress. His bad record on legislation in behalf of Negroes is the chief count against him, and a serious one. But he has been very effective in the field of government reorganization. The findings of the committee of which he was head still stand as the most constructive program for the coordination of social security, public works, and relief. Attorney General Jackson, who is to replace Hughes, has made a brilliant record as an able and consistent liberal during his brief stay in his present post. His position on civil liberties has been particularly sound, and it is comforting to know that a man with these views is to sit on the Supreme Court during the difficult period that lies ahead. The only appointment that had not been generally foreseen was that of Associate Justice Stone to be Chief Justice. And yet this should not have been a surprise, for Justice Stone is undoubtedly one of the ablest members of the court, as well as the oldest in point of service. Although a staunch Republican and Attorney General under Coolidge, he was among the first to recognize the necessity for greater governmental powers to meet the exceptional problems of the present day. As Chief Justice he can be relied upon to use his influence to see that laws are interpreted on a common-sense rather than on a formal or legalistic basis.

THE BOLD MOVE OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL of the American Federation of Teachers in initiating a membership referendum on the proposal to expel three locals on charges of Communist domination resulted in an overwhelming vote in its favor. Excluding the votes of the expelled locals, the membership approved the council's action by approximately four to one. New locals will be chartered to take the place of those expelled, and petitions for these charters have already been filed; but all applications for membership will be passed upon by a committee of four. The most difficult and delicate task still lies ahead—the task of keeping out Stalinists, those who hold party cards and those who don't, without penalizing the innocents who are the easiest prey of the "militant" Communists. It is so difficult, in fact, that no union would adopt such a procedure if there were any other way out of an intolerable situation. The situation in the Teachers' Union was certainly intolerable; and since it is a voluntary union and there is no question of the closed shop, the desperate remedy seems to us justified. It seems quite likely to be administered without abuses, for the members of the executive council are known liberals who realize that the vast majority of members of the expelled locals, like the membership of most unions under party control, are not Stalinists. One of the charters may be issued to the Teachers' Guild, which split away from the Teachers' Union several years ago on the very same issue. Meanwhile the officers of the expelled locals are threatening legal action and a fight at the union convention in August. One mark of the Stalinist is his intense dislike of even a taste of his own purgative medicine.

WE RECOMMEND AS GOOD LIGHT READING the annual report of the Department of Lighting of the City of Seattle. Last year's revenues were $6,273,199, an increase of $144,456 over 1939. Operating expenses, less depreciation, were $2,102,397, an increase of $66,616, which went largely to increased wages. The average wage of the plant's employees is $172.90 a month, and they work forty hours a week. During 1940 the "all-electric rate" was introduced, providing residents of Seattle with electric energy for all domestic purposes except house heating at a cost of only $5 for 370 kilowatt-hours per month. The people of Seattle not only save thousands of dollars every year on electricity for domestic use; they also enjoy the distinction of paying only 1.9 cents a kilowatt hour for their street lighting, which is one-half the rate paid in the majority of American cities. Unlike the private companies, City Light does something about paying off its bonded indebtedness. Since 1904 it has redeemed nearly $22,000,000 worth of bonds entirely from its revenues, and in 1940 it redeemed $1,704,000 worth. "Of course," says the spokesman for the private companies, "they pay no taxes." Wrong again. City Light paid taxes and made contributions to the cost of government to the tune of $577,640.

Letting Britain Down

AFTER the President's words of a few weeks ago about the necessity for getting aid to Britain, the official figures on the first three months' operation of the Lend-Lease Act come as a profound shock. It will be recalled that when the act was passed, provision was made for the immediate release of $1,300,000,000 in supplies from existing army and navy stocks so that no time would be lost waiting for new production. It was recognized on every hand that the situation called for the utmost speed. The position of Britain and Greece in the Mediterranean was already critical in mid-March. An invasion of England was widely expected by April or May. The shipping situation had become extremely serious on the Atlantic. There was a clear recognition of the fact that if we did not soon get substantial shipments to England and Greece it would be too late.

Such was the urgency. What are the results? A close analysis of the President's report indicates that we turned over to Great Britain in the first three months of the Lend-Lease program just $10,729,684 in supplies out of the $7,000,000,000 appropriated. Of this practically $8,000,000 consisted of agricultural products, leaving the total amount of munitions—by the broadest stretching of the word—at a little more than $2,700,000. No ammunition, ordinance, or arms were supplied out of the $7,000,000,000 fund during the first three months. About $1,500,000 worth of aircraft was provided.

The total value of shipments for the period was $75,000,000, but more than $64,000,000 of this amount came out of appropriations made prior to the passage of the Lend-Lease Act, and these shipments would have presumably been sent whether the act was passed or not. Even this latter figure is very far from the $1,300,000,000 which we were supposed to provide from existing army and navy stores. And it is still farther from the $1,000,000,000 a month which, according to conservative estimates, we must furnish Britain if American assistance is to offset Germany's superiority in armament production plus the economic advantages Germany has gained through the conquest of Europe.

Mr. Roosevelt makes much of the fact that $4,277,000,000 of the $7,000,000,000 was allocated during the first seventy-four days of the Lend-Lease program. This, of course, is a commendable record. But the history of the domestic defense program has shown that there is little or no relation between allocations and production.

In part, the bad showing in shipments may be attributed to transport problems. Great Britain has too few ships to carry all the goods we should be sending. But that is obviously not the crux of the difficulty. No additional shipping would be required to transfer fifty or seventy-five destroyers to Britain. Nor would it require ships to deliver a substantial number of bombers from existing army and navy stocks. And there is nothing to stop the United States from turning over additional merchant shipping to Britain. The real difficulty obviously lies deeper. It is to be found in the opposition of army and navy bureaucrats to turning anything over to Britain which we might need ourselves. Yet even if we do get into this war within a few months, our defense production will presumably have risen by that time to really substantial proportions. Meanwhile why not do all we can to help keep England going? For months we have been operating on the assumption that this was the government's policy. If it is our policy, it is high time we began to do something about it.

St. Lawrence Power

THE most hopeful document to come out of the Office of Production Management since its establishment was Release No. 516, dated June 5. "The press reported," the release said coldly, "that Mr. C. W. Kellogg, an OPM consultant, in a speech at Buffalo on June 3, expressed the opinion that no shortage was to be expected in electric power." "This view," the announcement went on to say, "could only have been expressed by Mr. Kellogg in his individual capacity, as it does not represent the position of the Office of Production Management. The Office of Production Management is not in agreement with the views on this subject which the press has ascribed to Mr. Kellogg. On the contrary. . . ." The contrary, as stressed in the President's farsighted message on the St. Lawrence project, is that we have a shortage of power now, that shortages in the future are likely to increase, and that we must plan for expansion of power production immediately. And the OPM has now formally indorsed the President's position by approving the St. Lawrence waterway project.

One way to facilitate expansion of power, as of other production facilities, is to place men in control who are in sympathy with such expansion and have no private interests to be served by scarcity. Mr. Kellogg, the OPM's consultant on power, is head of the Edison Electric Institute. Like most of the OPM's consultants, he represents private interests opposed to expansion and to an "all-out" effort. It is good to see him rebuked—though the rebuke came after a blistering explosion from Secretary Ickes at a press conference the day before. It would be more encouraging if Mr. Kellogg and others like him were given their dollar and requested to go home. In the field of security regulation we have begun to understand that a man cannot serve two masters, that the public is hurt when the same interests sit on both sides of the table. It is time we applied the lesson to defense. It is time we ended the custom whereby Mr. Kellogg, the OPM consultant, gravely consults with Mr. Kellogg, the head of the Edison Electric Institute, for power trust, and solemnly assures himself that there is no need for the government to expand power facilities. Too many similar "conversations" have taken place on steel, on oil, on aluminum, on railroad cars, on copper, on scrap, and on every vital defense material.

It is painful to see the attitude toward power and the St. Lawrence of newspapers like the New York Times and the Washington Post, which talk of the need for an "all-out" effort. "The enemies of democracy," Mr. Roosevelt said, "are developing every hydroelectric resource and every waterway from Norway to the Dardanelles. Are we to allow this continent to be outmatched because shortsighted interests oppose the development of one of our greatest resources?" The answer of the Times and the Post seems to be "Yes." Though it is proud of being a newspaper "of record," the Times did not see fit to print the text of the President's message and buried the story on an inside page, as though it were the annual report of the Mamaroneck City Council. Both papers brought up the usual seedy objections, plus the new one of "diverting" energies from defense. The fact is, as Mr. Roosevelt pointed out, that the erection of steam electric plants as suggested would be a far more serious diversion of facilities needed for defense. Steam power-plant equipment is a bottleneck in ship construction; we still have plenty of facilities for digging ditches—and the St. Lawrence project is a glorified ditch-digging job.

The St. Lawrence seaway is important not only from the standpoint of power but also from that of shipbuilding. "The Great Lakes today," the President said, "hold many shipways and drydocks, as well as resources of men and materials for shipbuilding. They are bottled up because we have delayed completing the seaway. If we start the seaway now, scores of additional merchant ships may be built in coastal yards freed by transferring a portion of the longer-term naval program to the Great Lakes." Congress must decide whether it will continue to place the wishes of shortsighted power, aluminum, railroad, and port interests ahead of national defense. The question could not be put more clearly than it is by the St. Lawrence project.

Keep Cool on Labor

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE strikes on the West Coast may or may not have been directed from the Kremlin. I don't believe they were. The theory that Stalin was trying to improve his bargaining position with Hitler by demonstrating his ability to sabotage the American defense program seems to me far-fetched even in this fantastic mid-war year. But that theory is not necessary to explain Communist strategy in the strikes. The comrades have fish to fry nearer home than Moscow. They want, first of all, to control the unions; to strengthen their own position behind the isolationist leadership of Lewis while weakening the pro-Administration elements behind Murray and Thomas. Second, they want to sabotage defense. Opposing the whole program and the foreign policy that underlies it, they naturally intend to lay hands on the rich pickings in power and prestige offered by the defense boom, even if they slow up production in the process. Third, they want to create exactly the reaction they have created—in Congress and in the country. Anger and a blind determination to stop defense strikes at any cost are putting fresh steam behind the demand for repressive legislation. Obviously this is what the Communists need. They have argued from the start of the European struggle that "war hysteria" in the United States would bring legislation directed against labor's rights and in the end produce home-grown fascism. Now they have created the objective conditions which may prove their prophecies, and so their entire position, correct. Some elements in Congress seem determined to fall in with Communist strategy and pass just the sort of laws they are angling for.

I think the President was right to send the army to take over the North American plant. He faced a challenge that the government could not ignore. It was a revolutionary challenge. The men responsible for breaking the union's agreement to give the Mediation Board a chance to settle the dispute represented an outlaw element. If the President had not acted, they would have made good their defiance of their own union, as well as of the government. Such a success would have ended the hope of labor-government collaboration in the defense program and at the same time dynamited the whole structure of collective bargaining, which has been built with such enormous effort during the past eight years. The President's act precipitated the struggle inside the union and gave the pro-defense, pro-democratic forces both the strength and the opportunity to gain control.

But the use of troops to break a strike is a dangerous expedient. Successful once, like a slap in the face administered to a hysteric, it would be fatal as a regular treatment. And so it is easy to understand Philip Murray's opposition to an act that temporarily strengthened his hand in the union, although it is unfortunate that he failed to temper his attack with a clear statement of labor's stake in the defense program. Murray knows how easily, in war time, the habit of violence and repression takes hold. And he knows that repression, through executive act or legislation, will promptly swing the balance the other way, bringing rank-and-file support to the anti-Administration, anti-defense elements in the union.

It has already done so. The Communists and isolationists are not stupid. Having lost one round, they seized their next chance to move into action. No sooner had Murray denounced the use of troops and the anti-strike legislation brewing in Congress, than the New York Industrial Union Council, dominated by Communists, hurried to back the C. I. O. president in his "fight against repression," and they were joined by such eminent fellow-travelers as Mike Quill of the Transport Workers and Joe Curran of the Maritime Union. This effort to haul Murray into camp probably will fail, but it may succeed in weakening his position before Congress; his excellent case will not be helped by the support of isolationists and party-liners. And, even more important, it may serve to deceive the ordinary union member into thinking that there's no real difference after all between the Murray-Thomas-Frankenstein faction and the Lewis-Communist faction—that they're all agin the government together.

Murray has repudiated the rumors of splits and declared against any attempt to start a "witch hunt" within the ranks of labor. He has opposed the deportation of Harry Bridges and has held a long, friendly conference with Joe Curran. It is clear that he hopes to subdue rather than purge the so-called "leftists" among the C. I. O. officials. And perhaps this is a statesman-like move. It is if it works; but like most measures of appeasement it may also offer his opponents a breathing-space in which to marshal their forces and carry out their tactics of penetration and confusion. It will take a master-strategist to beat them at that game.

There is only one way to straighten out this evil mess. The President and Congress must put the whole weight of the government behind the responsible leaders in both labor organizations. Because the foreign policy of the Administration does in fact offer the only hope of a future for free organized labor, it has the support of the majority of the workers and the best of their leaders. The election showed that to be true, and every important test in the leading unions has borne it out. The Communist and other isolationist groups can do no more than cause incidental trouble—unless the government goes out of its way to build up their strength. The one thing that will make them a menace rather than a nuisance is a wave of repressive legislation. So it is up to the President and Congress to decide whether or not they will strengthen the hands of their enemies—who are also the enemies of labor itself.

It is necessary, obviously, for the government to wipe out, by whatever face-saving formula can be devised, the reckless work-or-fight order of Brigadier General Hershey. This order not only did a disservice to the army by converting the draft into a form of penal servitude. It also wiped out the right to strike through a measure hardly distinguishable from martial law. It is guaranteed to rouse the fighting resistance of all able-bodied workers and create antagonism to the government and the army where none previously existed. If the Communists and Lewisites are to be neutralized, this order will have to go.

The Connally amendment to the Selective Service Act, already passed by the Senate, seems certain to be adopted in some form. The bill does little more than provide legislative sanction for what the President did on his own executive authority in North Inglewood—take possession of vital defense plants tied up or threatened by strikes. Since he has the power in any case, adoption of the amendment serves as a sort of vote of confidence. The C. I. O. opposes the bill, as perhaps it should do on principle. But so does the National Association of Manufacturers; and Senator Vandenberg, ignoring Communist denunciation of the measure, has said that he fears it will lead to permanent nationalization, adding, "Communism undoubtedly is interested in the nationalization of industry, and this bill might unwittingly help the fifth column." Idiocy aside, the Connally amendment may prove pragmatically useful, serving as a lightning rod to head off more drastic measures. If it is adopted we must look to the Executive to display the restraint and wisdom which alone will guide the country through the industrial hazards of the next few months. The Administration must put its foot down hard on the fierce anti-labor agitation which the Communists asked for and helped to foment. And by coordinating and speeding up and extending the facilities for mediation it must attempt to settle the outstanding labor disputes before they reach the stage where another showdown with the armed forces of the country becomes necessary.

Inglewood's Backwash

BY ROSE M. STEIN

Washington, June 16

IF, AS it is perfectly reasonable to assume, the chief purpose of the subversive elements behind the recent labor upheaval was disruption, embarrassment, and confusion, it was fully attained. Production was halted. The most pro-labor President in American history was forced to use federal troops in a strike. The slow fire which Philip Murray was building under obstructionists in the C. I. O. in order to smoke them out quietly burst into a major conflagration, bringing into the open a fight for which he was not fully prepared. Congressional clamor for anti-labor legislation was reinforced. Above all, an atmosphere was created in which nearly everybody is confused, and confusion is the handiest weapon of the totalitarian technique. In the ensuing mêlée labor's legitimate rights are likely to be badly trampled on.

One story that has aroused amusement and some apprehension down here illustrates the split inside the C. I. O. When Philip Murray wrote the eighteen woodworkers' locals to accept mediation, his letter was published verbatim in newspapers throughout the country. The C. I. O. News, however, printed only a brief summary, and in fourteen of the sixteen editions that go to different national unions, even the summary was omitted. Len de Caux, editor of the News and a faithful partisan of the Communist-influenced factions, was called on the carpet to explain his irregularity. His only answer was that the Murray letter was "controversial."

But though the labor situation has become difficult and confused, some actual benefits are emerging. Wyndham Mortimer, the power behind the so-called left-wingers, was relieved of his duties in the aircraft organization drive. This move, coupled with the general conduct of the North American Aviation strike and the resulting publicity, will curtail the leftists' expected show of strength at the Automobile Workers' convention next August, and probably pave the way for a major purge of Communists in this very important defense industry. Harry Bridges, too, would probably have been fired from his post of C. I. O. director on the Pacific Coast had it not been feared that this would have a prejudicial effect upon his pending deportation case. The woodworkers' defiance of Philip Murray and the National Defense Mediation Board has completely collapsed. More than 70 per cent of the men involved in the Puget Sound strike voted over the heads of their national officers to accept Murray's recommendations, and their president,

O. M. Orton, then scurried to safety by urging upon his membership the very settlement he had earlier denounced. The efforts of Joseph Curran, head of the Maritime Union, to promote the Communist-controlled American Peace Mobilization by calling a conference of trade unionists to formulate "peace" plans have been effectively squelched. Curran even stayed away from a Peace Mobilization meeting in Washington last week where he was scheduled to be the principal speaker. Finally, events of the last fortnight are tending to crystallize John L. Lewis's position.

Expectations that Lewis might denounce the Communists and come out in support of Murray appear so far to be pure wishful thinking. They are believed to emanate from government circles, which would like to make him take a positive stand one way or the other. If he remains silent, he will leave little doubt about his position. The left-wingers have repeatedly voiced their allegiance to him rather than to Murray. His silence, therefore, will denote acceptance of their fealty and alignment with their cause. The blast against the Administration just issued by Labor's Non-Partisan League, Charlie McCarthy to Lewis's Bergen, adds further weight to this assumption. If he does take this course, the result can only be his abdication from leadership—unless, indeed, the Communist hopes materialize.

There is little doubt that leadership in the three West Coast and Cleveland die-casters' strikes came from Communist ranks. But it cannot be too strongly emphasized that in the great majority of plants collective bargaining has not broken down. For instance, in the last two months the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee negotiated 590 contracts, with only two minor stoppages, while the Automobile Workers negotiated 500 working agreements, 68 of them in aviation. The President has promised "to maintain" the social progress made in recent years and "to strengthen it." This means that collective bargaining must be safeguarded, and not merely by such lip-service as Capitol Hill has indulged in lately. It cannot be safeguarded under compulsory arbitration, and the Defense Mediation Board is rapidly being converted into an arbitration body. Compulsory arbitration might not freeze wages, although that is a conceivable possibility; it would definitely freeze organization and automatically throw the National Labor Relations Act out of the window.

Hitler's Grip on Finland

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

WHAT new mischief is Hitler brewing in northern Europe? In the daily flood of rumors about German pressure on the Soviets, reports about troop movements and other military activities in Finland are becoming increasingly prominent. There have been many reports of Nazi reinforcements reaching that country, and Helsinki has become a strategic center for the "war of nerves." New travel restrictions on foreigners in the Finnish northern and border regions have been officially announced. Attempts are being made to remove women and children from Helsinki to rural districts, and a number of Finnish reservists have been called up, ostensibly to take part in summer maneuvers. In Stockholm a few days ago the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Swedish Riksdag was suddenly called into session. No explanation was given for this event, but ex tempore meetings of that body are usually related to important happenings in northern Europe. Any outbreak of hostilities in the Baltic would inevitably touch Sweden nearly, and if these hostilities involved Finland, as well as Russia and Germany, the Swedes would be hard put to retain their cherished neutrality.

No country in Europe has been drawn more subtly into the Axis orbit than Finland, although it is not yet, in the strict sense of the word, an occupied country. Finland has not been invaded, like two of its neighbors, by the Nazi armies, nor has it, like several Central European and Balkan states, placed itself officially under German protection. Any Nazi forces in Finland at present—no less than five divisions are there according to latest reports—are "in transit" or "on leave."

Following the example of Sweden, which in June of last year authorized the passage of German troops and war material through its territory, Finland announced on September 24 that it had signed an agreement with Germany permitting the transport to and from Norway of German soldiers "on leave" and of supplies. Shortly afterward German troopships began bringing uniformed—but, it was officially claimed, unarmed—soldiers into Finland's principal Bothnian seaports—Turku (Åbo), Vaasa, Oulu, Kemi, and Tornio; and German engineers went to work on the strategic highway which links the Gulf of Bothnia and the Arctic Ocean by way of Rovaniemi. Some of these troops may have actually proceeded to northern Norway, where the Nazis are busy making real strongholds out of the former Norwegian garrison town of Kirkenes and the ancient, half-decayed Fort Vardöhus on the Varangerfjord, but by far the larger part stayed in Finland over the winter. A few weeks ago this virtual army of occupation was greatly reinforced by the arrival at Turku of a fresh contingent of 12,000 German soldiers with armored cars, tanks, and other heavy equipment. The Finnish and German governments subsequently denied or minimized the news of these troop movements, but of course such denials need not be taken at their face value. They are a routine matter in connection with military moves.

Just what is the Nazi game in Finland? Everything Germany did or is doing in Norway and Denmark could be explained by the necessity of guarding against some alleged British plan. But the Petsamo district on Finland's narrow strip of Arctic coastline and the adjoining Norwegian Finmark, split at its northeastern tip by the Varangerfjord, are wholly outside British influence—at least at the present stage of the conflict. Yet this region is just now the scene of intense military preparations.

Undoubtedly the country really threatened by the German military dispositions in the extreme north of Europe is the Soviet Union. This is not to say that the long-awaited clash between Hitler and Stalin is imminent, but rather that the Nazis have so successfully maneuvered that they can now use a squeeze play against Russia as effectively as against Vichy or Franco. The five Nazi divisions in Finland, with the twenty to twenty-five divisions lined up along the Rumanian border and an unknown but surely considerable German force strung across Poland to the tip of East Prussia, form an effective thumbscrew with which to extort more and more concessions from Moscow. Altogether, according to John T. Whitaker, writing in the New York Post for June 4, Germany has some 2,000,000 men on the Russian frontier.

Should Stalin prove uncooperative, it does not follow necessarily that this huge striking force would be employed in a direct attack on Russia. There are many indications that Germany, instead of engaging the Soviet Union in open hostilities, plans a war by proxy, using as its tools Finland and possibly Sweden in the north and Rumania in the south. Finland is still smarting under the hard Peace of Moscow (March 12, 1940), by which large chunks of Finnish territory were incorporated in the Soviet state. In spite of its economic and financial difficulties, practically the entire nation has set its heart on recovery of the lost territory. And German propagandists, always alert to seize an opportunity, have not been slow in exploiting this sentiment to the full. Though Germany's attitude at the time made it possible for Russia to defeat Finland, Nazi agents now promise to obtain for the Finns restitution of all lost territory, and even more.

The Nazis in Finland are old hands at this game. Two years ago—in fact, right up to the signing of the Nazi-Soviet pact in August, 1939—they were cooperating closely with Finnish nationalist circles, to whom they promised Russian Karelia and Ingermanland. Finnish chauvinist organizations like the Isanmaallinen Kansan Liike (I. K. L.) (People's Patriotic Movement) and the Karelian Academic Society (A. K. S.) fanned the flames of anti-Russian feeling and thereby gave at least some color to the Soviet charges that preceded the war. According to latest reports from Finland, these organizations, which were temporarily suspended in 1939 because of their avowedly fascist tendencies, are now becoming active again. Both the fascist Ajan Suunta and the chief conservative organ, the Uusi Suomi, have been violently irredentist of late, and Russian reprisals would surely have followed if so many Nazi troops had not happened to be "in transit" in the country.

An interesting sidelight on the headway already made by this new Axis drive in Finland is provided by recent reports from Helsinki that Eljas Erkko, who was Foreign Minister at the beginning of the Russo-Finnish War, and Marshal Mannerheim, who was commander-in-chief, are among the sponsors of the new Party of National Union, of which the I. K. L. and A. K. S. form the backbone. Both these men have long been considered pro-British, and Erkko was reputed to be a sincere democrat, but they have obviously been bitterly disappointed by the course of events and are now seeking Germany's, instead of Britain's, support for a war against Russia.

In Sweden these developments have caused great uneasiness, for if Finland, with open or under-cover backing from Germany, went to war against Russia, Sweden too would almost certainly be drawn into the conflict. Since Swedish policy, as past events have clearly shown, is primarily to "keep out of war at all costs," much disapproval has been expressed of the aggressive tone adopted by Finnish newspapers in recent months. In the latter half of April the press of the two countries indulged in a long-drawn-out controversy, described by one Finnish paper as "a duel in the dark." Both sides were, in truth, almost completely in the dark about the main issue—whether, when, and where Germany intends to strike at the Soviet Union.

It was primarily for the purpose of working out a common Finnish-Swedish policy with regard to Germany and Russia that Sweden's Foreign Minister, Christian Günther, went to Helsinki on May 6 to see the Finnish Foreign Minister, Rolf Witting. We shall probably know before long how well he succeeded in his attempt to convince the Finnish government that the time has not yet come to try to recover Finland's lost territories.

To the Class of '41

BY ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

[This article is an abbreviated version of the Commencement address delivered by Mr. MacLeish at Union College on June 7.]

COLLEGE classes are remembered through the brief periods of college history for one characteristic or another—the largest or the brightest or the tallest or the wildest or the luckiest or whatever. Your class, not here only but throughout the United States, will be remembered as the most talked-at class since the first divinity student said goodbye to the last cow in the Harvard cow yard and headed west to Watertown to convert the Indians. I have no doubt that you are thoroughly sick of the whole business—the talk and the talkers and even of yourselves as the objects of talk. A satisfactory Commencement to most of you would be a Commencement without words at all and certainly without words directed at the opinions, orthodox or otherwise, of the graduating class.

You will not have, I am afraid, a satisfactory Commencement. Here or anywhere. And for a reason which relates not to the motives of those who have been invited to speak to you but to very different considerations. Neither you nor they can avoid the discussion of your opinions because, of all opinions of which men can think or speak, yours are most immediately significant. The debate which has been going forward over the past twelve months between members of your generation and members of mine is not a frivolous debate, nor is the attempt to define or to modify your views a gratuitous and impertinent interference with matters private to yourselves. Whether the contestants realize it or not, they are engaged in a struggle as important to the outcome of this war as any other—perhaps more important. For in a sense which is not at all figurative you are the principal battleground of this war—you, the young men and young women of every country, and particularly of this.

There are some among you who, thinking of 1914 and of 1860 and of other years, claim special consideration for your opinions because, you say, you will do the fighting in this war if there is fighting to be done. Men of your generation will not fight this war any more than old men and women and children will fight it: the experience of England would seem to show that you may fight it even less. But the opinions, the beliefs of young men and young women have nevertheless an importance in this war which it would be impossible to exaggerate. We speak most frequently in geographic terms when we speak of the war. But even the enormous titles of geography and war are smaller than the truth. For the true battleground is not an extent of land at all or even an ocean or a sea. It is larger still. It is the minds of the young men.

It is the minds of the young men not in poetic metaphor but in the most precise and literal truth. The Nazis may win all the battles of geography—they may defeat all their enemies and subdue the continent of Europe as they have now subdued the greater part of that continent, they may win the Battle of Africa, the Battle of Asia, even the Battle of the Atlantic—but they will not have won the war unless and until they have persuaded the minds of millions of the young to accept the kind of world they propose to create.

They know this well enough. Their first effort in every country they have conquered has been to win the minds of the young men and the young women to their cause—to persuade the young men and the young women of Denmark and Norway and Holland and Belgium and France that democracy is corrupt, fat, decadent, and dying; that only discipline and blind obedience to the Nazi will can give the young men jobs again and the young women marriages and children. You cannot combine millions of human beings in a going and effective economic system coordinated for industrial production on the modern scale by billeting troops in their towns or by lodging secret police in their homes or even by torturing those who resist and shooting their relatives. To win the war as the Nazis mean to win it they must not merely destroy the cities of those who fight back and cripple their children with bombs and liquidate their writers and their teachers in the cellars of warehouses and send their scientists and their preachers to rot behind barbed wire. To win the war they must win the minds of whole populations of human beings, and particularly of the young among those populations, to affirmative cooperation in a "New Order" of which the fascist slogan is the perfect description: "Believe, obey, fight."

But the same necessity compels those also who are determined to resist the establishment of such a system. They too must win the battle of men's minds. They must first of all bring millions of men to desire to resist a danger which is not real to most of them until it can no longer be resisted—men who hate war as all sane and serious human beings hate war, men who have, or think they have, nothing of their own to fight for, men who wish only to be left alone, to be passed by, to be forgotten. They must bring millions of such men to see the things they look at, to listen to the sounds they hear, to understand that these horrors of which they read, of which they speak, are actual horrors. They must bring millions of such men to understand with the final shock of personal understanding that in this war it is not possible for any man, no matter how anonymous, no matter how indifferent, no matter how small, to be passed by; that the outcome of this war will affect every man whatever his wishes; that "no personal significance or insignificance will spare one or another of us."

But even this necessity is only the beginning of the necessities which drive those who understand what Nazism is and who propose to resist it and to persuade others to resist it while they still can. They must not only win this preliminary battle, they must not only persuade men who are not yet slaves to resist slavery, but they also—they as much as the Nazis—must win the remainder of the fight. They too must persuade men's minds to accept an organization of life—and not only to accept it but to affirm it as a man affirms a cause in which he believes and has faith. They must bring men to believe in the possibility of the organization of men's lives by the instruments of freedom for freedom as an end.

There are two reasons why they must persuade men's minds of this: first, they, no more than the Nazis, will have won the war if they do no more than destroy the Nazi weapons and break the power of the Nazi dictators. To do that much is to win a tremendous victory and yet to win nothing, for Nazism is not Hitler but an evil with a long and bloody past. That is the first reason. The second is this: that unless the partisans of freedom persuade men's minds to accept as their own the cause of freedom, they will not even win the fruitless, the negative preliminary victory against armies and machines. For unless they can persuade men's minds of this, they will oppose to the disciplined and propagandized and indoctrinated armies of the fascists—soldiers educated to believe the fascist lie of force—an army altogether lacking in any affirmative belief, an army prepared only to resist and hence half defeated from the start.

This, then, is the real battle of this war—the battle fought upon that darkling plain of the human spirit of which Arnold wrote—the battle of which you and millions like you are the field. It is a battle fought not with bombs or guns or ships, although bombs and guns and ships play their real and terrible part. It is a battle fought with words—words which also are realities and can be terrible. It is a decisive battle, upon the outcome of which the future of the world does truly depend.

But it is not only because this battle must be fought that men of my generation have busied themselves so long and so insistently with your opinions. There is another reason also—a reason which your elders do not perhaps admit to themselves or altogether realize but which is nevertheless a continuing presence in their thoughts. The reason is that this battle for your minds is one which may very possibly be lost—and lost because your minds, however your wishes or your wills may stand, are tipped against us. The reason is that in this battle, as in the European battle of armies, those to whom we are opposed have the advantage of weapons and of time and of position. And in this battle as in that, the advantage is one for which we ourselves must take responsibility. Your minds, as those who taught you have now come to see, are more open to the persuasion of the enemies of freedom than to the persuasion of the partisans of freedom. It is because we have ourselves prepared our own danger that we turn on you in whom the danger lies. It is because we now see that we have deprived ourselves in you of a power of words which should have been ours, and have armed our enemies in you with weapons of words which are already turned against us, that we have plagued you as we have.

What we are coming now to see is this: that the weapons of words are of two kinds in this fighting. A bomb is a bomb no matter who drops it or on whom—the Nazis on the English or the English on the Nazis. It falls, it explodes, it kills, regardless of the sender and regardless of the target. But words in this war are not equal words. The words which the Nazis can use as weapons against us are not the words we can use as weapons against them. The enemies of freedom, whose cause is not an affirmation but a denial, can use as weapons only the words which will destroy hope, which will corrupt belief, which will poison the confidence of men in their own dignity. But the partisans of freedom, because they are partisans of freedom, because their cause is the reaffirmation of belief in common men, can use as weapons only those words which can create and re-create the self-respect of men, the confidence of men in their own worth and their own power, their belief in themselves and in the life they can build together.

The weapons of the Nazis, the weapons they use with the populations they have subdued by force of arms but must convince to conquer, the weapons they use with the populations of more distant countries whom they wish to paralyze with doubt and fear until their own time comes—their weapons are what we know: the words powerful in destruction, powerful in negation, powerful in doubt. They are the words which define democracy in such a way as to destroy all faith in democracy; the words which shake belief in liberty, in freedom, in free-will, in self-government; which debunk, discredit; words, in short, skilfully chosen to drive their listeners, disillusioned and disgusted with themselves and every man, into the iron arms of discipline and obedience and slavery, not out of love of discipline and slavery, but out of disillusion and contempt for other orders of the world.

And for the same reason the weapons of those who oppose fascism and who would bring against it the affirmative passion for freedom in a free man's world are the candid and believing words which say that men have dignity, that men have value, that all men are created free and equal, that the earth, as Jefferson said also, belongs to the living generation. Their words are the words used not to deny but to assert, not to obscure but to clarify, not to destroy credit but to create credit, not to corrupt belief but to create belief. They are the words of the great hopes, the recurring dreams, the indestructible declarations.

It is this difference in the use of words as weapons which men of my generation have come to see and understand in the years since Spain, the years since Austria, since Bohemia and Poland and Norway and Holland and France. We have come to understand also the advantage in this battle of words which we have ourselves prepared for those who attack us. The advantage is this: that in the field of your opinion, the field in which this battle must be fought, the negative words, the questioning words, which serve our enemies for weapons are superior to the words of affirmation which serve us. The advantage is that the generation to which you belong has been prepared by education and experience to respond more readily to the use of language to question and to disabuse and to breed doubt than to the use of language to declare and to affirm. Your instinctive loyalties altogether apart, you have been taught by us and by your experience of a world for which we are responsible, that the great declarations of human hope and human faith and human idealism are far more likely to be false than true and that the part of wisdom is to question first and afterward still to question.

It is the fact of this advantage which stands at the heart of the long controversy over your beliefs. The question is not now and never was a question of your courage, physical or moral. Neither is the question a question of the seriousness with which you have faced the issue of your time. You have faced it far more seriously than my generation faced the issue of 1917. The real question is that posed by your predisposition to give validity and weight to the words of doubt and of discredit rather than to the words of affirmation and belief. It is because the men and women of your generation have been trained to suspect that all the affirmations of belief and faith are propaganda, not realizing that the unquestioned suspicion is itself a propaganda of formidable strength; it is because your disposition to reject the one and accept the other has encouraged you to accept the words in which the case for fascism can be presented and to reject the words in which alone the case for freedom can be made.

But if the actual issue is so defined, the resolution of this long debate should not be difficult. The central issue will remain until the outcome of the battle for men's minds has been determined, but the responsibilities can be assigned. It is we, certainly, as the generation charged with the government of this country and the education of those younger than ourselves, who are responsible for the predispositions of your minds.

It is our fault and only ours if the most highly educated of our young men and women have developed over the past decade and a half a suspicion of words, an automatic distrust of declarations of belief, an equally automatic distrust of eloquence, of emotion, a fear of being moved, of being persuaded, which becomes in its extreme form a kind of gullibility in reverse—a simple-minded gullibility which assumes as a matter of course that all the gold is brick, that all the appearances are false, that all the virtues are hypocrisies, that there is an inside story to all stories, that there is a lowdown to everything, and that the only wisdom is to be wise not as the great were wise but as the wisecrack is "wise"—as the tough kids are "wise" at the drugstore corner.

The responsibility for all this is our responsibility, but there is another responsibility which is yours. We cannot ask you to believe, by an effort of will, in the possibility of an organization of the world for freedom through the instruments of freedom. But what we can ask you to do is to face the question of belief as fairly as the world we have made and the education we have given you will let you; to be no more afraid to confess belief than you are to admit doubt; to be as trustful of passion and emotion as of skepticism and emotional impotence —even when emotional impotence describes itself as scientific doubt.

Maintain if you will the attitude of the objective searcher after truth in which you have been trained, but refuse to let that attitude betray you into credulous acceptance of all doubters. Put us both on trial for our truth and for our lives—we who have failed to create a true democracy in this country or in the world and these others who now offer you obedience and discipline instead; we who have created for you a society, an economic order, which neither you nor we can take much pride in and these others who would give you in its place a different order made by the police. Put us both on trial and choose between us, but remember, as you choose, the choice you make is for yourselves.

What we can demand of you, and what you can demand with even greater authority of yourselves, is that you put off the irresponsibility you have learned from us, the irresponsibility of those who wear suspicion as an armor and doubt as a disguise—those who evade their time by hiding in the cotton wool of doubt and skepticism and refusal. What you can demand with honor of yourselves is this: that you accept the issue history has forced upon you and that you come to your decision on that issue, not by default and not by refusal, but in the full responsible determination to decide your future for yourselves. More than that, no man can ask.

Le Deuxième Gestapo

BY CARLO A PRATO

THE Vichy government and the Axis powers are collaborating in many ways, but none is more shameful than their joint effort to round up and destroy the refugee anti-fascists now on French soil. Many thousand men and women who in the past several years fled from Nazi oppression and were subsequently hounded by the French police now face a combination of the Gestapo, the Italian Ova, the Franco police, and the French gendarmerie, all working in harmony, exchanging records and supplementing each other's activities, in order to wipe off the face of Europe the most outspoken enemies of the New Order. As a political refugee who arrived in America less than a month ago, I know from personal experience that this cooperation exists. Moreover, I have had access to a number of documents emanating from high officials of the Vichy government. Both my experience and the official record expose the nature and extent of the collaboration. This is a side of Vichy-Axis relations largely ignored by both the French people and the outside world, since it has not been written into any of the published agreements.

At the beginning of the year pressure was exerted on Vichy by Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco to "reorganize" the French military-intelligence section, known as the Deuxième Bureau, and the local police forces. Reorganization is, of course, a euphemism for the process of installing fascists and their sympathizers in posts from which they can enforce Hitler's wishes. That the Deuxième Bureau had been well coordinated by Marshal Pétain even before then is established by the part it played in the dismissal of Pierre Laval on December 13, 1940. Evidence placed before M. Henri Peyrouton by the Deuxième Bureau is believed throughout France to have led to the government's expulsion of Laval. That was Vichy's last action with any semblance of independence. After Darlan and Pétain put France completely at the mercy of the Nazis, it was not difficult to take the last short steps toward full Nazi "reorganization" of the police and secret service.

On his first trip to Paris as Vice-Premier, Darlan was presented by the German authorities with a formal request for a new "agreement of collaboration." The purpose of the agreement was chiefly to enlist the cooperation of police authorities in obtaining the delivery or extradition of German refugees living in the unoccupied zone and in North Africa. Darlan assented, and the agreement was put into effect on January 27. Early in February the Germans gave Vichy several long lists of persons they wanted. Some of these were men and women whose whereabouts was known to the Gestapo; others were left to Vichy to locate within seven days.

Vichy's secret agents worked diligently at the complicated task set them by the Nazis, but they were not able to finish within the specified time. The Germans thereupon presented two new lists on March 10. The names were the same, but to them were added many of the Gestapo's own data and, more significant, the names of French inspectors who were to be held personally responsible for the apprehension of particular groups of refugees. If any were unsuccessful, there was a provision that they should be discharged and punished by Darlan.

Refugees whose addresses were known to the Gestapo were to be rounded up by March 14; those not yet located were to be turned over to the Nazis by the eighteenth. Darlan immediately divided the work among the deputies named by the Germans. One document in my possession reads in part:

The French commissioner Betz must be personally responsible for the following persons: Ettingaus, former German deputy, probably in the Marseilles-Nice region; Grunow, former member of the Schwarze Front and aide of Otto Strasser; Guibarty, Hungarian who worked with the German Social Democrats; Felzenstein, Austrian Socialist; Frl. Helen Loeffel; Alfred Kuntz; Joseph Braun, former German deputy; Deutsch, Austrian Socialist [who is known, by the way, not to be in France].

Another runs as follows:

The French commissioner Chanzy is in charge of Friedrich Muller, Karl Blumer, Johann Herner, Gustav Segesser, Heinrich Kessler, H. Joss, M. Struder, H. Weiss, M. Rosenfeld, Al. Kahn. Commissioner Wilhelm is responsible for Maslov, a Communist deputy; K. Hurlimann, M. Mogouilski, Klara Wolff, Dr. E. or F. Frey. Commissioner Crespit is responsible for Frl. R. Fischer, Dr. Katz, Walter Delang. Commissioner Baillaux is responsible for F. Gerry or Geery, Joseph Oser, Michael Katz, Frl. Fr. Gugelstein.

Reproduction of these lists can do no harm since they came originally from the French and German authorities. Whether or not all the persons they name were delivered to the Germans on time I do not know, for I left France too soon to find out.

These, naturally, are only a random and hasty sampling of the names listed in the hunt for 30,000 refugees. Hundreds of other lists have been handed out since I left and undoubtedly will continue to be for months to come. Each case is not only an unimaginable personal tragedy for the hunted but evidence of the debasing compliance of the Vichy government. On February 24, for example, an Austrian Socialist named Hertzfeld, having been caught by the police, killed himself before they had a chance to deliver him to the Nazis. At the time he was in a concentration camp in occupied territory—at Moulins, in Barracks No. 4. Vichy was so frightened by what it imagined the Nazi reaction would be that it not only officially disclaimed responsibility for the suicide but announced at once that it would turn over the corpse to the Nazis. The Nazis cremated the body and sent the ashes to the man's family in Austria, with word that he had died from unknown causes in France.

At about this time the Germans served General Huntziger with a request for collaboration that went far beyond the agreement signed by Darlan in January. It demanded that the French accept the assistance of the Nazis in reorganizing the Deuxième Bureau not only for dealing with refugees but for handling other matters. This makes it incumbent upon French police and intelligence officers to report to the Germans whatever they can learn of British movements in both the occupied and the unoccupied zone, and to report on American consular and diplomatic activities throughout France. Darlan again consented, although General Huntziger, who was first approached, was hesitant. Pétain intervened, however, and over his name a statement went out ordering the Deuxième Bureau to "cooperate fully with German authorities in order to crush all British activity in France and North Africa." Pétain having approved, Huntziger added on his own account an order to watch Alsatians and Lorrainers who might fail to cooperate with the Germans or even instigate an opposition movement.

Vichy is cooperating with Mussolini and the Ovra as effectively, if not as extensively, as with Hitler and the Gestapo. At the beginning the Gestapo took care of those the Ovra wanted. Surprised by the sudden defeat of France, many well-known Italian anti-Fascists were unable to escape and were immediately seized and returned to Italy. A few of them, Communists who agreed to work with Doriot and other fascists, were released, but Italians are constantly being sent across the frontier.

Some of the better known among these are the former trade unionist, deputy, and secretary general of the Confederazione Generale del Lavoro, Bruno Buozzi; the former leader of the extreme wing of the Partito Popolare, Guido Miglioli; and Signora Berneri, the wife of a well-known theoretical Anarchist who was shot in Barcelona at the time of the Anarchist uprising.

With the Ovra fully installed for operations in France and Darlan's Montpellier agreement with Serrano Suñer signed and sealed—forcing back across the Pyrenees thousands of Spanish Republicans who had expected to go to Mexico—the problem of the refugees will become even more difficult. They have long known hardship and death, however, and the story of Pétain's and Darlan's cooperation with the police of the Axis shocks one not so much because it intensifies the predicament of the anti-fascists as because it reveals the thoroughgoing degradation of a once noble republic.

Lone Star Razzle Dazzle

BY ROLAND YOUNG

THE current election campaign in Texas to fill the late Morris Sheppard's seat in the United States Senate contains so many elements of the ridiculous that at times it is difficult to take it seriously. Yet in some aspects it is typical of our political life. The buffoonery of the occasion derives from the number of marginal political characters who have entered the race and the peculiar manner in which they appeal to the electorate. The name of any person who has filed in time and paid the dollar fee will appear on the ballot on June 28. There have been no party nominations, no primaries, and no run-offs in this special election; the candidate who gets the most votes wins.

Of the twenty-nine aspirants one is a Communist, two are Republicans, and twenty-six are Democrats paying various sorts of lip-service to President Roosevelt. Their assorted biographies and platforms make entertaining reading, the platforms in general expressing the candidate's own views rather than those of a specific minority group. One man wants to make the Trinity River navigable; another wants a five-ocean navy; a third wants us to enter the war at once; a fourth (now withdrawn) offered a free mattress to the largest poll-tax-paying family appearing at his rallies; a fifth campaigns with a hill-billy band; a sixth is a perennial candidate who assures the electorate daily that he will fight it out to the end; a seventh has carefully calculated that he will finish seventh; an eighth is for prohibition; and so it goes. The four most important are Governor W. Lee O'Daniel, Attorney General Gerald Mann, Representative Martin Dies, and Representative Lyndon Johnson.

In a contest of personalities O'Daniel might well prove the winner, and to save Texas from this self-made charlatan, Johnson, who is President Roosevelt's only 100 per cent supporter, needs to clarify the political issues—other than the defense program, which all the Big Four support. This he is doing very rapidly. In one sense, the Roosevelt leadership is the issue, with Johnson boldly upholding the President's program, just as he has supported it for four years as a member of Congress. The issue is also decent representation against demagoguery, for O'Daniel is one of the most ambitious and persuasive politicians in the country. Johnson not only has the best chance to beat O'Daniel, but he is by far the best man in the race, and in the most recent public-opinion poll in Texas he led the field. O'Daniel, however, is still the psychological favorite, for his two razzle-dazzle campaigns for governor stunned the state into believing him an unbeatable miracle man. "Pappy's going to win," many say, "but I'm not for him." "Pappy" received his title from his incredible campaign slogan in 1938, "Pass the biscuits, Pappy."

Until the summer of 1938 O'Daniel was a successful Fort Worth flour salesman who used the radio and a hill-billy band to popularize himself and his wares. That summer he decided somewhat tardily to run for governor, and so spectacular was his campaign, so large the following he had built up by his years of crooning, that he received a majority over all other candidates in the first primary. And this in spite of the fact that he was ineligible to vote because of non-payment of his poll tax; that his political affiliations were far from clear; and that his political beliefs—except on the question of old-age pensions—were unstated. It is not this record, however, which makes O'Daniel a man to keep out of the Senate. It is rather the fact that his political beliefs have turned out to be reactionary, that he mixes politics and religion in a nauseating manner, that he belittles democratic institutions, and that he can seduce the underprivileged into voting for him. O'Daniel's backing comes largely from two groups of citizens: first, a few wealthy Texans, such as Jim West, the publisher of the Austin Tribune; Hal Collins, the Crazy Water Crystals promoter; and E. B. Germany, the leader of the Garner-for President movement; and, second, a great number of poor people to whom O'Daniel has promised pension and who believe he is protecting them from crooked politicians.

O'Daniel has outdone any politician extant in personalizing his office by talking to the people every day over the radio. On week days the Governor speaks at noon, just as he formerly did when selling Light Crust and Hill Billy flour, and on Sundays at six in the morning. That he uses the religious appeal for partisan ends is a charge, I believe, that can be fairly made. Ostensibly, he speaks for no particular belief, and at the end of his little sermonette on Sunday mornings he admonishes all listeners to go to the church of their choice. His Sunday talks, however, show that Pappy has much more on his mind on a Sabbath morning than communion with God. He has even identified a landlord's eviction of a tenant with the laws of God. "The main thing that counts," he once said, "is the manner in which we each respect and obey the laws laid down by the Maker of this world and everything in it, including us. God's rules of occupancy of space in this world by man are so perfect that our landlords pattern after Him. If a tenant does not comply with the rules of the landlord, he soon gets put out."

Another device of O'Daniel's is his pretension that he alone represents the people and that all other democratically elected officers are ganging up on him. "It seems that they don't care which one of the other candidates gets elected," says Pappy, feeling mighty persecuted, "just so it isn't me. You, friends, will recall how that was the same situation when I ran for governor. They were for any candidate in the race except O'Daniel." He promises, moreover, to expose what is going on in Washington. "They do a lot of talking about wanting trained and experienced men to go to Washington," he says. "That's right. They want them trained and experienced, but how? Trained to work with their gang, because they might get a good, capable, honest common citizen up there who would not be one of the gang, and he might find out the truth about what is going on in this circle of petty politicians and get right up on the radio at Washington and tell the common citizens back home all about their tricks."

Fortunately, the chances are extremely good that for all his quackery—or, perhaps, because of it—O'Daniel will be licked. His scheduled opening address in Waco on June 2 went very sour. Shortly before he began to speak, it began to pour. Though the crowd had gathered in what looked like clear weather, it numbered only about 2,500 instead of the expected 25,000—the number that had attended the Governor's opening campaign addresses in Waco in 1938 and 1940. Pappy was so flustered by the smallness of the crowd and the rain that he canceled all speeches for the remainder of the week.

Martin Dies has the largest national reputation of the Big Four, but his campaign does not seem to be clicking, and the chances are that he will run third or fourth.

Dies, as would be expected, is conducting a super-patriotic campaign, wrapping the flag around him whenever he speaks. He recently addressed the mothers of Dallas on communism in the American Youth Congress. He has no state organization and apparently relies on his reputation as a spy-hunter, plus the activity of his committee in Washington, to put him across.

The thirty-four-year-old Gerald Mann, a famous forward passer for the Southern Methodist University Mustangs in the 1920's, now Attorney General of the state, is aggressive, ambitious, and well-liked, but it is difficult to associate him with any particular political belief. To get the Dies vote, he advocates more FBI investigations; to get the vote of the soldiers' families, he advocates $40 a month for draftees; to get the O'Daniel vote, he carries a Bible, which he occasionally thumps for effect; and to get the Johnson vote, he says that he sent a wire of congratulations to Franklin Roosevelt after the Chicago Democratic convention. Because he follows rather than leads and remains apparently indifferent to the great changes overtaking the country, he makes little real appeal. For instance, when all America was tingling with the question of Willkie or Roosevelt, when the issue of defense was as plain as it is now, and when the New Deal was threatened, Mann remained disgracefully silent. However, despite his agility with the soft-pedal, he is vastly to be preferred to Dies or O'Daniel.

The fourth candidate, Lyndon B. Johnson, is recommended not only by the weaknesses of his opponents—the buffoonery of O'Daniel, the flag-waving of Dies, the indecision of Mann—but by many positive characteristics of his own. He is not as well known nationally as he should be, but he is one of the most promising of the young New Deal politicians. He is convinced and he has convinced his constituents that the New Deal reforms mean a better life. Although he does not have the reputation of baiting the power trust, he is one of the strongest backers of the rural-electrification program in Congress, and every farm in his district now has access to electricity. Johnson was elected to Congress from the Austin district in 1937 to succeed the late James P. Buchanan and reelected without opposition in 1938 and 1940. He demonstrated his political courage in his first campaign when he ran on a platform of all-out support for President Roosevelt—this in the year of the court-reorganization plan and the Great Hate. Before this Johnson had been NYA administrator in Texas and before that secretary to Congressman Kleberg. In Congress Johnson voted for the repeal of the embargo act and has of course supported all latter-day defense measures. He has disagreed with the Administration but once, I believe—when he voted to continue a low interest rate on farm loans.

The President is of course vitally interested in the Texas campaign. Alsop and Kintner have reported that he persuaded Johnson to run, though Johnson pleaded ill health (infected tonsils) and lack of money. Without presuming to tell Texas for whom it should vote, the President has pretty clearly indicated the confidence he places in Johnson. Johnson announced his Senatorial aspirations from the White House steps and later that day was referred to by the President as his "old, old friend." Roosevelt wired Johnson after signing the farm-parity bill, because, as he said, he knew of Johnson's great interest in the measure. The close parallelism between Johnson's Fort Worth speech of May 23 calling for the declaration of an unlimited national emergency and the President's speech on May 27 might be more than a coincidence. Also, on June 5 the President wrote Johnson that he favored a federal old-age pension plan, and reminded him—and the Texas voters—that the two had talked the matter over before, that their ideas were substantially incorporated in the Democratic platform, and that Franklin D. wanted Lyndon B. to drop in after election to talk the matter over. If Johnson is elected despite all the demagoguery and folderol of the campaign, America can breathe more freely.

The centuries collapse.

Backed by the timeless sun
Dive-bombers scream above Cnossus:
Ida's shadow falls upon squat tanks
Where came the Achaean and the Dorian
To tread the hundred cities into shards.

Lift up your eyes, Pythian Apollo,
You of Gortyna:
See how they bloom and blossom in the sky,
Swift-dropping flowers,
Men breaking from the stems,
Living for death,
Born and air-borne to kill and die
Where Minos sired by Zeus
Set firm his throne upon the fluent sea:
Where from the maze, with wax and feathers,
Son and father soared.

Now deep with Icarus the cruisers lie.

Deep, deep.

Deep temples have been raised to light,
And palaces: but there are deeper still:
Yet not so deep but that this latest dust
Will sift and sink and find them
And commingle.

THE SPLIT IN THE C. I. O. that has been awaited ever since the Nazi-Soviet pact is close at hand. Not only have several top labor leaders expressed their dissatisfaction with their pro-Communist colleagues, in many cases for the first time, but the Communists themselves are now publicly attacking Philip Murray, last fall's compromise candidate for C. I. O. president. Attempts may be made to forestall the eruption, such as Richard Frankenstein's statement in support of Harry Bridges, but most observers believe that the main initiative from now on will come from the Stalinists. It is also believed that when the showdown comes, some leaders identified with the party line will elect to stay with their unions rather than their political associates.

AT A DINNER in Washington recently Representative John E. Rankin of Mississippi, with whom Representative Michael Edelstein took issue just before the New York Congressman's death, spoke of a legislative battle he has been waging. "I had a grand ideal," he said, "and I pursued it to its ultimatum."

KEN CROSSEN, a well-known pulp writer, was scheduled to speak at the League of American Writers Congress held last week in New York. His subject was to be New Heroes in the Pulp Field. Crossen never showed up. A reasonable assumption is that his absence was connected with the hero through whom Crossen makes his living—the Green Lama, who fights and foils Communists to the delight of the readers of Double Detective Magazine.

A Native at Large

BY JONATHAN DANIELS

The Smearing of U. S. 1

THE gasless Sundays have not begun yet, and here it is summer and the time of the wheels on the roads. Some suggest that, until Mr. Ickes as oil dictator says otherwise, there will be more riding than ever on the three million miles of American roads. They are not talking simply about the owners of new cars bought with the wages of new defense jobs. Those Americans, they say, who once crowded the ships which sailed to the Ritz bar in Paris and the cathedrals in Italy will now perforce look at America. I am glad to learn that indignation persists about some aspects of the scene.

U. S. 1 is not the only road, and Struthers Burt, the author who was born on one part of it and winters on another, is not the only man concerned about it, but I am glad this summer that he is mad about the sleazy shacks of the roadside salesmen and the signboards of the big corporations which are planted almost in a procession along this No. 1 American road. Not only was it the first road across the colonies; it still runs in primary importance from the Canadian border to Key West. The founding fathers forded the creeks it crossed, and the people they made the republic for go like hell on it beside signs big enough to be read at sixty miles an hour.

Kenneth Roberts, who, as novelist, does not think so much of the Founding Fathers, lives close to it, too. I have no direct information about him, but I hope he too is still angry 900 miles up the same road from Mr. Burt's place in the South. Three years ago he spoke of the unsightly nests of tourist camps in his state, which, he said, huddled in the fields as though some debauched summer hotel, on the loose, had paused on a dark night and given birth to the result of a misalliance with a sentry box.

Mr. Burt is still blasting about his part of the road: "The state is making a fool of itself where its highways are concerned. Tourists are talking about it. Furthermore, in the present mood of the public, nonsensical desecration of assets such as our highways is becoming increasingly hard to bear."

I hope there is something in Mr. Burt's faith in this present mood. Coupled with the present riding, it might do something about improving the appearance of America. I am not sure I entirely agree with Mr. Burt or with some others who have ideas about our highways. As a traveler I am not fond of roads which, in effect, hide the country by a formal beautification of it. I like to go by America—the factory as well as the farm, even the slum as well as the suburb. But I am with him "all out" in protest against the very specialized smearing which makes our highways look like nothing but our sign-lined highways, cheap, confusing, almost contemptuous of the enjoyment of the very travelers they pretend to serve.

The crimes against U. S. 1 can also be found in California and Texas, but the cheap corruption of this route runs from Fort Kent into Florida. Mr. Roberts once made a sort of grisly poem of the signs in Maine. Recently Elizabeth and Walter Lawton reported to the magazine Nature that on one sixteen-mile stretch of the highway in Connecticut just east of the New York line there were 1,800 signs, 112 to the mile, more than one a second if you travel fifty miles an hour. They called the approach to the national capital on the Baltimore-Washington Boulevard stretch of U. S. 1 "the motorist's nightmare," with 618 business places and nearly 2,500 signs along less than thirty miles of road. One of the dirtiest and most damaged landscapes in America takes the millions who presumably seek beauty with pleasure to Maine and Florida and all the resort places between.

I wish I had Mr. Burt's confidence in this present American mood. Unfortunately, the highways have nowhere been worse smeared than by the honky-tonk villages at the gates of new army camps. More and more billboards are going up for the soldiers and for the travelers with defense wages in their pocket-books. Increasingly the neon signs shut out the stars at night. I am not sure America does not like the mess. Night and day, stopping along the roads, I find many more persons listening to nickelodeons than to nature. I wonder if more people do not look with pleasure at the wisecrack poems on the Burma-Shave signs than at any delectable mountains, or at any glimpses the signboards permit of the sea. I hope I'm wrong. But I know that not even the sensitive South resents the patent-medicine signs advertising the prevalence of chills and fever. Maine, which bases its hopes on its function as a vacation land, allows the gate to its shores to be as hideous a passageway as America possesses. The road runs close to Kenneth Roberts's house and provides the best possible evidence to support his thesis that mobsters made this land. Certainly their descendants have lynched the roadsides, and Mr. Burt's voice sounds very still and small beside their high-speed roar in the ruins. His is still a whisper that we need.

BOOKS and the ARTS

CONSTANCE ROURKE: ARTIST AND CITIZEN

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

ALMOST three months have passed since the death of Constance Rourke, a death so sudden, so unreasonable, so irrelevant, that it is difficult even now to write as if it had actually occurred. "The news of my death, my dear"—I can hear her saying it in her firm buoyant voice—"has been greatly exaggerated." Her set toward living was so strong, she was attached to life at so many points, that one refuses to believe this break is not as reparable as a short circuit that throws a high tension system temporarily out of function.

"We all feel," wrote a friend in Grand Rapids the day after her funeral, "that she has been here with us all the time, and we find ourselves saying, 'How Constance would enjoy'—whatever it was—about her own funeral." She would certainly have shared her friends' amusement over the solemnities and ironies of funerals, including her own. Even more deeply, I think, she would have shared the resentment and anger that flared up in myself and in many others that her work had been so suddenly interrupted.

Some years ago Van Wyck Brooks, writing to Miss Rourke about an article she had published in The Nation, told her that he looked forward with great eagerness to the appearance of what was to have been her major work—a critical-historical "essay" as she called it, on the whole range of American culture, with particular emphasis on the arts. I am sure that workers in the field all over the country shared that expectancy. So did laymen like myself who had intimations of its richness and scope. For that "essay," of several volumes, was to have set forth the fruits of discovery and conclusion gathered in the course of thirty years of search and research. There is no question that it would have been a major contribution to scholarship—two years ago her bibliography contained 10,000 entries; there is no question either that it would have been an important work of American literature. The "little blue slips" which made up the log of an extraordinary voyage of research that ranged from Maine to California through the Middle West and the deep South can be salvaged; the work of literature is lost—and it is a major loss.

Constance Rourke's approach to her materials combined the care of a disciplined worker, the wariness and taste of a connoisseur, and the never-flagging excitement of a pioneer breaking new trails. A few summers ago, as chauffeur on a three weeks' trip through New England, I had the opportunity of observing her work in progress. It was primarily a vacation jaunt, but with Constance in charge, it became an exploration as well. She was searching, among other things, for wall paintings executed in the early nineteenth century by itinerant artists. We picked up one trail in the library at Newburyport that led us down a country road to a fine old house. And presently we were sitting in a parlor crowded with beautiful mahogany and shouting into the ear trumpet of a fine old lady in black bombazine who was pouring out her past in the subdued toneless voice of the very deaf. The painting that covered the walls of the stair well was perfectly preserved—because, as she explained without inflection, there had been no children in the house during her lifetime. It was also exquisite: a river, more white than blue, flowing through a forest of stenciled trees (the itinerant painter had to take short cuts), highlighted by two leaping "stylized" deer, elongated and painted—scarlet.

A German design marched in stiff repetition around the walls of the parlor in Old Lyme; in this case the painter may have been a Hessian soldier. In some of the houses we visited—in all of them Constance achieved within five minutes the status of an invited guest—children and time had left only bare outlines. We visited the remnants of the Shaker colonies, whose founders had a talent for high views, and all the museums that lay in our path. I remember the skill and charm with which she won the confidence of a reserved Shakeress; and the keen, appraising, not-to-be-fooled look in her eyes as she went swiftly through collections whose contents she already knew.

As she often insisted, she was not an antiquarian but a critic whose purpose was to relate and correlate, not to collect. For that reason reading her books, particularly "American Humor," which prefigured the "big book," is like walking through new woods and flushing at every step not a scholarly or antiquarian "bustard urging its slow, heavy, laborious, earth-skimming flight over dreary and level wastes," but a "covey of poetic partridges with whirring wings"—if I may appropriate Coleridge's vivid sentences. Many of her ideas were bold and controversial—which makes for liveliness in writing. She invited rather than avoided argument—which makes for care in documentation and adds confidence to delight.

"American Humor" was subtitled "A Study of the National Character." When the big book was only beginning to take shape in her mind, she described it as a study of the forms of the American imagination. This description gives the key to her central interest. Much of her long day's work was done in the obscure reaches of library stacks, but it was animated and directed by her passionate and by all odds primary concern—the problem of the creative artist, which she understood because she was herself one of that company. She held the view that the creative worker in any field, if he is to achieve the confidence and strength of maturity, must be aware not only of himself but of the social, historical, and cultural background out of which he has come. She conceived her task as critic to be that of making our natural inheritance of tradition, myth, and craftsmanship, both native and European, as accessible and as nourishing to the creative worker in America as, say, the French and European background has been to the creative worker in France. The last paragraph of "American Humor" might stand as a statement of her aims, and I quote it in full for that reason.

For a creative writer the major problem seems to be to know the patternings of the grain; and these can hardly be discovered in rich color without understanding of the many sequences of the American tradition on the popular side as well as on purely literary levels. The writer must know, as Eliot said, "the mind of his own country—a mind which he learns in time to be much more important than his own private mind." A favored explanation for the slow and spare development of the arts in America has lain in stress upon the forces of materialism. But these have existed in every civilization; they have even at times seemed to assist the process of art. The American failure to value the productions of the artist has likewise been cited; but the artist often seems to need less of critical persuasion and sympathy than the unstudied association with his natural inheritance. Many artists have worked supremely well with little encouragement; few have worked without a rich traditional store from which consciously or unconsciously they have drawn. The difficult task of discovering and diffusing the materials of the American tradition—many of them still buried—belongs for the most part to criticism; the artist will steep himself in the gathered light. In the end he may use native sources as a point of radical departure; he may seldom be intent upon early materials; but he will discover a relationship with the many streams of native character and feeling. The single writer—the single production—will no longer stand solitary and aggressive but within a natural sequence.

In "American Humor" Miss Rourke, among other things, placed our major writers in relation to the many sequences of the American tradition on the neglected popular side as well as "on purely literary levels." The result is a fresh and enlarged view of the sources of our literature, a view which includes the frontier as well as New England and Europe. Tall tales and the "comic poets" who, beginning with stories out of other and older mythologies, created legends distinctively American were of special interest to one concerned with the "forms of the American imagination." This interest led her into long tedious examinations of the popular literature of earlier generations, which were rewarded by such discoveries as the beautiful tale, buried in an old almanac, of how Davy Crockett went to Daybreak Hill and came back "with a piece of sunrise in his pocket." And this is only one small example of her large store of gathered light.

I never felt that Miss Rourke's work received the recognition it deserved; just as I was always sure that that recognition would come with the publication of the "essay" on American culture. But though she missed the public triumph that should have been hers, she had her private rewards. I know of no individual, and this is a considered statement, who drew from so wide a range of people such rich, free offerings of affection, loyalty, and respect. This may begin to sound merely like a tribute to a friend. It is certainly that, but my reason for putting it in print is not personal. Constance Rourke's relationship with the world she lived in had a social as well as a personal significance. For one thing that world was far larger than the bailiwicks most of us inhabit. Intellectuals in particular tend to cut themselves off from this and that and the other current of American life. The scholar sticks to his books, the artist to other artists; the critic, confronted with so much dross, becomes a walking rejection slip. Miss Rourke was all three of these, yet she continued to see, and experience, American life whole. The fact that she lived and worked in Grand Rapids, Michigan, is in a way symbolic in a period when, as Van Wyck Brooks recently said, most writers "hated the town they were born in." She not only "resided" in Grand Rapids; she took part in its life as a community. I should like to quote again from the letter of the friend in Grand Rapids.

During these last days all sorts of men and women have called, and came to the funeral. There were librarians and teachers, poor people she had helped in little unknown ways, a farm woman who sold her bread at the city market, a maid who never worked for her but in whom she was interested; when the question came up of selecting bearers for the funeral we decided that we would just make a list of men who would want to be included without regard to number. We had fourteen. . . . There was the mayor, who had worked with her on the Committee to Defend America, there was the sales manager of one of our biggest firms, a lawyer and a doctor and an automobile salesman [she had no automobile]. Then there was a young liberal, the head of our Transient Bureau, a young struggling artist, and a professor at the theological seminary. No one of them knew all the others, and the list represented a cross-section of our community.

"There is no question," said a Grand Rapids business man to me, "that Constance Rourke was our most distinguished citizen."

Such statements hardly fit with the general assumption that the serious writer who lives west of the Hudson must necessarily be isolated and lonely. It was one of the assumptions that Miss Rourke often assailed, and her own experience suggests that the writer himself bears some of the responsibility for his status as outcast. She was as sensitive as anyone could be to cultural poverty; her awareness of it was the mainspring of her work. She was a liberal and a democrat in the most concrete sense of those much-abused words. Yet she contrived the good life in the place where Grand Rapids furniture and Senator Vandenberg come from. She was at the center of the cultural ferment that works in every community, the friend and adviser of the struggling painter, the beginning sculptor, the young man who wants to be a writer. She set the pace as well for that group of intelligent laymen which is likewise always to be found in the smaller American cities. She accepted "her town" and became a force in it. And one of her rewards was a sense of belonging to a community, which, as the Shakeress told us that afternoon in Maine, helped to explain why so many excellent craftsmen flourished in the Shaker colonies.

Her success with people of every age and calling was based primarily on an incorrigible interest in human beings. She loved the give and take of conversation and thoroughly enjoyed an argument. This interest was no doubt widened and reinforced by the nature of her work. The politician and the business man, as well as the artist, were manifestations of the complex American background she had set out to explore and put in critical order. She understood them often far better than they understood themselves, and her quick verbal sketches of character were extraordinary. She was a person of strong feelings, vigorous opinions, and strict standards; yet she never avoided the responsibility of living and coping with the infinite variety of human beings, never resorted to the self-defeating expedient of burying them in categories. She would have made an excellent diplomat; she was a born teacher; and she sometimes said humorously, but seriously too, that the American tendency toward evangelism and reform was in her blood. She incited loyalty, and her enthusiasm for work and life was infectious.

She influenced many people. But her sense of humor and a genuine humility precluded any touch of self-importance; and her influence was that of a friend whose faith is both a reassurance and a challenge that must be met. She was a source of strength; with her quick responses and her sense of the ridiculous she was also the gay companion. One looked forward to her visits for both reasons. It is hard to admit that they have ended.

When Huey Long Was Kingfish

LOUISIANA HAYRIDE. By Harnett T. Kane. William Morrow and Company. $3.

NO ONE, not even the Kingfish himself, could quite explain Huey Long. He said, "Just say I'm sui generis and let it go at that." Mr. Kane has not added much to what was already known of Huey Long, but he has done a wholly creditable job of telling the story of the regime from start to finish. The men who ruled Louisiana after Huey Long was dead were easy to understand. They were, with a few minor exceptions, either vulgarians or thieves, and usually both. They put gold fixtures in their bathrooms and they stole everything in sight. It is an exciting story, and Mr. Kane portrays this amazing gallery of rogues with much skill.

Mr. Kane first of all makes clear why it was that Huey Long found the Louisiana soil so fertile for his dictatorship. The people had been so constantly abused and so often betrayed that they had precious little faith in what went by the name of democracy in Louisiana. Huey Long called it Tweedledum-Tweedledee government. He said, "One of 'em skinned you from the ankles up, the other from the neck down. But you got skinned just the same." The moral is obvious but will bear repeating in these days—if democracy is to be saved it must be made strong and healthy, a living thing, useful to the people, worthy of faith and of love.

Next Mr. Kane's book makes it clear that Huey Long was not a fascist, if by fascism one means some conscious theory of government such as rule by an élite or a totalitarian state. Huey Long knew little of economics and less of ideologies. His share-the-wealth plan was an unworkable hodge-podge of poor-white dreams and hopeless economics. The Long regime from beginning to end was motivated by nothing else than the hunger for power and the hunger for boodle. Huey Long was the "pure dictator," without any ideological frills. Early in his political career he perfected a formula for obtaining power. The poor whites could give him power, because they had the votes and trusted him as one of them. In return he must give them something, possibly not much, but more than they had had before. Huey Long kept enough of his promises to convince the poor whites that he meant what he said. The poor whites got free schoolbooks, good roads, and the work of building them; the politicians got the boodle; Huey Long got the power. The poor whites trusted him as long as he lived, and when he was dead they made a martyr of him. They trusted him even while he was betraying them by making secret deals with the "interests." Of course they didn't know about the deals, or at least not all about them. Nor did they fully realize that for every dollar of benefits they were getting, the dictatorship was stealing two dollars. But it is doubtful whether they would have rebelled even had they known the full truth. "At least we got something," a North Louisiana farmer said. "Before him, we got nothing. That's the difference."

The people excused themselves by saying that even if the men around Huey Long were crooked, Huey himself was a man of honesty and integrity. But Mr. Kane thinks that a part of the loot went into Huey Long's pockets. As for his political integrity, he had none even at the beginning. There was never a time in his whole public career when he was not actively betraying the people who had voted for him.

By 1935 Huey Long had made himself the master of Louisiana and was reaching out for the United States. He had sent himself to the United States Senate, leaving behind a puppet governor. The Roosevelt Administration fully expected him to defeat Senators Robinson of Arkansas and Harrison of Mississippi in the 1936 primaries. Moreover, Jim Farley found that if Huey Long should run for President in 1936, he would get as many as 4,000,000 votes, possibly enough to hold the balance of power. The Roosevelt Administration was thoroughly scared, and Huey Long was having the time of his life. He was confident he would be President, but thought 1940 would be his year. At this point the assassin's bullet put an end to his career. Huey Long prayed, "Oh, Lord, don't let me die. My work for America is not finished."

The national threat disappeared almost from the day that Huey Long died. Gerald L. K. Smith tried but failed to keep the movement going on a national scale. The other heirs were willing to confine themselves to Louisiana. They might still be reigning there in unquestioned power if their greed had not led them on to ruin. Whereas Huey Long had wanted power more than money, his successors wanted money more than power. The Kingfish had once mused, "If them fellows ever try to use the powers I've given 'em, without me to hold 'em down, they'll all land in the penitentiary." That was exactly where most of them landed.

But one who believes in democracy will not find much comfort in reading Mr. Kane's account of their decline and fall. What finally broke the dictatorship was not the people of Louisiana but the intervention of the federal government. After having played a most ambiguous role in the "Second Louisiana Purchase," the Roosevelt Administration partly redeemed itself by sending in O. John Rogge in 1939. The parade then began to the penitentiary. Yet with most of the leaders in jail, and none but the incompetent Earl Long left to head the regime, it lost the election of February 20, 1940, by only 19,000 votes. Suppose that Huey Long had not died. Suppose that the federal government had not intervened. Suppose that the dictatorship had had one leader who was both able and honest enough to be put up as a "front." Suppose such another dictatorship, with no better purpose but with more shrewdness, should arise elsewhere in America. What then, fellow-Americans, what then?

"Lest We Forget"

THE DIARY OF GINO SPERANZA: ITALY, 1915-1919.

Edited by Florence Colgate Speranza. Columbia University Press. Two Volumes. $6.

GINO SPERANZA was born in 1872 in Connecticut, the son of a university teacher of Italian origin. He was an American through and through, but in his soul a bridge of affection constantly remained open between the land of his birth and that of his ancestors. In August, 1915, after Italy had entered the World War, he went there as correspondent and stayed until April, 1919. The American ambassador to Rome realized his usefulness as an expert in Italian affairs and attached him to the embassy.

During those years Speranza kept a diary of his whereabouts, talks, observations, and thoughts. The diary has now been published by his companion in Italy, his wife. Her love and intelligence have given us a model of skilful editing.

Speranza took up residence in Florence, then in Rome, and, while convalescing from a serious illness, in Sorrento. But he often motored from Venice to Naples, from Pisa to Ravenna. A man of exquisite taste, he enjoyed lovely landscapes and works of art. He loved Venice as his sweetheart. His pages on Venice in the blackout, as Arthur Livingston remarks in his excellent introduction, deserve a place in a Venetian anthology side by side with Goethe's and Ruskin's descriptions.

But Speranza was not a tourist living in the past and indifferent to the present. He often visited the fighting front, met people of all estates, observed economic conditions, intellectual currents, and religious and moral habits with lively intelligence, keen curiosity, and a generous heart. The picture changes from page to page. The whole Italian nation parades before our eyes: army chiefs and privates, ladies of the nobility and peasants, anti-clerical intellectuals and Catholic parish priests, young men who had come from Wyoming to fight and politicians homesick for the good old times of the German alliance. With sustained interest one follows the writer in his manifold inquiries and experiences, from the storm, cold, and death of Mt. Adamello, at an altitude of 12,000 feet in the Alps, to the smiling seashore of the Gulf of Naples. One shares Speranza's sympathy and respect for the wisdom, gentleness, and stoical endurance of the Italian humble folk.

When he arrived in Italy, Speranza had no doubts about the soundness of Foreign Minister Sonnino's policies. But his duty as an honest observer was to become acquainted with all pros and cons in Italian happenings. Thus little by little doubts began to creep into his mind. He wrote on January 18, 1916: "Is Sonnino's finely spun diplomacy too finely spun? Is it a house of cards?" Doubts went on increasing and developed into actual condemnation. The mean measures by which President Wilson in Rome was kept aloof from all but official circles aroused Speranza's contempt: "I am through with them! The trouble is that government everywhere today is class government, and it is so entrenched, if not behind physical force, then behind sentiments, respects, habits of mind, and human vanities that you can't hope to change it constitutionally." One of the firebrands who worked in the service of the official policies attacked him as a "paid agent of Yugoslav imperialism." He had committed the crime of meeting people who did not approve of those policies. "I have since learned that the Nationalists have it in for me because I am a friend of Z——, but to think that I have never talked with him of the Adriatic question!" Beside the common sense and gentleness of the humble Italian folk, there were also at work in Italy the brutality, boastfulness, and stupidity of nationalism, which was the father of Fascism.

Mrs. Speranza has prefaced her husband's two volumes by no more than three words: "Lest we forget." The poor showing that Mussolini's armed forces have made during the present war leads too many people to forget what the Italian nation suffered during the other war, and to make light of the fact that there exists beyond Mussolini and will always exist after Mussolini the Italian people. "Lest we forget."

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Poetry Continues

NEW POEMS: 1940. AN ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH AND AMERICAN VERSE. Edited by Oscar Williams. The Yardstick Press. $2.50.

THE poetry here is on a surprisingly high level. There are at least three or four very good poems* and perhaps one great one. The credit belongs of course to the poets, but the responsibility for the presence of so much good verse in an anthology that confines itself roughly to a single year is particularly Mr. Williams's. I like his taste, I like his prejudices—even though I may suspect occasionally the intrusion of the politics of the professional poet and the man about poetry. Although he takes in much that stems from other areas of poetic opinion, Mr. Williams's bias runs more or less to the school of Auden and his affiliates. Auden leaves his impress everywhere: most of the poets here borrow or emulate his chic and timeliness; a good many work within his technique. Mr. Williams says that "the poetry . . . bears witness to a new vitality, a kinship with reality, a concern with an answer in a world reeling with questions." True enough. Behind most of the poems the reader senses or should sense the presence of a moment in history great with threats. The poems depend for their emotion upon this sensed presence. Since there is so little left in the world that one can take seriously and sincerely enough to write poetry about, I am inclined to agree with Mr. Williams that this is a good thing, but not altogether for the reasons, or lack of reasons, he gives in an introduction shouted in the best avant-garde style and packed with the usual enthymemes with which poets since Shelley have been in the habit of justifying their trade.

Thirty-six poets are represented in this collection, eight of them British, the rest American. But the space given to the British representatives is far out of proportion to their actual number. George Barker gets more space than any other single poet—in addition to a foreword by him filled with metaphorical definitions, all of which have been heard before. But he earns it. He has as much energy as Dylan Thomas, by whom he is somewhat influenced; and if he has less intensity and incandescence, he is open to more experience and can talk about more things. Under Lorca's influence, Barker writes in the simple declarative sentence; his lines pound downhill in trochees and spondees, belaboring our ears with internal rhymes, assonances, and alliteration, jolting our minds with the abrupt stops and turns of his figures of speech. There are a few too many modish tags and epithets, too much of the small change of the latest best poetry, too much talk here and there about Time, but all these things are carried off by the poet's surging energy and somehow made acceptable. Meanwhile, what a sound-box! In Barker as in Auden, English poetry becomes once more loud orotund, periodic, declamatory.

As verse it is becoming even more irregular. To judge from this anthology, free verse as we knew it has disappeared almost entirely, but while seemingly regular measures are being taken up again, they are being subjected to a steady, subtle, and more dangerous attrition. There is under way a loosening and disintegration of the traditional syllabic and accentual system of English verse by which it seems to be acquiring a kind of "quantitative" character, using the cadenced phrase rather than the brace of syllables as its unit of measure. Syllabic accent has become so subdued that the poet is governed in the placing of his stresses only by sense-rhythm and our habits of breathing. The voice has a tendency to linger upon rather than bear down upon the emphatic syllable—as in prose. And rhymes are imperfect and do not coincide with important words. What is happening is that the cadences as well as some of the very tones of prose are being assimilated to poetry; not that the latter is becoming more prosaic in the sense—mainly descriptive—that free verse became prosaic, but that it is trying to expand its register. It wants once more to generalize, state, argue, and exhort, as well as to sing and describe. If anything, it is becoming more high-flown, and if it admits more ideas than formerly, it deals with them rather hysterically.

A hysterical note sounds through a good deal of the verse in Mr. Williams's anthology. It is justified by the state of our times. Sometimes, however, it is factitious, as in Muriel Rukeyser's poetry; sometimes it gets out of control, as in Mr. Williams's own verse.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Out of the Night

THE DARKEST HOUR. By Leo Lania. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

LEO LANIA is an Austrian journalist who earned the hatred of Hitler as long ago as 1923, when he wormed his way into Nazi ranks under the pretense of being an Italian Fascist and subsequently wrote an exposé of the Munich beer-hall putsch. Lania was rewarded for this act in 1933, when the Nazis came to power, by having a price put on his head. He fled to Paris, where in spite of his long anti-fascist history he was placed in a concentration camp at the beginning of the present war. His situation was no different from that of thousands of other refugees who were judged by their nationality rather than their sentiments. While officials of the purest French blood were allowed to connive without hindrance in the highest government offices, anti-fascists like Lania were locked up.

After the country was overrun by the Germans, many of the refugees went straight from the hands of their French captors into the even less merciful ones of the Gestapo. Lania was one of those who escaped, and the story of that escape, a fine adventure story told with literary distinction, forms the substance of this book.

The incredible personal hardships suffered by Lania make all the more remarkable the balanced tone in which his book is written. He does not step before the reader to point the moral of his story but lets each incident speak for itself. Most of the incidents of this narrative are vivid enough to need no underlining. The reader is not likely to forget the figure of the terrified Negro whom Lania encounters while he is still in Nazi-occupied territory. He has become separated from his regiment and is trying to escape falling into the hands of the Germans.

A towering figure stepped toward us. A Negro. His face shone like polished ebony, and his eyes rolled like two white marbles. The rain ran down his cheeks.

"Have they passed?" he asked. He was trembling all over, and his teeth were chattering.

"Where do you want to go?" I asked him.

"I don't know. If they catch me—. They don't take us prisoners. They shoot us."

When asked about his companions, he continued in broken French, "Soldiers all prisoner. Negroes not took prisoner . . . they kill Negroes. Why? Aren't we soldiers too?" Such scenes are more likely to bring home the meaning of Nazi racial theories than any abstractions of partisan politics.

Edgar Ansel Mowrer has supplied a short but penetrating introduction to the book. Mr. Lania's translator, Ralph Marlowe, also deserves to be credited.

Hollywood, June 11

THE Motion Picture Theater Owners of America are in town: at least some of them are. This year was to be the most important, most eventful exhibitors' convention ever held, with the M. P. T. O. A. and the Pacific Coast independent group meeting at the source of production and scheduled to discuss a number of vital and controversial subjects with the producers. Box-office receipts all over the country have recently been showing a steady and disconcerting decline, all the more disturbing because it coincides with heavy national-defense spending calculated to have quite the contrary effect on box-office takings; the exhibitors' convention was supposed to discuss, among other matters, how to offset this slump. The operation of the consent decree with respect to picture booking, the double feature, cash clubs, and bank nights were other problems which were expected to attract the enthusiastic attention of the delegates.

However, instead of the 1,500 exhibitors expected, about 350 turned up, many of them Pacific Coast theater owners. Of these, apparently a large proportion found the attractions of Hollywood too much, for at many of the meetings and addresses only a handful appeared, while the others were suspected of attending the races at Hollywood Park or visiting the night spots. The industry feels insulted by this rather cavalier treatment, for not only does it consider the financial situation of the motion-picture industry serious enough to demand the theater owners' earnest attention, but also it went to a lot of trouble to provide entertainment for the visitors, including such treats as tours through various studios and a barbecue at the Columbia Studios Ranch, which apparently was not properly appreciated. A leading trade paper remarks that next time Hollywood is chosen for a convention Hollywood will not respond.

One thing that the convention is on the verge of accomplishing is the condemnation of the double feature. This is regarded by the top producers and by many exhibitors as the greatest evil in the picture industry, keeping far more people out of the theaters than it brings in and causing Hollywood to offer inferior products in order to keep pace with the demand for films. Some exhibitors, however, still regard the double bill as an attraction and have successfully opposed up to now the efforts of certain studios and other exhibitors to abolish it; at the present moment one of the chief supporters of the double feature is reported to be wavering, and if he can be won over, there is every hope that it will be abolished.

Having sighted his precision rifle squarely on Herr Hitler strolling on his terrace at Berchtesgaden, Captain Alan Thorndyke renounces the pleasure of pulling the trigger as thoroughly un-British and unsporting, and from then on never enjoys a quiet moment during the entire course of "Man Hunt." This picture is an adaptation of Geoffrey Household's novel "Rogue Male," and the adaptation gains in thrills what it loses in plausibility. The director, Fritz Lang, seems able to give a few lessons in the technique of suspense even to Alfred Hitchcock, and has created out of a maze of improbabilities, inaccuracies, and poor performances a really exciting picture. Walter Pidgeon, who plays Captain Thorndyke, sportsman and brother of a lord, is thrown from a cliff, shot at in the subway, and trapped in a cave with a sangfroid so froid as to be confusable with woodenness, while Joan Bennett's interpretation of a Cockney girl belongs, if anywhere, in the high-school dramatics class: London is presented as a city of brownstone houses, Renault taxicabs, and costers in full regalia, and the English appear capable of no other emotions than a few slow resentments. How Fritz Lang managed to make of this material one of the most exciting adventure pictures since "Foreign Correspondent" is an inexplicable mystery, but indisputable proof of his ability as a director.

The screen version of the play "The Gentle People," now rather prosaically renamed "Out of the Fog," gives the impression of being just about to deliver one of Warner Brothers' weighty social messages without ever quite succeeding in unburdening itself. Some essential element of the play must have gone with the title, for the banks of fog in which the characters wander seem to be symbolic of their state of mind rather than to serve any real dramatic purpose. John Garfield plays a petty gangster, a water-front bully, who terrorizes gentle old Thomas Mitchell and almost succeeds in enticing his daughter, Ida Lupino, away to Cuba. Virtue triumphs and terror vanishes in the soupy waters of Sheepshead Bay, but this, in the picture, seems to happen more through luck than good management. The play, for so it still is rather than a film, is beautifully acted by Mr. Garfield, Miss Lupino, and Mr. Mitchell, and Odette Myrtil gives an arrestingly good performance in a small role.

The distinctive flavor of Damon Runyon's prose is conveyed to the screen with great success in an unpretentious and amusing picture adapted from his story "Tight Shoes." A gangster whose feet hurt, corrupt politicians, a strip-tease artist, and a shoe clerk who finds himself transformed into a modern Carrie Nation provide the material from which the director, Albert Rogell, and the authors, Leonard Spigelgass and Art Arthur (via Mr. Runyon of course), have concocted a delightfully original film. The humor is certainly not subtle, but it is dispensed with much verve and gusto by a cast which seems thoroughly to enjoy itself. Binnie Barnes, who for some time has been unfortunately enmeshed in portrayals of ladies of the higher social brackets, comes into her very funny own with her performance as the strip-tease artist.

RECORDS

TO ITS previous reissues of hot jazz classics Columbia has added an album (C-43, $2.50) of performances in which the clarinetist Teschmaker participated. These include the famous four sides recorded by the McKenzie and Condon Chicagoans: on 35951 "China Boy," with the most exciting ensembles, an outstanding piano solo by Sullivan, and a superb solo entrance by Teschmaker that fizzles out miserably, and "Sugar," less exciting, but with good playing by McPartland on cornet, a fine half-chorus by Teschmaker; on 35952 "Liza," also less exciting, but with good playing by McPartland and Teschmaker, and building up to a powerful close, and the faster and livelier "Nobody's Sweetheart," with McPartland outstanding and Teschmaker's playing exciting in its drive rather than its musical ideas. And on 35953 we get the finest performance of the album, the Miff Mole "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble," with, among other things, a superb extended solo by Teschmaker. But on the reverse side is the same group's "One Step to Heaven," offered with the usual excitement as something previously unissued, and turning out as usual to be something which the company showed good judgment in not issuing. Also, on 35951 we get the mediocre Charles Pierce "Sister Kate" and "Nobody's Sweetheart." And the inclusion of these things leaves no room for two outstanding performances—the Chicago Rhythm Kings "I've Found a New Baby" and "There'll Be Some Changes Made" with superb playing by Spanier on cornet, and with Teschmaker's most disciplined, integrated, and perfectly formed solo in the first piece, his characteristic rhythmic intricacy in the second (they can be had on Commodore 7-8).

All this volume needs is a "Shim-Me-Sha-Wabble" offered excitedly as a previously unissued pressing from the second master, with a solo by Teschmaker inferior to the one on the originally issued pressing from the first master; then the volume would be a perfect example of the ways in which this project of reissuing the classics of hot jazz has been mishandled. It isn't only a critic who needs a clear head and an eye kept rigorously on his object; and it isn't only the writing on jazz that has suffered from the people with muddled heads and with eyes on their own performances and on the audiences they have performed for. What has caused them to write as loud champions of small-group hot improvisation and then to use this championship in loud propaganda for some of the commercial large bands, has also caused them to start with the objective of reissuing the original classics of recorded hot jazz performance and then to get this objective cluttered up with previously unissued first and second masters and other things that should have been issued, if at all, after the original classics had been reissued, not before. Last summer I heard for the first time the old Okeh record of two classics—the Bertha Hill-Louis Armstrong "Pratt City Blues" and "Pleading for the Blues"; and tremendously excited by them I inquired whether they would be included among the projected reissues. Yes indeed—in an album of blues singers that would appear in November. That month is long past; the reissues have included everything from the best of Armstrong, Bessie Smith, Beiderbecke, to unimportant things by these musicians theatrically discovered in the dim Columbia archives at 5:23 in the morning, and even to an albumful of Dorsey Brothers (C-51, $2.50); but they haven't included the Bertha Hill-Armstrong classics; and there must be other things of the sort. These, I dare say, will come out eventually, and all the Dorsey Brothers album does is to delay them; but issuing the second master of, say, Ellington's "Lazy Rhapsody" means that the original classic, with its finer vocal passage, will not be reissued at all.

In the volume Hot Trombones (C-46, $2.50) we get on 36008 the late Jimmy Harrison's beautiful twelve-measure contribution to the 1930 Chocolate Dandies' excellent "Dee Blues," and the less interesting "Bugle Call Rag"; on 36009 the same group's "Got Another Sweetie Now," originally issued only in England, in which Harrison has only a vocal that is quite undistinguished, and the 1933 Eddie Condon "Tennessee Twilight"—"originally issued in England and France, second master"—with three lovely solos by Russell on clarinet, Kaminsky on cornet, and O'Brien on trombone; on 36010 a good solo by Miff Mole in his 1927 "Original Dixieland One Step," and the fine work of Teagarden in his 1929 "Makin' Friends" (a quite different and even finer version is on Commodore 28); on 36011 the powerful playing of Higginbotham in his 1930 "Higginbotham Blues," and the undistinguished Benny Morton 1934 "Gold Diggers' Song."

As for single discs, there is simply but beautifully phrased playing by Louis Armstrong in the 1924 Clarence Williams Blue Five's "Mandy, Make Up Your Mind" and "I'm a Little Blackbird" (35957); but the "Crying All Day" and "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" of the Trumbauer Orchestra with Beiderbecke (35956) are unexciting.

The Way to Help Europe

Dear Sirs: The editorial How to Invade Europe (issue of May 31), with its insistence on revolution as the only way to overcome Hitler, is refreshing; you have at last come to realize that only Europe, and especially Germany, can settle European and German problems. Can you not carry the thinking to its conclusions? Can you not see that the only real help America can give is through the example of its own triumphant democratic, socialized development?

The political education of Europeans can come much more quickly and efficiently in time of peace than in time of war; by entering the conflict America would be merely erecting one more barrier against the spread of its own idealism through the world. You note that "the men who run our country and run our defense program are unprepared to make a revolution." Of course they are, both here and in England. The war, and war emotions, is supported by "the best people" in the wild hope of avoiding revolutionary issues. Imperialism and revolution do not run together. The fact that we, who so recently were boiling with holy rage against Russia for seizing the Finnish shores of the Gulf of Cronstadt, are now clamoring, with an equal holy rage, for the seizure of Dakar and Martinique, with a much less valid excuse than Russia's, reveals the depths of moral obliquity to which war thinking leads.

Every step on the part of this country toward war is a step away from every decency, every ideal, every kind of progress for which The Nation has for so many years campaigned. Every step toward war makes the example America could give to Europe less worthy, every achievement of social progress here less possible.

The best way to fight the war against National Socialism is to fight its causes here—race prejudice, stupid and unnecessary poverty, technological unemployment, evil concentrations of power in the hands of finance capitalism, outworn distribution systems, greed deified as "drive," and so on—you can make your own list.

We have nearly a continent of our own to make truly democratic before we crusade in other continents. Our masses, who do not seem to want to enter the war, in this seem wiser than some of our leaders, who do.

Professor Mamlock Silenced

Dear Sirs: It now becomes evident that in their friendship pact of August 23, 1939, Stalin promised Hitler that he would never again produce or allow to be released by his representatives abroad any anti-Nazi film. In conformance with this policy the various "Amkinos" folded up about a year ago. However, an "Artkino" has recently been formed to resume releasing Soviet films. If you phone this Artkino office, where the staff is the same as that which managed the Amkino, to inquire whether you may ever again see the anti-Nazi films "Professor Mamlock" and "The Oppenheim Family," you will get the reply: "Sorry, but we do not distribute the old pictures any more." If you persist and ask why such films as "Chapayev" and "Potemkin" are available in New York but not the more recent "Professor Mamlock," you will get no satisfactory explanation. The conclusion to be drawn is clear.

ANDY ROBIN

Mr. Eden's War Aims

Dear Sirs: Those of us seeking to rally America behind the President's stirring call to take an effective part in the British struggle will find it hard to swallow some of Foreign Secretary Eden's words in his speech on war aims.

Almost in the same breath in which he assured us that "the lasting settlement and internal peace of the Continent as a whole is our only aim," he shocked us with an incredible repetition of the vicious propaganda of the last war, saying of Germany that "five times in the last century she has violated peace." In a speech broadcast to this country on September 11, 1939, he expressed the same idea more fully, referring to the wars in Denmark in 1864, Austria in 1866, and France in 1870, 1914, and 1939.

The origins of the wars of the past eighty years are not as simple as Mr. Eden apparently believes. The Prussian-Austrian civil war within Germany was a disturbance of peace far smaller than the Boer War or our own Civil War. Mr. Eden would do well to read Lord's "Origins of the Franco-Prussian War," Fay's "The Origins of the World War," and the first few chapters of Ponsonby's "Falsehood in War Time."

We seek, in the words of our President, no "world like the post-war world of the 1920's, in which the seeds of Hitlerism can again be planted and allowed to grow." In other words, we seek a chance to make good our mistakes of 1919. It is a rude awakening to hear the spirit of Versailles proclaimed in bold language by the British Foreign Secretary.

It is discouraging to historians that historical truths command so little respect in a world which sorely needs the light they alone can give. It is not helpful to advocates of aid to Britain when such ignorance and international ill-will are revealed by an official British spokesman. And it must be profoundly embarrassing to peace-loving Britons fighting against international hatred and organized contempt for the truth to find these evils appearing in their own ranks.

I hope the liberal press and the liberal letter-writers of this country will make it clear to the British embassy that Mr. Eden's war aims are not the kind America is willing to underwrite.

The Leviton Strike

Dear Sirs: The 1,700 workers of the Leviton Manufacturing Company, whose New York plant is in the slum-factory Greenpoint section of Brooklyn, have been on strike since last August 27. The company manufactures small electrical equipment—sockets, plugs, switches—is the largest in its field, and has no defense contracts. Most of the employees are young girls and women. About two years ago it was found guilty of unfair labor practices by the National Labor Relations Board; the board's action was affirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals on April 29, 1940. Last November Local 3 was overwhelmingly chosen as the exclusive bargaining agent for the workers in an NLRB election in which the vote was 1,299 for the union and 70 against.

the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local 3, the union which is now leading the strike, makes against the company: (1) The plant operates under an intense speed-up system, and as soon as production is increased, rates on piece work are cut. (2) Employees often have lost wages because of the breakdown of machinery. They have been kept in the factory during the period of repair but not paid for the time thus spent. This is in violation of the wage-and-hour law. (3) The average pay of girl and women workers is $16.35 a week. The average pay of male workers, skilled and unskilled, is $23.49 a week. The company has no pension plan, no group insurance, no bonuses, and no profit-sharing plan. (4) Girls have often been injured at machines because safety devices were removed in order to speed up production. (5) Sanitary conditions are deplorable. The law provides that there shall be one toilet for every fifteen persons, but on one floor of the Leviton factory there was one toilet for over 200 workers.

The union's demands are simple: a $16 minimum wage, a 10 per cent increase for all those earning more than the minimum at the time the strike was called, one week's vacation with pay, improved sanitary conditions, and a union shop.

The strike is now in its tenth month, and despite the fact that the union has paid each striker $8 a week for strike benefits from the beginning, the misery and privation in Greenpoint are very great. Families have been dispossessed and malnutrition is taking its toll. Yet only 25 of the 1,700 original strikers have gone back to work.

Early in February Mrs. Roosevelt addressed the workers and, after listening to their demands, said: "I'm afraid I agree with you." Her appearance before the strikers was bitterly attacked by Westbrook Pegler, who referred to the leaders of this union as "labor coercionists."

The press of New York has been exceedingly friendly to the strikers; PM has made a splendid campaign for them and exposed the shameful working conditions and low wages. Yet despite an almost unanimously hostile public opinion, Mr. Leviton has refused to submit his case to arbitration and has boasted that he will starve his employees back to work.

The strike is the longest strike of its magnitude in New York and, to my way of thinking, reveals two things: (1) the inadequacies of the existing labor laws, under which a recalcitrant employer can evade the spirit of the Wagner Act, and (2) the necessity for carrying on a struggle here in America against our own economic dictators.

The Shape of Things

THE NAZI ONSLAUGHT ON RUSSIA IS ONLY three days old as we write, and it is much too early to assess its prospects. Moreover, we must expect even less reliable information about the course of this campaign than we have received from other battlefields of World War II. Both sides are in a position to control completely the flow of information to the outside world, both have long experience in the arts of censorship, and both habitually subordinate truth to propaganda. Up to date it appears that the Germans have penetrated the Russian border at a number of points but not to any great depth. They are still a long way from the main Soviet defense lines, which cover the border as it existed prior to 1939. But the chief Nazi effort at the opening of the campaign is, as in Poland, directed against the air force and communications system of the enemy. The Luftwaffe is roaming over wide areas of western Russia, smashing at railroads and bridges in an effort to hinder Russian mobilization but concentrating its heaviest attacks on airports. It claims to have destroyed huge numbers of Soviet planes and is obviously seeking to establish undisputed mastery of the air so as to pave the way for the mechanized ground forces. It is generally agreed that Hitler cannot afford a lengthy campaign in Russia. Within three months at the most he must achieve his main objectives, the Ukraine—which is not only Russia's granary but its greatest industrial area—and the Caucasus, which besides its importance as a source of oil supplies offers enormous strategic possibilities for a gigantic flanking movement against the whole British position in the Middle East.

THE FIGHTING QUALITY OF THE RED ARMY is the great x in this new extension of the war. Hitler clearly is gambling on the belief that it is formidable only in numbers, and there is all too much reason to fear that this supposition is correct. Most, though not all, independent experts rate Russia's military power as far inferior to Germany's. Its planes and mechanized equipment are generally thought to be of comparatively poor quality, and it is not believed to possess the kind of repair organization which is essential for modern mechanized warfare. Russia is also likely to suffer from its inferior and inadequate transport system, which may prove as much the Achilles heel of its defense as it has of its economic development. Finally, there is the question of how far the purges of the past few years have affected the morale of the Red Army. In the face of invasion by a hated enemy this may prove higher than foreign observers have estimated, and it must be remembered that in many ways the Russian soldier has been the most favored member of the Soviet community.

RUSSIA HAS ACCEPTED BRITAIN'S PROMPT offer of assistance, but in view of the difficulty of communications the rendering of direct aid is hardly possible. However, the smashing aerial offensive which the R. A. F. has developed against western Germany and the invasion coast is likely to prove invaluable as a check on Hitler's drive east. If the present pace is maintained, Göring may be compelled before very long to pull part of his air fleet away from the eastern frontier. The fact that the Luftwaffe is not capable of sustaining full operation on both fronts provides the British with a grand opportunity. We can help them make the best of it by sending them immediately every available bomber.

THE NAZI-SOVIET WAR PLACES JAPAN IN AN awkward position. Last week the Japanese government was forced to acknowledge failure in its effort to extend the New Order in Asia to the Dutch East Indies by process of intimidation. This presumably led to a temporary shelving of the military's grandiose plans for expansion into the South Seas. Now Japan is forced to decide whether to live up to its obligations to the Axis in a war, not with the United States as it had expected, but with the Soviet Union, with which it has recently signed a neutrality pact. At first sight, the German attack on Russia might seem to give Japan a golden opportunity to invade Siberia—an opportunity its militarists have long awaited. But the immediate risks of such an adventure appear to be even greater than those of a war with the United States. For despite the war in Europe, the Soviet Union is known to have a strong force in eastern Siberia. And Japan's chief cities lie only a few hundred miles from the Soviet air bases near Vladivostok. Furthermore, there is more than a little chance that the United States may yet come into the war, and thereby force Japan to fight simultaneously on two fronts.

IT IS STILL NOT CLEAR WHAT ACTION, IF any, Japan will take. The special conference called by the Emperor to consider Japanese policy in the new crisis has been twice postponed. Judging by Japan's record in the last few months, we may expect a policy of extreme caution. A shattering Soviet defeat would, of course, be followed by an attack on Siberia, just as an invasion of Britain would be followed by a general Japanese attack on British and Dutch possessions in the South Seas. But barring a sudden overwhelming Nazi victory, Japan will probably ignore its commitment to the Axis. The chief danger is that it may interpret the recent swing toward appeasement in Washington as an indication that the way is now clear for a drive to the south. The Administration has laid itself open to such misinterpretation by passing over Japan in its recent orders against Axis consulates. It seems more likely, however, that Japan will take advantage of the world's preoccupation to push its lagging campaign in China. The Chinese Quisling, Wan Ching-wei, has just made a visit to Tokyo, where he spoke of his hope of aligning China with the Axis. This, of course, presupposes a victory over Chiang Kai-shek which cannot be achieved if the United States does its part.

CHINA IS IN DANGER OF FALLING VICTIM TO the Nazi-Soviet war. While no country is likely to change its policy toward Chungking because of this new war, the Soviet Union will hardly be able to keep up its aid on anything like the scale of the last four years. The prospect is particularly alarming since American shipments also have been running behind those of last year. Moreover, the overland route from the Soviet Union to China, although difficult, is much the best one for getting supplies into China. Recent reports indicate that traffic on the Burma road has seriously bogged down despite the appointment of an American to supervise it. Although alternative routes are being built, none are yet completed. Since Japan is likely to take advantage of the Nazi-Soviet conflict to push its invasion of China, it is up to the United States to take exceptional measures to give China substantial military assistance of the type formerly provided by the Soviets. This means supplying not only planes but pilots and technicians. And since the amount of aid that it is possible to send to China is limited by transport difficulties, the necessity for stopping aid to Japan has become greater than ever. In addition to stopping shipments of war materials, immediate action should be taken to freeze Japanese funds in this country.

THE RESPONSE OF BOTH CONGRESS AND THE country to the President's message on the Robin Moor sinking was somewhat apathetic. Perhaps this was partly due to the fact that the message contained no program of positive action. It served a useful purpose, however, by placing the question of the Robin Moor in its true perspective. The torpedoing of this American vessel without any provision being made for the safety of its passengers and crew is far more than a mere incident which can be settled by apology and indemnity. As M.

Roosevelt said, "We must take it that notice has now been served upon us that no American ship or cargo on any of the seven seas can consider itself safe from acts of piracy." Unable to prevent the passage of the Lend-Lease Act, Germany is now resorting to violence and intimidation in an attempt to render that measured decision of the American people ineffective. The sinking of the Robin Moor underlined threats previously uttered by Admiral Räder and by Hitler himself. To yield to these threats would mean recognizing the waters of the whole world as a combat zone and withdrawing our merchant marine from commerce with every land controlled by Britain and its allies. To take a concrete example, we should have to send out in ballast the ships employed to carry rubber and tin from the East Indies. But as the President said: "We are not yielding and we do not propose to yield." What then? Are we to continue to risk our ships and our sailors' lives by sending them to sea unprotected, or are we to take positive action against the pirates who endanger them? The Administration's next step will undoubtedly be to dispatch a stiff note to Berlin, where its complete rejection is already foreshadowed. In this event there does not seem to be any alternative to providing armed protection for our ships.

THE UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS, WHO have just won a contract with the Ford Motor Company covering 130,000 employees in plants all over the country and including the check-off, must feel a little like Joshua when the walls came tumbling down. To be sure, they had won the election in River Rouge by a large majority, but it was generally felt that this was only the first step on a long road toward genuine collective bargaining, which would be obstructed at every turn by Harry Bennett and the Ford lawyers. Instead, Harry Bennett himself signed the momentous document. There are those who see in Ford's all-out gesture in giving the union more than it asked for an attempt to embarrass it by presenting it with what is truly a huge responsibility; and certainly the contract will require careful and intelligent handling. It is suggested also that the agreement to pay a wage equal to the highest in the industry may be a source of confusion and difficulty for the union. But the U. A. W. has gone through its growing pains. What is more, it has pretty well eliminated Communist Party influence, which might be a source of dangerous wild-cat moves, and the contract will greatly strengthen the anti-Communist forces at the forthcoming U. A. W. convention, where the Stalinists are expected to stage an attempt at a comeback. Ford may have been motivated by a desire to give the union more than it could handle; on the other hand, his gesture is not uncharacteristic of a man who does nothing by halves, whether it be fighting a union or accepting it. Moreover, he has gained an end of the hearings of the National Labor Relations Board, with their devastating evidence of the Ford Company's brutal ways with labor, and the settlement of a number of court cases which would have been equally damaging. This serves to remind us that the peaceful solution represents a triumph not only for the U. A. W. but for the NLRB. The very statistical record of the claims, hearings, testimony, and decisions bears eloquent testimony that if the fight for union recognition by the Ford Company had been conducted without benefit of the Labor Board, it would have left in its wake a trail of disturbance, production delays, and even bloodshed.

THE GOVERNMENT OF PETAIN HAS BEATEN its own record of submission to its Nazi masters by agreeing to hand over to Hitler the 100,000 Spanish refugees who found asylum in France after the fascist victory in Spain. Until now the Vichy administration had limited itself to the delivery of such prominent individual Loyalists as Companys and Zugazagoitia, who were arrested in France by the Gestapo, sent back to Spain, and executed by Franco. Now the Pétain government has changed its tactics, and instead of making Franco the present of a few Loyalist lives, it performs the far greater service to the Axis of handing over an army of 100,000 Spanish workers. These men, according to press dispatches, are to be transported to North Africa "to join the huge conscript labor force being marshaled there under Nazi direction for work on the strategic Trans-Sahara Railway to Dakar." The first contingent, numbering 7,000, has already sailed for Algeria. In the last four months Hitler has poured into French North Africa great numbers of technicians and engineers. Now he needs a mass of slave labor to accomplish the task of building the strategic road for the next Nazi drive in the Mediterranean. The Spanish refugees serve his needs exactly, at the same time relieving Vichy of an unwelcome body of irreconcilable anti-fascists. In last week's Nation Carlo a Prato exposed in detail the subordination of the Vichy police to the Gestapo. The delivery of 100,000 Spanish Republicans offers impressive documentation of the total subservience of Vichy.

SENATOR PAT HARRISON WAS ONE OF THE vivid personalities of the Senate. No one who ever met him will forget his humor and unfailing good nature, or underrate his political ability. Although he was by no means a liberal, his record was well above the average. In his labor policies he was usually reactionary, as a Senator from Mississippi might be expected to be, but he worked closely with the Administration in steering the NRA, the AAA, the Social Security Act, and other reform legislation through Congress. As head of the Finance Committee he was instrumental in getting the undistributed-profits tax on the statute book, but he later worked for its repeal. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee he strongly supported the President's foreign policy. In recent years Pat Harrison had lost much of his buoyancy and had become increasingly conservative, particularly in fiscal policies. But he will be remembered not so much for his recent lapses as for his years of useful service.

We Have But One Aim

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

HITLER wants oil and wheat and minerals. But he has other desires, too, as Louis Fischer and Norman Angell point out. Some are military; others are political, and his political desires extend far beyond the line of men and equipment stretched from Petsamo to Odessa. They extend to Tokyo and Madrid and Washington and Buenos Aires. They reach into country homes in England and farm houses in Wisconsin. Hitler wants Russia's rich stores of food and materials; he wants them quickly and surely before American aid to Britain robs him of his last hope of early victory, before British bombs further damage Germany's embarkation ports and its morale. But, just as seriously, he wants confusion of mind and conflict of interest among his adversaries and the remaining neutrals. The attack on the Soviet Union is a straight military campaign waged for great stakes. It is also a battle in the world war of nerves.

The United States is the most important objective in this battle, because it is our growing intervention which has informed Hitler that the war will be a long one, longer perhaps than he can afford. His mechanized legions are hurled at American opinion as much as at the Red Army. They carry a variety of suggestions and warnings. They hint to the isolationists that the war is less than ever "our war." They tell the appeasers that further aid to Britain means support of Stalin—and Communist revolution in Europe. They offer hope of a "respite" for England, during which, no doubt, the right people can promote the idea of the right sort of peace. They threaten the independent, anti-fascist left of all countries with the unhappy prospect of a new alliance with the Communists as the price of continued anti-Nazi action. By all these means the Germans hope to build up the opposition to our government's policy of resistance and throw confusion into the ranks of its supporters.

But this strategy will fail. Surely if slowly the American people are coming to understand the one actual issue in this war. It is not an issue which can be blurred by the ideological backtracking of the Communists or the past mistakes and treacheries of the Soviet government. Hitler must be defeated and destroyed, not because yesterday he was in league with Stalin or because he is fighting Stalin today, but because he represents the one overwhelming menace to the Western democracies and to freedom throughout the world. This most Americans realize. They can be confused by Hitler's march on Moscow only if the nation's leaders allow the policy of the United States to falter or shift.

The answer of Washington to Berlin must be unequivocal. It must echo Winston Churchill's magnificent pledge in his address on the day the invasion of Russia began:

We have but one aim, and one single irrevocable purpose. We are resolved to destroy Hitler and every vestige of his Nazi regime; from this nothing will turn us—nothing. We will never parley, we will never negotiate with Hitler or any of his men. We shall fight him by land, we shall fight him by sea, we shall fight him in the air, until, with God's help, we have rid the earth of his shadow and liberated his peoples from the yoke.

Any man or state who fights against Nazidom will have our aid. Any man or state who marches with Hitler is our foe. This applies not only to organized states but to all representatives of that vile race of Quislings who make themselves the tools and agents of the Nazi regime against their fellow-countrymen and against the land of their birth. These Quislings, like the Nazi leaders themselves, if not disposed of by their fellow-countrymen, which would save trouble, will be delivered by us on the morrow of victory to the justice of the Allied tribunals.

That is our policy and that is our declaration. It follows, therefore, that we shall give whatever help we can to Russia and to the Russian people.

The President need only translate those words into terms of American action and he will wash the minds of the people clear of any Nazi-made distortions. The statement of Sumner Welles was an encouraging, if not an inspired, formulation of the Administration's position.

But a policy is easier to proclaim than to carry out. So far the United States has neither produced nor delivered more than a fraction of the war material Britain urgently needs. Transportation facilities to Russia and within that country are inadequate. Even if the Lease-Lend Act is applied to the Soviet Union, the existence of a declared war means that goods cannot be shipped in American bottoms; and what ships of any registry are available for a greatly increased flow of war supplies? Planes can doubtless be flown to western Russia via Alaska and Siberia, but it is a long and hazardous route. The total amount of help that can be safely delivered on the vast front facing Hitler's mechanized legions is clearly limited. But what can be sent should be sent quickly.

It is equally clear that aid to Britain must be multiplied. No momentary slackening in Hitler's attack should be used as an excuse to slow down American production or divert supplies even to our own defense needs. This is Britain's hour to strike. If Russia holds firm or falls back slowly and at serious cost to the Nazis, Britain may be able to wreck Hitler's last hope of an invasion. The

R. A. F. attacks on Germany's bases and industrial centers, already intensified in the weeks of Hitler's preparation for his drive to the East, can be carried on with even greater effect while the German invasion of Russia continues.

Whatever the outcome of the invasion, Britain's labor of destruction will not be lost. This is the crucial hour, and not one second of it should be wasted. The need of decisive action is so pressing that the United States should send over more than its quota of new planes. We should defer our own needs and transfer our bombers and fighters to the very limits of military safety. We can build more planes; we can never bring back this opportunity for decisive action.

But more important, even, than a defensive support of Britain's position is a strong offensive, in which the United States must also play a major role.

In this offensive every weapon, military and political, should be used. For the moment at least, not only England but the whole non-Nazi world outside of Russia is relatively secure. This is the time for the anti-Nazi forces to seize the initiative, to take aggressive action in North Africa and throughout the Middle East. This is the time to rally anti-Vichy sentiment in France, to crystallize anti-Nazi sentiment in the Mediterranean countries. The fact that Russia is at last in the war and on the side of Britain will have good, as well as troublesome, moral effects. Many reluctant, semi-pacifist elements of the left have watched the struggle with suspicion. These elements are important in France, occupied and unoccupied. They helped France lose its own war with Hitler; given hope of a democratic victory, they may help win the larger war which Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union has initiated.

A powerful offensive launched by Britain in Libya, a final victory in Syria, a strong defense of the other chief strategic positions in the eastern Mediterranean, would stimulate the hopes of millions of workers in France and every captive country. To this mighty effort the United States must contribute all possible aid through speeding up production and extending the range and activity of our sea patrol. And surely we should delay no longer in removing the obstacles provided by the obsolete Neutrality Law.

The war between Russia and Germany will be a source of confusion only if the leaders of opinion in the democracies allow it to be. Winston Churchill has indicated that he understands the full meaning of the issues involved. Sumner Welles, with less vigor and inspiration, has formulated clearly the American position. The danger in this country is that our leaders, too sensitive to the general distrust of communism and of the Soviet Union, will move slowly, waiting for the popular reaction. But this is no time to sit holding the public pulse. Russia's war is democracy's opportunity, perhaps its last one for a long time to come.

The Tax Fiasco

THE chance that an adequate tax program will emerge from the House Ways and Means Committee has now largely vanished. After more than two months of hearings and discussion, the committee has chosen to throw most of the constructive features of the Treasury plan out the window and has adopted few of the improvements suggested by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation or Chairman Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board. The results are far from satisfactory. There is no longer any hope of attaining the Treasury's original objective of defraying two-thirds of the government's expenditures for 1941-42 by taxation and restricting borrowing to cover the remaining third. The best that is anticipated is that about 12 or 13 billion dollars will be raised in taxes and borrowing held to 10 or 12 billion. The final outcome is much more likely to be a fifty-fifty distribution between taxes and loans rather than the hoped-for distribution of two to one.

But this is not the worst of it. By adopting an increase in the tax rate on moderate incomes only about one-half as steep as the Treasury proposal, the House committee will have to fall back on excise taxes for a large part of the needed revenue. These taxes, which will be paid mainly by low-income groups, will be put into effect immediately, whereas the boost in personal and corporation income taxes will not actually become payable until next March 15. Elimination of separate income-tax returns by husband and wife is the only constructive action taken by the committee thus far.

Especially unfortunate was the House Ways and Means Committee's rejection of the Treasury's proposal for strengthening the excess-profits tax. The present tax, as the Treasury points out, is not really a levy on excess profits but on war profits. It allows a corporation to earn as much as 50 or 60 per cent on its invested capital without paying this tax provided it made such earnings in the four-year base period. The invested-capital formula offers the only way in which the principle of ability to pay can be applied to corporations. The present policy, retained by the committee, of allowing corporations to choose between the invested-capital and the average-earnings principle has been found in practice to leave altogether too many loopholes for companies with huge earnings. The tax hearings showed big business almost unanimously opposed to the Treasury proposals. That should have given the committee a hint of their relative effectiveness.

It should be frankly recognized that the greater part of the testimony before the committee, except that by government officials, represented efforts on the part of the "haves" to shift the burden of defense taxation to the "have-nots." The "haves" are highly organized. They can afford expensive legal talent to explain the injustice of any tax which falls on the well-to-do. But the President has announced that it is the Administration's policy to see that the emergency taxes are imposed, as far as possible, on the basis of ability to pay. So far the Ways and Means Committee has yielded to the pressure of entrenched interests on every important issue. In so doing it has virtually repudiated the President's leadership. We believe, however, that the President has the prestige and the power to gain the support of a majority of members of Congress if he chooses to make a fight on this issue. And since the nature of our post-war society depends largely on how the defense program is financed, it is an issue on which he must take a stand. This is no time to allow corporation spokesmen to write our tax laws.

The Guild—a Case Study

THE general assembly of the Newspaper Guild of New York of June 19 was notable for two things. It reversed, by a vote of 365 to 362, the action of the previous meeting supporting the Inglewood strike, although that strike had been disavowed by the national leadership of both the United Automobile Workers and the C. I. O. And it showed pretty clearly the actual numerical strength of the Stalinist minority, which at present dominates the New York local, to be less than 400 out of a total membership of a little more than 4,000. To be sure, the administration slate of delegates for the Guild's national convention won in the recent election by a ratio of seven to five, with 1,600 not voting. But that contest involved various issues, factional and other, whereas the Inglewood strike posed only one question: whether or not the Guild should support a stoppage which Philip Murray himself had labeled an outlaw strike precipitated by Communists in the automobile workers' union and designed to hinder the defense program. There is no question that the Guild administration mustered every bit of its membership strength in order to prevent a reversal of the stand taken a week before at a meeting attended by some 200 people. That strength turned out to be 362. The opposition likewise tried to muster its strength. Its "meeting" force totaled 365 votes, but in the week between the two meetings 800 members had individually repudiated the support of the wild-cat strike at Inglewood by signing statements circulated in the various units.

This is a typical case study of a union under Stalinist control. That control is based on the ability to command the regular attendance at union meetings of a disciplined one-way minority which is large enough to constitute a majority at most meetings.

The ostensible and easy answer to the question of how this control can be broken is that the majority, if they would fulfil their duty as members as faithfully as the Stalinists do, could very soon, by regular attendance at meetings, dislodge the minority. And even an oppositionist is likely to argue sadly that since the Stalinists are so assiduous they have a right to set the Guild's policies even though those policies run counter to the actual sentiments of the great majority of its members. But this is a fallacious argument which the Stalinists have exploited.

Certainly the inertia of the majority is reprehensible. But this is not the only factor. Even a good union member, particularly if he is subject to eccentric newspaper hours, cannot always attend meetings; and he cannot always stay until the small hours of the morning, when the Stalinists, who control the machinery, deliberately choose to discuss really important issues, since they know that by then the field has been left to members under their orders. In any case, the failure to attend meetings hardly justifies the penalty of having the union run by a machine of which the driving power is not primarily the desire to build a strong union but to use it as a political tool.

Certainly also, those who do the work in unions should have the honor of being recognized and given official positions. But the fact that they do the work does not entitle them to flout the known will of the membership, as the Guild administration has repeatedly done—especially when their zeal springs from extra-union motives which are fundamentally inimical to its welfare.

The ideal way out of a serious dilemma would be to bring about somehow the constant and overwhelming attendance at every meeting of a majority aware of the issues and determined to have the union run in the interest of the membership, not of an outside political party.

But democratic bodies being what they are, it is difficult to weld the majority, which, unlike the Stalinist minority, has no desire to rule for an outside party's sake, into a disciplined unit. Its members are much more likely to lapse into disgust and indifference. Practically speaking, the only immediate solution probably lies in the building of a counter minority machine, which is not in itself desirable. There is one other hope. The national convention of the Guild, now in session, may oust its present Stalinist leadership. An executive council representing the definitely anti-Communist views of the membership could bring pressure on the New York regime; it might even cite the example of the Teachers' Union in expelling locals under Communist control.

It would be unfortunate if such measures became necessary, but the Inglewood episode demonstrated that the situation in the New York local cannot continue except at the price of serious disruption. It also indicated that the Stalinists are ready to risk even that rather than lose their control. They not only tried to throw out the vote that reversed the Guild's stand on the Inglewood strike by charging fraud, but the leadership attempted later, with surpassing impudence, to construe this reversal into a reaffirmation. Obviously the Communist Party's trade-union policy is "rule or ruin."

Hitler Marches East

BY LOUIS FISCHER

SO THE Nazis have launched a declared war on the Soviet Union. Another negotiated peace has been disrupted by Adolf Hitler. In September, 1938, Chamberlain and Daladier, appeasers and non-interventionists, signed a negotiated peace with Hitler. Eleven months later their countries were at war with Germany. August 23, 1939, was Stalin's Munich; he negotiated a peace with Hitler at the expense of Poland and the Baltic states. Now Stalin is reaping the fruits of that appeasement. It was inevitable; critics of the post-Litvinov policy always predicted it. There is no safety with Hitler. The only way is to destroy him.

I think America's part in the war shaped Russia's fate. The more aid America sent to England the more Hitler had to extract from Russia. That helps to explain why the Communists opposed aid to England. America's jerky progress toward belligerency convinced the Nazis that they could not win the war quickly. They had to prepare, instead, for a long contest with Britain and America. But the territory under Nazi control has never fed itself and cannot support a protracted war. Only the Soviet Union can furnish the required supplies. Hitler, however, wanted more than Russian materials. He wanted to be sure that Moscow would not cut him off in an hour of dire need. He wanted to be sure that if the war lasted a long time, and if Germany were weakened by it, Russia would not stab Germany in the back. To prevent this, Hitler has to break the Soviets militarily and deprive them of their key munitions and raw materials. Hitler's aim today is a Vichified Russia, part occupied, part "free," working for him and maybe even fighting for him.

It is very likely that Hitler decided to attack irrespective of Moscow's attitude. He wished to clean up his Russian problem once and for all and thus consolidate the entire European continent behind him in anticipation of the Anglo-American siege. But if Berlin did make far-reaching demands for goods deliveries and for control inside Russia, it was certainly obvious to Stalin that these demands were merely the beginning of a series, and that today's yielding would leave Russia less capable of resisting tomorrow's pressure.

Hitler was forced to fight the Bolsheviks, however much he might have preferred to concentrate on England. And thus Stalin had to go to war, however much he fears the results of hostilities.

The fate of the Soviet regime is at stake. The outbreak of war between Germany and Russia makes Communist Russia, in effect, the ally of anti-Communist Britain and America. But Czarist Russia was also the ally of the democracies, and then Czarist Russia collapsed. Russia's history since 1936—which I analyzed in detail in my "Men and Politics"—will now avenge itself upon Bolshevism.

The Soviet-Nazi war is a great stroke of luck for England and America. The British probably intensified their bombing of the Ruhr, western Germany, and occupied France from June 11 on in order to encourage Moscow to stand firm, and President Roosevelt may have had in mind Soviet psychology, among other things, when he sent his stiff anti-Nazi message to Congress on the Robin Moor. If the Baltic states, White Russia, and the Ukraine are quickly overrun, if the Soviet government is forced to capitulate and vast Bolshevik territories are subjected to methodical German economic exploitation, the democracies will have suffered a serious setback, for Hitler will then turn west with augmented confidence and power. But by immediately stepping up their efforts the British and Americans can involve Hitler in a violent two-front war which is the best road to an Allied victory.

In one way, so far as Hitler is concerned, his attack on Russia is late. Earlier, Germany would have been less tormented by British raids. Now, the R. A. F., using new American-made planes, can handicap his Blitzkrieg against the Soviets. But Hitler had to delay until he had conquered the Balkans, "coordinated" Vichy, and converted Turkey's alliance with Russia into Turkish neutrality. The advantage for Hitler, however, is that the fields and dirt roads in the Soviet area of combat are now dry, and since there are not even any stone walls, wire fences, or stout houses in the Ukraine or White Russia, Nazi tanks and trucks can move cross-country in straight lines. The Ukraine is as flat as a table. The Ukrainian harvest is still green in the fields. Harvesting takes place at the end of July. If the Ukrainian crop is partially destroyed by incendiary bombs or ground fighting or as a result of inadequate labor and insufficient oil for tractors, combines, and motor transport, Hitler will not care; Germany has enough bread for 1941, and the Nazis are thinking of the Ukrainian rye and wheat of 1942; but it would be a blow to Russia, which without Ukrainian surpluses must go short or immediately begin dipping into meager reserves. In July the population of the city of Moscow depends for bread on the Crimea, which reaps before the Ukraine. But if railway lines are overburdened by the military, the effect will be felt forthwith.

To take Leningrad, the Baltic states, White Russia, the Ukraine, the granary of the northern Caucasus, and the Caucasus proper, Hitler has probably given himself three full months, until the beginning of October, when weather becomes an obstacle. If he succeeds, he will have deprived the Soviet regime of its richest food sources and its most valuable industries. He could thereupon ram a Brest-Litovsk peace down the throat of the Soviet government and direct his fury against Britain once more. As between the German and Soviet armed forces, the German are stronger. How long Russia can hold out will therefore depend on the amount of damage the R. A. F. can inflict on Germany and on how much Nazi air power Churchill compels Hitler to divert westward.

Unfortunately for Stalin, the Finns and Rumanians can say that they are fighting to regain territory he recently stole from them. This will win them sympathy among the other robbed nations of Europe. The Nazis will benefit from that sympathy.

Many allegiances will be divided. Americans have been friendly to Finland. Now Finland is an ally of our enemy, Hitler. The Communists should, logically, go pro-British and forget the faults of Winston Churchill, who has promised aid to Stalin. Will Japan jump on Siberia? Will America try to stop Japan from doing so? Will Lindbergh, who should now have some doubts about a Nazi victory, therefore intensify agitation which favors the Nazis?

Whatever the answers to these riddles, most Americans will rejoice that Hitler has another enemy. As preliminary to any consideration of American aid to Russia under the Lease-Lend Act, Washington should informally demand that Russia and Britain sign an agreement not to conclude a separate peace with Germany. Russia is a tremendous country, and should the Blitzkrieg succeed, the Soviet government could retreat endlessly eastward. It would also make a good impression in this country and England if Maxim Litvinov and Troyanovsky were restored to office and if purged Bolsheviks who are still alive, like Radek, Rakovsky, and some others, were released.

The Chance of the West

BY NORMAN ANGELL

THE Nazi turn against Russia belongs clearly to the order of events which are at once a great peril and a great opportunity. The peril lies in the fact that Hitler may find in this new move one more opportunity for dividing morally those whom he must overcome if his victories so far are to profit him at all. The opportunity lies in the fact that, properly employed, the move may marshal against him the very forces he proposes to use against the rest of the world, or at the very least give time to rally and mobilize the forces potentially so very much greater than his own, and still unconquered by him—the forces of America and the British Empire.

The military strategists point out that in any case there is very little material aid that America could quickly give to Russia, even if it went as part of the aid sent to Britain. But if during the next few weeks Hitler can manage seriously to divide American and British opinion, then certain vital strategic decisions may be so delayed while "waiting for public opinion to develop" that he will be able once more to seize and keep the initiative. It is almost certain that the Hess visit was part of this maneuver.

We—the British and American public—have still inadequately digested the fact that the ultimate explanation of Hitler's victories has been his employment of the "moral" weapon—his capacity to divide the non-Nazi world so that it can be brought under the domination of a Nazi minority; if the non-Nazi majority had only learned the trick of hanging together as the sole alternative to being hanged separately, this evil menace would not now hang over us.

It is particularly on this matter of Bolshevism versus Nazism that the confusion has from the beginning arisen. Western Europe could not, in fact, make up its mind which of the two evils was the greater; and failed to see that that was never the question. The real question was, not which was the greater evil, but which was the greater danger. "Communist unrest" was something for Western states to meet in part by education, in part by constructive social reform. It was never anywhere in itself a military danger. It was a danger to defense only in so far as it played the game of Nazism by contributing to the divisions from which Nazism, not communism, profited.

The events of the last two years have shown beyond dispute that Nazism was in a position to profit greatly from the weaknesses of Western society—particularly the disruptive nationalism which rendered that society incapable of mutual aid in defense against the domination of a violent and ruthless but competent and cohesive minority. It was this weakness which enabled the Nazi minority to sweep over the world in a devastating wave that threatens to carry away the freedoms built up in a thousand years of toil.

A day or two ago I sat in a gathering of religious, well-intentioned folk. A man of education and knowledge expressed the view that Britain should have avoided this war at the time of Munich by striking a bargain with Germany which would have allowed Hitler a free hand to attack Russia in return for peace in the West. Very few of the earnest folk present seemed at all shocked by his suggestion. Very few seemed to recall that the proposal represented precisely the intention which those of us who were left everywhere believed to animate the more sinister elements of the right; and that for governments in Western Europe to have lent themselves to such a maneuver would have split Western nations from top to bottom, would not have preserved peace, and would have delivered the situation into the hands of the Nazis even more completely than events have done so far.

To forestall the confusions which are likely to bedevil counsel and policy in the coming months we must keep constantly before us the first and last purpose of this war against Germany. That purpose, as it affects America, is the defense of the people of this country, as of others, against the oppressions of a counter-revolution similar to that which the people of France now face, a counter-revolution which has resulted in part from internal division, in part from external pressure.

Russian communism as we now know it represents an evil form of society. So be it. Are we therefore indifferent whether Russia is overrun and brought under the domination of the Nazi power? We know that if that takes place Nazi Germany will stretch from the shores of the Bay of Biscay and the North Sea to the shores of the Pacific. Germany, in fact, will in that event be brought to within a dozen miles of American territory. And that conquest, as Churchill reminds us, would be merely the prelude to an all-out assault upon the British fortress. If Britain fell, then the whole world outside of North America would be under the command of Hitler; and no one who can face facts at all would pretend that in such circumstances the United States would be defensible for very long.

Russia, we are told, is not a Christian state. Neither is China. Neither is India. Most of the world is non-Christian. The conquest of Russia by Germany would not make Russia more Christian. It would only make it more dangerous.

To show that the West is prepared to give Russia the same rights of protection against external violence, the same rights to life as a nation and a state, which Western nations demand, will be to increase the chances that ultimately it will, with others, take its part in common resistance to war. The alternative—some form of appeasement which would throw the Soviets to the Nazi wolves—would in the end condemn us all to a like fate.

The Worker and Defense

BY PHILIP MURRAY

THE C. I. O. rejects the view that it is now necessary to curtail consumption drastically in order to carry out our defense program and provide aid to Britain. I am not unmindful of the expanding character of the defense effort or of the now discernible actual and potential shortages in strategic materials, especially certain metals. But I know that there are still in this country several million jobless men and women who could and should be employed to build additional capacity for the production of armaments as well as consumer goods. I know, too, that our present productive facilities are not being utilized to the full.

Those who advocate lowered living standards at this time cling to the discredited notion that our economic welfare requires an economy of scarcity and overlook the fact that the greatest asset of a nation seeking to defend its democratic way of life is a healthy and satisfied people. If all our people are to put forth the energy and give the devotion for which the times call, those on the lower rungs of the economic ladder must have their living standard raised, not lowered; and it is my considered judgment that this can be done without harm or delay to the defense program. It cannot, however, be done under a "business as usual" arrangement. It calls rather for careful and intelligent planning far beyond anything we have so far undertaken.

Some months ago I proposed a plan for Industry Councils, the fundamental purpose of which was to obtain full and efficient use of all our productive resources. These resources include not only plant facilities and manpower but labor's ability to lend practical aid in production problems, as illustrated by the Reuther and steel-expansion plans submitted by the C. I. O. Management has no monopoly of brains, and the extensive experience of labor could be used most advantageously to advance the defense program and the nation's well-being. Unfortunately, none of these proposals have received the serious consideration which many industrialists and economists, as well as labor men, believe they merit.

Current discussion of the need to reduce outlay on consumer goods rests upon the assumption that increased employment, plus increased wage rates, has already created or will soon create purchasing power in excess of available commodities, and that a commodity shortage leads to high prices and consequent inflation. Suggestions for avoiding this unpleasant prospect are running rife, most of them aiming in one way or another to reduce the worker's purchasing power and living standards. The devices proposed range all the way from frozen wage rates to increased taxes and a variety of complex deferred-spending plans.

I am fully cognizant of the dangers inherent in inflation. No group has more to suffer from runaway prices than the working people of America, a very large proportion of whom, even when they are fully employed, receive an income which, despite recent wage boosts, is barely up to a level of health and efficiency. I do not subscribe, however, to the premise that we face now or in the near future a serious shortage of consumer goods. Some goods are going to be scarcer, to be sure. We are going to have fewer automobiles, and a reduced supply of many other mechanical gadgets. But these reductions will not materially lower living standards, nor need they be allowed to become the pivot for a spiral of rising prices. If our price-control agencies function effectively, there is no reason why prices should get out of hand.

The worker will have ample opportunity to spend his wages on commodities which are far more essential to his own and his family's well-being than articles made of steel, aluminum, or nickel, many of which he buys because he is unable to resist high-pressure salesmanship and attractive instalment-plan offers. There are ample reservoirs of consumer goods on which our population can spend its income without interfering with armament production. First of all, it can buy more and better food. Facts brought out at the Nutrition Conference recently held in Washington, the high rate of rejections among draftees because of physical defects, and various health studies made in recent years attest eloquently to the inadequate diet of a large segment of our population. Department of Agriculture experts estimate that if American families had "good" diets, they would consume 15 to 20 per cent more dairy products, 35 per cent more eggs, and from 70 to 100 per cent more fruits and vegetables. We have all these commodities in abundance, and, given sufficient income, our people will buy them. The value of such spending to both consumers and producers hardly needs to be argued.

The inadequacy of medical and dental care among our people, especially in small industrial towns and rural areas, is a disgrace of long standing. We may run short of facilities for building much-needed hospitals and clinics, but there is as yet no shortage of doctors and dentists. Some small effort directed toward organizing health cooperatives would help to divert some of the national income to keeping the nation's health intact, and incidentally help some of the less prosperous members of the medical and dental professions to earn a livelihood commensurate with their long preparation for these important and socially useful careers.

There is need for wholesome recreation. A population hard at work needs adequate facilities for spending its leisure time to the best advantage. Too great strain and fatigue, and the hazards of accident and ill health attendant upon them, must be avoided. Periodic vacations open up a channel for spending which instead of interfering with defense production would make it more efficient.

The point I wish to make is that we do not need to curtail consumption; we need only to redirect it. This calls for intelligent community planning, in which organized labor is always ready and willing to lend a hand. Much of the redirection will take place automatically. On the basis of usual spending patterns, our economists estimate that nearly 80 per cent of the $500,000,000 annual wage increase recently obtained by the C. I. O. for its members will be spent on food, clothing, housing, medical care, and general household operations. With a reasonable amount of redirected consumption, there will be no need for deferred spending schemes. I know the American workers. They are loyal and thrifty. Those whose income is above the level essential for modest but decent living will save without compulsion. And they will gladly invest in securities offered by Uncle Sam.

I know, of course, that proposed taxation and deferred-spending plans have at least two other objectives in view—to pay for the defense program and to provide a backlog of purchasing power against a possible post-war depression. As to the first, the only just and democratic principle of taxation is that based on ability to pay. I have no objection to workers paying an income tax, provided their incomes are high enough to enable them to maintain a living standard commensurate with our national resources. But no tax structure is adequate or fair which, as the President said, allows the rich to get richer and the poor to get poorer. I am most emphatically opposed to a sales tax.

The kind of backlog for post-war buying which can be built up through deferred spending will be insufficient to save us from depression if we revert to the anarchy which ruled at the close of the last war, and will be unnecessary if we plan for comprehensive economic adjustments. Assuming we can force our people to deprive themselves of the necessities of life to the extent of, say, $4 billion a year, assuming further that the emergency will be over by 1945, between $16 billion and $20 billion will have been accumulated. Repayment of these savings will depend upon Congressional action. Congress may decide not to pay them at all, in which case the whole scheme will topple like a house of cards. If it chooses to pay them back over a period of years, the net effect of the annual payments will be too small to check deflation and depression. If, however, Congress decides to pay them back in a lump sum, at a time when our national debt will already be the highest in history, it can do so only by levying new taxes. If these are levied on the poor, money taken out of one pocket will be put into another. If the taxes are to be levied on those able to pay, why not do it now, when profits are at their peak?

We shall find ample use for our expanded productive capacity at the end of the emergency in building homes and roads, replenishing the supply of automobiles and other heavy consumer goods, helping feed and rebuild war-torn Europe, and aiding in the development of Latin America. A vast market for goods and services will exist among our own people if only they are allowed a fair share of the wealth they produce. This depends, of course, on a more equitable distribution of the national income, which can be brought about through collective bargaining, an intelligent tax structure, and enforcement of the anti-monopoly laws. Beside these potential outlets the demand created by currently deferred spending would be practically nil.

We must never lose sight of the fact that the "four freedoms" we are all determined to preserve include economic freedom. This freedom is limited as long as millions remain unemployed. It will be in grave jeopardy if we show any readiness to surrender without a struggle the minimum living standards of our people. I am convinced that such surrender is not necessary and that it would offer a greater threat to the democratic cause than any other possible development within or without. No mental gymnastics can build a sound case for cutting down consumption as long as there is an unused labor supply to produce more goods. With full utilization of available labor, with proper redirection of consumer demand, with the application to constructive ends of the intelligence God gave us, we can keep our people well fed, well clad, in time well housed, and at the same time produce the arms we need to defend ourselves and those who, like ourselves, seek to retain the decencies and freedoms which the human race has striven for through the centuries.

Geopolitics, East and West

BY PETER STEVENS

TO AN American just returned from the war and near-war zones of Southeastern Europe and Southwestern Asia the pattern of talk and events here is deeply shocking. It is shocking because it is so reminiscent of what went on in all the European countries now occupied by the Germans and in the countries of the Middle East which are awaiting Nazi "deliverance" from imperialistic, plutocratic British "tyranny."

I have watched the plans of the German Geopolitical Institute* executed step by step by Himmler's Gestapo and Goebbels's propaganda machine in eight countries—Hungary, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Greece, Syria, Palestine, and Iraq. Only in Turkey have I seen them thwarted by a vigilant and shrewd government which has dealt ruthlessly with every attempt to set the geopolitical machinery running. Other eyewitnesses have described how Western European states were paralyzed by the softening-up process used by the Nazis prior to actual occupation. In all, seventeen countries have succumbed to the Nazi "strategy of terror," discovering too late that Hitler's methods of political warfare cannot be countered with orthodox kid gloves. Yet so cleverly and gradually is the Nazi virus injected that we have not yet fully recognized the unmistakable infection in our own body politic. It may be useful, therefore, to sketch the general pattern of the German technique as I have observed it in action and to illustrate its effects with incidents from my own experience in the conquered countries. To this pattern and these examples the parallels here are all too obvious.

The spearhead of the Nazi method is the construction of what may be called a front of malcontents. This must be led by a respectable group who can be put on display to reassure the public. Confused idealists, uninformed pacifists, ex-heroes, sincere leaders of dead causes are required to provide an innocent window-dressing. The rank and file of the malcontents' front is made up of Russo-ophile Communists, Jew-baiters, anti-Catholic bigots, reactionary bankers and manufacturers, discredited political groups, personally ambitious rabble-rousers, irredentists, and the diehard flotsam of lost causes which litters the political sea of every democratic country. For ammunition old grudges, blind prejudices, and long-abandoned issues are exhumed and polished up. Each group in this front is promised everything it has ever wanted; each group is assured separately and confidentially that they will be "top men" and that their cause will prevail when the wave of the future rolls in.

Certain key men not in any of these groups are often bought outright. There is good reason to believe that Horia Sima in Rumania, Mihailov in Bulgaria, the Koualty leaders in Syria, and Rashid Ali in Iraq were won over in this way. In Bagdad in April I was told that Rashid Ali's price was $100,000 in a Swiss bank, also available at the Imperial Bank of Iran, plus a European mistress and a new Mercedes-Benz, both carrying a trade-in guaranty.

* The Institute is described by Frederick Sondern in the June issue of Current History in an article entitled The Thousand Scientists Behind Hitler.

Though it may be hard for our well-meaning fellow-travelers who consider themselves merely liberals to believe it, the Communists in every Balkan country cooperated fully with the German organizations and the local malcontents' front in preparing for the capitulation. A former Prime Minister of Bulgaria, the leader of the largest liberal leftist party in the country, said to me in January, "Any hope of a popular-front, left-of-center opposition to German occupation is gone, since our strongest and best-organized group, the Communists, are firmly in the camp of the Germans in the spirit of the Berlin-Moscow agreement." A few self-respecting Communists did form an anti-Russian Communist group, but it was pitifully small.

As soon as the German diplomatic corps and the advance Gestapo men report this front of malcontents as an established fact, the Goebbels machinery goes into high gear. One or more newspapers are bought outright or subsidized. Illustrated magazines somewhat like Life are printed in Berlin and distributed free in great quantities. The D. N. B., on the German radio, appeals to the population through every receiving set, and the propaganda power of the German radio is incomparably greater than that of any other country. Its influence in Iraq may be taken as typical. Every Arab, at least every town or village Arab, spends part of his day in a coffee house. And every coffee house has a powerful outdoor radio which can be heard blocks away. From Tel-Kochek in the north to Basra in the south, one is seldom out of range of their weird music and loud speech. The Germans hired a brilliant rabble-rouser named Younis Bahri at a huge salary and took him to Berlin. He speaks the language of the average Iraqi of the coffee house and has rubbed salt into every old sore disturbing British-Iraqi relations. The B. B. C. from London and Jerusalem counters this with Arabic programs given in the stiff and pedantic classical Arabic, which is almost unintelligible to the common people. An Englishman who has lived in Iraq since the last war told me he believed that 90 per cent of the people who had access to a radio heard Younis Bahri daily, while 15 per cent at the most heard the B. B. C.

Some time before the occupation the Germans had gained control of almost all moving-picture theaters in the Balkans, and pacifist groups were strengthened by the constant stream of German films showing Blitzkrieg scenes. These were usually followed on the screen by views of young German Apollos in field-gray tending Polish babies or dressing the wounds of frightening-looking thugs in French or Dutch or Norwegian uniforms. Deputies, hesitating politicians, and lukewarm army officers of high rank were wined, dined, and shown these pictures. The obvious implication was, why make these wholesome German boys destroy you when you can have them here as friends simply by a little cooperation?

I heard much whispering about the way the Nazis blackmailed factory owners and other rich men and I finally ran across one case which is probably fairly typical. One would expect that the rich, after listening to what the D. N. B. had to say about plutocrats, would be strongly against the New Order, but a great proportion of them turned up, at least apparently, in the Nazi camp. Since he is alive and still in Sofia, we will call my man Gregor Stanev, a name which bears no relation to his own. Likewise we will say he owns a shoe factory. Several times during 1940 a German purchasing agent came to his factory and ordered moderate quantities of shoes at very good prices. In December the agent came again and offered a contract for the entire output of the factory, at good prices, for a period of five years. Stanev was delighted until the agent added with studied casualness, "We expect that your contributions to the Agrarian Party will cease. We further expect that your not inconsiderable influence will be used to facilitate an orderly and peaceful installation of the New Order in Bulgaria. From time to time we may have other small favors to ask along this line which we are sure you will be glad to grant."

Stanev refused to be bought and asked for the contract. It was returned to him, and the agent left, apologetically and with a great show of courtesy. Within a very few days Stanev's eldest son, a young army officer, came home upset and excited. He urged his father to change his mind. He had been approached by a senior officer on behalf of the New Order. This officer had assured him that the factories of those who cooperated would not be confiscated or molested in any way. If Stanev refused, he faced possible loss by confiscation, certain ruin through loss of orders, and in all probability the breakup of his family and a concentration camp. Stanev has a wife and several children in addition to the son who is an army officer. He could not be bought, but this threat to his family and their safety was too much; he signed.

I do not know the end of this particular case. But if other incidents are indicative, the "purchasing agent" probably came back when the German army entered Bulgaria on March 1 in the neat dark gray of the Elite Guard. He is probably now Stanev's partner in the shoe business.

The success of this kind of campaign, based on unrest, disorganization, and threats, depends on the German agility in carrying water on both shoulders—making incompatible promises to incompatible groups—until the Nazis' complete domination makes it no longer necessary for them to keep any promises. Last winter and fall the Nazis were financing and directing diametrically opposed irredentist groups in Yugoslavia, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania. Persons opposed to the New Order in these countries begged the English to flood the air waves and propaganda routes with the simple statement that Dobrudja, Macedonia, Bessarabia, Transylvania, Croatia, and other territories were being promised by the Germans to two countries at once. In fact, certain portions of Transylvania were actually being promised to Russia, Hungary, and the Rumanian Iron Guardists at one and the same time. They are now occupied by German troops. The English refused on the ground that such propaganda would be interfering in the internal affairs of a friendly country. They were content to bring the matter to the attention of the governments concerned through regular diplomatic channels, ignoring the fact that these governments were in many cases carefully keeping the facts from their people in order to aid the Germans.

Thwarted nationalism provides the happiest hunting ground for the Nazis. This approach has been used very successfully in Croatia, Syria, Palestine, Iraq, and even in India and South Africa. Imperialism and plutocracy are the most successful bogies of propaganda. And the British, whose history has been gone over with a fine-toothed comb for examples of their villainies, are presented as preeminently plutocratic and imperialistic. We fill the next spot of honor as their dupes and assistants. Boer War concentration camps, America's refusal to sell the Boers guns, and eighteenth-century British atrocities are refurbished and broadcast in sanctimonious terms by the operators of Dachau and the authors of the crimes in Poland.

We are told as the Balkans were told, and as each victim has been told, that we are the exception; that against us there is no claim and no conspiracy. And we, like those helpless millions in Europe, show signs of believing it. Many of us, like many of them, are willing to forget or explain away the very words of the official interpreter and formulator of Nazi ideals and aims, Dr. Rosenberg: "A new peace shall make Germany mistress of the globe, a peace not hanging on the palm fronds of lachrymose pacifist women-folk, but established by the victorious sword of a master-race that takes over the world in the service of a higher civilization."

I do not know whether the forces that march behind the respectable front of Lindbergh and Wheeler and Nye were marshaled by Haushofer's Geopolitical Institute. But they have an amazing similarity to groups used by the Nazis in other countries. There walk the fellow-traveling labor leaders, the Christian Front and the Jew-baiters, Protestant Veterans and Catholic-haters, and an amazing array of professional rabble-rousers and adherents of lost causes. The week that I returned from Europe, the Christian Front held an America First rally in Boston. The entertainment was blitz-horror movies, supplied by the German consul. How familiar it all seemed! To me it was plainly the repetition on a colossal scale, as befits America, of the first figures in the pattern which in seventeen nations in the last few years has led finally to capitulation and the New Order.

Some say that the Bill of Rights gives this movement the "right" to proceed on its fatal course; others that we are so strong and so rich that we need not be troubled by Communist interference with our plans for arming, that we can afford to ignore the defeatism and pacifism of Lindbergh and Wheeler, and the racial, social, and religious hates of Coughlin and the Christian Front. But let us not forget the similarity of our malcontents' front to the Nazi tools in each and every one of the nations already engulfed by the Wave of the Future.

What's Wrong with Our Army?

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE army has aptly been called the stepchild of American defense. More than any other agency of government it has been the victim of circumstances. During the two decades of peace, military training in the schools and the fascism, real or alleged, of some officers have been favorite targets of pacifists and liberals. Economy-minded Congresses have so reduced the army's appropriations that it has, at times, nearly perished from financial malnutrition. Its personnel, both commissioned and enlisted, has too frequently consisted of the ne'er-do-wells and misfits of civil life, to whom the prospect of a secure if poorly paid existence has beckoned more alluringly than the competition of civilian life.

Today the army suffers from a very different set of circumstances. It has been given more money than it ever expected to receive and masses of recruits whom it was unprepared to assimilate, though the General Staff, without too great an inner struggle, allowed itself to be persuaded to favor conscription. Supplied with unlimited quantities of both money and men, the army has been expected to do only one thing—show results. In some respects its response has been very creditable. Many of the useless activities of military life, such as excessive fatigue duty, overemphasis on the manual of arms, and antiquated forms of etiquette, have been dropped. Rookies clad in sensible uniforms have been given as much instruction as they could possibly absorb in the time allowed. All things considered, the construction of cantonments has progressed satisfactorily. Much necessary new equipment has been provided. In short, the army has shown more energy than many of its critics would formerly have believed possible.

But these isolated accomplishments do not mean that the army has become a powerful modern force capable of meeting German troops and defeating them. The training of a mass of raw recruits results in the temporary weakening of an army, for veteran divisions have to be broken up to form the cadres for the new material. The development of new weapons, particularly anti-aircraft and anti-tank guns, has left the army short of implements for fighting a modern war. No less an authority than General Marshall has testified to the army's fine spirit, but virtually nothing has been done deliberately to build morale and esprit de corps among the new troops. The Army Air Corps, partly because of the necessity of providing air aid to England, is in a state of bad disorganization, with too few modern planes.

Much more serious is the fact that the basic plan for the army's expansion is defective. As in the First World War we are developing a slow, cumbersome mass army. Yet according to the testimony of German, French, and neutral observers the German troops which actually conquered the Low Countries and France consisted of only some twelve divisions, about 120,000 men. The bulk of the German army followed at the heels of the dive-bombers and armored units and played the part of policemen, consolidating and holding gains. The armored divisions, possessing great mobility and speed and from three to seven times the fire power of the older infantry units, were the effective striking force. Other troops had a purely secondary function. And despite the contrary claims of Allied propagandists, the losses of the attackers were remarkable small.

This revolution in warfare has been almost completely ignored by our army leaders. We now have two armored divisions, with two others planned, for an army which has been increased 600 per cent within a year. An army of four million men even is being discussed. If it is built up to this size without an increase in the armored branch, the American army will present the interesting spectacle of a force 1 per cent modern and 99 per cent obsolete. When a man in a tank or plane has been demonstrated to be worth ten or fifty or a hundred ordinary infantrymen armed with rifles, it is obviously foolish to multiply the number of infantrymen instead of the number of armored troops. Germany today probably has at least twenty Panzer divisions. Between twenty and forty are the indispensable minimum for us.

In a recent issue of the Infantry Journal, a progressive service publication, the view was expressed that the United States "might do worse than to duplicate the work of the Germans but probably could, and should, do much better." Both parts of the statement are correct. Many of our army officers, for example, General Hugh A. Drum of the First Army, foresaw the armored division, parachute troops, dive-bombing in conjunction with infantry attacks, and other recent developments before these things had been tried out by any modern army. Under their leadership we could ultimately evolve a system of warfare as much better than that of the German army as German methods today are in advance of those of 1918. Unfortunately these are not the men who are in positions of leadership. Until recent months they have been the unhonored prophets or the suppressed rebels of American military life. Our typical army leaders obtained their positions after long years of competent but undistinguished service, with promotion on a basis of straight seniority. They are men who have resolutely closed their minds to new ideas; for the past hundred years the American army has rejected virtually every suggested improvement or invention until years after it had become an established success elsewhere. If we wish to make an army as good as the German army, the closed minds in the higher ranks must be eliminated—by arbitrary executive action if necessary. Advancement by seniority must be replaced by selection for merit. And the officers selected must be promoted to high command at an age when they are still at the height of their physical and mental powers.

The lack of vision of American military men is due partly to the cumbersome organization of both the army and the War Department. The functioning of the transport and supply services of the army has been a particular cause for complaint among field officers. The outstanding authority on military organization in the United States, General Johnson Hagood, has written: "The present organization of the Department of War is so involved that no Secretary of War has been able to understand it. . . . No archangel of heaven could operate a machine so badly constructed and so complicated as the War Department is under existing law . . . it would fall down immediately upon the outbreak of war."

The problem created by the presence of incompetent and reactionary officers in the higher ranks is not, of course, peculiar to the United States. The French army had its full share of backwardness. So did the British army—until recently. So did the German army—until Hitler ruthlessly weeded out the dead wood in the German High Command. One of the most striking features of the Nazi forces is the large proportion of young men in high positions. Men in their forties occupy posts as high as those held by American officers of sixty. And unlike the United States, Germany has made a systematic effort, through high pay and generous treatment, through entertainment and propaganda and obvious marks of national esteem, to create and maintain a magnificent morale among its soldiers. Thorough training of troops in the field of their activity is another mark of the German system.

Our present selective-service law gives too many men too little training. For the less vital components of the modern army a year may suffice, but for the armored divisions and air force a lengthening of the period of service or the use of long-term volunteers is needed in order to do away with the rapid turnover of personnel.

One of the greatest defects of American defense has long been lack of coordination. Aside from the President, whom pressure of business normally makes unavailable, there is no person or group in Washington to coordinate the needs and plans of the various defense services with those of the United States as a whole. Congress is not in a position to offer help, for each of eight defense committees deals with only a certain part of the entire field and cannot see defense policies as a whole. There is a definite need for a national general staff composed of informed civilians and representatives of the air, sea, and land forces. At the same time heroic efforts must be made to break down the jealousies which have long inhibited the smooth cooperation of the navy with the army and the army with the air force.

Our naval air force is an integral part of the navy; it has no sense of separatism and gives intense loyalty to naval traditions. But there is little friendship or cooperation between the army air force and the army proper. Efforts to coordinate bombing with infantry attacks, for example, were made only during the last maneuvers and then rather clumsily, according to observers. Rightly or wrongly, many aviation men feel that their interests have been sacrificed by a reactionary High Command, which has been very jealous of its prestige and knows little of aviation. A formula for cooperation should be found which includes a frank recognition on the part of both defense branches of the utility of the other in winning modern wars.

All these improvements, however, will not guarantee an army capable of defeating German troops in the field. In war, superiority, not equality, must always be sought. The brilliant American officers whose theories of the art of war were first practiced by the more alert Germans must be given an opportunity to evolve means to surpass the Germans.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The New Economic Order

ADDRESSING the general assembly of the German Reichsbank recently, Dr. Funk, its president and also Nazi Minister of Economics, boasted: "Despite the British blockade, the volume of Germany's foreign trade has again almost reached its pre-war level." In view of the fact that Germany obtained some 50 per cent of its pre-war imports from countries to which access is now completely blocked, this statement at first sight naturally arouses skepticism. But Dr. Funk himself has an explanation of the seeming miracle. "Germany's exchange of goods with European countries," he tells us, "has risen by a round 65 per cent in the course of the past year.

It is perfectly possible that the Reichsbank president is, on this occasion, actually telling the truth, apart from his decidedly euphemistic use of the word "exchange." For there is no doubt that Germany has obtained during the past year enormous quantities of goods from the European countries which by force or "persuasion" have been brought within its orbit. To some extent these imports are the fruits of outright seizure, but a considerable part of the flow is the result of transactions which have at least a surface appearance of normal business deals.

The Nazi agent approaches the Danish farmer or French manufacturer offering the current market price, or even better, for the goods he requires. Commercial morality is thus far appeased and the farmer or manufacturer encouraged to sell without the use of coercion. But the question arises: Where does the Nazi agent get the kroner or francs which he flourishes temptingly under the seller's nose? The answer is that he gets them from the Danish National Bank and the Bank of France, both of which have been forced to open unlimited credits for German account. Alternatively they may have been obtained from the governments of those countries as "occupation costs," charged on a scale which leaves large free balances after actual expenses for the German forces within the conquered countries are met. In either case the Reich evades the necessity of exchanging goods against goods.

According to the Neue Zürcher Zeitung of March 14, the credit which the Danish National Bank had been forced to grant to Germany had risen to 488,000,000 crowns by the end of February, 1941. But Danes went cold last winter, for although they exported their butter and bacon to the Reich, which commanded practically the entire coal supply of Europe, they were only permitted to buy extremely meager quantities of fuel. The other occupied countries are in a similar plight. Germany buys from them everything it can lay hands on, even badly needed food stocks, but sells only minimum quantities of the goods they desperately need. This is what Dr. Funk chooses to describe as "exchange."

The conditions of this one-sided commerce are, however, now changing. The occupied countries of the West have by this time been almost drained of existing stocks of commodities, and they can go on feeding the German war machine only if their industries are put to work. This means they must be supplied with raw materials, and since raw materials throughout the Continent are under German control, the Nazi High Command is able to bend production in accordance with its own needs. Thus the Agence Economique et Financière, published in Paris, has stated that Germany is compelled to regard all raw materials, both within its own borders and in the occupied areas, as part of "a joint reserve, to be used primarily for the German war machine and only secondarily for civilian consumption."

Early this year negotiations started in Paris between German and Vichy officials to discuss the technique of economic collaboration, or in other words the utilization of French industry in accordance with German needs. In February a Salon Technique et Industriel Allemand was opened in Paris as a permanent institution, not, as might be thought, to attract buyers of German goods, but to encourage and educate potential French purveyors to Germany. On display are machinery, machine parts, and other metal products for which German industry is willing to sign subcontracts with French concerns. There are also sections devoted to the chemical and textile industries, and special offices where business can be transacted on the spot are available. If necessary, the German purchaser agrees to supply the needed raw materials.

German control over the industries of France and other occupied countries is being further tightened by the systematic buying up of their share capital. The "occupation costs" racket provides a steady flow of funds for this purpose, and many methods of making recalcitrant stockholders see the wisdom of selling have been reported. Among recent deals of this kind are the purchase of some $5,000,000 worth of shares of the Algemeene Kunstzijde Unie, a large Dutch rayon company, by a German group and the acquisition by the Ruhr steel trust, Vereinigte Stahlwerke, of $10,000,000 worth of shares in the Koninklijke Nederlandsche Hoogovens, one of the leading units in Dutch heavy industry. In the second of these cases the almost certainly unwilling seller was the City of Amsterdam.

In Holland the extraordinary export balance reported during the early months of the occupation has fallen off since the beginning of the year, and now, the Neue Zürcher Zeitung reports, trade with Germany shows a considerable import balance. But, it should be noted, these imports are mainly raw materials destined to be worked up in Dutch factories and later returned to Germany as finished products. Altogether, according to the same source, Germany placed orders in Holland valued at over one billion guilders during the first quarter of this year. This expenditure will provide work and wages in Holland, but unless payment takes the form of imported consumers' goods it will do nothing to halt the rapid decline in the Dutch standard of living.

In France the German artificial-fibers cartel has obtained a 30 per cent participation in France Rayonne, a combination of twenty factories with a capital of half a billion francs. Because of the shortage of raw wool and cotton, synthetic-textile manufacture has become a key industry. The Neue Zürcher Zeitung, in an article describing Franco-German collaboration, in this field states: "Germany is placing the necessary quantities of cellulose at the disposal of France, since French raw-material resources, even if fully exploited, would be insufficient. The significance of Franco-German cooperation in the textile industry lies in the fact that the productive capacity of the French rayon plants will be used to a large extent to supply the German market, while the expanded German cellulose industry will have to supply the French market with patents, raw materials, and probably with limited quantities of artificial wool."

Similar measures to reorganize French industry in accordance with the economic needs of the German Wehrmacht are being adopted in many other fields, notably in aluminum and steel production. As British bombings of German industrial areas increase in intensity, the Nazis are likely to rely more and more on the productive facilities of the occupied territories. But while the resulting diffusion of targets will add to the difficulties of the R. A. F., it must also swell the German transport problem by necessitating long additional hauls for raw materials and finished goods. Moreover, it will compel the Nazis to make available greater food supplies to their victims, for the factories cannot be kept running by starving workers.

NEW YORK's coming mayoralty campaign will be the liveliest and most uncertain in years, and because almost every political group now operating in the country will be represented, it will be a national campaign in microcosm. Mayor LaGuardia is odds-on favorite for the Republican nomination. An attempt will be made to have the Democrats indorse LaGuardia, but Brooklyn's District Attorney William O'Dwyer is favored by the machine, and it is believed that nothing short of intervention by Roosevelt would win the nomination for the "little flower." Various fascist and Christian Front groups are backing George U. Harvey and Judge Herbert A. O'Brien inside the Democratic Party, but if O'Dwyer wins, the Coughlinites will support him despite his excellent liberal record. The right wing of the American Labor Party will support LaGuardia; the pro-Communist wing has considered backing Vito Marcantonio, but its plans will doubtless be changed by Russia's entry into the war.

THE REGENTS of the University of Georgia recently voted to retain Walter D. Cocking, Dean of Education, after Governor Talmadge sought to remove him from office because of his advocacy of a teachers' training school at which the pupils would be "both blacks and whites—in order to uplift the state of Georgia." As quoted by the Chicago Tribune, Talmadge said: "I'm not going to put up with any social equality in the university system of the state schools."

PROBABLY the last fellow-traveler to give the old, pre-June 22 Communist line was Rockwell Kent, who spoke over the N. B. C. hook-up at 4:30 p.m. on the day Hitler invaded Russia. Kent attacked the war, the defense program, and the intellectuals who support Britain.

ONCE DURING Elmer Davis's brief stay in England the New York office of the Columbia Broadcasting System invited the news commentator's wife to speak to her husband over the company's transatlantic telephone system. Mr. Davis's voice came over clearly, but he was noticeably reserved and distant for a man talking to his wife. Finally, as the conversation came to a close, Mr. Davis said, "I didn't quite get your name, but will you be sure to give my love to my family."

ANGERED BY PM's exposé of Christian Front propaganda, the New York Sunday Enquirer, whose publisher was linked to the Front in several articles, recently made an effort to get back at the crusading tabloid. PM received a call from an Enquirer representative who said he had heard a rumor that the owners were planning a merger with the Daily Worker. The Enquirer man was assured that this was not the case. In its next issue the Enquirer ran a page 1 story headed, "PM, Daily Worker Will Not Merge."

Soldiers Need Fun

BY THIS time I hope the United Service Organizations will already have every nickel of the $10,000,000 they started out to get on June 3 in order to be able to run the recreation houses the government is going to build for the soldiers, sailors, and other essential participants in defense. But before the organizations, all but one of which are of a distinctly religious nature, start out to spend the money, I should like, as a country boy, to join that city slicker, Miss Elsa Maxwell, in saying a few words about this recreation for our defenders.

Miss Maxwell, who for years has been making her living by putting on parties for the city rich which sometimes sounded at least a little wacky to the country poor, has been out partying with the selectees. She went all the way down to Camp Robinson in Arkansas and came back to make a profound announcement to a lady reporter over luncheon at the Louis XIV Cafe. Soldiers, Miss Maxwell reported, are young and human, and they want fun.

There is nothing wacky about that pronouncement. It makes sense. And no other feeling about these young defenders of ours is going to make sense in the defense towns. Miss Maxwell recommends for them blind dates with nice girls and free beer from nice brewers. Such a plan might encounter difficulties. I am specifically not advocating it. But I am hoping that at least as much of this $10,000,000 is spent on fun as on organized goodness.

I favor providing for the "welfare and spiritual needs" of the young men. I know there are problems of welfare around the defense towns, scandalously neglected ones so far. I know there are times when a boy may want more than anything else the consolation he could get from a priest, preacher, or rabbi, maybe even from a Y. M. C. A. secretary. But I know that what the big mass of the young in defense want is some fun when they get through a week of maneuvering across Tennessee or a day of taking gadgets apart and putting them together again in California. They could take care of their own welfare by staying at the camp. In most posts they could find chaplains for their spiritual needs. But they're going to town. That is why the government is building these recreation centers in the towns to which they go.

A famous architect has designed the recreation houses, but there seems to be some confusion as to the people they are being built for. Depending upon the local or national view, our young defender seems often to be two things, neither of which, I think, he is: he is the roughneck who has to be watched close at hand, or he is the infant for whom elaborate protective processes are being devised at a distance. Evidence can undoubtedly be arrayed to support both views. There are roughnecks in the army. Young men do need protection from some dangers. But the greater truth is that the soldiers, sailors, and defense workers in America today are young men typical of the boys in our own towns. Most of them are pretty good boys. Indeed, in large measure they are the selected and not merely the drafted. But they are young. They want fun, excitement, girls, and sometimes an amazing amount of noise, which they call music.

Most of them would prefer good girls to bad ones. Most of them would rather have a chance at decent fun than the stinking blatancy of the campside honky-tonks. But our young defender is American youth, 1941 model, and he is going to be pulled away from the dangerous entertainers, who have had at least a year of experience in entertaining him, only if he is offered recreation corresponding to what he wants and not to what the righteous and the protective think he needs.

For that job $10,000,000 is not much money in this defense spending. If it is wasted in wrong-headed righteousness, not much money will be lost. But a lot might be lost in time and morale if there is continuing loneliness and boredom and dangerous young adventuring after satisfactions in strange, crowded countrysides.

The collection has been taken, and I've put my money in the plate of the rabbis, priests, preachers, laymen, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, welfare workers, and Salvation Army drum-beaters and doughnut dispensers. In with my money I put my hope that they would do a good job. But I'm expecting to get the value of my money—it was not much—for America only if the emphasis in the recreation houses is put on the ideas of the young who are to be entertained rather than on those of the undoubtedly consecrated and devoted men who are to be in charge of the entertaining. This is the soldiers' and sailors' money—this $10,000,000—and it ought to be spent for their fun. The best way to protect them—to build their morale—is to please them.

You've got to get them and hold them before you can save them.

Please, let's have fun. There is no scarcity even now of solemnity.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE Retail Bookseller recently printed a statement by the editor of Modern Age Books that is rather discouraging for book lovers whose buying is limited by book prices. Modern Age began by publishing new books, as well as reprints, at 25 cents. The venture seemed to be going well at first, but sales were not sufficient to justify the large printings which were in turn necessary to keep down the unit cost of each book. A new range of prices, from 50 to 95 cents, was tried and for a time seemed to be the right formula. Then the average sale began to drop. Since November, 1939, Modern Age has published new books at "regular" prices of $2 or above.

The chief difficulty, according to Modern Age, is a lack of widespread distribution facilities. "Book outlets have been too few in number to allow wide display of low-cost titles, and . . . potential buyers were not reached." The Retail Bookseller, which is concerned of course with proving that book prices are not too high, expresses doubt that this potential market exists and repeats the old argument that a low price makes people suspect there is something wrong with the product; it does not go on to say what I suspect is far more to the point, that bookstores, which to judge by their relatively small number are not highly profitable enterprises, naturally prefer to display and sell those books which yield a greater unit return.

The arguments of the Retail Bookseller seem to me to be weakened by the fact that cheap reprints are sold in large quantities; it was new books that Modern Age was unable to sell successfully at low prices. This does not mean, however, that I subscribe to the theory that books are just another commodity, like toothpaste, and susceptible to the same methods of mass production and sale. The habit of cleaning one's teeth is almost universal; the market for toothpaste need not be created but only competed for. The habit of reading is fairly widespread, to judge by the circulation of cheap magazines—though these magazines are kept going by advertisers, not by readers. The habit of reading books is relatively much less common; and while I think there is a great potential market, the problem of opening it up involves cultural as well as economic factors. The editor of Modern Age thinks that "the more successful Pocket Books, Penguin, and other low-cost ventures become, the wider will be the distribution of reprint titles. And in time, if a successful tradition of sale continues, distribution outlets will spring up around these low-cost books. From that point on it should be possible to issue an occasional new book." However, he thinks "it is bound to be years before the practice of issuing new books at low cost can become general in America. It costs more to manufacture new books, and of course they lack the initial sales advantage possessed by a reprint of a previous best-seller. From every point of view they are a greater economic risk than reprint publications." This sounds sensible, though it seems unlikely that this increased book-buying public will ever be inclined to pay $2.50 for an unknown new book when it has got used to buying books of known value for 25 cents.

The Retail Bookseller concludes, a little triumphantly, that "books do not cost so much!" As a stubborn consumer I should put it differently. The success of reprints—of which the apparent prosperity of the Readers' Club is another example—and the testimony of my own pocket-book convince me that new books do cost too much, but this seems to be a necessary evil which will continue as long as the pattern of their production and sale follows, for whatever reasons, that of Rolls Royces rather than Fords. It will continue, in other words, until the potential large market, which I believe exists, is opened up and the publishing business can be shifted to something like a mass-production basis.

MARGARET MARSHALL

A Call for Action

THE TIME IS NOW! By Pierre van Paassen. The Dial Press. $1.

MR. VAN PAASSEN has written a brilliant sketch of Hitler's present ambitions, particularly with respect to the United States. Of the many speculations on that subject which have been poured out in recent months no other has seemed to hit the nail so squarely on the head. Despite some wild statements about the alleged influence of the Munich Geopolitical Institute on German foreign policy during the last two generations, which I shall return to, he has succeeded to a truly remarkable degree in penetrating to the inner nerve of Hitler's policy, the logic behind his moves, his subterfuges, and his devices.

Mr. van Paassen rightly recognizes as the pivotal point of Hitler's policy his remarkable attempt to win a war that is essentially a war to control the seas without a navy and on land. Hitler is pitting his armies against the British navy in an attempt to bring the whole of the Old World under his control; he is trying to eliminate Britain as a world power by systematically depriving it of any foothold on the land, while at the same time he seeks to dominate the shipping lanes of the world by means of submarines and planes. His ultimate objective is to encircle, after the defeat of Britain, the last source of resistance to his plans, the United States—in the east from Iceland and Greenland to the Azores, Dakar, and the Cape, and in the west from the Behring Sea to Singapore.

In tracing out this sweeping plan of campaign in more detail Van Paassen scores many hits against the blind optimism that has obscured it. The German drive in the Balkans, far from being an act of desperation to prevent the British from creating an eastern front, "was a carefully executed, perfectly timed detail of the master-plan." "When Hitler loudly blamed British and American diplomacy for Belgrade's final decision to make a stand, we fell into the trap. We failed to realize that this resistance to his demands was precisely what he desired, and that he had engineered matters to that end." Van Paassen thinks Hitler's plans in the Near East include a drive along the African east coast to Cape Town, where the nationalist Boer opposition would enable him to stage a repetition of the Sudetenland farce, and an advance through Persia and Afghanistan to India.

In the final act of the drama, when the whole of Africa and of the Near and Middle East had fallen into German hands, the United States would face in "splendid isolation" a hostile Old World. With insufficient forces to defend the whole of the Americas' 30,000 miles of coastline, we should be forced to give up the greater part of South America "desperately clamping ourselves to what are, after all, mere secondary positions at Panama and in the Caribbean."

To avert such an encirclement Van Paassen proposes the immediate dispatch of an expeditionary force to Dakar, in order to prevent Hitler from seizing this decisive point in the "world-wide pincer movement of the Axis against the Western Hemisphere" and the Cape Verde, Canary, and Azores Islands; the staging of a naval demonstration at Singapore, to assist Britain in the defense of India against the Germans attacking from the west and the Japanese from the east; and the immediate drafting of a plan of full cooperation between the American and British navies, with the American fleet conveying war material to Britain, in order that the Battle of the Atlantic may not be lost to Hitler.

To see America in the role of a mere sympathetic onlooker to Britain's tragedy is Herr Hitler's fondest desire. For his projects envisage the consecutive, separate, installment-plan conquests of Britain and America modeled on the tactics he has so far pursued, on a miniature scale, in Europe.

Mr. van Paassen's penetrating analysis of Hitler's strategy would be even more admirable if, in his eagerness to enhance the force of his warnings, he had not attempted to bolster them up with a series of grotesque statements about the influence of the Geopolitical Institute, and to present Hitler's plans for world domination merely as the execution of the schemes evolved over almost half a century by that institution. To assert that "the real conflict between the Kaiser and Bismarck was based on Wilhelm's adoption of geopolitical ideas then sponsored by the Institute of Political Oceanography" and that "Kaiser Wilhelm believed in Germany's destiny as a mistress of not only Europe but of the whole world" is as grotesque a falsification of history as the statement that "the Geopolitical Institute has existed since 1897, and its ideology has fermented in the minds of German political thinkers since 1870," and that "the German government—whether a Kaiserreich, republic, or totalitarian state—enthusiastically sponsored a planning academy whose function was to develop a long-range project for the domination of the world." The truth is that German foreign policy has had no such continuity as is here ascribed to it; it did not harbor under the Kaiser, still less under the Weimar Republic, any such worldwide ambitions as have dominated it under the Nazis. As to the Geopolitical Institute and its alleged influence as the "Reich's political and military planning academy," all talk about the institute's existence prior to the World War is nonsense. The geopolitical movement, not the institute, rose under the influence of the defeat and in opposition to the Weimar Republic; and its influence, or rather that of its head, Professor Haushofer, dates from Hitler's accession to power in 1933.

HERBERT ROSINSKI

Eros and Agape

LOVE IN THE WESTERN WORLD. By Denis de Rougemont. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE perfectly handsome and good young man meets the perfectly lovely and good young woman amid the perfectly beautiful and good scenery of nature, and soon they are that way about each other. Of course, there are obstacles—to make the story interesting—but one by one they are overcome. The rivals are honest enough to reveal themselves in their true light, the husbands and wives considerate enough to die and leave a fortune, and the curtain falls to the music of the angels as the divine pair fall into each other's arms forever. All this is not a myth; it really happened; the camera and technicolor cannot lie.

But how are Tom and Mary, for whom the curtain does not fall, to do likewise?

"It isn't easy," Tom reflects, "to be a god. Is any razor blade or hair cream really fool-proof? Is my tailor reliable? What job will bring me ten thousand dollars a year, yet not take up any of my time?" "It isn't easy," Mary also reflects, "to be a goddess, when it's always August underneath the arms. Ought I to change my diet? Is my laundry a tattle-tale gray? Do I serve the right coffee? Will having a child ruin my ankles?"

And of course their fears are justified. They cease to be gods to each other and become unromantic human beings, smelly, aging, selfish, and irritable. But they have been brought up to believe in the myth of passion; that is, that only perfection is worthy to be loved. "Tom never calls me the only girl in the world now," moans Mary, and Tom hums grimly,

I took her for better or worse but she Was worse than I took her for, and it is hardly surprising if they seek in a series of "affairs" to rekindle the sacred flame.

"Love in the Western World" is a history of this romantic myth from its inception in the courtly love of Provence down to its latest personal and political forms. Its thesis may be summarized thus: at the root of the romantic conception of ideal sexual passion lies Manichaeism, a dualistic heresy introduced into Europe from the East, which held matter to be the creation of the Evil One and therefore incapable of salvation. From this it follows that all human institutions like marriage are corrupt, and perfection can be reached only by death, in which the limitations of matter are finally transcended and the soul is merged into the infinite nothingness of the Logos. The primary expression of this myth is the Tristan legend which culminates in Wagner's opera. To Tristan and Isolde love is, first, something predestined, for which they have no moral responsibility, and, second, something which can exist in the world of time only so long as there are obstacles to its physical consummation; only after death can they be at last eternally identified in the Infinite.

June 28, 1941

This legend in its turn creates its negative mirror image, the legend that begins with Jean de Meung and culminates in Mozart's Don Giovanni. Here it is the flesh that is asserted and the spirit that is denied; the present moment is all, the eternal future nothing. Tristan sees time as something evil to be passively endured; Don Juan sees time as something evil to be aggressively destroyed: the former is a suicide, the latter a murderer. But they have three things in common: both are interesting sinners; both lack all knowledge of the beloved as a person; both "appear sword in hand." The two sides of the myth can combine only in a collective form, in warfare, where every individual is at one and the same time the masochistic murderess and the sadistic murderer, or in the political relationship of the impassioned leader and the impassioned masses.

Equally opposed to both isotopes of Eros stands the Christian doctrine of Agape.

The incarnation of the Word in the world is the astounding event whereby we are delivered from the woe of being alive . . . for the Incarnation to have occurred is the radical negation of every kind of religion . . . [which] tends to sublimate man, and leads to the condemning of his "finite" life . . . men can only achieve salvation by ceasing to be, by being "lost" in the bosom of the divine. But in Christianity this process is completely inverted. What the Gospel calls dying to self is the beginning of a new life already here below. It is an immediate reassertion, not of course of the old life, and not of an ideal life, but of our present life now repossessed by the Spirit. . . . Thereupon to love is no longer to reject the act of love. To Eros individual beings were so many defects of the one and only being and as such none was susceptible of being really loved. . . . Christian love is obedience in the present. For to love God is to obey God, who has commanded us to love one another. In reply to the ironical question: "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus answered: "Whoever has need of you."

My only criticism of Mr. de Rougemont's profound and brilliant study is that I find his definition of Eros a little vague. He sometimes speaks as if he meant, which I am sure he does not, that Eros is of sexual origin and that there is a dualistic division between Agape and Eros rather than—what I am sure he believes—a dialectical relation. For Eros, surely, is "amor sementa in voi d'ogni virtute, e d'ogni operazione che merta pene," the basic will to self-actualization without which no creature can exist, and Agape is that Eros mutated by Grace, a conversion, not an addition, the Law fulfilled, not the Law destroyed. That is why the symbol of Agape is not the act of sex but the act of nutrition: just because eating is the one primal act common to all living organisms irrespective of species, race, age, sex, or consciousness, the one act in which, since we demand all and give nothing, we are necessarily completely alone, therefore only this act can testify to the utter dependence of all creatures on each other, to the fact that everyone is our neighbor.

Non-human nature lives in the world of the actual, and its Eros finds there its natural limits. As a physical organism man lives in the same world, but as a conscious being he also lives in the world of the possible. The task of the human Eros is how to actualize the possible by a series of decisions in which one future possibility is grasped by the present, and the rest thereby rendered impossible. But to be aware that more than one possibility exists is to be aware that it is possible to make the wrong decision, that self-actualization is only achieved if the right decision is taken, and that if any of the wrong decisions are taken, the result will be self-negation. The human Eros is thus placed in a "catastrophic situation," to avoid the reality of which it tends to flee in two directions. Either it hides from the possible and attempts to live, like the animals, only in the actual. But for man the actual is no longer in fact limiting on his consciousness, so that, unless he goes mad, the result is the opposite of his intention; the conscious world of possibilities invades and destroys the unconscious world of actualities. Don Juan's intelligence tyrannizes over his phallus, and his relations with women are a succession of possible relationships that are never realized.

Or, alternatively, man's Eros can hide from the actual and attempt to live only in the possible; but again, since his physical body in fact is limited by the actual, unless he gets sick, the result is that the physical world invades and destroys his consciousness. Tristan's relation to Isolde has no possibilities because it is tied to a past event—the drinking of the love potion.

How is man to be delivered from "the body of this death," so that his Eros may have the courage to take decisions? His first answer is a collective one, the Myth and the Law, whereby rules are laid down for all specific occasions, and the number of conscious possibilities is reduced to a minimum. But this works only as long as the collective Eros is strong enough to submerge the individual Eros; as soon as a society begins to differentiate, the individual becomes conscious of more possibilities than society officially admits, and realizes that the polytheistic myths are only social conventions. Now, either, like the Chinese, he must accept this fact and sacrifice development to stability or, like the West, he must face the catastrophic situation alone. It is at this point of historical development that the concept of passion appears. Sex as a collective unconscious force had been worshiped before (e. g., sacred prostitution), but now for the first time self-actualization is thought of in terms of a single conscious sexual relationship which gathers to it all the functions which had previously been discharged by the many collective myths; hence its greater intensity. Once again its purpose is the same, to eliminate the possibility of making wrong decisions, to dispense with what the Christian believes to be essential, namely, Faith.

Though the myth of passion has a long history, men's actual sexual relationships continued to be, to a large degree, conditioned by unromantic social conventions, and it is not until the nineteenth century that both religious faith and bourgeois convention become weak enough for the myth to be regarded as a scientific theory of life. It is only in the past hundred years that people have seriously tried to marry their mater-imagos or their lame shadows, and it is only quite recently that, dismayed at the failure of this attempt, they have denied the significance of personal relations altogether and returned to a collective and political myth of Eros.

In the last few chapters of his book Mr. de Rougemont states the Christian doctrine of marriage, which will seem absurdly straightlaced to the hedonist and shockingly coarse to the romantic. But perhaps the unpleasant consequences of romantic love and romantic politics are making thoughtful people more willing to reconsider it than they were while a bourgeois convention, which professed to be Christian but was nothing of the kind, was still à la mode.

W. H. AUDEN

Norman Thomas's Odyssey

WE HAVE A FUTURE. By Norman Thomas. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

CANDOR has always been a rare virtue. It is growing rarer in these days of sharp cleavages and neurotic extolment of causes which those who shout loudest often neither understand nor care about. The appearance of a frank and honest examination of vital social problems is therefore an exhilarating experience. "We Have a Future," by Norman Thomas, is just such an examination.

Although it deals with the thesis which has absorbed Norman Thomas all through his long public career, this book differs from most of his other works, and from books written by other Socialists, in that it reveals the author to be no longer paying homage to some of the fetishes in which every good Socialist has heretofore had to profess a belief. He refuses, for instance, to cling to the theory of the class struggle in a world where the effort to create a classless society in a country spreading over one-sixth of the earth's surface produced the Stalin bureaucracy. Even more meaningless, he believes, is this theory in our own country, where workers, farmers, technicians, and professionals think of themselves "to an amazing degree as middle class." The same reasoning leads him to discard the sentimental notion that the wage-earner is destined to become society's messiah. Reduced to the status of "romantic nonsense" is the thought of successful violent revolution in these days of bombers, tanks, and artillery. Instead, "any program of social action must be more or less gradual, however revolutionary its goal." Mr. Thomas has even abandoned hope of a labor party in this country.

He has discovered no infallible or dogmatic guide for achieving a good society. We need wisdom and skill, hope, conviction, and loyalty; and, above all, he says, we must safeguard the democratic channels within which these qualities may be utilized in planning and experiment. Whether the experimentation leads to a greater or lesser degree of collectivism or individualism is not so important. What is important is that we have a clear idea of the end to be sought—abundance for all and freedom for the individual.

Most liberals will approve of these ends and means. On one point only does Mr. Thomas invite argument. He still firmly believes—or perhaps it is only a fervent hope—that these ends can be sought and attained without a military defeat of the forces of aggression now abroad in the world. It is precisely this part of his argument, however, which recommends the book to all those who by the long or short route have made peace with themselves in the matter of aiding Britain, defeating Hitlerism, and redeeming democracy at no matter what cost. The book will not alter their convictions, but it will give them a necessary realization of the risks involved. More than that, it will, or should, make them aware of the stark fact that war alone, even victorious war, will not automatically provide the basis for a decent society. This delusion is common and must be guarded against.

"What sort of material," he asks, "will survive the war on either side of the Channel to build the new world?" His contention that you cannot bomb people into sanity can hardly be gainsaid. "What sort of new generation, starved in body and sick in soul with the horrors amid which they have grown up, will be left for the tasks that lie ahead? What formula of democracy can they carry out? Granting that the peoples of occupied countries will hate Germany and the Germans, will they love England and the English after two, three, four, or more years of blockade? Or will new hates be added to the old?"

"We Have a Future" is probably the nearest Norman Thomas will get to an autobiography for a long time. It is a statement of deeply cherished convictions, of shattered hopes, yet of abounding faith in the decency of man, the vitality of democracy, and the ultimate combination of the two in the endeavor to bring about a saner world. This hopeful outlook is due in large measure to the fact that he will not allow himself the "luxury of despair." As a writer and speaker Norman Thomas is always crisp, keen, and stimulating. In this latest product of his brain and pen these qualities are at their best.

Elizabeth Madox Roberts

NOT BY STRANGE GODS. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

MISS ROBERTS died four days before this volume of short stories was published. She was fifty-five, and her first book, "Under the Tree," a volume of short poems about childhood, came out nineteen years ago. In those nineteen years she published two volumes of verse, two of short stories, and seven novels, or more than a book a year. She must have been writing steadily, and it is easy to believe that she did little else. She never married, she was painfully shy, she stayed close to Kentucky, where she was born and where she died. Her life was uneventful in a superficial sense, probably, but in the world she had made she must have lived intensely and passionately.

This world is, by the map, Kentucky. But it is a Kentucky that lived solely in Miss Roberts's mind and heart. Her first and best novel, "The Time of Man," introduces a Kentucky

Tobacco Road. The food is bacon and pone, the houses are cabins, nobody has enough to wear or to eat, nobody goes anywhere or does anything except be born and grow up and marry and die. But this world is as different from Mr. Caldwell's world as day from night. Out of his shiftless poor whites Mr. Caldwell wrings irony, wit, tragic squalor. Miss Roberts is without humor and she is never squalid. Nobody was ever less of a tractarian than she. A good illustration of this is the first story in "Not by Strange Gods," The Haunted Palace. In it a fine manor house, deserted by the gentry that had once lived in it, tumbling down, set in a tangled park, is taken over by a share-cropper and his family. In the great parlors, with their carved white woodwork and their polished floors, the share-cropper and his wife bring their sheep at lambing time. The house is filled with ghosts—of the music that had been made on the grand piano, of blue and gold wall hangings, of stables full of blooded horses, and a lovingly tended garden. But the polished floors are slippery and wet, and two dead lambs have been thrown in the great fireplace out of the way. In about thirty pages Miss Roberts presents two completely different modes of living, two educations, two cultures. But she is not concerned with whether one is "better" than the other, or whether one is the result of the other. Here they are, sharply drawn, and moral judgments are complicated things. If you must have one, you will have to make it yourself.

In this world she has made there is a great deal of poetry. It is in the songs the people sing, the thoughts the young girls—and even the old men—have, most of all in their common speech: "I want to be like you are, but you want to be like some other kind you can't name or say." "There's always fault on both sides, though, and it's never all one person's blame, I always say." "Then I recollect spring. Yes I recall. Then come fall and warm politics on. I recollect the barbecue on the creek and old man Hardin on the stump for office." "I feel like I could pick up a hill or I could break open a mountain with my fist, and what call have I got to be afeared of a lonesome sound tonight?" These quotations, chosen at random from several books, are indicative of the poetically unreal, strange, and yet winning speech of Miss Roberts's characters. They are dialect, full of old saws and folk wisdom. Paradoxically, they sound like the authentic speech of these particular people, although these people never lived, in Kentucky or anywhere else.

Miss Roberts's world is never seen quite clearly. There is always the illusion of distance, of muffled sound, of indistinct edges, of a veil between the persons in the book and the reader. Even in "My Heart and My Flesh," when the social stratum is different, and the characters are urbane and cultivated, there is still this feeling of distance, of persons not quite human, although—another paradox—not unreal.

Finally, if in some sense this Kentucky is unreal, it is nevertheless continually fresh and interesting, the language is sweet and strange, the people are warm, passionate, complicated. Although probably Miss Roberts reached her peak in her first book, all the qualities that made it original and appealing are in the last one. American literature would be inestimably poorer if Kentucky had never known her; and if she had never known her own peculiar Kentucky.

Fighting Editor

EDITOR IN POLITICS. By Josephus Daniels. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

"TAR HEEL EDITOR" told the story of the author's early years. The second volume of Mr. Daniels's recollections begins with his taking a job in the Interior Department under Cleveland and ends when he enters Wilson's Cabinet as Secretary of the Navy. In between it is essentially a local story. The politics of the title are North Carolina politics, and the personalities with which the narrative abounds are in the main North Carolina personalities. Cleveland figures, of course, and Bryan; but Mr. Daniels took part in the Bryan campaigns as a representative of his state, and his job under the Cleveland Administration seems, from what he says, to have consisted largely in getting jobs for other North Carolina politicians.

"Politician" as applied to Mr. Daniels has no derogatory implications. A man more transparently, almost naively, honest never lived, nor a more public-spirited citizen. It was only right that a successful candidate should reward those who had contributed to his success, each according to his deserts. Mr. Daniels did not question this any more than he questioned free silver, a low tariff, the Baptist faith, and the maintenance of white supremacy by fair means or, regretably, foul, if necessary. But kindly, charming, and devoted to the welfare of his community as he was, he was no respecter of persons where his principles were involved. He was a courageous fighter for what he thought was right and often risked ruin to uphold it. Within the limitations of his place and time he was a sincere liberal. He not only took a stand against child labor and for shorter hours, better wages, wider and better education, but he did not hesitate to name names, though they were those of the most powerful people in the state. He also exposed persons in clerical, legal, and educational circles who knew on which side their bread was buttered. It is often harder to do this in a small community than to denounce the source of the evil, but he never shrank from the duty.

His reward was the respect and affection of all right-thinking men who knew him. He had not expected high office, but when it was offered to him he accepted it without surprise and as part of his duty to his fellow-citizens. From Cleveland to Wilson the wheel had come full circle, bringing Mr. Daniels once more on to a wider stage. It is scarcely possible for anyone not familiar with the issues which agitated North Carolina in the interval to follow Mr. Daniels's account of these intervening years with interest in all the details. He gains the reader's regard, however, and one looks forward to the volume to come which will cover the Wilson Administration, the War of 1914-18, and Mexico under the New Deal.

IN BRIEF

GENERALS AND GENERALSHIP.

By General Sir Archibald Wavell.
The Macmillan Company. 50 cents.

These lectures would be remarkable for their intelligence, imagination, humor, and humanity at any time. They are even more so when one considers that though they were delivered before the outbreak of the present war they clearly state the essentials for getting the jump on methods since put into practice by the Germans—essentials now obvious but then not grasped even by many civilians, and of course by almost no generals. General Wavell is, moreover, no mere commentator on a particular moment in military history. He draws on a tradition which includes Socrates, Wellington, and Tolstoy; and his mind, like his style, appears to be endowed with simplicity, directness, and flexibility.

SIR RICHARD BURTON'S WIFE. By Jean Burton. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

It may be hard to believe that any woman could be a match for Sir Richard Burton, but his wife was as extraordinary as he was. If he was a devil, she was a whirlwind. The author, who is only a very distant connection, does full justice to her subject. She succeeds in bringing out the comic side without spoiling the dramatic. This is a book to be read for plain enjoyment.

EVERYONE'S CHILDREN, NOBODY'S CHILD. By Justine Wise Polier. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

The author is Children's Court Judge of the Domestic Relations Court of the City of New York. Her case histories naturally come from New York, and the United States as a whole is dealt with mostly in terms of statistics and generalities. A historical section describes attempts to solve the problem of delinquent children in the past, both here and in England. The book brings home the nature and extent of that problem today, but does not offer a radical cure.

WHY FREEDOM MATTERS. By Norman Angell. Penguin Books. 25 cents.

Since the real fight is the fight for freedom, Sir Norman Angell, recognizing that a war cannot be won without a temporary relinquishment of liberty, feels that it is imperative to retain a clear idea of its nature. A vigorous statement of the fundamentals, an exposition of Mill's classic case, and a succinct consideration of the problems of liberty in practice make up a book which no one concerned for a more democratic post-war world should miss.

JOHN DRYDEN. Some Biographical Facts and Problems. By James M. Osborn. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

Though Dryden has recently resumed his place as a major English poet, it will probably never be possible to present his life and character fully or picturesquely, for the simple reason that he died just a little before the time when it became usual to preserve the sort of records necessary for a colorful biography. But modern antiquarian research is so much more systematic and laborious than anything dreamed of by persons who lived much nearer to Dryden that small points may still be cleared up and certain traditions either documented or discredited. In the present volume the author first minutely examines the sources and methods of all the important early biographers of Dryden and then presents the results of his own investigation of various minor questions. The result is not likely to make any great appeal to the average reader, but it will prove invaluable to students of the subject. The book is an impressive demonstration of the author's competence in the highly specialized field of antiquarian investigation.

THEODORE SCHROEDER

COSCOB, CONN.

RECORDS

COLUMBIA gives us three works recorded by Stokowski with the American Youth Orchestra (whether last year's orchestra or this year's is not revealed): Beethoven's Fifth Symphony (Set 451, $5.50), Brahms's Fourth Symphony (Set 452, $6.50), and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite (Set 446, $3.50). The few comments on these sets that I have seen have found Stokowski's handling of Beethoven and Brahms open to question but his handling of Stravinsky admirable, and have praised Columbia's recording of the performances. To me it seems that the fussy phrasing, the exaggerated nuances, the constant swelling and contracting of lush tone, all adding up to what I would call a heavily perfumed style, falsify the character of Stravinsky's Ronde des princesses and Berceuse no less than that of Beethoven's and Brahms's music. And on a high-fidelity phonograph the recorded sound of the Ronde (Side 2) is accompanied by rattle and grit; while that of the Danse infernale screams and screeches on top and is thin, hard, without body, depth and warmth in the middle and bass (I have never heard anything like the horrible noise produced by the beginning of Side 4). The sound of Beethoven's Fifth has more body—which means, I presume, better proportion of low and middle to high frequencies—but is cold and harsh on a high-fidelity machine. And even the Brahms, which is the best of the three in depth and roundness, lacks warmth and has another defect of Columbia recording—the false relations of space and volume exemplified by what happens in the second variation of the last-movement passacaglia: the oboe and clarinet which lead off, apparently at some distance from the microphone, are joined by other woodwinds that sound much closer.

There is no warmth, but only hard, clear, and occasionally piercing brilliance, as well as increases of sonority that blast one out of the room, in the best of Columbia's recent orchestral recordings—that of Rodzinski's taut performance of the "Rosenkavalier" waltzes with the Cleveland Orchestra (11542-D, $1). Perhaps Columbia would achieve more if it attempted less—if it did not undertake to outdo what anyone else is doing in frequency- and volume-range, and tried merely to do as much as is done on its superb imported Beecham records of "Carmen" and the "Haffner" Symphony and "Francesca da Rimini," or on Victor's imported Furtwängler records of the "Pathétique" Symphony, "Tristan," and "Parsifal." I would be content if it achieved with Stokowski the clarity and fidelity, the depth and body and warmth of his first Victor recording (Set 53) of the "Firebird" Suite; and for that matter I would be content if Stokowski himself achieved the performance on those records of ten or twelve years ago, made before his style had developed its present elephantiasis.

The Columbia Stokowski recordings are more agreeable to the ear with the treble of a high-fidelity machine reduced, or on a small machine of reduced frequency-range that cuts off the high-frequency harshness and grit as well as the high-frequency musical sound. One should reduce the treble also for Lotte Lehmann's records of Brahms songs (Set 453, $4), which, played with wide range, produce rattle and grit along with admirably faithful sound of her voice. The songs include very good ones like "Wie bist du, meine Königin" (17273) and "Die Mainacht" (71060), slight but charming ones like "Sonntag" and "O liebliche Wangen" (71060), and others that I don't care for like "Wir wandelten" (17273), "An die Nachtigall" and "Auf dem Kirchhofe" (17274), and three folksongs—"Erleube mir, Feinsmädchen," "Da unten im Tale," and "Feinsliebchen, du sollst mir nicht barfuss gehen." The last of these Lehmann sings a little too archly, and there are the occasional sharp intakes of breath; but on the whole the singing and phrasing are lovely.

I keep wishing for a recording of all the fascinating "Dix pièces pittoresques" of Chabrier that Balanchine used in "Cotillon"; meanwhile Columbia offers one of the pieces, the Scherzo-Valse, rattled off perfunctorily by Casadesu, with a less interesting Impromptu by Chabrier on the reverse side of the record (71061-D, $1). On another single are three spirituals—"Lit'l Boy," "I Want to Go Home," "You're Tired, Chile!"—which I find less impressive in themselves than in the way they are sung by Roland Hayes (17275-D, $75). And Roy Harris's String Quartet No. 3, well performed by the Roth Quartet (Set 450, $4.50), is some more of this composer's windy incoherence to express the Oklahoma plains and character (is there no Oklahoman to protest?).

Letters to the Editors

Production Comes First

Dear Sirs: I have been pleased to note in these last critical months that The Nation has taken a realistic attitude toward world events, but I am somewhat up in the air after reading the editorial The Coming Labor Crisis in the June 7 issue.

I am in the A. F. of L.—or was until the Typographical Union stepped out—and a Socialist. I naturally believe in the right to strike. But I also believe that right should be suspended in times of national danger. Fully appreciating that living costs are rising and that big employers never grant just and proper wages voluntarily, I nevertheless believe some machinery should be set up by our national government very soon to effect all-out war-time production. Strikes seriously hamper such production. Industry certainly contributes more than its share to the casus belli in strikes. Both industry and labor, therefore, should be made to toe the line.

I am not acquainted with all the provisions of the Vinson compulsory-labor-mediation bill, but I believe compulsory mediation of some sort, with a federal body fixing wages and working conditions in an industry where a labor dispute exists, is the answer today. Such a body would not order a "cooling-off" period before strikes but would step in immediately, keep up production, and make all its orders retroactive from the time the dispute started. Labor and industry would have to abide by its decisions.

This may seem heresy for a man in the labor movement, but I am also an American who looks with horror at the bloody shambles in Europe and sees nothing but slavery for labor throughout the world should Hitler win.

ARTHUR P. WIESNER

One Way to Fight Inflation

Dear Sirs: I was interested in reading the article Luxury or Liberty? by Maxwell S. Stewart, in your issue of May 24. He is undoubtedly right in pointing out the danger of inflation arising from an increase in the national income without a corresponding increase in the consumers' goods available for purchase. Likewise, he is right when he says that the best way to avoid that danger "is to attack purchasing power directly." As methods for effective attack he cites these three: "taxation, compulsory savings, and restrictions on consumers' credit."

It seems to me that there is a fourth method from which great results can be hoped. I refer to the Defense Savings Bond and Stamp Program inaugurated by the government on May 1. This, of course, contains no elements of compulsion, but it does have in it psychological appeals which may be expected to enlist many millions of our people as partners in the American effort. In May it resulted in purchases of these securities amounting in round figures to $442,000,000. The public willingness to take part continues unabated, and it is not unlikely that within a twelve-month several billion dollars will have been put in these securities.

This represents a substantial subtraction from the people's income spendable on consumers' goods and is, in my judgment, one of the most effective preventives of inflation that we have. In essence, it is an American modification, on a basis of free will rather than duress, of the Keynes plan. I think it deserves inclusion as one of the best methods of attacking purchasing power directly.

GEORGE FORT MILTON
Washington, June 19

And One Way to Cause It

Dear Sirs: I recently subscribed to The Nation with high hopes for the chance to read an intelligent, pro-American, pro-civilization journal. But I soon began to suspect that your pro-Americanism was second to your pro-labor policy, and all doubt is removed by reading your editorial The Coming Labor Crisis, in the issue of June 7. You say, "Powerful interests have sought . . . to give the impression that the defense program was being seriously retarded by strikes and labor disputes," which you would have us believe is altogether absurd. And you lament that "the gains which labor has won . . . at great sacrifice during the last few months stand in grave danger of being wiped out by the increased cost of living. . . . These workers will have no recourse except to strike or to threaten to strike." Such a position is not even intelligently pro-labor. For the inflationary spiral which such a policy would inaugurate would engulf labor along with everyone else.

R. L. EDWARDS
Oxford, Ohio, June 18

Vichy's Catholicism

Dear Sirs: In my review of Jacques Maritain's book, "France, My Country, Through the Disaster," I referred to the military castes of France and Spain, leaders in the betrayal of their peoples, as "devout Catholics." Good Catholic friends have written to me that I was wrong. Weygand and Huntziger, they assure me, are practicing Catholics, and so are most of the Spanish counter-revolutionaries, beginning with Generalissimo Franco, but Admiral Darlan was a franc-maçon, who gave up his Masonic affiliations only in order to enter Pétain's government. Pétain, moreover, it appears, "made career with the anti-clerical clan of the army" and, having married a divorced woman, was outside the discipline of the church until recently, when the death of his wife's former husband enabled him to make his peace with Rome. This, my correspondents remind me, is scarcely the behavior of a "devout Catholic."

For the sake of accuracy, these details should be noted. But of course they do not weaken my point about the religion of the people of France, or my regret that M. Maritain did not bring to bear upon this crucial weakness the critical clairvoyance of his love.

A Labor Policy for Defense

Dear Sirs: In the hysteria that has been aroused recently in regard to American labor and the defense program, constructive thinking has been almost totally lacking. It will interest your readers to know, therefore, that the executive committee of the Union for Democratic Action, composed of educators, labor leaders, and qualified writers on social problems, sat down quietly and worked out a statement of policy which has as its purpose the defense of democracy at home and abroad. The statement follows:

The Union for Democratic Action congratulates the Congress of Industrial Organizations (C. I. O.) for its action against the wild-cat strike in the Los Angeles plant of the North American Aviation Company. This strike was clearly provoked and led by Communists who exploited the legitimate demands of the strikers for sinister political ends. The attitude of responsible leaders of the C. I. O. is a splendid expression of labor's determination to allow no subversive elements to interfere with production for national defense. The North American plant should be released from army control as soon as normal union-management collective-bargaining relations are restored.

We strongly urge that a limit be set on the discretion allowed local draft boards in decisions to reclassify defense workers participating in strikes. Unlimited use of the Selective Service Act as a strike-breaking weapon would result in a severe loss of labor gains throughout the country.

We believe that the right to strike represents a basic democratic freedom. But in its own interest, as well as in the interest of national defense and democracy, labor should make every effort to avoid strikes by making full use of all conciliation and mediation sources. Strikes can be avoided (1) if labor unions eliminate from their leadership all those who take an irresponsible attitude toward production for national defense and democracy, whether because they owe allegiance to a foreign government, communist or fascist, or because they are merely defeatist; (2) if labor voluntarily outlaws strikes based upon jurisdictional disputes of any kind; (3) if government boards of mediation are so set up that the trade unions have full representation upon them; (4) if adequate machinery is set up to make necessary adjustments in wages in organized and unorganized industries to meet the rising cost of living, and if a determined effort is made by the government to prevent rising living costs; (5) if there is no interference, either from management or government, with efforts to form unions among unorganized workers in accordance with the law; (6) if all legislation to prohibit the right to strike is defeated. Prohibition of the right to strike is as dangerous as infringement of the right to vote. Destruction of union rights and power is the beginning of totalitarianism.

The Union for Democratic Action believes that industrial peace is necessary for national defense against fascism. But industrial peace is a cooperative job of labor unions, management, and government. It calls for cooperation between unions and management. It requires the uprooting of subversive elements in both business and labor. It calls for severe taxation of excess profits; so that labor, the middle class, and farmers may have the assurance that any sacrifices that are made will not redound to the benefit of the owners of industry.

Responsible labor leaders and the rank and file of labor are determined to get full protection. But it must be noted that since last summer infinitely more production has been lost from the "business as usual" attitude of the administrators of industry than from strikes. There was a sitdown strike of corporations last summer, when they refused to take national defense orders until they secured satisfactory amortization and taxation concessions from the government. Shortages of steel, aluminum, magnesium, and electric power threaten defense production because monopoly interests refused to expand their capacity to produce. The refusal of monopoly corporations to subcontract defense orders among smaller enterprises is even now creating bottlenecks and making it impossible to get full use of our economic resources for defense.

Hence the Union for Democratic Action calls for the grant of full powers to the President to take over any productive property that is needed for national defense. Specifically we ask that the President be granted the power to (1) seize any plant not doing its job for defense; (2) seize needed machine tools now being withheld from defense work; (3) force any enterprise sticking to civilian production for higher profits to go into defense work; (4) seize strategic materials now being hoarded in many industries by "forward buying."

Liberals and the War

Dear Sirs: Stanley High's attempt to show that war economy will be directed by liberal statesmen to the ultimate advantage of labor in America and Britain is an insult to the intelligence of those who read the columns of The Nation. The claim that this is a "little people's" war because the little people do all the suffering marks a new low in liberal journalism. If Britain and America do emerge from the war militarily victorious with the present leadership, people like Stanley High will be profoundly disappointed with the "liberal" millennium.

This is not, however, to confirm the Communist thesis that genuine liberals have no business supporting the war; for the Communists would seem to be liable to a similar charge—namely, of abetting in spite of themselves an equally immoral group of imperialists and potential fascists—the Lindberghs, Fords, Hugh Johnsons, McCormicks et al. of the "Western Hemisphere school." It must be said at least to the Communists' credit that they have been astute in discerning the character of their bedfellows, while a number of liberals apparently have not. But if the Communists insist that their particular version of isolationism is a third program to be distinguished sharply from that of the America First Committee, it would seem that the liberals have the same right to make distinctions between the liberal pro-war program and that of the present interventionist clique. To fail to avail oneself of this privilege of logic and to identify the liberal cause with the cause of a Churchill, a Halifax, a Knudsen, or a Stettinius is indicative of a spurious conception of liberalism.

There is justification for a choice—if reluctant—in favor of the cause of tory democracy as against the cause of equally tory Western Hemisphere imperialism, but there is no justification for glozing the facts.
